By the Irish account he was of the race of Fiacha Araidhe, founder of the kingdom of Dal-Araidhe or Dalaradia, and thus one of the Cruthnii or Irish Picts. His father was Setna or Sedna, and his mother, Brig or Briga. He was a native of Mourne, now Magheramorne, a district and village in the barony of Lower Belfast, co. of Antrim, and on the shore of Lough Larne. The year of his birth is variously stated, but the most probable is A.D. 517, which is given by Tighernach, and accepted by Dr. Reeves. His name, which is interpreted "pulchrum pignus" and "faustus," is written Comgall, Comgill, Congal, and by Ussher, Gomogillus. He is said to have been under St. Finnian (Dec. 12), at Clonard, Mòbi Clairenech (Oct. 12), at Glasnevia, and St. Fintan (Oct. 21), at Clonenagh. Apparently after he left St. Fintan and while on his way northward, he was ordained priest by bishop Lugidius at Clonmacnoise, who afterwards used his influence, as others were doing, to prevent St. Comgall's going away from Ireland into Britain. Yielding to their solicitations he returned to the north, and after teaching for some years in the province, founded in A.D. 558 his great monastery at Bennechair-Uladh, now Bangor, in the Ards of Ulster, and co. of Down. (On the derivation and meaning of the name, which is not "Fair or White Choir," but has its root in beanna, the Irish word for horns, peaks, crests, pointed hills or rocks, see Reeves, Ecl. Ant. 199-201.) To his monastery multitudes flocked from all quarters, and for it and kindred institutions he drew up a Rule which was considered one of the chief ones of Ireland, as he himself was one of the eight who composed rules there and formed orders. His most noted disciples at Bangor were Cormac, son of Diarmaid and king of South Leinster, who in his old age abdicated the throne and became a monk in the monastery of Bangor, as is related in the Life of St. Fintan; and St. Columbanus, abbot of Luxeuil and Bobbio, who went out with his companions from Bangor, preached the faith among the Franks, Suevi, and Alemanni, and established monasteries where the institutions of Bangor and the Cursus Scotorum were the chief characteristics. [COLUMBANUS.] But others of his pupils are named, such as St. Lachtain (March 19) of Achadhur, St. Fionnehu (Nov. 25), his successor, and St. Mochua or Cronan (March 30), of Balla. He was uncle of St. Maerubha (April 21), and St. Molua (Aug. 4) is given as his confessor. The author of his life (Vit. c. 22) says that in the 7th year after he founded Bangor, that is in 565, St. Comgall sailed to Britain, intending to visit some of the saints there and stay with them for a time. This is probably the occasion referred to by St. Adamnan (St. Columb. iii. 17), when the four saints, Congellus Mocu Aridi (his tribe name as belonging to the Dal-Araidhe), Cainnechus Mocu Dalon, Brendenus Mocu Alti, and Cormacus Nepos Leathain came to St. Columba on the island of Hiaba. During his stay in Scotland he founded a monastery in Heth (now the island of Tiree), and either now or afterwards he seems to have accompanied St. Columba on a visit to king Brude, at his chief residence on Craig Phadraic, beside Inverness. Yet St. Comgall and St. Columba do not appear to have been always thus friendly, as the battle of Cul-Rathain (now Coleraine) is said to have been occasioned by some dispute between these two saints regarding the church of Ross-Torathair, somewhere near Coleraine. But the quarrel is more likely to have been between the tribes to which the saints severally belonged, and any dispute about monastic jurisdiction may have inclined them to regard the conflict with more favour. After ruling the monastery of Bangor and its dependencies for "ten days, three months and fifty years," as the calendars say, but about forty-four years according to computation, St. Comgall died at Bangor on May 10, A.D. 602, aged eighty-five, having received his viaticum from St. Fiachra (Feb. 8), of Congbail. He is justly reckoned among the fathers of the Irish church. He was buried at Bangor, and the first to open his shrine seems to have been the above-mentioned St. Fiachra, who took out an arm and carried it with him to Leinster. But worse fortune befell the holy place when in 824 the Danes plundered the city and abbey, and breaking open St. Comgall's shrine, scattered the contents to the four winds. (On Bangor and its monastic history, see Reeves, Ecll. Hist. 93-5, 152-4, and Adamnan, 213, 317; Ussher, Ecll. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 473 sq.) Of this saint there are two Lives given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Maii, tom. ii. 577-87); these, along with some miscellaneous extracts, are given by Fleming (Collect. Sacra, 303-16). There is also a life of St. Comgall in the Codex Kilkenn. (in Primate Marsh's Library, Dublin, fol. 90 b), and a metrical composition of great age, called the 'Rule of St. Comgall of Bangor,' written in Irish but probably not the composition of St. Comgall, is preserved in the valuable Irish collection at Brussels. The 'Antiphony' of St. Comgall is still preserved at Milan, and has been published by Muratori; in it there is a curious alphabetical hymn concerning St. Comgall. (On his Life, &c. see more in Lanigan, Ecll. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10; Reeves, Adamnan, pass. and Ecll. Ant. pass.; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 123; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 189, 225 n.; Colgan, Acta SS. 190 b, 192 a, 352, c. 18, 423, and Tr. Thaum. 88, c. 98, 127, c. 65; Ussher, Ecll. Ant. cc. 13-17, wks. v. vi., and see Ind. Chr. A.D. 456, 516; Butler, Lives of the SS. v. 195 sq.; Ulst. Journ. Arch. i. 173, ii. 214-5, 235-6; Ware, Ir. Writ. 5, 27, and Ir. Ant. 93; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 108-10; O'Conor, Ier. Hib. Scrip. ii. 168-9, iv. 45 n., 122 sq., 155.) He is commemorated in the Scotch calendars, but Camerarius places him on Jan. 2, and suggests a Scotch Bangor. His dedications in Scotland were at Durriss, Kincardineshire, and possibly Dercongall, or Drumcongall, now Holywood, in Galloway (Bp. Forbes, ut supra). [J. G.]

If Comgall was not the father of Hibernian monachism, as some overlooking St. Patrick have sought to make him, he was an early and most successful promoter of it. In the 6th century the Irish Bangor, Bangor on the Dee [DINOTHUS], which has been sometimes confounded with it, and Iona, were the three great lights of Celtic Christianity in the British Islands and were already in vigorous activity when the Roman mission first set foot in Kent, A.D. 597. The Celtic church seems to have been, if we may so express it, organised more on a monastic than a diocesan basis. Its strength lay less in great bishops than in great abbats. Its teeming cloisters, reckoning their 3000 inmates—a favourite traditional figure, as Montalembert (iii. 93, 94) remarks—must have been analogous to the colleges that crowd our university towns. The Bangor monastery, like others on the sea-coast, fell on the first appearance of the Danish fleets in the 9th century. The village which now represents it still looks out upon the bay of Belfast, but no vestige remains of the vast institution to which it owes its fame. Ussher (Antiq. Ecll. Brit. c. xvii. wks. 1847, t. vi. p. 483) mentions the Rule of St. Comgall among the four which were extant in his day in archaic Irish. Sir Roger Twissden, as quoted by Tanner (Notitia, Pref. p. ii.), says that the monks of Bangor were not unlike the order of St. Basil, if not of it. Hadrian and Stubbs (i. 116) mention Comgall as one of those who sought to Christianise North Britain in Columba's period, and refer to Reeves for a list of Irish missionaries whose attempts resembled his. They quote the Four Masters and Lanigan for his death in A.D. 601. For the MSS. materials of his life see Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 190, 753). [C. H.]

COMGALL (2) Son of Eochaidh, of Bothconais, Sept. 4. He was brother of Celechrist (March 3), and son of Eochaidh Cais, of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages. His monastery was at Bothconais in Inis-Eoghan, a name which is extinct, but the place is now probably Temple-moyle, in the parish of Culdaff, barony of Inishowen and county of Donegal. He is said to have received this monastery from St. Cianan (Nov. 24) of Duleek, but his brother died A.D. 722 [CELE-CHRIST], and St. Cianan was a contemporary of St. Patrick [CIANAN] (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 237; Colgan, Acta SS. 454, 455, nn. 2, 4; Lanigan, Ecll. Hist. Ir. i. 345, iii. 162). [J. G.]

(3) Of Gobhal-luinn, July 28. His monastery was at what is now Galloon, in the S.E. corner of Fermanagh, and seems to have been included in the ancient Dartraighe-Coininse, which has given its name to the barony of Dartry in the S.W. of Monaghan, at the head of Loch Erne (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 205). On July 27 Butler (Lives of the SS. vii. 423) gives a short memoir of St. Congall, abbat of Iabhnallivinn, and says that before his death he committed the government of his monastery on the upper part of Lough Erne to his beloved disciple St. Fegnarnach. [J. G.]

COMGAN (COMDHAN, CONGAN).

(1) Of Cluain-Connaidh, Oct. 13. Among the relatives of St. Columba we find St. Comganus, son of Degillus, and of Cuman or Camenia, sister of St. Columba. Maguir thinks this was St. Comgan of Glenn-Uissen (Feb. 27), but Colgan is of opinion that it must either be Comgan Kele-de or Deicola, or else Congan of Cluain-Clonnaidh, in Cuirene (in the barony of Kilkenny West, Westmeath), but in support of this he quotes from the Four Masters, A.D. 663, the obit of St. Comman Mac Ua Theimhne (Feb. 27). (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 478 n. 3, 479 n. 13.) [CONGAN.]

(2) Of Glenn-Uissen, Feb. 27. He was son of Diarmaid, son of Deghaidh, of the race of Cormac Cas, son of Oilioil Olum, and his mother was Ethne, daughter of Feidhlimidh, son of Tighernach; but as to his also being nephew to St. Columba, Colgan shews that this could not have been, the chief reasons being the chronological, and the paternity of Feidhlimidh. He founded a monastery in his native province at Ceann-indis or Keann-indse, and succeeded St. Diarmaid (July 8) in the government of the monastery at Glenn-uissen (now Killeshin, a parish and a remarkable glen called the Cut of Killeshin, situated about two Irish miles to the west of the town of Carlow). The precise year of his death is unknown, but it must have been before A.D. 569 if the story be true which represents St. Ita (Jan. 15) as attending his deathbed, and closing his mouth when dead, which was believed to secure for him eternal safety. (Lanigan, Ecll. Hist. Ir. ii. 76 sq.; Reeves, Adamnan, lxx. n.; Bollandists, Acta SS. Feb. tom. iii. 682; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 464 n. 7; Archdall, Mon. Hib. 398.) [J. G.]

COMMAN is a not uncommon name among the Irish saints, and is often exchanged with Colman, Comgan, Coeman.

COMMAN (1) Mac Ua Theimhne, Feb. 27. Colgan (Acta SS. 417) distinguishes "St. Comgan Hua Teanne" from St. Comgan of Glenn-uissen (whose commemoration is on the same day), and gives from the Irish Annals the date of the former's death as A.D. 663, in the great mortality in Ireland. O'Donovan is of opinion that he was probably the brother of Muirchu Maccuthennius, who wrote a Life of St. Patrick from the dictation of Aidus, bishop of Sletty, as stated in the Book of Armagh (fol. 20, b. 1), and if so he may have been son of Cogitosus. [COGITOSUS.] (Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 274 n. ^m, 275.)

(2) Of Roscommon (Ross-Comman), Dec. 26. Regarding this saint there is no little confusion. Ussher (Ecl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 532-3, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 540), quoting from a Life of the saint, tells of a Coeman or Comman, of the seed-royal of Ulster, whose father was Fealcón and mother Scribside, and who, having been educated by St. Finnian of Clonard (Dec. 12), received from the king of Connaught the rich and fertile vale of Ross, where he built his monastery, and gave his name to the whole county of Roscommon. On this authority Colgan places him among the disciples of St. Finnian, but this legend appears to be a later invention, and it seems best to follow the Four Mast. with Ware and Lanigan, and place his decease in the year 742, though O'Donovan would prefer the earlier foundation of Roscommon by St. Comman, and Colgan and Ware adopt both dates in different parts of their writings. He is said to have been of the race of Irial, son of Connall Cearnach. He wrote a monastic Rule, and in the Annals, about the year 790, there is mention made of the promulgation of "the law of St. Coman" throughout the three divisions of Connaught. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 343, 349, 395; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 349; Colgan, Acta SS. 405 b, 721 n. ¹²; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. ii. 225, iii. 177-8; Ware, Ir. Writ. 14, and Ir. Ant. 113.)

COMMANDMENTS. [DECALOGUE.]

COMMENTATORS, ANCIENT. [INTERPRETATION, BIBLICAL.]

COMMODIANUS, the author of two Latin poems entitled respectively, "Instructiones adversus Gentium Deos pro Christiana disciplina," and, "Carmen Apologeticum adversus Judaeos et Gentes." The Instructiones were discovered by Sirmond, and first edited by Rigault, at Toul. 1650; the Apology was first published, 1852, in the Spicilegium Solisvicense of Dom. Pitra, from a MS. in the Middlehill collection, said to have been brought from the monastery of Bobbio. The poet is mentioned by Gennadius (De Vir. Illust. c. 15), who speaks slightly of his versification and latinity. His Instructiones are included "inter apocrypha" in a synodal decree of Gelasius (Concil. tom. iv.), most probably on account of certain heterodox statements they contain respecting Antichrist, the Millennium, and the First Resurrection. With these exceptions, ancient writers appear to be silent respecting him. The question as to the age in which he lived has been the subject of much dispute. Rigault was of opinion that a corrupt passage of the Instructiones (§ xxxiii. 5) contained an allusion to pope Silvester, the contemporary of Constantine, and Clinton (Fast. Rom. vol. ii. p. 450) places him even later for reasons which, however ingenious, are insufficient to outweigh the internal evidence of the poem, that the author lived in the days of persecution. The style of the Instructiones points to the age of Cyprian, with whose works they have more than once been edited. There is an allusion to the Novatian Schism (§ xlvii. ad fin.), and the language of § liii. seems to be aimed against the "Thurificati" and "Libellatici" of the 3rd century. In § lxvi. 12 there is mention of a "subdola pax," which Cave refers to the temporary quiet enjoyed by the Christians under Gallienus, after the Decian and before the Aurelian persecution. Other expressions (e.g. agonia propinqua, § liii. 10) clearly point to the expectation of fresh suffering. But the most important passage as affecting the date of the poem is one in which the author upbraids the Gentiles for perseverance in their unbelief, though Christianity has prevailed for 200 years (§ vi. 2), and this, which singularly enough seems to have escaped the notice of the earlier critics, must be held to fix the date of Commodian approximately to the year A.D. 250. The barbarity of his style, and the peculiarity of certain words he uses (e.g. Zabulo, Zacones), led Rigault to infer that he was of African extraction. It is true that he applies to himself the epithet "Gazaeus," but this refers in all probability to his dependence upon the treasury of the church (gazophylacium) for support, and not to any connexion with Gaza. Originally a heathen (Instruct. Praef., 5, § xxvi. 24), he was converted by the perusal of the Scriptures (Praef. 6), and if the words "Explicit tractatus sancti Episcopi . . ." discovered on the MS. of the Carmen Apologeticum by Pitra, may be taken to refer to the author of the poem, who, from internal evidence, is conclusively proved to have been Commodian, it would seem that he ultimately became a bishop.

The works of Commodian, though utterly valueless in a literary sense, are of considerable interest as a landmark in the history of the Latin language. Although purporting to be written in hexameter verse, they are composed with regard not to quantity but to accent only. The following lines may be taken as a specimen of these Versus Politici, as they are called; they are part of a remonstrance against the pomp of female dress, which at least has the merit of strong moral earnestness:

"Obruitis collum monilibus, gemmis et auro,
Necnon et in auris gravissimo pondere pendent:
Quid memorem vestes et totam Zabuli pompam?
Respuitis legem, cum vultis mundo placere."

From this example it will be seen, that at the time when Commodian lived, the change had already passed upon the Latin tongue, which gradually resulted in the formation of the Romance languages. The poet, not having been brought up, like Ausonius and Claudian, in the schools of Alexandria or Gaul, read Virgil as he would have scanned his own lines by accent alone, and, in attempting to imitate him, set to work much as a modern scholar might do who was unacquainted with the rules of prosody. For further information upon this subject, the student is referred to an interesting paper by Mr. H. A. J. Munro, upon an inscription copied by Dean Blakesley, at Cirta (Transact. Camb. Phil. Soc., vol. x., part ii., 9).

The Instructions are divided into 80 sections, each of which is an acrostic, and denotes its title by its initial letters. To this rule the 60th is an exception, which, being in sense a repetition of the preceding section, follows instead the order of the alphabet. The last section read backwards gives Commodianus Mendicium Christi. The poem contains over 1200 verses. The Apology, which is imperfect, consists of 1020 lines, divided into 47 sections. The text of both poems is very corrupt.

The first edition of the Instructions is that of Rigault, 4to, 1650 (Tulli Leucorum); the latest is to be found in Migne's Patrologia, vol. v. The Apology is contained in Pitra's Spicilegium Solis-mense, vol. i. [E. M. Y.]

COMMUDIUS, one of the seventeen guards in the story of CHRYSÆ. [G. S.]

COMMODUS, A.D. 180-193. The monstrous vices of the degenerate son of Marcus Aurelius brought with them at least one counterbalancing advantage. The persecutions which had been carried on in his father's reign ceased for a time in his. There was a lull throughout the empire. The popular feeling against the Christians, though it still continued, was no longer heightened and directed by the action of the Imperial government, and the result was a marked increase of numbers. Many of the rich and noble, with all their household and kindred, professed themselves Christians (Euseb. H. E. v. 21). Even in the emperor's palace, but it is uncertain whether as officers, or freedmen, or slaves, believers were to be found (Iren. adv. Hæc. iv. 30). Marcia, the favourite mistress of the emperor, is said by Dio Cassius (lxxii. 4) or Xiphilinus, writing in his name, to have used her influence with Commodus in their favour, and to have done them much good service. It is, of course, scarcely possible to think of one who lived as she did, as being herself a Christian, but the fact stated by Irenæus makes it possible that there may have been others in the imperial household who were so, and who were able to work through her instrumentality. The strange history of Callistus in the recently published Refutation of all Heresies attributed to Hippolytus (ix. 6) throws fresh light on Marcia's connexion with the Christian church at Rome. The epithet by which he describes her as a "God-loving woman" may be, as Dr. Wordsworth suggests, ironical; but the facts which follow it shew that she was a frequent communication even with the officers of the church. Callistus had been brought before Fuscianus, the prefect of the city, on the charge of disturbing a synagogue of the Jews, and was sentenced to hard labour in the mines of Sardinia. Marcia, wishing to do some good work, sent for Victor, a bishop of the church, and asked what Christians were suffering for their faith in Sardinia, and on receiving their names obtained from Commodus an order of release. The order was given to an eunuch, Hyacinthus, who carried it to Sardinia, and obtained the liberation of Callistus, as well as of the others, alleging his own influence with Marcia as his warrant, though the name of Callistus had not been included in the list. The narrative clearly implies that Hyacinthus was a Christian. The remarkable name of one of the conspirators who with Marcia planned the assassination of the emperor, Eclectus, might almost suggest that there also there was some point of contact with the brotherhood which claimed it as peculiarly their own.

The story just given implies that some Christians had, as such, been condemned to exile; that persecutions, though less frequent, had not altogether ceased. One sufferer of the time takes his place in the list of martyrs. Apollonius, a Roman citizen of distinction, perhaps a senator, of high repute for philosophical culture, was accused before Perennius, the prefect of the city, by one of his own slaves. In accordance with an imperial edict sentencing informers, in such cases, to death even when the accused was found guilty, (may we trace Marcia's influence in this also?) the slave had his legs broken. Apollonius was brought before the senate, called upon for his defence, and so was able to deliver an elaborate Apologia for the faith which he professed. By what Eusebius speaks of as an ancient law (possibly the edict of Trajan) he was beheaded (H. E. v. 21). [E. H. P.]

COMMUNION, HOLY. [EUCCHARIST.]

COMNAT (COMNATAN, CONNAT), V. A. of Kildare, Jan. 1. She appears among the prelates of Kildare on this day; but of her abbacy we know nothing beyond its close. She died abbess of Kildare in A.D. 590. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 5; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 629 a; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 24-5.) [J. G.]

CONAID, a companion of St. Sampson. He is called by the French St. Mein, and is probably the same as Mevennius. He is said to have died A.D. 590, and his day was June 15 (Cressy, Ch. Hist. of Britt. lib. xi. c. 28). [C. H.]

CONAING. [CONANG.]

CONALL. In Mart. Doneg. there are seven Conalls, and Colgan (Acta SS. 367) says there are nine or ten in the Irish Martyrologies.

(1) Son of Aedh, of Cluain-dallain B. April 2. He was son of Aedh, son of Savan, of the race of Coelbadius, and succeeded his relation St. Cairpre of Cuil-raithin (Nov. 11), now Coleraine, as bishop there. But before he was bishop at Coleraine, he was abbat at the monastery of Cluain-dallain, now Clonallan, lying along Carlingford Bay and Newry river, in the county of Down. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 93; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 380 n. 105; and Acta SS. 281 n. 11; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 114 n.)

(2) Abbat of Inis-Caeil, May 22. By Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 480 n. 10) he is cited among the descendants of Conall Gulban, and called son of Manius Coelius, son of Caitherius; he was much honoured in Tyrconnel, especially at his church of Inis-Caeil (now Iniskeel, an island off the west coast of the parish of Iniskeel and barony of Boylagh, Donegal), where Colgan says his fast was strictly observed even in his day. He may also be the St. Conall whose holy well, reilig or cemetery, and other antiquities at Bruckless, near Killybegs, on the north coast of Donegal Bay, are still held in honour. There was a panegyric written upon him by St. Dallan Forgaill, the poet (Jan. 29), and this may enable us to fix his date as anterior to A.D. 594, as on or about that year St. Dallan was killed on the island of Inis-keel, and buried in St. Conall's church. He is said to have brought over from Rome, though there is good reason to believe that it was not promulgated for more than a century after his death, a curious law-tract or rule, still extant, entitled the Cain Donnúigh, for the observance of Sunday as a day totally free from labour, with certain unavoidable exceptions. The Bearnan Chonaill, or Gapped Bell of St. Conall, said to have been received from St. Patrick, has disappeared since the year 1844. (Colgan, Acta SS. 204, cc. 8, 9, and notes; O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. ii. 32-3; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 345 ser. i. 466-70; Butler, Lives of the SS. v. 4th-6.)

CONALL (3) Bishop. March 18. At this day Colgan (Acta SS. 632) gives a memoir of St. Conall, founder of the church of Kilconnell, near Aughrim, in the barony of Kilconnell, co. Galway. He was made bishop by St. Patrick, and afterwards he and St. Etchen (Feb. 11) negligently, and without St. Patrick's knowledge, ordained some persons who were unfit for the episcopate. For this they were severely reproved by St. Patrick, who prophesied that their churches would ever continue small, and the town of Kilconnell is an insignificant place to this day. He also offended his sister St. Attracta (Aug. 11), through his excessive fear lest any woman should approach his monastery. But St. Conall could not have been brother of St. Attracta and contemporary of St. Patrick and Lanigan (Ecl. Hist. Ir. i. 429) doubts the connexion with St. Patrick, though the story comes through Ussher (Ecl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 463).

(4) There is a St. Conall or Connell in Scotland, who gives his name to Kirkeconnell, a parish in Nithsdale, co. Dumfries, and whom it seems impossible to identify. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 311.) [J. G.]

CONAMHAIL (CONAIN), son of Failbhe, abbat of Hy. Sept. 11. He was of the race of Colla Uais, and therefore one of the Oriels. He was the first abbat of Hy, or Iona, that was not of the race of the founder, and was the last under whom the Scotch usage regarding Easter prevailed. He succeeded St. Adamnan (Sept. 23) A.D. 704, and died A.D. 710 (Ussher, Ecl. Ant. c. 15, wks. vi. 245, and Ind. Chr. A.D. 710, calling him "Conain"), but by the Annalists Dunchad is said to have been holding the "principatum Jæ" in A.D. 707. To account for this Reeves (Adamnan, 379) supposes that St. Dunchad either administered the affairs of the society, as a tanist-abbat, in consequence of St. Conamhail's age or infirmity, or perhaps headed a schism possibly on the Paschal question. (Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. iii. 150, 153; Grub, Ecl. Hist. Scot. i. 113-4; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 309.) [J. G.]

CONAN, fifth of the metropolitan bishops of London in the British period. (Joelcin of Furness, given in Ussher, Brit. Eccles. Antiq. cap. v., Works, ed. 1847, t. v. p. 88; Godwin, Praesul. 170; Le Neve, Fasti, ii. 273; Stubbs, Repts. 152.) [C. H.]

CONAN was a common Irish name, and assumed several forms, as Cona, Conan, Conna, Connan, and with the affectionate or honorific prefixes Do or Da and Mo, Dachonna, Mochonna. In Tr. Thaum. 178 n. ¹¹³, Colgan gives a long list of saints bearing these names, while in Acta SS. 60 n. ¹, he adds largely to the list of nominal variations.

(1) Jan. 13. In the Irish calendars on this day there are Mochonna, bishop of Leamhchill (now perhaps one of the Loughills, co. Kilkenny) and Mochonna of Inis-Patraig. Of the latter, as Connanus bishop, Colgan attempts to give a memoir, but mixes up the notice of him with what belongs to the bishop of Mann [CONAN (3)], and supposes that Inis-patrick or Inis-patraig is only another name for Mann. But Conan, here called Mochonna, is more likely to have lived on the island of Inis-Patrick, near Skerries, off the coast of Dublin. (Colgan, Acta SS. 59-60; Kelly, Cat. Ir. Saints, 55; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. i. 303-7; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 191, 195, 447; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 15.)

(2) Dil, of Eas-ruaidh, March 8. He was son of Tighernach, son of Fergus, of the race of Conall Gulban, and nearly related to St. Columba. Besides Conan, he is called Conna, Connan, Conda, Mochonda, and he came to be generally and affectionately known as Conan dil, "Connanus dilectus." By St. Aengus he is called "St. Conanus Dil, athleta gloriosus." He had three brothers, St. Bégbile (Oct. 12), St. Colman (Jan. 13), and St. Cuan Cnoin (March 2). He flourished about the end of the 6th century, and gathering a number of disciples around him, ruled over a monastery which was probably of his own foundation, at Cnodain, on the north bank of the river Erne, near Easruaidh (now Assaroe, or the Salmon Leap, on the Erne, at Ballyshannon); he probably was also a bishop, and is numbered among the disciples of St. Columba. Maguir says he rests either at Easruaidh or at Easmae-neire (now Assylin, near the town of Boyle, in the county of Roscommon). (Memoir in Colgan, Acta SS. 563, Index Chron. A.D. 596; and Tr. Thaum. 480 n. ¹¹¹, 489 n. ³³; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. ii. 222, 226; Kelly, Cat. Ir. SS. 89.)

(3) Bishop of Sodor or Mann, Jan. 26. Though Colgan (Acta SS. 59-60) has identified Conan or Mochonna of Inis-Patrick with Conan, bishop of Mann, [CONAN (1)], yet they appear to have been different persons. From what we can gather in the Scotch hagiographies, St. Conan was bishop in Mann, or ancient Ebona, in the beginning of the 7th century, and his influence extended through the Hebrides and great part of Scotland. He is said to have been tutor to St. Fiacre, Ferquhard, and Donaldus, sons of Eoghan IV. king of Scotland, but this is mere legend. He died about A.D. 648, and is honoured in the Hebrides, Perthshire, and Forfarshire. (O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 446-9; Butler, Lives of the Saints, i. 377-8; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 76; Boece, Hist. Scot. ix. cc. 19, 20; Chambers, Book of Days, i. 165; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 307-8; Russel's Keith, Cat. Scot. Bps. 296.)

(4) Of Aeg, Jan. 12. O'Hanlon suggests that St. Conan of Aeg, or Egg, may have given his name to the neighbouring island of Canna, among the Hebrides, but beyond the mention of the name and dedication in the calendars there is nothing known of this saint of St. Donnau's island of Egg (Reeves, Adamnan, 308; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 180-1). [J. G.]

CONANG (CONAING), son of Lucunan, Sept. 23. This person is identified with Conaingius O'Daithil, coarb of St. Ailbhe (Sept. 12) of Emly, and called archbishop in the Life of Mochoemocus (March 13). If this identification is correct he died in A.D. 661 (Ann. Tigh., Four Masters). In the Life of St. Molagga (Jan. 20) there is mention made of St. Conaing O'Daithil as being one of the sureties given to St. Molagga by king Caius of Munster, that he would stand to his promises of granting certain immunities and privileges to the church (Colgan, Acta SS. 148, c. 19, 150 n. 21, 217 n. 29; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 34, 35). [J. G.]

CONANTIUS, a Spanish bishop of the 7th century. His see was Pallentia (Palencia in Old Castile) of which he was bishop for more than thirty years, from the reign of the Visigothic king Gondemar, A.D. 610, to that of Sisenand, A.D. 636. He subscribed the decrees of the 4th, 5th, and 6th councils of Toledo. His appearance is described as corresponding in gravity to the seriousness of his character and the weight of his judgment. His eloquence was ready and pleasing; his devotion to his ecclesiastical duties unceasing. He was acquainted with ecclesiastical music, and added many new melodies to the repertory of the church. He was the author of a book of discourses on the Psalms, "de omnium proprietate Psalmorum." (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 582; Migne, Patrolog. xcvi. 203; Hildephonsus Toletanus de Vir. Illust. xi.) [E. V.]

CONCORDIUS. [CORDIUS.]

(2) Deacon of the church of Arles, present at the election of Hilarus to the see of Rome, A.D. 461. He apprised Leontius, bishop of Arles, of the succession, as we know from the letter of Leontius to pope Hilarus. (Patrol. Lat. lviii. p. 22, Ceillier, x. 336.) [W. M. S.]

(3) Presbyterian, suffered martyrdom at Spoleto in the time of the Emperor Antoninus; while in prison consoled by an angelic visitation; commemorated Jan. 1 (Usuard, Mart. and Obs.). [C. H.]

(4) Bishop of Arles (A.D. 374-circ. 409), canonised. One of the twenty-two or thirty bishops present at the first council of Valence (A.D. 374). One of the decrees of this council was that those ecclesiastics who in order to rid themselves of the burden of office, accused themselves of mortal sin, should be taken at their word. Under this canon came Acceptus, bishop of Frejus. Concordius defended him in the council. (Tom. i. Concil. Hard. p. 798; Tillemont, tom. viii. Hist. Eccl. p. 551-3; Ceillier, iv. 600.) [W. M. CONCUPISCENCE, in ecclesiastical Latin: viz. in the sense put upon it by St. Augustine in controversy with the Pelagians, not desire simply, but irregular, inordinate, lawless, rebellious desire: lust in every sense, and not merely sexual. In a word, the moral malady produced in man by sin: and since then, indissolubly linked to the manner of his procreation: and never eradicable, though less prominent, and less irrepressible in all his other acts, mental as well as bodily, through life. But it is stripped of its guilt ipso facto, by having the merits of Christ applied to it, and may be kept under perfect control afterwards through life by His grace. Thus it is not sin absolutely, though the effect of sin, and exciting to sin again: just as rebellion begets anarchy, and is fomented by it in turn. Man no sooner disobeyed his Maker, than his passions disobeyed him, making him ever afterwards their slave, to be set free by Christ alone. Or, to give this in his own words, "Natura quippe hominis primitus inculcata, et sine ullo vitio creata est. Natura verò ista hominis, quã unusquisque ex Adam nascitur, jam medico indiget, quia sana non est. Deus autem qui dives est in misericordiã, cum essemus mortui delictis, convivificavit nos Christo ejus gratiã sumus salvi (De Nat. et Grat. c. 3). Porro autem, si interrogetur illa carnis concupiscentia, quã pudenda facta sunt, quae prius pudenda non fuerant, nonne respondebit, se in membris hominis post peccatum esse coepisse? Et ideo legem peccati verbis Apostolicis nuncupatam, quod hominem sibi subditum fecerit, quia Deo suo subditus esse noluit: seque esse, de quã et primi conjugati tunc erubuerunt, quando pudenda texerunt: et nunc omnes erubescunt, quando ad concubendum secreta conquirunt, neque hujus operis testes audent habere vel filios quos inde genuerunt (De Nupt. et Concup. c. 22) . . . Servatum est igitur, ut ex viro et muliere, id est, per illam corporum commixtionem, nemo videatur expers esse delicti." . . . as he quotes further on from St. Ambrose (c. 35). "Peccatum autem, inde a nascentibus trahitur, non ad nuptias pertinet, sed ad malum quod accidit hominibus, quorum conjunctione sunt nuptiae (ib. ii. 26) . . . Sic autem vocatur peccatum, quia peccato facta est: cum jam in regeneratis non sit ipsa peccatum: sicut vocatur lingua locutio quam facit lingua: et manus vocatur scriptura, quam facit manus. Itemque sic vocatur peccatum, quia peccatum, si vincit, facit: sicut vocatur frigus pigrum, non quod a pigris fiat, sed quod pigros faciat (ib. i. 23). . . Si autem quaeritur, quomodo ista concupiscentia carnis maneat in regenerato, in quo universorum facta est remissio peccatorum . . . ad haec responderetur, dimitti concupiscentiam carnis in baptismo, non ut non sit, sed ut in peccatum non imputetur . . . quae tamen concupiscentia quotidie minuitur in proficientibus et continentibus . . . donec sanetur omnis infirmitas nostra, proficientem renovatione interioris hominis de die in diem, cum exterior induerit incorruptionem" (ib. 25) . . . They who cannot understand, how lust should remain in us, when its guilt is gone, should ask themselves how it is, that of sins which were committed by us ages ago the guilt remains, up to the day of its being remitted, in full force (ib. 26). Finally, lust remains in us, for two reasons:—1. that we may accomplish our moral probation in fighting against it here and 2. be persuaded of our need of the grace of God to fight against it with success. "Reatus ejus regeneratione solutus est, conflictus ejus ad agonem relictus est. Malum est, clarum est. Non viribus nostrae voluntatis . . . huic obsistimus, nisi divinitus adjuvemur. Debellandum hoc malum est, non negandum: vincendum est, non defendendum. Postremo, si ei consentis, malum agnosce peccando: si ei resistis, malum agnosce pugnando" (C. Julian. Op. Imp. i. 72.) Such is his luminous paraphrase of the teaching of St. Paul on this head (Rom. v. vii.) long since become the basis of Christian anthropology by general consent, though its elucidation has been almost entirely confined to the West. Witness the volumes that have been written on the latter half of the second book of the Sentences of Peter Lombard, drawn in each case from St. Augustine. The attention given to these subjects in the East may be measured by the length of the single chapter in the corresponding work of St. John Damascene, which refers to them in any way (De Orthod. Fid. iv. 22). [E. S. Ff.]

CONDA. [CONNA.]

CONDEDUS, ST., presbyter and recluse, connected with Fontenelle. Called also Condelus, Condedes, Candidus, but his genuine name was Condedus. He was a native of Great Britain, but migrated into Gaul in the time of Theodoricus, son of Clovis, about A.D. 511. After crossing the Channel, he took up his abode in the neighbourhood of Fontana St. Walarici (St. Valerien-Caux, or more probably St. Valeri-sur-Somme), where he led a solitary life. Then hearing of the fame of St. Lambert and the brothers of the monastery of Fontenelle, he visited them. He then sailed to an island called Belcinaca, in the Seine, and took up his abode there. It was in the forest of Arles, called in the vernacular La forest de Bretonne, because Condedus, a Briton, inhabited it. There he was visited by king Theoderic, who used to hunt in the forest. Theoderic treated him with much honour, and made the island over to him. In that island Condedus built two churches, those of the Virgin Mary and SS. Peter and Paul, in the latter of which there was probably an oratory dedicated to St. Walaricus. Condedus was buried in the church of SS. Peter and Paul, but his body was afterwards translated to the monastery of Fontenelle, and placed in the church of St. Peter, where it was put in the same place with the body of St. Errembert (A.D. 1027).

EPITAPH ON CONDEDUS IN FONTENELLE.

"Extitit in Gallis meritis dignissimus olim,
Cujus membra sacra hic tumulata jacent;
Nominis Condedus, virtutum flore coruscus,
Pro quibus in coelis nunc viget eximius.
Qui, Theodorico Francorum sceptris regente,
Rura Britannorum transvena deseruit.
Gallorumque adit partes, lux Christicolarum
Insula nunc Sequanae, quae Belcinaca vocatur, Curculis multis pavit et hinc sepelita.
Cujus sacratos cineres post tempora longa
Egregio cultu turba sacra tultit;
Fontanellensi tumulans in cespite pulchro.
Nunc ibi poscentes muneribus cumulat."

Condedus is commemorated on the 21st of October. The date of his death is uncertain; but Henschenius places it in the year 473, Mabillon in 583 (AA. SS. Boll. Oct. ix. pp. 351-358; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. tom. ii. pp. 58, 316; Migne, Encycl. Théol. xl. p. 645). [D. R. J.]

CONDIDAN, British king, slain in battle by the West Saxons, A.D. 577, at Deorham (A. S. C ad an.). [C. H.]

CONDLAEDH. [CONLAED.]

CONFESSION, as a church ordinance, is, in some form or other, as old as St. James: and it is even doubtful whether the last six verses of his epistle, which in our Authorised Version are disjointed, from being referred to the bodily "sick" in part (v. 14-20), should not all be understood of the penitential discipline of his day. St. Chrysostom at all events understood them so (De Sacerd. iii. 6) "God has given more power to priests than parents," he says: "the difference between them being as great as that between the life now, and the life to come. For the latter cannot ward off either death or even disease from their children; but the former frequently succeed in saving the soul that is diseased (καμνουσαν) and about to die: in some cases assuaging its pain: in others securing that it should never fall—and that, not merely by teaching and admonishing, but by the power of prayer: nor in regeneration only, but in virtue of their prerogative to condone sins in after life. For as the apostle says: 'Infirmatur quis in vobis? advocet presbyteros ecclesiae, et orent super eo . . . et si peccata fecerit, remittentur ei.'" This passage thus construed (and indeed the clause ἀσθενεί τις, might almost seem to have been suggested by 2 Cor. xii. 29-30, comp. 1 Cor. ix. 22: though of course, St. John xi. 2. countenances the A.V.) the next verse (16) comes with redoubled emphasis: "Confess your sins one to another" and then the Greek verb ἐξομολογήσθε is directly suggestive of the "vox sollemnis" for confession in primitive times, "exomologesis." Now, this word, Albespinus has shewn incontestably, was not a simple, but a complex term: and included the whole discipline which penitents had, in those days, to go through before they were restored: of which public confession in the face of the whole church formed the last act. Further, this was at first allowed but once in a lifetime, so that it was never performed by the same person twice (Observat. ii. 26: and 5-7.) Tertullian, in his treatise on penance, which, like that on baptism, has become classical, accounts in the same breath for its origin, and goes dogmatically through its component parts: making, in principle, the counterpart of conversion as taught now. As concupiscentia is not extinguished by baptism though its guilt is cancelled, the enemy of souls feels he has just one chance left him of ruining man in spite of the victory which has been won for him by Christ. "Itaque observat, oppugnat, obsidet: si qua possit aut oculos concupiscentia carnali ferire, aut animum illecebris saecularibus irretire, aut fidem terraeae potestatis formidine evertere, aut a via certa perveris traditionibus detorquere: non scandalis non tentationibus deficit. Haec igitur venena ejus providens Deus . . . collocavit in vestibulo poenitentiam secundam, quae pulsantibus patefaciat: sed jam semel, quia jam secundo: sed amplius nunquam, quia proxime frustra" (c. 7). Thus penance, he says in another place, (c. 4), is life, as it stands between us and death.

Lay hold of it, cling to it: and like the plank to him who has been shipwrecked, it will bring you safe to port. He who has appointed to punish for sin, has promised forgiveness through penance. If you doubt this, hear what the Spirit saith to the churches. "Omnes ad poenitentiam commonet, sub comminationibus quidem. Non comminaretur autem non poenitenti, si non ignosceret poenitenti." (c. 8). What mean those lessons given in the parables of our Lord? That a woman lost a piece of silver, and sought it again, and found it, and called her friends to rejoice with her, is it not an emblem of the restored sinner? . . . And whom are we to understand by the father of the prodigal son? Verily it is God: none so much a father, none more devoted. He will receive you, his own son, because you have returned, though you have wasted what you had from him, though you have returned naked: He will even rejoice more over your return, than over another that has never strayed. But this, on condition of your repenting heartily . . . on condition of your abandoning the wine that have been your companions: on condition of your returning to your offended Father, and saying, "Father, I have sinned, I am no more worthy to be called thy son." Confession of sins lightens their burden, as much as concealment of them aggravates it. For confession is the act of one who would make satisfaction for them, but concealment, of one who continues as hardened as ever (c. 8). "Hujus igitur poenitentiae secundae et minus, quanto in arto negotium est, tanto operosior probatio est, ut non solâ conscientia praeferatur, sed aliquo etiam actu administretur. Is actus, qui magis Graeco vocabulo exprimitur et frequentatur, exomologesis est: quâ delictum Domino nostrum confitemur, non quidem ut ignoro, sed quatenus satisfactio confessione disponitur, confessione poenitentia nascitur, poenitentia Deus mitigatur. Itaque exomologesis prosternendi et humiliandi hominis disciplina est, conversationem injungens misericordiae illicem . . . In quantum non peperceris tibi, in tantum tibi Deus, crede, parcat." (c. 9). The objection made to all this, he continues, is its publicity. People shrink from such a publication of themselves as it entails, thinking of their shame more, than of the saving of their souls. Thus, from a false modesty which leads them to conceal their ailments, they throw away their chance of being cured. "Quid consortes casuum tuorum, ut plausores, fugis. Non potest corpus de unius membri vexatione laetum agere; condoleat univsum, et ad remedium collaboret necesse est. In uno et altero ecclesia est, ecclesia vero Christus. Ergo cum te ad fratrum genua protendis, Christum contractas, Christum exoras. Aequè illi, cum super te lacrimas agunt Christus patitur, Christus Patrem deprecatur . . . Grande plane emolumentum verecundiae occultatio delicti pollicetur . . . An melius est damnatum latere, quam palam absolvi?" (c. 10.) . . . Is not this, clearly, the exomologesis which St. James enjoins, when he says: "Confess your sins one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed"? The satisfaction of which Tertullian speaks consisted in the outward self-chastisement which every penitent underwent in public to manifest his contrition: his confession, addressed to the presbyters, was heard by all present, his absolution consisted in the prayer offered for him by them, in which all the rest joined. The 9th c. of the 8th book of the Apostolical Constitutions contains a prayer of this kind, which the following passage from St. Ambrose will interpret in the sense put upon it by contemporaries. "When our Lord said 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost, whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them,' He shewed it was by the Holy Ghost that sins are condoned. Men exhibit their ministry, but exercise no direct power at all, for the remission of sins. They remit them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, not their own. They ask, Divinity grants; they officiate, heaven confers the gifts" (De Spir. S. iii. 18.) St. Ambrose likewise testifies to the course pursued in the fourth century being identical with what Tertullian attributes to the second. "They are deservedly censured," he says, in his own work on the subject, "who think that penance may be performed again and again, as making too free with Christ. For did they perform it sincerely, they would not consider it could ever be repeated, any more than baptism. Quia sicut unum baptisma, ita una poenitentia. True, penance must be performed in public, and we must repent of sin daily; but in the latter case we have to do with lighter offences, in the former with graver" (De Poen. ii. 10). For the first seven or eight centuries, when recourse was had to priest or bishop apart, it was with reference to this public penance. Origen again and again recommends it as a means: "pronuntiari peccatum = in publicum proferre," being the end in view (in Levit. Hom. iii. 4. Comp. Homil. ii. 6, in Psalm. xxxvii.). The story told by Socrates (v. 19) and Sozomen (vii. 16) of the abolition of penitentiary presbyters at Constantinople points the same way; public penance, which had dictated their appointment, being shaken in practice considerably by their removal. Trivial sins of daily commission, of course, neither excluded from communion, nor were to be confessed in this way. The repeating of the Lord's Prayer daily was confession enough in their case. "Delet omnino haec oratio minima et quotidiana peccata," says St. Augustine (Enchir. § 71). The belief of the church from the earliest times had been, that sin acts on the soul like poison, and that confession, in some form or other, is its precipitant. "Consider what the Scripture teaches us," says Origen, "that we must not conceal sin within our breast. For just as people who have taken food that has disagreed with them and are oppressed with indigestion, are relieved by vomiting, so they who have committed sin if they conceal and retain it are diseased inwardly: but on becoming their own accusers, and confessing their sin, they vomit it up as it were, and with it the cause of their malady" (on Ps. 37, as before). Origen said this in counselling preliminary confession of sins to a priest. "If thou drawest back from confession," says Tertullian, in enlarging on the obligation of public penance, "consider in thine heart that hell-fire, which confession shall quench for thee, and first imagine to thyself the greatness of the punishment, that thou mayest not doubt concerning the adoption of the remedy" (De Poen. c. 12). Possibly, the last verse of the epistle of St. James may have suggested this. "How can you expect to be forgiven your sins," asks St.

Chrysostom: "never having confessed them? . . . It is not enough to call ourselves sinners in general: we must recall our sins, and specify them one by one." But then he adds: "I am not saying, that you are to make a parade of yourself, or accuse yourself before others: but I exhort you, in the words of the Psalmist, to commit your way unto the Lord: confess them before God, confess your sins to your judge, praying if not with the tongue, at least with the memory: and thus ask to be forgiven" (Hom. xxxi. 3. in Heb. xii.). Confession to God above was a favourite theme with St. Chrysostom, and St. Augustine suggests, in a passage which may be seen in Bingham at length (xviii. 3. 3: or Ep. c. liii. 7, ad Maced. ed. Ben.) it had this advantage over public penance, that it could be repeated indefinitely. Besides: "What have I to do with men," as he says elsewhere, "that they should hear my confessions as though they would heal all my weaknesses . . . Again, how know they, when they hear from myself about myself whether what I tell them is true?" (Confess. x. 3). Then, in another place, he has this further question to ask about confession to God. "When Thou hearest my confession O Lord, Who hast eternity, can You be supposed ignorant of what I tell You or a spectator in time of what is done in time? To what purpose then, should I trouble You with so long a tale? Not certainly, that You should learn it through me! But I quicken my affection for Thee, by confessing to Thee all my wretchedness, and all Thy loving kindness towards me, to the end that Thou mayest complete my deliverance" (ib. xi. 1). His own work, in which this passage occurs, is a noble illustration, all through, of the principle which is here laid down. Daillé's work on auricular confession threw a flood of light on the subject in general, which Albespinus (Observat. ii. 1 and sqq.) Bingham, Ant. xviii. 3 and sqq.) Marshall (Penit. Discipl. c. 2) and others have turned to good account: and Morinus (Comment. de Discipl. Pœn. ii. et sqq.) and others have been forced to acknowledge. Comp. notes K, L, and M, pp. 369-408 to the Oxford Tr. of Tertullian, where this is learnedly summarised. [E. S. Ff.]

CONFESSOR. [Dict. Christ. Ant.; see also CYPRIAN in this Dict.]

CONFIRMATION. Confirmation anciently was a part of baptism, or rather its completion, and this it is, according to the Greek rite, still—far from being a distinct ordinance. It was administered with imposition of hands and prayer—in the first instance by the apostles themselves, afterwards by their representatives and successors, the bishops—and, so far, just as it is administered in the church of England at present. In other respects it has undergone many changes. It was not anciently called by the name it has borne so long in the West, though this was probably borrowed from the title given to it in the Apostolical Constitutions (iii. 17)—Βεβαίωσις τῆς ὁμολογίας—which was, in turn, founded on 2 Cor. i. 21, in common with its earlier name, and the no less early ceremonial, with which it was administered at the conclusion of baptism, for many centuries, in the East and West alike, viz. the "sealing," or "anointing with chrism." For its ritualistic developments, indeed, considered in themselves, see the Dict. of Antiq. s. v. It is only their connexion with dogma that concerns us here.

First, then, our Lord, "having been baptised, and praying, the heaven was opened, and the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape, like a dove, upon Him," as St. Luke says (iii. 21). Similarly, "when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John, who, when they were come down, prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Ghost. Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost" (Acts viii. 14). There was a medium in both cases, and a clear interval after baptism in both cases; but in His case the medium was prayer alone made by Himself, and the interval was next to none. In the other, the interval was of days or weeks, and the medium prayer made by His apostles, followed by the laying on of their hands. The thing bestowed in each case was the Holy Ghost; and this, in the second case, its recipients are distinctly said not to have received before—"having," in the words of the inspired writer, "only been baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus," as yet. A similar instance being recorded Acts xix. 6, we may assume that such was the rule then. That the Holy Ghost should have fallen upon the first Gentile converts while St. Peter was preaching to them, and before they were baptized at all, indirectly witnesses to it, both from their having been baptized the next moment and from their having been baptized in the same name (ib. x. 44).

Thus the rule which prevailed in the apostolic age seems to have been that baptism was administered in the name of the Lord Jesus, yet that the Holy Ghost was not bestowed in baptism on those who were so baptized, but conveyed to them subsequently by a distinct act, which could only be performed by the apostles themselves, and had for its matter imposition of hands, and for its form prayer—prayer, of course, for the gift it was designed to convey. It was with reference to this gift, clearly, that St. Paul wrote of the Giver: "Now He which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us is God" (2 Cor. i. 21)—and St. John, of its recipients: "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things" (1 John ii. 20). The same unction which Christ had received after His baptism, and from which He derived His name, had been bestowed upon them after their baptism, and was implied in their name no less. Again, the effects it produced in them extended to the power of working miracles similar to His, in addition to that of regenerating their inner man. That such was the rule rather than the exception, may be inferred, not only from the passages of the Acts already quoted, but from 1 Cor. xiii.-xiv.; otherwise St. Paul must be held to have expended three whole chapters on non-existing phenomena. Further, when he speaks of the "doctrine of laying on of hands," in his Epistle to the Hebrews (vi. 2), the context shews it must have been the laying on of hands after baptism which was uppermost in his mind then.

Subsequently to the apostolic age, this laying on of hands was viewed as a complement of baptism no less, and maintained as a prerogative of their successors. They allowed others to baptize for them, as the apostles had done. As the apostles had done, they retained this, its appendix, in their own hands, to be administered sooner or later, at their convenience. Yet it was not the self-same thing in their hands that it had been in the hands of the apostles, nor was it performed by them with the same ceremonial either of form or matter, as time went on. It was not the self-same thing in their hands, for two reasons: 1, as soon as baptism began to be administered in the name of the Trinity, the Holy Ghost was held, and held scripturally, to be conveyed, and to confer regeneration and sanctification in the baptismal act itself, whether confirmation followed or not; and 2, the effects produced by the laying on of hands subsequently were confined in general to the strengthening and expanding of those graces which had been received in baptism, instead of including the power of working miracles in general as well. It was not performed with the same ceremonial; for, in process of time, there was less of prayer than of ceremony; less of imposition of hands than of chrism; less of a supplement to baptism in its dogmatic aspect than a distinct sacrament. Thus it may be said to have gained in theological importance in proportion as it decreased in intrinsic value. Whether the narrowing of its effects brought about its ceremonial changes, or was brought about by them, it may be hard to decide: it is a simple fact that both commenced almost simultaneously, and have gone together ever since. We can no more define when baptism began to be administered in the name of the Trinity than when chrism began to be used in connexion with it. Of course, so far as there was a Divine command for the one, and no command even of the church for the other, they must always stand on a different footing. It is a pure question of history which commenced first; and of this the New Testament affords no clue. The only baptisms recorded in the New Testament are said to have been administered in the name of the Lord or the Lord Jesus (see the Art. on BAPTISM). St. James bids "the elders of the church pray over the sick, anointing him with oil" (v. 14); but there is no proof of his having bade them do so likewise by the newly baptized. But by the end of the 2nd century the universal practice was to administer baptism in the name of the Trinity, and for the bishop to anoint all the newly baptized—infants as well as adults—with chrism. There was even an anointing which took place before baptism, but it is not this with which we are concerned here. What, it may be asked, could have suggested the introduction of chrism thus universally, yet thus absolutely, without positive command of any kind, into the baptismal rite?

The answer is, plainly, that according to Roman, as well as Eastern notions, to make the body perfectly clean, it was necessary that it should be not only washed but anointed. No baths were complete without their ἀλειπτήριον or unguentarium. (On this, see Dict. of Rom. and Greek Ant. s. v.) It was the same at the "gymnasium" or "palaestra," when people went into special training as athletes. Anointing, under both aspects, was so relevant to the Christian profession that St. Theophilus asks his friend Autolytus (i. 12), "Think you, that the name Christian is a term of reproach? Do you not know that whatever is anointed, instead of being contemptible is both pleasant and trust-worthy? What vessel, for instance, can be pronounced fit for sea till it has been anointed? What house or castle, if it has not been anointed, is weather-proof? What man, either entering upon this life, or coming forward as an athlete, is not anointed? What work of art, what ornament, has any finish, that has not been anointed and polished? Even the air we breathe is in some sort anointed with light and life—and are you averse to being anointed with the oil of God? It is because we are anointed with the oil of God that we are called Christians."

In general, of course, the fathers derive the word Christian from Christ; still Christ Himself owed His name to His having been anointed, and "anointed with the Holy Ghost," as St. Peter says (Acts x. 38). There were two causes, therefore, that prompted the introduction of chrism into the baptismal rite: 1, the current custom of anointing, after washing, the body, for cleansing purposes; and 2, the unction, as the apostles had phrased it, of the Holy Ghost bestowed on every believer at the font. This it was which the material unction or chrism was intended to symbolise; and this was the reason of its administration having been annexed to the prayer and imposition of hands with which the Holy Ghost had been originally conveyed by the apostles, and of its consecration being reserved so jealously to their successors. This is, however, far from proving that they authorised it, or from disproving that it was not an unauthorised, and has not been an unprofitable, innovation on what they practised. St. Basil, in short, meets us half-way when he says: "We bless the water with which we baptize and the oil with which we anoint, and even him who is baptized in addition. But what is the scriptural authority for either? Is it not rather secret and silent tradition? Certainly, the custom of anointing with oil was not learnt from any written document whatsoever" (De Sp. S. l. 66). It is true that Tertullian speaks of it (De Bap. c. 7) as belonging to the ritual of his day; but it is also true that, among the earlier works in which we hear most about it are those published under fictitious names, such as the False Decretals, the Apostolical Constitutions, and the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy. St. Cyril of Jerusalem devoted a whole lecture to its elucidation (Cat. xxi. De Sacro Chrismate), thus dissociating it in appearance from baptism, and giving colour to the notion that he looked upon it as a distinct sacrament. Again, he speaks of it in a way that few would speak now. "Be careful," he says, "not to hold that chrism cheap: for, as the bread of the eucharist, after invocation of the Holy Ghost, is no longer common bread, but Christ's Body, so that holy chrism is no longer common after invocation, but the gift of Christ and of the Holy Ghost: for, by the presence of His divinity, it is invested with efficacy . . . and while the body is anointed with it visibly the soul is sanctified with the holy and life-giving Spirit" (l. 3). And the author of the Apostolical Constitutions, similarly, of the prayer with which, according to him, it was to be administered: that, "unless some such prayer is made for every baptized person, he who is baptized goes down into the water, like the Jews, and is merely cleansed from the filth of the body, not that of the soul" (vii. 44). These views were improved upon in the middle ages, and were current much later. As late as A.D. 1666 we find a Greek metropolitan, who had been educated at Rome, telling a synod in Moscow that "the unction with chrism gives the illapse of the Holy Ghost" (Paisius, Hist. iii. 10)—a thing which scripture is careful not to assert even of the laying on of hands by the apostles themselves. It is true that the author of the Constitutions explains his meaning in an earlier chapter (vii. 22), where his language had been equally strong of the unction before baptism. "You first anoint him with oil," he says, "baptizing him with water next, and signing him with chrism in conclusion; so that the anointing with oil may be a partaking of the Holy Ghost: the water—symbolical of his death: the chrism—a seal of his engagements. But should there be neither oil nor chrism at hand, water will suffice for the anointing and for the sealing, as well as for the token of His death." And this, again, is carried a step further by the Council of Elvira, A.D. 305, which says: "that if any baptized person die before being blessed by the bishop, he may be justified by the faith with which he believed" (can. 77). But the administration of chrism being reserved to the episcopal order, there was always a tendency to make the most of it, even when it was administered at the same time with baptism. A deed, it was said, might be copied out by any scribe, but to be valid, it must be signed by the authority giving it force (S. Thom. pt. iii. q. 72, art. 11). And this was one of the reasons urged by St. Cyprian and his colleagues in proof that heretical baptism could not be valid. "It is necessary," say they, "that he who has been baptized should be anointed; that, having received the chrism, he may be the anointed of God, and have the grace of Christ within him. But one that has neither church nor altar cannot consecrate the material oil. . . . Heretics, therefore, cannot possess the spiritual unction either, as it is certain that they can neither consecrate the oil nor administer the eucharist" (Ep. 70 ad Januar.). In another place, referring to Acts viii. 14-17, but without adverting to the difference of the baptismal formula then in use, he says: "Which custom is now observed amongst ourselves, that they who are baptized in the church should be presented to the heads of the church, that by our prayer and imposition of hands they may obtain the Holy Ghost and be consummated with the seal of the Lord" (Ep. 73 ad Jul.). As though the Holy Ghost was not regularly conveyed to the baptized of his own days in the baptismal act. Similarly, St. Cornelius doubted whether Novatus could have received the Holy Ghost, because, though baptized, he had not been episcopally confirmed (Euseb. E. II. vi. 43), and St. Augustine was ready to agree with St. Cyprian, that "remission of sins" was not to be had from heretics, though he maintained against him that baptism was (De Bapt. c. Don. v. 22). In another place, he says: "What our ancestors meant by maintaining that the Holy Ghost is given by imposition of hands in the Catholic church alone, was nothing more than what the apostle says: 'The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given us.'

For this love they have not who are cut off from the communion of the Catholic church, and hence, though they speak with the tongues of men and angels, and know all mysteries and all knowledge . . . it profits them nothing. For the love of God they have not who love not the unity of the church. And thus it is quite intelligible that it should be said with truth that the Holy Ghost is not given but in the Catholic church. For the Holy Ghost is not now attested by outward and visible miracles to be given by imposition of hands as He was once, to encourage faith in its infancy and enlarge the church on its being first planted. For who now expects that they on whom hands are laid for the receiving of the Holy Ghost should, on a sudden, begin to speak with tongues? But the love of God is understood to be breathed into their hearts secretly and invisibly through the bond of peace, that they may be able to say: It is 'shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given us' " (ib. iii. 16).

Finally, when it had been decreed by the council of Laodicea that "those who were baptized should afterwards be anointed with the heavenly chrism, to be partakers of the kingdom of Christ" (can. 48), and by the second general council (can. 7), that heretics, whose baptism was admitted, "should, on coming over to the church, be received by sealing them with the sacred unction on the forehead, eyes, nose, mouth, and ears," and saying "the seal of the Holy Ghost;" in other words, with the ceremonial of confirmation, it was practically ruled that the road to church-membership lay in the unction with chrism, and in that alone; also that baptism without it was incomplete where it could be had. Again, from its connexion with baptism, it was sometimes called a sacrament; or, rather, baptism was occasionally spoken of as a two-fold or a three-fold sacrament, from the ceremonies attendant on it. St. Cyprian, for instance, referring to St. John iii. 5, says: "Imposition of hands is not sufficient for the receiving of the Holy Ghost unless the baptism of the church is received also. For then may persons become fully sanctified when they are born of each sacrament" (Ep. 72 ad Steph.). And St. Pacian: "These things cannot be completed otherwise than by the sacrament of water, of the chrism, and of the priest" (De Bapt. c. 6). And the so-called Areopagite, in his exaggerated style: "Moreover, the chrism, with its perfecting unction, bestows on him who has been initiated in the sacred mystery of regeneration, the indwelling of the Divine Spirit—symbolising, I presume, that the Holy Spirit is supplied to us by Him, Who, by the same Spirit, was sanctified for us as man without ceasing to be God" (Ecl. Hier. iv. 11). However, as long as it continued to be administered at the same time with baptism, it was never practically separated in idea from baptism, or placed on a basis of its own. And, owing to circumstances, infant baptism had not by any means the effect of dissociating it from baptism formerly, that we might be disposed to think now. For, in the first place, infants had the Eucharist administered to them for many centuries, in common with adults, as soon as they had been baptized. In the next place, baptisms came to be restricted, in general, to the mother-church, and to the festivals of Easter, Pentecost, and Epiphany, when the bishop was almost sure to be there. Everybody was thus ordinarily baptized, confirmed, and communicated on the same day. "In after ages," says Mr. Palmer, "when baptisms were administered in other churches besides the cathedral, and the presbyters and deacons received a commission from their bishops to administer this sacrament, it became necessary either to disjoin confirmation from baptism, or to give presbyters a commission to perform both. The former course has been followed by the Western churches of England, &c. where confirmation is always administered by the bishop, and generally several years after baptism; and the latter has been adopted by the patriarchate of Constantinople and all the Eastern churches, in which presbyters have, from time immemorial, been permitted to confirm; and in those churches confirmation is always administered to infants immediately after baptism" (Orig. Liturg. vi. 1). But this it was also, for nine centuries or more, throughout the West—"cujus rei fidem certam et indubitam faciunt, non modò rituales libri et pontificales a nobis superiori capite prolati: sed patres ferè omnes, qui his de rebus aliquandò scripserunt"—as Martene says (De Ant. Eccl. rit. i. 2, 1, comp. Assemani, Cod. Liturg. iii. 1, note); nor could its dogmatic relation to baptism be better explained than by reference to the rubric and prayer of the Gelasian sacramentary following the administration of the one by the presbyter, and preceding that of the other by the bishop. "Afterwards," says the rubric, "the infant, on ascending from the font, is signed on the crown of his head with chrism by the presbyter, in these words: 'God Almighty, Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hath regenerated thee with water and the Holy Ghost, and given thee remission of all thy sins, anoint thee with the unction of salvation unto life everlasting in Christ Jesus our Lord.'" He answers, "Amen." Then the seventold Spirit is conveyed to them by the bishop, who lays hands on them for consigning them, in these words: "God Almighty, Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who hast regenerated Thy servants with water and the Holy Ghost, and given them remission of all their sins: send on them, Lord, Thy Holy Ghost the Comforter, and grant them the Spirit of wisdom and understanding: the Spirit of counsel and might: the Spirit of knowledge and piety: fill them with the Spirit of the fear of God, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who liveth," &c. They answer, "Amen." Afterwards he signs them on the forehead with chrism, saying: "The sign of Christ unto life everlasting." They answer, "Amen." Then, "Peace be with you." They answer, "And with Thy Spirit" (Murat. Liturg. Rom. i. 510). In the Gregorian sacramentary this is called "confirmation;" and it is added, that "if the bishop be not there to administer it, the infant may be communicated by the priest" (ib. ii. 158). The same prayer and the same rubric is repeated almost word for word in every Western ritual of the same date. The corresponding rubric and prayer of the Eastern office for baptism is at least as old; though other parts of the office may not be. They run as follows: "The baptismal robe having been put on him, the priest adds this prayer: 'Let us pray.—Blessed art Thou, Lord God Almighty: fountain of blessing, sun of righteousness, Who hast lifted up the light of salvation on those that were in darkness, by the manifestation of Thy Son and our God: and bestowed on us unworthy the blessed purification of the holy water, and the divine sanctification of the life-giving chrism: Who hast also now vouchsafed to regenerate Thy servant just baptized with water and the Spirit, and to confer on him the remission of his sins voluntary and involuntary: be pleased, O merciful and omnipotent Lord, to grant him also the seal of the gift of Thy sacred, all-powerful, and adorable Spirit, and the participation of the holy Body and precious Blood of Thy Christ. Mayest Thou keep him in Thy holiness, and confirm him in Thy true faith: deliver him from the evil one and all his devices: and maintain his soul in Thy saving fear: in righteousness and purity: that, pleasing Thee in every word and work, he may be made Thy son, and heir of Thy heavenly kingdom.'" Choir: "For Thou art our God: a God of saving, and of shewing mercy: To Thee do we give glory: Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, now, ever, and evermore, Amen." This prayer finished, he anoints the baptized person with the holy chrism, making the sign of the cross on his forehead, eyes, nose, ears, and feet, and saying: "The seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost: Amen" (Goar, Eucholog. p. 355). The purport of both prayers is thus briefly: "Stablish the thing, O God, that Thou hast wrought in us," as the Psalmist says (lxviii. 28); and churches have believed in all ages as they prayed. Hence, whatever expressions may have been dropped by particular fathers, what they believed individually, and what the universal church taught collectively, was that the Holy Ghost was communicated as well in the baptismal act as at the later ceremony which followed it—called by us confirmation—and that He was communicated in this last only to strengthen and complete what He had commenced in baptism, viz. the regeneration and sanctification of the soul of man, and not to confer any new gift, as, for instance, the ministerial or prophetic character. Confirmation was therefore distinguished from baptism in ancient times, only so far as, externally considered, it was a separate ceremony; and further, as the one ceremony connected with baptism which the bishops insisted on retaining in their own hands. But it was regarded by nobody for 1000 years, even in the West, as a distinct sacrament; and to infer that it was, merely because communion usually followed it, as it followed baptism, is to assume that confirmation was instituted by our Lord, and had a distinct office assigned to it, as such, in those days, like the other two, which it had not. Indeed, it is included in the baptismal office, and administered at the same time with baptism in the Greek church still, though the Greeks have been inveigled of late years into reckoning it a distinct sacrament, contrary to their traditions. In ancient, as in modern times, nobody could be confirmed or receive the Eucharist who had not been baptized; but in the West, where confirmation has long been dissociated from baptism, persons are constantly permitted to receive the Eucharist who have not been confirmed. In ancient, as in modern times, anybody might administer baptism upon emergencies; and in the East, though the chrism used in confirmation must have been consecrated by a bishop, any priest may confirm. Finally, confirmation, as distinct from baptism, has never been considered necessary to salvation in either church, though penalties were decreed in the West against parents for not bringing their children to confirmation when it might be had. And clearly, what led to its being dissociated in the West from baptism was, not theory, but the practical instinct which seized on it as a fit supplement to the baptism of infants, who needed to have their responsibilities solemnly brought before them in maturer years, when able to appreciate them. That it was postponed for that purpose originally, and not from having been looked upon as a distinct sacrament originally, is a plain historical fact; and then, by degrees, its having a distinct minister and a distinct office, led to its being considered a distinct sacrament. Probably there is nothing that has obscured its true character more, or created false impressions of it, than the prominence given to chrisim in its administration, for which in the words of St. Basil, no written warrant of any sort exists. The East now viewing it as a sacrament, is at a loss to explain its origin. In the West, perhaps the chief of the dogmatic links associating it still with baptism is, that it can never be repeated.

For the current views respecting it in the 7th, 8th, and 9th centuries, see St. Ildefons. de Cogn. Bapt. c. 123-31; the Lib. de Div. Off. c. 19, attributed to Alcuin; Leidrad, *de Sacram. CONGAL (CONGALL). Commemorated on Jan. 2. Camerarius has "S. Congallus Abbas Benchoensis Monasterii in Scotia" (De Scot. Fort. 74). Possevin makes him flourish A.D. 590. Notker, in his Martyrology, at 5 Id. Jul., makes him a pupil of St. Columba, and preceptor of St. Columbanus and St. Gall. But this is, no doubt, St. Comgall of Bangor in Ireland, and not an abbat of Banchory in Scotland. (Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 233, 310.) [J. G.]

CONGAN (COMDIAN, COMGAN), A. Oct. 13 St. Congan, brother of St. Kentigerna (Jan. 7), and uncle of St. Fillan (Jan. 9), was the son of Cellach Cualann king of Leinster, and was in his youth trained as a soldier. On succeeding his father, A.D. 715, he governed his dominions as a Christian prince ought to do; but after a time he left his kingdom and native country. In company with St. Kentigerna his sister, and her sons Fillan, Fursey, and Ultan, and also seven other clerics, he went to Lochelch, (now Lochalsh, in Ross-shire) where they lived a severe life. At a great age he died, and was buried in Iona. His nephew, St. Fillan, built a church at Lochalsh to his memory, and his name was held in special honour in the district in the 16th century. We do not know the date of his decease, but his sister died A.D. 734. He had many dedications, and has given his name to many places in the islands and west of Scotland; in the east he is found only at Turriff, Aberdeenshire. (Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 310; Reeves, Adamnan, 384, 419; Book of Deer, p. cxxxiv. sq.; Brev. Aberd. pars aestiv. f. cxxvi.) [J. G.]

CONGUSSIU (CONGUS), bishop and scribe of Armagh. He was a native of Kinell Ainmire, and confessor of Aedh Ollan, king of the Northern Hy Neill of Ulster. He is famous apparently for but one transaction, the inciting Aedh Ollan or Allan to attack Aedh Boin, king of the Ulidians, for having pillaged some churches, his own amongst them, in the diocese of Armagh. He succeeded Sibhne (June 21) at Armagh, A.D. 730, and held the see for twenty years. In the Four Masters is given the quatrain which St. Congus composed to incite the king to revenge the profanation of the church. (Colgan, Tr. Thamm. 294, col. 1; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 331, 352 n. 2, 353; Ware, Ir. Bishops, 4.) [J. G.]

CONINANUS, Dec. 9, A.D. 710. He is described by Camerarius, on the authority of Wion, as having been abbat of Hy, and preceptor to king Ferquharl's sons. Perhaps he is Conamhail (Sept. 11), tenth abbat of Hy, and the first who was not of the race of Conall Gulban. [CONAMHAIL.] He cannot be Conang Ua Beiceleighinn of 1128, nor Conang (Sept. 23). (Reeves, Adamnan, 378, 404.) [J. G.]

CONLA. [CONNLA.]

CONLAEDH. (CONDLAEDH, CONLAIDH, CONLIAN.) May 3. Though Camerarius (De Scot. Fort. 117), at March 15, gives "S. Conleatus Sodorensis Episcopus," yet under this name we recognise the anchorite who was selected by St. Brigida to be her chief artist, and with her to govern her churches. He is called Conlaedh, Conlaedh, latinised Conlianus, a name which the scholium or gloss on St. Aengus the Culdee tells us is Cundal-Aedh, i.e. Aedh the Wise. If so, his name was Aedh or Hugh, but the same scholiast adds that his original name was Konchend (Todd, St. Patrick, 19-20). When St. Brigida founded her monastery at Kildare, she chose the learned and pious Conlaedh to be her bishop, and to have episcopal charge there and in the affiliated houses in all spiritual matters, as she had a conterminous charge in all monastic affairs. He was simply bishop, first and chiefly for the monastery, and then "in rebus exterioribus," but always in monastic submission to the head of the monastery. He was of the race of Laeghaire Lorc, son of Ugaime Mór, monarch of Ireland, and was distantly related to St. Brigida through their common ancestor Ugaime Mór. As well as being bishop, he is always referred to as St. Brigida's chief artist, artificer, or brazier, for the working in all kinds of metals and making chalices, patens, bells, shrines, &c. He was devoured by wild dogs or wolves as he was on his way to Rome, A.D. 520, and his tomb on the other side of the altar from that occupied by the tomb of St. Brigida, in the church of Kildare, was, like St. Brigida's, very highly ornamented. [BRIGIDA (5)]. (Colgan, Tr. Thamm. 524 n. 1, 552, c. 19, 565 n. 12, and Acta SS. 217-8 n. 22; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 170 n. 171; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 119; Petrie, Round Towers, 197 sq.; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 409, 450; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 311; Todd,

CONMACH. [CONNACHTACH and CONMACH.]

CONNA (CONDA, DACHONNA), abbat of Daire-Dachonna, in Ulster, April 12. He was of the race of Conall Gulban, son of Niall (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 101). There are so many saints of the name of Conna, and its honorific forms, Mochonna and Dachonna, that it is impossible to keep the lines of identification clear. For a long list, see Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 178 n. ¹¹⁵). Conna, an artificer, brother of St. Sacellus, received a church from St. Patrick in Kierragia-Airteach, a district in the present Roscommon (Colgan, ibid. 137, c. 56; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 245). There are two Mochonnas of Doire (March 8 and May 15), but there is nothing of any real value to attach them to a place in history (Mart. Doneg. 71, 127; Colgan, Acta SS. 565). [J. G.]

CONNACHTACH. (CONMACH.) May 10. This was the eighteenth abbat of Hy or Iona, and he presided A.D. 801-2. In the Annals he is called "choice scribe," and is known as Conman, and Conmach. (Reeves, Adunann, 388; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 252; Grub, Ecol. Hist. Scot. i. 125; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 500-1.) [J. G.]

CONNELL. [CONALL.]

CONNLA is found twice in the Irish calendars, first as Connla, son of Leinin, bishop, at May 10, and next as Conlla, bishop of Rusgach (qu. Ros-each, now Russagh, bar. Moygoish, co. Westmeath?), at Dec. 30. But the most famous person bearing the name was a renowned worker in brass, whose memory was fresh in the days of St. Columba, and who must have lived in the 5th century or early in the 6th. One of his shrines is said to have been extant in the time of Colgan, at Dun Cruthen in Ard-Magilligan, on the eastern shore of Lough Foyle. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 405. c. 99, 451 n. ⁸²; Petrie, Round Towers, 202-3.) [J. G.]

CONNMACH (CONMACH), of Armagh, succeeded Cudiniscus, but in what year is uncertain, probably some time after A.D. 790 (Four Mast.). He died suddenly in the year 807, and the Psalter of Cashel gives him a rule of fourteen years. Under his influence St. Fothad the Canonist drew up the remonstrance which procured for the clergy of Ireland the right of exemption from military service. [FOHAD.] (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 233, 244, 252; Prim. Ch. Hist. Ir. ii. 1106.) Of Connmach of Ath-blair, July 9, we have no account. [J. G.]

CONOC. [CANOC.]

CONODHAR [CONODRAN], of Fobhar, A., Nov. 3, A.D. 706. This seems to have been a person of note, as his death is entered in most of the Irish annals, but of his parentage or life at Fobhar (now Fore, co. Westmeath) we have no trace. He died A.D. 707 (Ann. Tih.). (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 296; Colgan, Acta SS. 143, c. 3.) [J. G.]

CONON (1) Martyred under Decius in Pamphylia, March 6, was a gardener, said to have come from Nazareth, a simple, poor, hospitable man. Wheu told the prefect wanted him, he said, "What can he want me for? especially as I am a Christian." When bidden sacrifice, he groaned, and wished the prefect could renounce idols and come to Christ. His ankles were pierced, and nails driven through them, and in that state he was made to run before a chariot till he died. Another story was afterwards told of him, or perhaps of another man of the same name, in Isauria, to suit the taste of a later age. He was baptized by the chief captain Michael. He used to make the devils guard his fields, and then shut them up in casks. He taught the people to say, "There is one God, even Conon's." And when he was tortured there was a rescue, and he survived two years, and died in peace. (Menology of Basil.) [E. B. B.]

CONON (2) Bishop of Edessa, who in the year 313 laid the foundations of a church in that city, which was completed by his successor Saades, and enlarged by Aitallaha (Herzog, Real-Encycl. iii. 646). [E. V.]

(3) Bishop of Apamea, who in the Isaurian rebellion in the reign of Anastasius, A.D. 542, "left his throne, and was converted from a priest to a soldier and a general." Theophan. p. 118. Conon became a leader of the rebels, and was killed while besieging the town of Claudiopolis, A.D. 543 (ib. p. 19). [E. V.]

(4) Bishop of Tarsus (flourished c. 601), a disciple of Joannes Philoponus, whose cause he defended in conjunction with Eugenius against the Eutychians Paul and Stephen before John the patriarch of Constantinople. The acts of this disputation existed in the time of Photius, and were read by him. Conon subsequently disagreed with Philoponus as to the perfect equality of the three natures in the Trinity, and, separating from him, founded a new church of which he acted as bishop. His quarrel with Philoponus led to his anathematization of his former teacher, and the publication of an Oratio Invectiva directed against the views of Philoponus as to the resurrection of the flesh, which Photius records having read. Photius speaks of Conon and his followers under the name of Tritheists (Phot. Cod. 23, 24; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 573.) [CONONITES.] [E. V.]

(5) Abbat of Lérins, lived about the year 600. Pope Gregory I. wrote a letter to him on the government of his monastery. "Let the good," he said, "find you mild, and the wicked severe. Maintain such order in your corrections that you may appear to love the persons and hate the vices, lest, if you act otherwise, your corrections may appear to change into cruelty, and you may lose those whom you wished to correct. Mingle in your corrections severity with mildness, so that love may make the good determine to keep on their guard and teach the wicked to love their duty." Pope Gregory says that he is equally delighted at the vigour, ability, and excellence of Conon as he had been distressed at the remissness of his predecessor (Stephannus). Le Cointe regards Conon as the restorer of Lérins to its ancient character and dignity. (Greg. Mag. Epist. xi. 12, Patrol. Lat. ciii. 1126; Le Cointe, Ann. Ecol. Franc. vol. ii. p. 478; Ceillier, Hist. Gén. des Auteurs sacrés, xi. 520.) [D. R. J.]

(6) A native of Sicily, but of Thracian extraction, chosen bishop of Rome Oct. 20, A.D. 646, in the room of John V., who died rather more than two and a half months before. Factions had stood in the way of a speedier election, and his own, the effect of a compromise, was perhaps due to his great age. He survived it but eleven months, incapacitated the greater part of that time from ill-health. No letters of his are preserved (l'Art de Vérif. les Dates, i. 254; Mansi, xi. 1097). [E. S. Ff.]

CONON (7). [CONAN.]

CONONDRIUS, supposed to have been bishop of Man, consecrated by St. Patrick, A.D. 447 (Stubbs, Regist. 154). [C. H.]

CONONITES. The followers of Conon, [CONOX (4)] at the opening of the 7th century. They held the Tritheistic views of Conon's teacher, Johannes Philoponus (d. c. 617), but differed from him and his disciples with respect to the resurrection of the body, the Philoponites asserting that both the form and matter of the human body perished after death, while the Cononites maintained that the form passed away, but that the matter was eternal. The sect had entirely disappeared by the time of Justinian II. A.D. 685-705. [E. V.]

CONRACH (CONRY), Feb. 23. On this day the calendars give Cruimther Connrach. Colgan says this is Courach or Conry, brother of St. Aidan, and one of the Mocuiken, or Moccuceim, i.e. sons of the descendants of Kien or Cian. His mother is said to have been Sinecha, sister of St. Columba, and he was buried at Durrow. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 478 nn. ⁵⁻⁶, 479 n. ²², 489 n. ³³; Reeves, Admann, 247, 277.) [J. G.]

CONRAN. [CAEMHAN (3).]

CONRINTINUS (Bede, Martyrol. May 1, Auct.), bishop of Quimper. [CORENTINUS.] [C. H.]

CONSECRATION OF THE ELEMENTS OF THE COMMUNION. [EUCCHARIST.]

CONSENTIUS, a lay theologian of the time of Augustine, lived in certain islands, probably the Balearic, and wrote to submit some treatises of his to the judgment of Augustine (Ep. 119 (221), vol. ii. 449). Augustine's answer follows (ii. 516, ed. Migne). This was probably about A.D. 408. Consentius's letter is interesting in several ways: (1) As one of the earliest specimens of that curious union which, according to Sir J. Stephens, we find in the schoolmen, "of the aspirations and prostrations of the mind of man, prostrating itself to the most arbitrary of human dogmas, aspiring to penetrate the loftiest and most obscure of the divine attributes." This is very much what Augustine remarks upon it. Consentius had said, "If the faith of holy church were to be apprehended by reason of disputation, not by piety of credulity, none but philosophers and orators could possess bliss. We must not so much ask a reason of God as follow the authority of saints." And yet he had shewn a desire to be instructed. "If I grant your request," says Augustine, "I shall do nothing else but render you a reason." "If it be reasonable that in some great things faith should precede reason, the reason that persuades us that it is so must precede faith." "The prophet said reasonably, Except ye believe, ye shall not understand (Is. vii. 9)."

controversy. It was not merely "mid tumult of her war" that the church was guided into truth, but in lonely meditations far and wide. The question of the relation of the human to the divine personality much perplexed Consentius. Augustine explains "ascending to the Father" to mean being recognised as equal to the Father. His reductio ad absurdum of a corporal anthropomorphism in conceptions of God is complete, but ludicrous, and therefore painful.

(3) The letter is interesting because of the nature of Consentius's difficulty in apprehending Augustine's doctrine. Belief in divine personalities was to him inseparable from a material conception of God as a surpassingly glorious light. To him Augustine's doctrine that God is righteousness seemed to make God no longer a living Being, but a dead abstraction. Augustine answers by asking, Is not life itself alive? As the body lives by the soul, and the soul lives on without the body, so the soul lives by righteousness, and Christ is made to us righteousness; "the highest God is true righteousness, and the true God is the highest righteousness; our righteousness is to hunger after Him here, and to be filled with Him hereafter." The substance or essence of God (into the distinction of ὑπόστασις and οὐσία he declines to enter) are not to be distinguished from the divinity.

Consentius wrote again (this letter is lost) for further information on the nature of the risen body, and Augustine answered him at length (Ep. 205 [146]).

The spirit of Consentius's letter, his profound humility, and entreaties that he may be publicly corrected that others also may profit, is so similar to that of the Spaniards who write shortly after to Capreolus, that we are led to ask whether for Constantius or Tonantius there, we should not read Consentius. [E. B. B.]

CONSORTIA, ST., virgin, of Clugny. Her legend is as follows. Eucherius and his wife Galla, a pious couple, of senatorial rank, being possessed of much wealth, but having no children, prayed to God to give them one, and in answer to their prayer a daughter was born to them, whom they dedicated from her infancy to the service of Heaven, under the name of Consortia. They afterwards had a second daughter, whom they called Tullia.

Consortia was sought in marriage by a youth of noble family, and was greatly imperturbed by his friends to accept him. For some time she evaded the matter, but at last she proposed that they should go together to the church, and having joined in prayer during the celebration of mass, should open the book of the Gospel, and learn the will of God from the first verses that happened to turn up. This was done, and the first words that they read were from the 19th chapter of St. Matthew: "Jesus said unto His disciples, Whosoever loveth father and mother more than Me is not worthy of Me."

This decided the matter, and Consortia remained unmarried. Her father Eucherius had already separated from his wife and become a hermit, retiring to a cave in Mont-Maur, where his faithful spouse fed him through a hole or window. [EUCHERIUS, ST.] In A.D. 523 he became bishop of Lyon.

After the death of her parents, Consortia built on her own land a church, which she called after the mother of St. Stephen, and a Xenodochium.

She lived about the end of the 6th century, in the reigns of Chlothar and his son Siegebart, and in both reigns was much persecuted by suitors, whom, however, she steadfastly resisted. In the reign of Chlothar she made a journey to that king to beg his protection for her religious house, and having miraculously healed his daughter who was dying, she obtained more than she desired in the way of large endowments. She is commemorated on the 22nd of June (A.A. SS. Boll. June, iv. p. 250). [D. R. J.]

CONSTANS I. [CONSTANTINE THE GREAT.]

CONSTANS II. [CONSTANTINUS IV.]

CONSTANS, supposed bishop of Winchester, A.D. 293, according to Rudborne (Stubbs, Regist. 153). [C. H.]

CONSTANS, priest and anchorite of Eo-inis, in Lough Erne, Nov. 14. He was son of Fuasclace, of the race of Colla Uais, son of Eochaidh Doimhlen, monarch of Erin. He is counted among the saints belonging to the family of St. Maedoc (Jan. 31), and the Ann. Ulst. give the obit of "Constans sapiens Locanerna" in A.D. 777. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 309; Colgan, Acta SS. 222, c. 4, where he is called "Abbat of Inis-eo.") [J. G.]

CONSTANTIA, sister of the emperor Constantine the Great, and wife of the emperor Licinius, patroness of Eusebius of Caesarea and Arius. Before A.D. 323 Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, met accidentally a woman carrying in the streets a picture representing two figures of philosophers, to which she gave the names of Paul and Jesus Christ. Eusebius, writing to Constantia, says he took the picture, to avoid the scandal of seeing representations of God hawked about the streets after the manner of pagan deities. Constantia writes back, asking Eusebius to send her the picture, or to get it copied. Eusebius is unwilling to comply, and tries to turn Constantia from tangible objects to the invisible reality, and persuades her to look forward to seeing God face to face in the world to come. The iconoclasts produced this letter at the Seventh General Council; but it was rejected as the writing of an Arian. During his sojourn at Nicomedia, Arius attempted to persuade Constantia to share his opinions; and St. Jerome says that he succeeded. At any rate Constantia was persuaded by a presbyter whose name is said by writers of a later date to have been Eutocius, that Arius had been misrepresented and unjustly condemned. On her deathbed, A.D. 327-8, she did her best to convince the emperor Constantine, and commended the presbyter to him. By him the emperor, who had never clearly understood the question, was persuaded to invite Arius to his court, where he soon established an exclusive influence. (Euseb. Epist. ad Constant. August., Migne, Patrol. Graec. xx. 1546; Rufinus, E. cl. Hist. I. xi.; Migne, Patrol. Lat. xxi. 482; Soz. ii. 27; Soz. i. 60; Robertson, Hist. Christ. Ch. Bk. II. chap. i.; Ceillier, iii. 250, 417.) [W. M. S.]

CONSTANTIANUS, ST., abbat and recluse, was born of a good family in Auvergne, in the beginning of the 6th century. In early youth he decided to become a monk, and betook himself to the cloister of Micy, in the neighbourhood of Orleans. Longing, however, for a still greater solitude, he retired to a wood in the province of Maine, where he became renowned for the sanctity and asceticism of his life, as well as for the number of wonderful cures which he was said to have performed on the sick who flocked to his retreat. St. Innocent, bishop of Le Mans, obliged him to become a presbyter, for the sake of the neighbouring villages.

When Clotarius I., king of the Franks, travelled through that neighbourhood to make war against his son Chramnus in Brittany, he paid a visit on the way to Constantianus in his cave. The saint promised the king a successful campaign, for which Clotarius handsomely rewarded him. With that money Constantianus enriched a cloister of his own, which stood long after his death, A.D. 570. His life, written by an almost contemporary author from the report of his disciples, is to be found in the histories of Maine, written by Courvaisier and Boudonnet. He is commemorated on the 1st of December (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. i. pp. 398, 863; Baillet, Vies des Saints, tom. iii. Dec. 1). [D. R. J.]

CONSTANTINA, wife of the Eastern emperor Maurice (A.D. 582-602), and daughter of his patron and predecessor, Tiberius II. (A.D. 578-582). She received letters from pope Gregory the Great: one, in reply to her request for certain relics of St. Paul for a church which she was building, in which he excuses himself by saying that it is impossible to venture near so sacred a body (Letters of Gregory, iv. 30, Patrol. Lat. lxxvii.); another, in which pope Gregory warns her against the pretensions of John, patriarch of Constantinople, who wishes to be sole bishop, and is protected by the emperor Maurice. Such pretensions, says Gregory, ought to shew him that antichrist is near. In the 41st letter of the 5th book, pope Gregory petitions her on behalf of the oppressed Corsicans and Sicilians. After the murder of Maurice by the assassin Phocas (emperor A.D. 602-610) Constantina attempted an insurrection in vain. With her three innocent daughters, she was brutally tortured and then beheaded at Chalcedon. The details of her life with the emperor Maurice, of her romantic disposition, and of her insurrections, are given by Theophaeus. (Patrol. Graec. cviii. §§ 211, 213, 215, 244, 246, 247; Ceillier, vi. 96, xi. 497, 498; Gibbon, Smith's ed. v. 387.)

A. Ancient (Heathen).

Eutropius, Breviarium, Hist. Rom., the end of the 9th and beginning of the 10th book. This historian was secretary to the emperor, and his short account is therefore valuable. The Cæsares and the Epitome, current under the name of Aurelius Victor, were doubtless the work of different authors. The first, who wrote under Constantius was a friend of Ammianus, and præfectus urbi towards the close of the century; the second, who excerpted from the first, lived a generation later, and continued his compilation down to the death of Theodosius the Great. They seem to have used the same sources as Zosimus, whom they supplement. The Panegyrists, as contemporary writers, deserve more attention than has been given them, allowance being made for the defects incident to their style of writing. Those relating to our subject are Anon. Panegyr. Maximiano et Constantino (A.D. 307). Eumenii Constantino in natalibus urb. Trevir. (310), and Gratitrum acti, Flavianisium nomine (311). Anon. de victoriæ adv. Maxentium (313), and Nazarii Paneg. Constantino (321). They are all the product of Gallic rhetoricians. The Scriptores Hist. Augustæ contain several contemporary references to Constantine; those in Julian's Cæsars are, as might be supposed, unfriendly and satirical.

The first volume of the Bonn edition of the Byzantine historians contains the fragments of Eunapius, Priscus, Dexippus, &c., but what is preserved of them directly is of little moment. The same may be said of the extracts from Praxagoras in Photius, Cod. 62. Indirectly it is supposed that we have the matter of these earlier writers in Zosimus's ιστορία νέα, book ii. This historian lived probably about the year 450. He is a bitter enemy of Constantine, whom he accuses of various crimes and cruelties, and blames for the novelties of his policy, shewing at the same time a particular dislike of his conversion. He falls into several historical blunders, one of which however is shared by other Greek historians, who confuse Maximianus Daza and Maximian (e.g. Zos. ii. 11 ad fn.; cf. 17 ad f. and Socrates, H. E. i. 2; Zos. ii. 39 ad init.; cf. 29 ad med.). The part of Ammianus' Histories relating to this reign is most unfortunately lost. Some remarks on it occur in the part that is preserved, from which we may conclude his general agreement with his friend and contemporary Victor. The text of Ammianus, recently published by Gardthausen (Teubner, 1874), may be recommended. He has also given a revised text from the MSS. of the anonymous excerpts generally cited as Anonymus Valesii, Excerpta Valesiana. They have of course received this name from being first printed by H. Valois, at the end of his edition of Ammianus. Some of these extracts may be traced word for word in Eutropius and Orosius, whence we conclude that their author did not live earlier than the 5th century. Others are valuable as coming from sources which are elsewhere unrepresented.

(Christian.) The earliest contemporary authority is Lactantius, De m'ribus persecutorum, a tract published after the defeat of Maxentius and before Constantine had declared himself the enemy of Licinius, i.e. probably 313 or 314.

His bitterness is very unpleasant, and his language is exaggerated and somewhat obscure, but his facts are generally confirmed by other authors, where we can test them. The most important is no doubt Eusebius. Three of his works especially treat of Constantine, Hist. Eccl., ix. and x., down to the year 324, and probably published before the death of Crispus in 326; De Vita Constantini, in four books, with a translation of Constantine's Oratio ad Sanctorum coetum as an appendix, published after his death; and, thirdly, τριακονταετηρικὸς, or Louides Constantini, a panegyric at his tricennialia, containing little but rhetoric. The attempt to harmonise Eusebius and Zosimus is a difficult one. Fleury's dictum, "On ne se trompera sur Constantin en croyant tout le mal qu'en dit Eusèbe, et tout le bien qu'en dit Zosime," may be perfectly true, but it is a very inadequate guide when a detailed account is in question, for Zosimus says very little good of him and Eusebius very little harm. Eusebius has great weight as a contemporary and as giving documents, which have not for the most part been seriously challenged; on the other hand he is discredited by the fulsomeness and bad taste in his later works, and by the inconsistencies of tone between them and his history. He gives notice, however, that he will only recount those actions of the emperor which belong to his religious life (V. C. i. 11: μόνα τὰ πρὸς τὸν θεοφιλή συντείνοντα βίον), and he throws himself open to the criticism of Socrates (H. E., i. 1) as τῶν ἐπαίων τοῦ βασιλεως καὶ τῆς πανηγυρικῆς ὑψηγορίας τῶν λόγων μάλλον ὡς ἐν ἐγκωμίῳ φροντίσας ἢ περὶ τοῦ ἀκριβῶς περιλαβεῖν τὰ γενόμενα. But we must make allowances for the natural exultation of Christians over the emperor who had done so much for them, and who openly professed himself an instrument of Providence for their advancement. While we feel a certain distrust of Eusebius on one side (as of Zosimus on the other), we must take care not to push our distrust too far. The best edition of the historical works of Eusebius is that by F. A. Heinichen, recently republished and enlarged (Leipz. 1868-1870, 3 vols.).*

Of the works of Constantine himself we shall speak in § IV. Besides these we possess very important contemporary documents in the laws issued by him (after 312) contained in the Theodosian and Justinian Codes. The first are in a purer state, and may be consulted in the excellent edition of Hänel (Bonn, 1842-44), or in the older standard folios of Godefroi, with their valuable historical notes. The series of laws from both codes are arranged chronologically in the volume of Migne's Patrologia, Opera Constantini, which also contains the Panegyrists and the documents relating to the early history of the Donatists.

Socrates, H. E. i. 1, and Sozomen, H. E. i. and ii. (living both about a century later) give us an account of the last period of his reign. Of these Socrates is generally the safer guide. On his relations with Arianism much will be found in the treatises and epistles of St. Athanasius, and occasional facts may be gleaned from the other fathers. As a hero of Byzantine history and

* For a careful judgment of Eusebius's Life of Constantine Heinichen's 23rd Meletema may be consulted (vol. lii. p. 754). Compare also De Broglie, l'Église et l'Empire, vol. lii. p. 39.

Ἰσαύρατος, Constantine has become clothed in a mist of fiction. Something may be gathered from Joannes Lydus, de Magistrat. P. R., and among the fables of Cedrenus and Zonaras may be found some facts drawn from more trustworthy sources.

B. Modern.

It will be unnecessary to enumerate the names of the well-known writers of church history who treat of Constantine. Nor are there wanting a multitude of minor essays on separate points of his life. As early as 1720 Vogt (Hist. Litter. Const. Mag. Hamburg) gave a list of more than 150 authors, ancient and modern, and the number since that date is infinitely increased. The first critical life of importance is by J. C. F. Manso, published about the beginning of the century (Leben Constantins des Grossen, Wien, 1819, &c.), but it is hard and one-sided, unchristian, if not antichristian. Jacob Burckhardt in great measure follows Manso, but his book is much more interesting and popular (die Zeit Constantins des Gr., Basel, 1853). It is not always fair, and some misstatements in it will be noticed below. The author views the emperor merely as a great politician, and shews much bitterness against Eusebius. Theodore Keim's der Uebertritt Const. des Gr. (Zürich, 1862) is in many points a good refutation of Burckhardt, as well as a fair statement in itself, from one not at all disposed to be credulous. Of larger works the first two volumes of l'Église et l'Empire au IV^e Siècle, by count, now duke, A. de Broglie, the head of the Conservative party in France (Paris, 1855, &c.), give the views of a learned and enlightened Roman Catholic, generally based on the original authorities. This is perhaps the most useful of modern books upon the subject. The section (134) in Dr. P. Schaff's Gesch. der Alten Kirche (Leipz. 1867, also translated) is as good a short account of Constantine as can be named. In English we have a short life by a Nonconformist, Mr. Joseph Fletcher (London, 1852, 16mo.), but no standard work of importance. The brilliant sketch by Dean Stanley in his Eastern Churches is probably also the fairest picture of Constantine in our language. For his relations with Arianism we may refer to Newman's Arians of the Fourth Century (1st ed. 1833; 3rd ed. 1871); Neale's Eastern Church, Patriarchate of Alexandria, and Bright's History of the Church, A.D. 313-451, 2nd ed. 1869.

II. Life.—Three Periods. i. To 312. ii. 312-324. iii. 324-337.

Period i. To 312.

Flavius Valerius Aurelius Constantinus, surnamed Magnus or the Great, was born Feb. 27, probably in the year 274, at Naïssus (Nissa), in Dardania or Upper Moesia, the country where his family had for some time been settled. Victor (Caes.), makes him 62 at the time of his death, but Socrates (i. 39) says he was in his 65th year. The place of his birth is given as Naïssus by Anonymus Valesii, Constantine Porphyrogenitus (De Thematibus, ii. 9), and Stephanus Byzant. s. r. Naïssos. Julius Firmicus (1, 2) places it at Tarsus (cf. Ammian. xxi. 10), and Nicephorus Callisti at Drepanum, the birthplace of Helena. The opinion that he was born in Britain, and of a British princess, current since the time of William of Malmesbury, and accepted by Baronius, seems to have arisen from a mere misunderstanding.

ing of two passages in the Panegyricists, who address him as "taking his rise" from Britain (Pan. Max. et Const. iv. and Eumen. in not. orb. Trev. ix.), and possibly from a confusion of his mother Helena with her namesake, wife of Magnus Maximus.

His father, Constantinus Chlorus, was still quite young at the time of his son's birth. He was of a good family, being nephew by the mother's side of the emperor Claudius, the conqueror of the Goths. A few years later we find him high in favour with Carus, who intended, it was said, to make him Caesar. His mother Helena, on the other hand, was of mean position, apparently a servant at an inn, and as such seems to have had the status only of a "concubina" (Zos. ii. 8), and not to have been fully married till after her son's birth. (St. Ambrose calls her a "stabularia," de obitu Theodos. Migne, vol. iii. 1209; cf. Anon. Val. "matre vilissima.") Burckhardt (Leben C. p. 349 note 2) refers to Eutychius Alex. ed. Oxon. pp. 408, 456, and Hamza Ispahens. p. 55, as asserting that she was a Mesopotamian captive and a Christian; but Eusebius (V. C. iii. 47) ascribes her conversion to her son, and Eutychius is notoriously untrustworthy. Her marriage is implied by many historians, and by her subsequent repudiation in favour of Theodora (292), and asserted by Eusebius (H. E. viii. 13 app. παιδα γνήσιου) and in inscriptions. On the other hand, the positive statements of her "concubinatus" outweigh the deductions drawn from Victor and Eutropius. Constantine, the child of these parents, was, it seems, brought up at Drepanum in Cilicia, his mother's birthplace (Procop. de aedif. Justin. v. 2). His father, on becoming Caesar, and taking at the same time another wife, sent him, when about 16 years old, as a sort of hostage to Diocletian at Nicomedia, who treated him with kindness. His first military service was to accompany that emperor in his expedition against Achilleus in 296, and Eusebius saw him as a young and handsome man, as they passed through Palestine into Egypt (V. C. i. 19). In the following year he took part in the successful war of Galerius against the Persians.

We must place the first marriage of Constantine with Minervina about this time. We know that he married early, and that Crispus was over twenty when appointed Caesar in 317 (ἡδη νεανίω, Zos. ii. 20; cf. Pan. Max. et Const. iv.). Minervina, of whose character nothing is known, died before her husband's alliance with Fausta, but about her status there is much the same doubt as about Helena's. On the one hand we have the special eulogy of his morality (Pan. Max. etc., ut supra de vict. adv. Max. iv., pudicitia soli dicata conjugio, but both after his marriage with Fausta), on the other the assertion of Zosimus that she was a "concubina," to which positive statement it seems best to assent (ii. 20, so Zonar. Ann. xiii. 2). In both cases we may remark that the relation was one recognised by the Roman law, and by no means in itself a sign of depravity. Marcus Aurelius, for instance, took a concubine after the death of Faustina, and Alexander Severus required his provincial governors to have such a companion if they were unmarried. Constantine continued in the East while his father was fighting in Gaul and Britain. In 303 he was present, when the edict of persecution against the Christians was promulgated at Nicomedia, and the palace soon after struck by lightning. The concurrence of these two events and the comments made upon them seem by his own assertion to have made a strong impression upon him (Orat. ad Sanct. coet. 25). He was a witness also in 305 of the abdication of the two Augusti, Diocletian and Maximian, and may have expected something from the partiality shewn him by the former; the son of Constantius had at any rate as just pretensions as the nephew of Galerius, Maximinus Daza (De M. P. xviii., xix.; cf. xiv.). He remained, however, probably against his will, with Galerius, who it is said attempted to destroy him by exciting him to combats with wild beasts and exposing him to encounters with Sarmatian champions (Praxag. Frag. Hist. ed. Müller, vol. iv. p. 2; De M. P. 24; Anon. Val. 3; Zon. Ann. xii. 33).

But a higher destiny was awaiting him in another part of the empire. His father insisted upon his return, and Galerius at length was persuaded to give his permission and the seal which was necessary for the public posts, ordering him not to start before receiving his last instructions on the morrow. When the emperor rose the next day, having purposely delayed till the afternoon, he found Constantine had taken flight in the night. He had probably good reasons for his mistrust, and to stop pursuit he maimed the public horses on many of the stations on his road (Zos. ii. 8; Anon. Val. 4; Victor Caes. 21), which (as De Broglie remarks) lay in part through countries where the persecution was raging. He arrived at Gesoriacum (Boulogne) just in time to accompany his father, who was on the point of sailing to Britain on his last expedition against the Picts (Eumen. in nat. urb. Trev. vii.). Constantius died at York, July 306, in the presence of his sons, after declaring Constantine his successor, who was much older than any of the children of his second wife (De M. P. xxiv.). He was almost immediately proclaimed Augustus by the soldiers (Σεβαστὸς πρὸς τῶν στρατοπέδων ἀναγορευθεὶς, Eus. II. E. viii. 13. Other authorities speak of him as Cæsar, Zos. ii. 9; Anon. Val. 4. Eumenius, in nat. urb. Trev. viii. is indecisive. See below § VI. Coins) a movement which was supported also by Ercus, king of the Alamanni (Vict. Epit. 41). It is perhaps idle to dispute whether this act is to be called an usurpation or not. Constantius was as much Augustus as Galerius, and the principles of inheritance of empire, however vague and fluctuating, gave his son at least a right to prefer his claims to his father's colleague. Galerius received with some reluctance the laurel-crowned image, which was sent according to precedent, but refused him the title of Augustus, which he bestowed on Severus. Almost at the same time another claimant of imperial power appeared at Rome in Maxentius, son of the retired Maximian, who now came forward again to assist his son. This apparently more important rival occupied the attention of the Augusti, and left Constantine free to strengthen himself in his western provinces. His first act is said to have been to shew favour to the Christians (De M. P. xxiv.) who had been exposed to little of the violence of persecution under the mild rule of Constantius. (V. C. i.

13-17. Eusebius seems here to exaggerate. Cf. Episcopor. partis Majorini preces ad Constantinum, in Op. Const. Migne, col. 747.) Like his father, he occupied himself with his own subjects, and was now particularly engaged in defending Gaul against the Franks and German tribes, who had risen during the absence of Constantius in Britain (Eumen. ib. x.). In 307, between the time of Severus's defeat and death and the expedition of Galerius against Maxentius, Maximian, who had quarrelled with his son, crossed the Alps and allied himself with the Caesar of the West. Constantine received as wife his daughter Fausta (born, we may remark, at Byzantium), and with her the title of Augustus, to which Galerius assented in the following year (Pan. Max. et Const. v.). For three years after his marriage he found sufficient employment in consolidating his government in the West, and in wars upon the frontier of the Rhine, over which he began to build a bridge at Cologne. The seat of his court was Treves, which he embellished with many buildings. The circus maximus, several temples and basilicas, and the forum, are mentioned by his panegyrist as his gift to the city (Eumen. l.c. xxii.). The chief of the existing remains, the baths, amphitheatre, basilica and Porta Nigra, whether all his work or not, belong in all probability to the same period. In the amphitheatre, cut out of the low hills above the city, he exposed a great multitude of Franks to the wild beasts, more, says the rhetorician, than they could dispose of without satiety (l.c. xii.). During one expedition against this people, Maximian, who was once more in retirement, a third time assumed the purple, giving out that his son-in-law was dead. Constantine hastily returned and blockaded him in Marsailles, but when that place surrendered, was content to let him live in obscurity. Maximian could not rest, and plotted to murder him, a scheme in which his daughter pretended to join. She informed her husband; and the old man was taken dagger in hand—a worthless slave having been laid in the emperor's bed as his substitute—and was obliged to be the instrument of his own death (Eum. l.c. xvi.—xx.; De M. P. xxix., xxx.; Euseb. H. E. viii. 12; V. C. i. 47). In the mean time Galerius was seized with a painful illness, and on April 30th, 311, shortly before his death, issued his haughty edict of toleration, the first of the series, to which the names of Constantine and Licinius were also affixed. Constantine, however, still remained in the West engaged in wars with the Alamanni and Cherusci, and in restoring the cities of Gaul (cf. Eumen. Gratiarum actio Flavianium nomine, on the restoration of the schools of Autun). He is said, indeed, to have interfered by letter on behalf of the Eastern Christians whom Maximinus Daza now began to molest, and this is in itself sufficiently probable (De M. P. xxxvii.).

To understand the history that follows we must remember that there were at this time four Augusti, Licinius and Maximinus in the East, and Maxentius and Constantine in the West. The two latter had for some time acknowledged one another (see below, § VI. Coins), and it is probable that by a kind of tacit consent the four restricted themselves pretty nearly to the limits which afterwards bounded the four great preictures. But there was little united action between them, and sole empire was perhaps the secret aim of each. Maxentius now felt himself strong enough to break with Constantine, and declared war against him. The latter determined to take the initiative, and crossed the Cottian Alps, by the pass of Mont Genève, with a force certainly much smaller than that of his opponent (Gibbon says, by Mont Cenis; but the road to Susa and Turin was then by the Cottian Alps and Mons Matriona, as may be seen in the Itinerary from Bordeaux to Jerusalem made in 333, which may be found in Migne's volume, Opera Constantini, &c.). Later historians affirm that the Romans besought him by an embassy to free them from the tyrant (Zon. Ann. xiii.; Cedrenus, § 270). Maxentius had certainly done almost everything that folly, insolence, and brutality could do to alienate his subjects, and no writers, however adverse to Constantine, speak in his behalf (e.g. cp. Julian, Cæs.). There is therefore some probability in the statement. Constantine had also allied himself with one of the Eastern Augusti, Licinius, whom he engaged in marriage with his sister Constantia. On the other hand he had to proceed against the counsels and wishes of his generals, and against the advice of the augurs (Pan. de vict. adv. Maxent. ii.). After taking Turin, he rested some days at Milan, where he was received in triumph, and gave audience to all who wished to consult him (Ibid. vii.). We may assume also that two other events took place at the same place and time, the spring or summer of 312, viz., the betrothal of Constantia with Licinius, and the issue of a second edict of toleration to the Christians, that somewhat hard edict to which the emperors refer in the more celebrated announcement of the following year (see below § III. B. Religious policy, and cf. Keim, Uebertritt, note 11).

After taking Verona, Constantine, according to the common accounts, met with little resistance till within a few miles of Rome, though this is not quite consistent with the statement of Lactantius (De M. P. xlv.). He had turned the advanced guard of the enemy at Saxa Rubra, close to the Cremera, and then pressed forward along the Flaminian road to the walls of the city itself. With great rashness Maxentius had determined to give battle exactly in front of the Tiber, with the Milvian bridge behind him, about a mile from the gates of Rome. It was the 26th of October, two days before the 6th anniversary of the accession of Maxentius, and during the night, according to our earliest authority, Constantine was warned in a dream to draw the monogram of Christ, the ✠, upon the shields of his soldiers (transversa littera X summo capite circumflexo Christum in scutis notat, De M. P. xlv.); and now, if not before, he learnt to invoke the name of Christ to help his arms (H. E. ix. 9, 12). The different accounts of the vision are discussed below, § V. Maxentius, in the mean time, spent the night in sacrifices and divination (Zos. ii. 16, &c.). The next morning the two armies met. That of Maxentius was totally routed after a vigorous resistance on the part of the praetorians. The fugitives crowded upon the bridge, and upon the pontoons placed at its side, which Maxentius had devised, according to an almost incredible statement, in order to give way beneath his opponent (Eus. H. E. ix. 9; 5, 6; V. C. i. 38; Zos. ii. 15). He was himself precipitated into the river, where his body was found the next day. The victor entered Rome in triumph, and was received with great joy by the people (Pan. de vict. adv. M. xix.). The head of the tyrant was carried on a spear into the city (ib. xviii.; Zos. ii. 17), and then sent to Africa, the province which he had particularly oppressed (Nazar. Pan. xxxii.). Constantine used his victory on the whole with moderation. He put to death the son of Maxentius, and disbanded the praetorians, who had formed the "faction" of his opponent, and razed their camp (Zos. ii. 17); but he repressed the delators (Cod. Th. x. 10, among the earliest laws in that collection). Eusebius tells us further that he set up a statue of himself with a spear terminating in a cross in his right hand, and an inscription to the effect that by this salutary sign (or standard) he had restored the Roman senate and people to their ancient glory and freedom (H. E. ix. 9; cf. V. C. i. 40). To this time also are referred the enlargement and endowment of many churches in and near Rome (V. C. i. 42), and the letters to Anulinus in behalf of the Catholic church in Africa, which led to such important consequences (ap. Euseb. H. E. x. 5, 7). From these documents it is evident that Constantine had already a strong disposition to favour the Christians, especially the Catholic body. The answers to one of them brought the case of Caecilian and the Donatists to his notice, and involved him during the succeeding years in the affairs of the African church. On the other hand he accepted the title and insignia of Pontifex Maximus, both of which were borne by his successors till the time of Gratian (Zos. iv. 36).

The triumphal arch erected to commemorate the victory, with materials drawn in great part from other monuments, particularly those of Trajan and (?) Marcus Aurelius, still stands over the Via Triumphalis between the Coliseum and the Palatine. The inscription on it has been the subject of considerable debate. It runs thus (Orelli 1075, Wilmanns 1073):—

IMP · CAES · FL · CONSTANTINO MAXIMO
P · F · AVGVSTO · S · P · Q · R

QVOD INSTINCTV DIVINITATIS MENTIS
MAGNITVDINE CVM EXERCITV SVO
TAM DE TYRANNO QVAM DE OMNI EIVS
FACTIONE VNO TEMPORE IVSTIS
REMPUBLICAM VLTVS EST ARMIS
ARCVM TRIVMPHIS INSIGNEM DICAVIT

i.e., Imperatoris Fl(avii) Constantino Maximo P(ri)ncipis Augusti Senatus Pop(uli) qu(e) R(omani), quod instinctu Divinitatis, mentis magnitudine, cum exercitu suo, tam de Tyranno, quam de omni eius factione, uno tempore iustis Republicam ultus est armis, arcum triumphis insignem dicavit.

On the sides we have rotis X and rotis XX and sic X and sic XX, and inside the centre arch liberatori urbis and funditori quietis.

The expression Instinctu Divinitatis has sometimes been represented as an after insertion in the place of some heathen formula, e.g. nutu Iovis o. m. (see Henzen, Inscr. Lat. vol. iii. p. 113; cp. King, p. 18), and writers like Burckhardt are very ready to make a point against Constantine upon this supposition (Die Zeit Const.

p. 363 and note). But the careful examination made by Commander G. B. de Rossi, proves that no alteration has been made, or indeed was easily possible, since the words are cut upon the actual blocks of the structure, five of which would have required removal in order to effect the change alleged (Bulletino d'Archeologia Cristiana for 1863, Nos. 7 and 8). The arch appears to have been dedicated in 315, when Constantine was again for two months in Rome at his Decennalia. In fact the title Maximus does not seem to have been used by him before that date. But the inscription seems not so much to express his own feelings, as those of a temporising senate. The words instinctu divinitatis are exactly of that guarded character which we should expect from them. The same vague theism prevails in the heathen Panegyrist, especially in speaking of this campaign, and is very common in other pagan writers of the period. (Pim. de v. adv. M. ii. iv., "te divina praecepta, illum superstitiosa maleficia," and especially ch. xi., where Constantine is spoken of as "divino monitus instinctu," almost the same phrase as on the arch, and the address, ch. xxvi., which is like nothing so much as Pope's Universal Prayer, cf. Nazar, Pan. xxvi., xxviii. etc.) The belief of Constantine himself at this time was limited to a very few articles, but it was centred upon the person of Christ as the representative of the highest God, to whom the other gods were opposing demons rather than powers approaching to an equality.

Period ii. 312-324. Commencement of the cycle of Indictions, Sept. 1, 312. Constantine sole emperor of the West.

We have up to this point followed the steps by which Constantine at the age of about thirty-eight became sole Augustus of the West. The course of the next twelve years saw him reach the summit of his power, and ready to change the seat of empire to the East. Having settled the affairs of Rome, he proceeded early in the year 313 to meet Licinius at Milan. There the marriage of the latter with Constantia was consummated, and the full edict of toleration, the Edict of Milan, was promulgated. The emperors then separated, Licinius to defend himself against Maximinus Daza, Constantine to guard the Rhine. Both were victorious. Constantine had strengthened his army by enlisting many of the troops of Maxentius, and was able to inflict great losses on the Franks. Notwithstanding his advances towards Christianity, he still sacrificed large numbers of his captives in the arena at Treves, unless we suppose his panegyrist to be referring to the earlier campaign (Pim. de v. adv. M. xxiii. caedibus hostium utitur etiam ad nostrum omnium voluptatem). Licinius soon after became sole master of the East by the death of Maximinus at Tarsus (Zos. ii. 17; De M. P. xlix.). The latter had followed the edict of Milan, according to the behest of the other emperors, by an act of toleration of his own, but of a less full and generous nature. (So Eusebius, H. E. ix. 9, 14, who gives the text; but it seems almost more probable that this edict was parallel to the harder edict of Constantine and Licinius of the year 312. Eusebius is often not accurate in the chronology of the documents he gives.) But this did not prevent him from taking advantage of the absence of Licinius to invade his territory, who in consequence had to fight him at Adrianople with a force half as large as that opposed to him. The battle was in many details like that against Maxentius—Licinius was favoured with a mysterious dream, and solemnly put his army under the protection of the God of the Christians, and on the morning of the battle repeated aloud three times with his officers a prayer to the holy and supreme God (De M. P. xlvi.). After his victory he entered Nicomedia in triumph, and proclaimed the edict of Milan, June 13th, and then pursued Maximinus into Cilicia, where he found him dying a horrible and painful death, the last of the persecutors (De M. P. xlix.; Eus. H. E. ix. 10, 14).

The brothers-in-law were thus raised to an equality of power, and their dispositions were not likely to keep them long at peace. The occasion of their quarrel is obscure—an intrigue in which Bassianus, husband of Anastasia, half-sister of Constantine, was concerned. Constantine accused him of conspiracy against him, and Licinius of fomenting it, a charge to which Licinius gave some colour by protecting the family of the accused (Anon. Vales. 14, but Zos. ii. 18: Κωνσταντίνου κατὰ τὸ σύνθημα αὐτῶ . . . φανεῖτος ἄπιστου). Licinius was defeated at Cibalis in Pannonia, and after an indecisive action at Mardia, near Adrianople, made peace by putting his Caesar Valens to death, and by the cession of Illyricum—that is, of the whole peninsula of which Greece is the extremity. Constantine was not too busy during this campaign to attend to the arrangement of the council of Arles, and to interest himself vehemently in the Donatistic disputes. The peace that followed lasted for nine years, during which the emperor employed himself with barbarian wars, especially against the Sarmatae, and with legislation civil and religious, as detailed below. His Decennalia were celebrated at Rome 315, 316, and the triumphal arch dedicated. Two years later Crispus, now a young man, and his infant son and nephew, Constantine and Licinianus, were raised to the rank of Caesar at Arles (Zos. ii. 20, &c.). His other sons by Fausta were born also in this period, Constantius in 317 and Constans in 323. Licinius in the mean time began to oppress his subjects, especially to act unfairly towards the Christians among them. He forbade the synods of bishops, he interfered with their worship, and in many cases destroyed their churches (even Julian, Ctes. p. 315, is unfavourable to Licinius). Constantine, on his part, was engaged in defending his Danubian frontier from Goths and Sarmatians, and took the Sarmatian king Rausimodes prisoner (Zos. ii. 21). In some of these expeditions he had not been careful to avoid trespassing across the boundaries of Licinius, and this was an easy pretext for a quarrel. The debate which arose between them was increased by the expostulations of Constantine against the treatment of the Christians, and after some changes of temper on the part of Licinius, an open rupture was the consequence (Anon. Vales. 21; Anon. ap. Mull. Fr. H. Gr. iv. 199 records an insult offered to the coins of Constantine's Sarmatian victories).

The character of the former war was ambiguous. This, however, in great measure assumed that of a religious war or crusade (Eus. H. E. x. 9). Before any conflict had been fought (it was said) the subjects of Licinius thought they saw the victorious legions of Constantine marching through their streets at midday (V. C. ii. 6). The monogram of Christ was stamped at this time on the coinage of almost all the mints in his dominions (§ VI.). The labarum became in the different engagements a talisman of victory (οἰνοῖ τε νικητικὸν ἀλεξιφάρμακον, V. C. ii. 7). The emperor surrounded himself with Christian priests, and believed himself favoured with visions as he prayed in the tent which contained the standard of the cross, and then leapt up as if inspired to victory (ib. 12). We must confess that he was in part self-deluded, and that the motive of personal ambition entered largely into his actions. But it is too much to say with Neander, that "the war beyond all question was undertaken on no other grounds than those of a selfish policy" (vol. iii. p. 32; ed. Bohn). The sentiment of a divine vocation was probably a real one to him, and it was fostered by the approbation of all the Christians. It will be unnecessary to follow all the details of the war. Licinius, on the very scene of his conflict as a Christian champion with Maximinus, prepared for battle by sacrifice and worship of the gods, against whom he then had fought, and Constantine on his side by prayer and by giving the watchword Θεὸς σωτὴρ (V. C. ii. 5 and 6; cf. Soz. H. E. i. 7 on the perversion of Licinius). This second battle of Adrianople, July 3, 323, was a second victory for the Christian arms. Constantine pursued his opponent to Byzantium. In the mean time Crispus, who had already won his youthful laurels against the Franks, shewed himself most active in command of the fleet, and defeated the admiral Amandus in the Hellespont. This caused Licinius to quit Byzantium for Chalcedon, where, as in the former war, he appointed one of his chief officers, Martinianus, as Caesar. But Constantine did not hesitate to pursue him, and on the 10th of September, after some negotiations, achieved a final victory at Chrysopolis. Licinius, on the entreaty of Constantia, was permitted to retire to Thessalonica; but Martinianus was put to death. Licinius, however, was not allowed to live above a year longer. Socrates relates that after remaining quiet a short time, "he collected some barbarians, and attempted to repair his defeat" (H. E. i. 4; so Zonaras and Niceph. Call.), and Eusebius justifies his execution by the law of war (V. C. ii. 19). Zosimus and the heathen historians make it an instance of the emperor's faithlessness (Zos. ii. 28; Victor, Epit. l. c.; Eutrop. Brev. x. 6), and as such too it appears in the chronicle of Jerome (ann. 2339, Licinius Thessalonicae contra ius sacramenti privatus occiditur). Yet, as far as we are aware, his wife Constantia did not resent the execution of her husband, any more than Fausta did the death of her father. Constantine thus found himself master of the whole empire, and his first act was to issue edicts of toleration and favour to the Christians of the East (V. C. ii. 24 sq., cited as Provincia ibus Palaestinae and 48 sq. Prov. Orientis). He now specially assumed the title of Victor (νικητῆς) as a part of his name (V. C. ii. 19; Vales. ad loc. asserts that he had used this title in some of the previous epistles about Caecilian and the Donatists, but this seems incorrect). He had won it by the constant success of his arms against barbarians on the Rhine and on the Danube, against rival emperors from the Tiber to the Bosphorus: his twenty years of empire had brought him from London in the far West to Byzantium, the centre of the Eastern world, and their course had been one of uninterrupted conquest. He was not by any means void of thankfulness to the Providence which had guided him, or indisposed to acknowledge that something was due from him in return (Prov. Pal. V. C. ii. 28, 29). But his progress had not led him to a victory over himself, or rather his success under the hand of God made him forgetful of his own liability to crime.

Peri d iii. 324-337. Constantine sole emperor. The history of the last twelve years of Constantine's reign is of a very different character from that of the preceding periods. As sole emperor he loses rather than gains in our estimation. He had no longer a religious cause to fight for or a dangerous rival to overthrow. The hardness of his character fitted him for a life of strong excitement, but not for the intrigues of an Eastern court and the subtle questions of Eastern theology. His immoderate profusion in building and other expensive operations gained him the name of "spendthrift" (decem novissimis [annis] pupillus ob profusiones immodicas nominatus, Vict. Epit. 41), and his liberality towards the church was by no means free from the evils that attend prodigal benevolence. But he had no less a providential part to play in the internal history of that church, than he had had up to this time in the destruction of her persecutors. As emperor of the West he had been led to interfere in her councils by the African schism, on which his decision was desired by both parties. As monarch also of the East he was brought directly into contact with the speculations on points of Christian doctrine which seemed there to have their proper origin and home. Here again he attempted to realise his idea of unity. Taking as his precedent the great council of Western bishops which he had summoned at Arles (Aug. 314) in the case of Caecilian, he determined to call together representatives of the whole empire to decide on the doctrines of Arius and the Paschal controversy (see below, § III. 2 and Nicaea, Council of). To Constantine is due in great measure the credit of the council of Nicaea (June and July, 325); without his intervention it certainly would never have been held. But the success of that great meeting filled him unfortunately with overweening pride. The flattery interchanged between himself and its members, hurtful to both parties, was especially hurtful to him, as he understood most indistinctly the merits of the points under debate. The conclusion of their session fell at the beginning of the twentieth year of his reign, and he celebrated the condemnation of Arius as a second triumph (V. C. iii. 14). He entertained all the bishops at his table. "The guards," says Eusebius, "kept watch with drawn swords round the vestibule of the palace; the men of God passed through their midst without fear, and entered the inmost parts of the royal dwelling. Some of them reclined by his side, and others were placed on couches on either hand. One might have seemed to picture to oneself an image of Christ's kingdom; the whole thing was more like a dream than a reality" (ibid. 15). The same writer suggests, we may remember, that the church of the Anastasis, built by Constantine, fulfilled the prophecies about the New Jerusalem (V. C. iii. 33). The interest of Constantine in the success of the council did not end with its dispersion. He wrote letters of various import to the different parties concerned in its decrees, strongly enforcing conformity with them (see below, § III. 2 c.) The same feelings led him to compose and deliver theological declamations, and to attempt the conversion of his courtiers. Large crowds attended to listen to the philosophising prince, who did not spare their faults. But the matter was not one merely of philosophy. It may be, as Burckhardt suggests (p. 454), that he took such opportunities of seriously warning or even denouncing those of his "companions" and "palatines," whose presumption on his favour had become intolerable. The passionate and almost eloquent law of this year, promulgated at Nicomedia, calls upon any one who feels wronged by such officials to declare their grievances freely, and promises personal vengeance on those "who up to this time have deceived us by simulated integrity;" and when Constantine felt himself wronged he did not hesitate to strike (Cod. Th. ix. 1, 4 in 325).

After a prolonged sojourn in the East his presence was now required in Rome. He advanced thither by slow stages, arriving about the 8th of July, in time to celebrate the completion of his twentieth year of empire, July 25, 326. He left it certainly before the end of September; but in that short space of time all that was tragical in his life seems to have reached its climax. There was much in the city itself to irritate and disturb him. The ancient aristocracy, in the absence of a resident emperor, preserved many of its old traditions, especially those of which the heathen spirit was the life. Though he came determined to be tolerant (Cod. Th. xv. 1, 3) and desirous of gaining the favour of the senate (id. xv. 14; 3, 4), it soon became evident that he was out of harmony with Rome. He would not join in the solemn review of the knights held on July 4th, and in their procession and sacrifice to Jupiter Capitolinus; but he viewed it contemptuously from the Palatine and ridiculed it to those who stood around him (Zos. ii. 29). Such an action, joined with the Oriental dress and general bearing of the emperor, seemed to have caused a popular outbreak of indignation against him. Though tempted to revenge himself by force he was wise enough to refrain. (See esp. De Broglie, l. c. ii. ch. 5, for the events of this year. He puts together Liban. Or. 12, p. 393; Or. 15, p. 412, and Chrys. Or. ad pop. Antioch. 21.) But this outburst was followed by far heavier tragedies within the circle of his own household. In relating them we have to rely on the vague and inconsistent tales of later writers, those nearest the emperor, Eutropius and Ensebius, being markedly silent. They seem to have originated with divisions, such as easily arose in a family composed of so many different elements. The half-brothers of Constantine, the sons of Constantins and Theodora, naturally took part with their mother's half-sister, Fausta, and her sons. On the other hand, Helena had reason to sympathise with her grandson Crispus, the son of Minervina. We may conclude that it was in connexion with these divisions, though the matter is most obscure, that Crispus was suddenly arrested, and conveyed to Pola in Istria (Amm. Marc. xiv. 11), where he perished by an unknown death. Whether he was the victim of political or of domestic jealousy, or, as is possible, of both at once, can never be known to us. Niebuhr thought it not improbable that the accusation of treason against his father, reported by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. i. 36), had some foundation of truth. Another, but not an early account, represents Fausta as playing to him the part of Phaedra towards Hippolytus (Zos. ii. 29), and certainly other authors name her as his accuser without specifying the nature of the charge. (Vict. Epit. 41, Philostorgius, ii. 4. Sozomen, H. E. i. 5, implies that the death of Crispus was required of Constantine by others.) The young and promising Caesar Licinianus was at the same time put to death, an act for which it would be hardly possible to find a justification (Eutrop. x. 6; Hieron. Chron. Ann. 2342). The following satirical distich, attributed to the city prefect Ablavius, was found on the palace doors after the death of Crispus (Sidon. Apollin. Epist. v. 8):—

"Saturni aurea sacula quis requirat?
Sunt haec gemmae, sed Neroniana."

But he was avenged much more tragically, and at no distant date. (Jerome puts it three years later, the others connect the two events.) Fausta herself was executed in as sudden and as dark a way as Crispus. The complaints of Helena seemed to have aroused her son to this dire act of retribution (Zos. ii. 29; Vict. Ep. 41). Later writers represent the empress as guilty of adultery (Philostorg. ii. 4; Sidon. Apoll. l. c.; Greg. Turon. H. F. i. 34), and her punishment is said to have been suffocation in the steam of a warm bath. (Philostorg. l. c.; Zos. l. c., the inconsistency in chap. 39 is curious, but not unparalleled in the author. The allusion in Chrysostom, Hom. in Philipp. 15, is incorrect in circumstance, but preserves the memory of the deed.) There are indeed difficulties, first raised by Gibbon, which have led some historians to doubt the death of Fausta. The conclusion of Evagrius, drawn from the silence of Eusebius, extends also to Crispus and is of little moment. But Julian in his Oratio to Constantius (i. p. 9 B. ed. Spanheim) praises the virtue, beauty, and gifts of his mother; and the author of the Monody on the younger Constantine (ad calcem Eutrop. ed. Havercamp), talks of her as alive and about to hear the news of her son's death. But the first is not decisive even of the innocence of Fausta, and the second appears to be on other points of doubtful authority, perhaps to be merely a school declamation of later date. (See Wesseling's Observations, reprinted in a recent edition Anonymi Graeci oratio funebris in Const. ed. C. H. Frotcher, Friburg, 1856. Wesseling inclines to refer it to Theodorus, brother of Constantine Palaeologus.)

There cannot, we think, be any real doubt that Crispus and Fausta perished, both probably in the year 328, by the orders of Constantine, acting as the instrument of family jealousies. The death of Fausta had also its sequel in the execution of many of his friends, those it may be presumed who had taken part against Crispus (Eutrop. x. 4). Popular traditions represent

Constantine as tormented by remorse after his delirium of cruelty had passed, and as seeking everywhere the means of expiation. Zosimus relates that the heathen priests refused to purify him, and that a certain Egyptian from Spain advised him to try the effects of Christian doctrine; whereupon he gave up the religion of his fathers (Zos. ii. 29). A similar pagan fable is that refuted by Sozomen (H. E. i. 5), which represents the emperor as repulsed by Sopater the philosopher, and then falling in with certain bishops, who promised him purification for all his sins after repentance and baptism. Though rejected by the church historians of the East, another form of this fable was long credited in the West, and Constantine it was said was actually baptized by pope Sylvester, and bestowed on the see of Rome his famous donation, the fatal gift of temporal power. This has long ago passed, as Ariosto described it, to the world of nonentities in the moon. Yet nothing can be more in harmony with the character of Constantine and of the age, than to suppose that he sought for means of religious expiation. Tillemont (Vie de Const. 24) suggests that the "Egyptian from Spain" may mean Hosius of Cordova, though he connects the circumstance with the earlier date of his conversion. Hosius or any other Christian bishop could have done nothing else except urge him to repentance to be followed by baptism. But for reasons which we do not thoroughly know, Constantine put off this important step, and also delayed the baptism of his sons. That he bestowed some possessions on the church at this time, and built or handed over basilicas to it, is very probable. From the number which claim foundation at his hand we may perhaps select those of the Vatican, which was destroyed to make room for the modern St. Peter's; of St. Agnes, which has an inscription referring to his daughter Constantina; and of the Lateran, once the palace of Fausta, and the seat of the first council about the Donatists, and still the real cathedral of the pope. It is probable that the pilgrimage of Helena to Palestine in pursuance of a vow, and the 'Invention of the Cross,' is to be assigned to the time that immediately follows. Constantine gave her every assistance, and authorised her to spend money freely both in alms and buildings (Paulinus of Nola, Epist. 11, ad Sulpic. Sever.; cf. V. C. iii. 47, 3). It is possible that he delayed his own baptism in the hope that he might soon follow her example and be washed in the holy waters of Jordan (V. C. iv. 62). He now left Rome never to return to it, but with the project of founding a new Rome in the East, which should equal if not surpass the old.

The beauty and convenience of the site of Byzantium had long been noticed (cf. Hdt. iv. 44); it was, as has been remarked, the birth-place of Fausta, and the immediate neighbourhood had been the scene of the final defeat of Licinius. The emperor had perhaps already formed the idea of embellishing it and calling it by his own name, as he changed the names of Arles and Circa to Constantina and Drepanum to Helenopolis. He had probably moved a mint thither as early as 325, and used the name (Constantinopolis) upon his coins. But now his intention may have been strengthened by his distaste for Rome, joined with a superstition that its fall from power was at hand (Chron. Pasch. ed. Bonn, p. 517). Other cities had before attracted his attention. At one time he was in the habit of saying "My Rome is Sardica" (Anon. ap. Mull. Fr. H. Gr. iv. 199), at another he had set his eyes upon Thessalonica and Chalcedon (Burkhardt, p. 465). At last he seemed to have fixed on Ilium, following out the dream of Julius and Augustus at the beginning of the monarchy. He even went so far as to erect walls and gates, when he was warned in a dream to remove to another site (Zos. ii. 30; Soz. ii. 3). His final choice was for Byzantium. Many stories are told of the ceremonies with which he laid out the plan of the new Rome, enclosing like its prototype the tops of seven hills. One of them is very characteristic. As he advanced, spear in hand, tracing the immense circuit, those who followed asked him how far he was going. "I shall go on," replied he, "till he that goes before me stops." (Philostorg. ii. 9; see here Burkhardt, p. 467, who places the date of this foundation Nov. 4, 326. Authorities differ much upon the point. Socrates i. 16 relates it directly after the council of Nicaea, and so Theophanes, anno 5816. But if the chronology of the Theodosian code is correct Constantine was at Arles Nov. 3, 326, and does not seem to have been in the East till June 327, when a law is dated at Constantinople. De Broglie places the foundation in 328 or 329, l. c. ii. 441; Éclairc. C.) From another source we hear of the presence of Sopater and other heathen mystics, implying perhaps the usage of heathen rites (Joann. Lydus, de Mensib. iv. 2). Yet the Christian historians assert that the absence of heathenism from the city was the express desire of the emperor (e. g. V. C. iii. 48). No doubt he was surrounded by various influences and was susceptible to changes of religious feeling. Sopater about this time was particularly influential, but he had many enemies, especially the powerful Ablavius. He was accused of delaying by magical arts the arrival of the corn-ships at Constantinople, the people clamoured for their doles, and Constantine hastily gave the order for his death (Eunap. vit. Ael. p. 41).

The removal of Sopater perhaps gave room for the power of Helena to reassert itself. She communicated to her son the success of her pilgrimage, and forwarded him certain relics, which he received with great joy, especially two nails from the cross. One of them he set in a diadem, the model of the iron crown of Lombardy, the other he formed into the mouthpiece of a horse's bit (Soz. i. 17; Soz. ii. 1, who quotes Zachar. xiv. 20; cf. Ambros. De obitu Theod.). With the aid of his liberality she built two churches, one on the cave of the nativity at Bethlehem, the other on the place of the ascension upon Olivet (V. C. iii. 43). At the same time she probably overlooked the construction of his great work, the church of the Holy Sepulchre or Anastasis, as well as the one under Abraham's oak or terebinth at Mamre. All these churches were already places of pilgrimage in 333, and are mentioned in the Itinerary from Bordeaux to Jerusalem. (Socrates, i. 17, speaks of the Holy Sepulchre as a building of Helena's, cf. Theodoret i. 18; Eus. V. C. iii. 30, sq., describes it and gives Constantine's letter to Macarius, but does not mention Helena as concerned with it.) Having thus accomplished her vow she returned to die in the presence of her son, and was carried into the "imperial city," that is most probably Constantinople (ἐπὶ τὴν βασιλεύουσαν πόλιν, V. C. iii. 47, which in Eusebius generally means Rome, and so it was understood by Niceph. Call. iii. 30, who makes her die there, and be translated two years afterwards to Constantinople. But Socrates, i. 17, says particularly εἰς τὴν βασιλεύουσαν νέαν Ῥώμην, which seems intended for a gloss on Eusebius, and he is likely to have known where she was buried. See further Heinichen on Eus. l. c.). Another death about the same time had important consequences. His sister Constantia was much under the influence of Eusebius of Nicomedia, and had in her household an Arian priest, who persuaded her that Arius had been most unjustly treated. She had not courage to speak on the subject herself to her brother, but on her deathbed strongly recommended the priest to him, and he was taken into the imperial family. This man soon succeeded in gaining influence over the emperor, the result of which it is said was his gradual alienation from the Catholics (Socr. i. 25; see De Broglie, ch. v., at the end).

In the mean time the building of the new capital went on with great vigour, temples and cities, especially in Greece and Asia Minor, were despoiled to beautify it: the statues of Castor and Pollux and the tripod of Delphi, dedicated by the conquerors of Plataea, were placed in the new hippodrome (Zos. ii. 31), where the serpent-twined base of the latter still stands; in two temples at the side of the Forum, were the image of Cybele from Dindymus, transformed it is said into a suppliant attitude, and that of the Fortune of Rome (Zos. l. c.). In the centre of the great square was the celebrated porphyry column, a fit emblem in its strange combinations of the character of the emperor. Taken itself from a temple at Heliopolis or Ilium (see Garucci in King, Early Christian Numismatics, p. 18), it was originally surmounted by a statue of the sun-god. This was altered into one of Constantine with the inscription, "To Constantine, brilliant as the sun." The aureola round his head resembled, we are told, the nails of the cross, but this may be merely the historian's fancy (Codinus De sign. C. P. p. 41; Zon. xxiii. 3; cf. Chron. Pasch. pp. 664, 666). Beneath the column was placed the Palladium of Rome or an exact copy of it (Chron. Pasch. p. 664), and a relic of the true cross (Socr. i. 17). Other more distinctly Christian works of art are described by Eusebius (V. C. iii. 3 and 49; iv. 15). Among the churches erected at this time may be mentioned those of St. Irene (taken afterward into St. Sophia's), of the apostles, St. Anne and St. Michael; and a letter from the emperor to Eusebius is extant, in which he orders fifty copies of the Scriptures to be prepared for the use of the churches he was building (V. C. iv. 36).

Other constructions went on with great rapidity to fit the city for the residence of a new nobility, some created and others transferred from Rome. Of the population that gathered together into it almost all the pagans and a good number of the Jews became Christians. The city was solemnly consecrated on the 11th of May, 330, followed by a feast of forty days (Idatius, fasti, Chron. Pasch. A.D. 330), and the anniversary (May 4th) was long kept as the nativity of Constantine.

It is indeed a very important era, marking the greatest political transformation that the Roman empire underwent. With it were connected the great constitutional changes detailed below, § III. 1, under which grew up the Byzantine spirit with its peculiar character, turbulent, slavish, and unimaginative, but yet capable of endurance tempered with a certain kind of morality.

The years that followed brought Constantine more than ever into the debates of the church. The emperor recalled Arius, but Athanasius, now made bishop of Alexandria, refused to receive him. The steps by which the latter was at length exiled (in 336) and Arius received in triumph into the church, belong to the history of COUNCILS (Caesarea, Tyre, Jerusalem) and of ARIANISM (see also § III. B (3) infra). After the building of Constantinople Constantine engaged in few wars. We hear of a Gothic and Scythian war in which the success of the labarum in battle caused the conversion of many barbarians (V. C. iv. 5). Constantine used his victories with moderation, and left a grateful memory amongst those he conquered (Eutrop. Brev. x. 4); he allowed, for instance, a large body of Sarmatians to settle within the boundaries of the empire (V. C. iv. 6; cf. Amm. Marc. xvii. 13, xix. 11, "Sarmatae limigantes") In 333 he received an embassy from Persia, and in returning it wrote a letter on behalf of the Christians dwelling in the dominions of Sapor II. (V. C. iv. 8, sq.; Theodoret, i. 25). After crushing the insignificant rebellion of Calocerus in Cyprus, he was induced, by some motives unknown to us, to divide the empire which he had with such labour united. He may have been disgusted with his ill success in promoting religious unity, he may have foreseen the quarrels likely to arise amongst his sons. At any rate, in the middle of his thirtieth year, 335, he distributed the territories under his dominion between his three sons and two nephews. The eldest, Constantine, received the provinces of his grandfather, Britain, Spain, and Gaul; Constantius, Asia, Syria, and Egypt; Constans, Italy and Africa. Dalmatius, with the title of Caesar, had the large province of Illyricum; and Hanniballian, Armenia and Pontus, with the extraordinary name of king. The evidence of coins would lead us to see in this measure a reconciliation of the two branches of the family, whose divisions we have already noticed (see § VI. Coins).

The end of Constantine's eventful life was now at hand, and as some of his first military services had been against the Persians, so now he was obliged at its close to prepare for war against that people, though he never actually engaged in it (V. C. iv. 57). The labarum had now been for many years the recognised standard of the empire, wherever the emperor was present; and as in the time of the war with Licinius the monogram of Christ was in these last years largely stamped upon its coins (see § VI.). He made also other preparations for the use of religious service in war, especially of a tent for his own chapel (V. C. iv. 56; Socr. i. 18), and he had some time before taught his soldiers, heathen as well as Christian, a common daily prayer, and ordered Sunday to be kept as a holy day (V. C. iv. 19 and 20; L. C. ix. 10; cf. Cod. Th. II. 8. 1 in 321). We may hope that with these observances the inward meaning of Christianity was becoming clearer to the emperor, when at Easter 337 he completed and dedicated his great church of the Holy Apostles, in which he desired to find a place of burial. In the week that followed, his health, which up to this point had been extremely good, gave way, and he sought relief in the warm baths at Helenopolis. Feeling there that his death was approaching, he made confession of his sins in the church of the martyrs (of the martyr Lucianus?), and received imposition of hands as a catechumen—for he had not even taken this step before. Then he moved back to the villa Ancyrona, a suburb of Nicomedia (Eutrop. x. 8; Vict. Cæs. 41), and desired baptism of the bishops whom he there assembled (V. C. iv. 61). He had wished once, he said, to be baptized in Jordan, but God had decided otherwise. He felt that now was the time when the blessing he had so long hoped for was offered him. "Let there be no doubt about it," he added, "I have determined once for all, if the Disposer of life and death sees fit to raise me up again to fellowship with His people, to impose upon myself rules of life such as He would approve" (V. C. iv. 62, see Heinichen's note). Baptism was administered to him by the Arian prelate Eusebius of Nicomedia (Hieron. Chron. ann. 2353). From that moment he laid aside the purple robe, and wore only the white garment of a neophyte. He died on Whitsunday in the same year, being within about two months of the completion of the 31st year of his reign, dating from July 25, 306.

A. SECULAR POLICY.—It would be out of place here to give a very detailed account of the secular policy of Constantine. Yet his reign was almost as remarkable as a turning-point in the history of the world as it was in that of the church. Nor were the changes that took place merely or chiefly consequent on the union of church and state, much as that conduced to the peculiar character of the empire that followed. No one, either Christian or heathen, could have expected that union; whereas the course of secular policy was one for which previous emperors, esp. Diocletian, had done much to prepare (cf. for example De M. P. 7, provinciae quoque in frusta concisae, multi praesides et plura officia singulis regionibus ac paene iam civitatibus incubare: see also the refs. and quotations in Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, vol. i. pp. 81 and 422). Indeed in recounting these civil changes we are often at a loss to know where to fix their date and origin, and we are very little qualified to censure their expediency. Probably very little was wholly new, whilst much that was partial and inconsistent became general and equal under Constantine's direction. However this may be, historians generally ascribe the greatest share in these measures to him. No emperor of the time had either the length of reign or the personal vigour requisite for them except himself; no one in fact but the founder of Constantinople could have changed the constitution of the Roman world.

(1.) The New Constitution. The building of a new capital sealed the division of the Eastern and Western empire, on which the whole subordinate constitution depended. Yet we must remark that even in the time of Diocletian the government of East and West had been practically distinct, and the scheme of division into praetorian prefectures, dioceses, and provinces was fairly complete. The following is the division into dioceses of the reign of Diocletian, preserved in a document of about the year 297 (Verzeichniss der Röm. Prov., Th. Mommsen, Berlin, 1863, 4^o, from a MS. at Verona, which he compares with the later lists of Polemius Silvius, the Notitia dignitatum and Hierocles).

The twelve dioceses are,—1. Oriens; 2. Pontica; 3. Asiana; 4. Thracia; 5. Moesiae; 6. Pannoniae; 7. Britanniae; 8. Galliae; 9. Viennensis; 10. Italiciana; 11. Hispaniae; 12. Africa. It is to be noted that Oriens = Oriens and Aegyptus of later times; that the two Moesiae and Pannoniae = Illyricum of Silvius, afterwards divided into (1) Dacia and Macedonia, and (2) Illyricum; and that Galliae and Viennensis = the later diocese Galliae. These dioceses were under Constantine divided between the four praetorian prefects of Oriens, Illyricum, Italia (including Africa), and Galliae (including Spain and Britain). To these great officers were assigned the highest judicial and political functions, with great freedom in their exercise, but with hardly any military power. The dioceses were governed by vicars or counts (vicarii, comites) dependent upon the prefects, and forming with the proconsuls of Asia, Africa, and Achaia the second order of civil governors. Beneath them came the provincial governors (rectores, correctores, praesides, consulares). To secure impartiality as much as possible, none of these was allowed to govern the province of his own birth. At Rome the city prefect retained his independence of the praetorian: and Constantinople received a like honour in the reign of Constantius in 360 (Soz. iv. 23). Constantine had already given his city two praetors (Joan. Lyd. de M. P. R. ii. 30). The older magistracies were still objects of ambition, but their power was merely nominal. That of consul carried with it great honour and influence if the holder liberally entertained the public. That of praetor was scarcely more than a tax upon the senators, like an Athenian liturgy, requiring the bearer of it to spend a certain sum, which he would naturally exceed if he was rich and ambitious. Besides these greater magistrates were others subordinate to them in all parts of the empire whom we cannot here enumerate. Details may be gathered from the Notitia dignitatum utraeque Imperii (ed. Böcking), composed perh. about 425, and from the obscure treatise of Joannes Lydus, de Magistrat. P. R., bks. ii. iii., written in the time of Justinian, as well as from the two codes and the commentators upon them (see also Manso, L. C. pp. 107 foll. and 9^{te} Beilage; De Broglie, t. ii. ch. 6).

Parallel to this civil constitution was the military establishment. The power over the troops was assigned to a master of the horse and a master of the foot (magister equitum, peditum), although the praetorian prefects seem to have retained some military state till the time of Arcadius (Jo. Lyd. de M. P. ii. 10). These officers, afterwards increased in number to eight, had directly beneath them a number of dukes and counts (duces, comites), with territorial titles taken generally from the marches and territories of the empire. Among the soldiers themselves Constantine carried out the distinction into two classes; the first stationed in the interior, with a higher rank, and including the household troops or palatini, the second being employed to guard the borders. (There is a difficulty as to their classification. Manso divides, 1. legiones = Palatini, Comitatuses and Pseudo-Comitatuses; 2. riparii, riparenses, or limitanei. Burkhartd quotes Lange, Hist. rei militar. Rom. p. 100, sq., to shew that the division was rather into 1. palatini, 2. legiones = Comitatuses, in provincial towns, and Pseudo-Comitatuses, on the boundaries.) As to their disposition, Zosimus makes it a principal charge against Constantine that he massed them together and set them to garrison the large towns instead of distributing them as before in the lines of smaller forts and castles (ii. 34; cf. Jo. Lyd. de M. P. R. ii. 10). As to the policy of these measures we cannot now decide, but Zosimus does not appear at all a profound reasoner on such matters, and Constantine surely was not ignorant of barbarian warfare. Still his policy of conciliation towards the German tribes, referred to above, was not pleasing to the Romans, and had dangerous results under his feeble successors, which he probably would have been able to avert. In conformity with the general tendency of the times the soldiers became almost a caste, not volunteers from the various ranks of society, but furnished by each municipality as part of the tax assessed upon them.

To this constitution of civil and military affairs must be added that of the court and aristocracy, which seems to have been determined more by Constantine than any other emperor, though in part of earlier, part of later origin. Some dignities were invented by him, such as the three orders of comites and the title illustrissimus (V. C. iv. 1), others were adopted and made regular from earlier times; for instance, the first magister aulæ known to historians was Martinianus, the short-lived Caesar of Licinius (Jo. Lyd. de M. P. R. ii. 25). This aristocracy was almost entirely official, and so owed its existence directly to the emperor, though the senates at Rome and Constantinople continued to coopt their own members. It was not at first hereditary, but had a tendency to become so from the frequency with which privileges were extended to the sons and grandsons of those who were ennobled. It consisted of the great ministers of state and their subordinates, among whom, as among the civil and military officers above referred to, were distributed substantial privileges attached to the well-known titles of honour. These were of two chief classes, 1. consisting of illustres, spectabiles, and clarissimi, not exactly defined from one another in the time of Constantine, but distinctly subordinated in the notitia dignitatum; 2. perfectissimi and egregii, distinctly inferior to the first class from the time perhaps of Diocletian. These had not only rights of admission to the presence of the emperor and to the courts of justice, but immunities, of which exemption from the curia was most important. In civil matters the first class could only be cited before prefects, praetorian or urban; and the second before their vicars. In criminal trials, however, a law of Constantine took away these privileges (C. Th. ix. 1. 1 in 317). The title nobilissimus was reserved for the royal family, while the emperor himself was addressed as Your Eternity, and the word sacred applied to his surroundings.

The great ministers just referred to were as follows:—First two of finance, the count of the sacred largesses (comes sacrarum largitionum), the treasurer and paymaster of the whole public staff of the empire, and the count of the private estate (comes rei privatae) who managed the enormous revenues of the fiscus and kept account of the privileges granted by the emperor (liber beneficiorum, Hyginus de Const. Limit. p. 203, ed. Lachm. and Du Cange, s. v.). These two presided jointly over a court of final appeal in civil matters where the state was either plaintiff or defendant. Next came the officers of the palace or Domus Augusta—the grand chamberlain (praepositus sacri cubiculi); the two commanders of the body-guard (comites domesticorum); and the master of the offices (magister officiorum). This latter was a most important functionary, being in fact minister of police for the whole empire, having control over the posts, the police, the arsenals and manufactories of arms, together with the charge of the imperial correspondence (scrinia). As his chief business was to guard against conspiracies and insurrections, he had also jurisdiction over all offences committed in the palace. The last of these great ministers was the questor palatii, a general secretary of state, who had the keeping of all edicts, rescripts, and ordinances, and of all such documents as bore the emperor's signature. These ministers, with the large departments subordinate to each, formed a centralised body which rapidly grew in extent and influence, till they overshadowed all the other powers of the state. The tendency of legislation was to increase their dignity at the expense of that of the prefects and provincial governors and the other aristocracy (see Cod. Theod. lib. vi.). The chiefs of these departments with a number of independent councillors formed the consistorium secretum or privy council.

(2.) Financial policy. The general scope of these changes in administration was to obtain security by centralisation and by the division of power in the hands of different officers. The Eastern empire henceforth becomes the model of a stable despotism; standing by its organisation, the product in its outset of vigorous minds, but afterwards able to endure in the absence of personal vigour either in the monarch or his ministers, though this was often not wanting. The object of the financial charges appears similar. The chief direct taxes existing before Constantine were three: 1. the land-tax (capitatio jugorum or praedii); 2. the poll-tax (humana capitatio) falling chiefly on the agriculturists; 3. five per cent. on inheritances (vicesima hereditatum). To these we may add the so-called coronary gold, dating from the time of Augustus, as a voluntary contribution on any joyful occasion, in the shape of wreaths of gold; then reduced to a money equivalent, and at last imposed by the emperer's will upon different cities and communities, but never quite losing the idea of a "benevolence." The first of these, the land-tax, consisted of contributions in kind as well as in money, varying every year in amount according to the supposed needs of the empire. The document describing the gross amount of the various produce required, was signed by the emperor's hand and called the Indiction. It was collected by the governors of provinces from the different municipalities, for each of which the town-council (curia) was responsible. The legislation of Constantine in reference to this tax consisted, as far as we know it, in various enactments with regard to the town-councillors (curiales, decuriones), and in prolonging the period between each survey from 10 to 15 years, whence it comes that the cycle generally styled the Indiction begins on Sept. 1, 312. The laws concerning decurions, possessors, that is, of a certain amount of land within a given territory, are some of the most curious and painful in the Theodosian code. They shew how miserable was the internal state of the empire; their chief object being to prevent the evasions by which the office was perpetually avoided. The whole title is one of the largest in the code, and 22 sections of it are from the hand of Constantine (Cod. Theod. xii. 1). To these taxes Constantine is said to have added two, which were in aftertimes particularly odious, though their object appears to have been a very just one, to lay burdens upon those who were least affected by the existing imposts. These were the foliis senatorii and the chrysargyrum. The first was a charge upon all the property of senators or clarissimi in addition to their other burdens. The privileges they enjoyed, especially that of exemption from the curia, might seem to make this at least equitable, but in fact it pressed very heavily upon them, and many like the decurions were desirous of renouncing their dignity. The chrysargyrum was levied every four years upon traders of every kind, and was productive of great misery. (Zos. ii. 38; Liban. c. Florent. ed. Reiske, iii. p. 477.) Its abolition by Anastasius was a most popular act. The institution of both is ascribed to Constantine by Zosimus, but Evagrius (iii. 40) regards it as a calumny, and Tillemont inclines to assign it an earlier origin (Emp. Constant. art. lxxx.). We have here a difficulty such as meets us continually in describing the organisation of the empire by Constantine.

In the administration of financial laws he was continually alternating between the desire of conciliating and relieving the people and the necessity of filling his treasury. Many of the laws express just feelings as to the protection of those who were less capable of paying taxes or bearing public burdens, and a hatred of fiscal exaction couched in no measured terms (e.g. Cod. Th. x. 4. 1; xi. 7. 2. 3; 16. 4; cf. Vict. Caes. xli., fiscalis molestiae severius pressae). According to a rather obscure statement of Eusebius he remitted yearly a quarter of the land-tax (V. C. iv. 2), and we have a more definite account of a larger temporary remission at his quinquennialia to the citizens of Autun (Eum. Grat. Act. xi., xii. in 311). Victor bears witness to his clemency and desire to relieve the provincials, and instances the cases of Nicaea and Tripolis (Caes. 41; cf. Epit. 41, commodissimus . . . audire legationes et querimonias provinciarum). It was forbidden also to carry away husbandmen from the harvest for the public service (Cod. Just. de agricolis, xi. 47. 1; C. Th. xiv. 24. 1 in 328). But though Constantine could attempt to adjust the public burdens, and regulate the collection of taxes, he could not do away with the prejudice against taxation as a tyranny, to which even the exercise of special acts of imperial clemency gave a colour. His expensive tastes in building, his prodigality of favours on unworthy courtiers, and his endowment of a new Rome with all the largesses of the old, obliged him to draw heavily upon his subjects. His immoderate profusion in the last decade of his life got him the nick-name of "pupillus," and he might have applied to himself the name of "wall-flower" (herba parietaria or wall-pellitory) which he gave to Trajan, "ob titulos multis aedibus inscriptos" (Vict. Ep. 41). Under this pressure it became necessary to define perpetually the share which each member of the community must take, and allow none to shift to an easier station. A system almost of castes was the result, from which escape was rendered illegal. The sons of decurions, of officials of all kinds, and of soldiers were required to remain in the profession of their fathers (C. Th. vii. 22. 1, 2, 3; xii. 1. 7). The same tendency was evident in other professions, as of physicians and literary teachers (professores, id. xiii. 3. 1, 2), as well as in the various guilds of artisans. Slavery was of course hereditary, and it was not till later that escape was allowed even to Christians from a slavery enforcing or implying vice (C. Th. xv. 7. de scenicis; 8. de lenonibus). Great freedom indeed was given to emancipation, which was placed directly under the guardianship of the church; but freedmen were still bound to do service to their patrons, and if ungrateful or contumacious might be reduced again to slavery (C. Th. iv. 10. 1).

It may be that the impulse given to emancipation concurred with other causes to raise into prominence a new class between the slave and the freemen, that of colons or serfs, "adscripti glebae." A modern writer tells us that "Marcus Aurelius began, and Aurelian and Valentinian continued the system of settling great numbers of barbarian captives upon the Italian soil and compelling them as slaves to cultivate it" (Lecky, Eur. Morals, i. p. 1). Constantine pursued the same policy especially with regard to frontier lands, but in tracing the rise of serfdom, we must also allow for the degradation of the free peasantry who were unable to pay their own taxes, and sunk, perhaps willingly, into the condition of colons.

The want of elasticity in trade, which is shewn by the failure of the chrysargyrum, left the possession of land as almost the only source of private greatness and the only basis of public revenue. The state also, as represented by the emperor, became the great landlord—just as in former times the Roman republic had been in theory—and granted military fiefs (beneficia) and lands in a sort of copyhold (emphyteusis). Hence in the legislation of Constantine, which brings these facts into prominence, we see the germs of much that afterwards grew into the feudal system. One power indeed happily resisted this stereotyping process, though it was in danger from time to time of yielding.

The ranks of the clergy and the monasteries, though circumscribed by the state and partially absorbed by it, gave openings from the oppression which coerced the rest of the empire. Entrance into the clerus was not indeed free to all. For when Constantine had granted the Catholic clergy immunity from the curia, it was found that many sought ordination for the sake of this evasion, just as they contracted servile marriages (C. Th. xii. 1. 6) or entered the army (ibid. 11 etc.). By a singular exercise of power he forbade any one whose fortune made him capable of bearing public burdens to become a clerk (id. xvi. 2. 3, a law of 320), alleging in a later law, that it is fit that the opulent "should support the needs of the world, and the poor be sustained by the riches of the churches" (ibid. 6, in 326). Though he did not molest those who were already ordained, he decreed that in future anyone declining public duties by this means should be separated from the body he had joined and be restored to the curia. But though thus restricted, the clergy did not actually become a close corporation or caste, notwithstanding the tendency to hereditary succession among them apparent in the West, which seems also contemplated by several laws of Constantius (ibid. 9, 10, 11, 14; see on the general subject Lecky, Eur. Morals, ii. p. 349, ch. 5 and the refs. there).

The prevalence of celibacy had in this respect, at any rate, the beneficial result of preserving a certain amount of freedom in the midst of great social tyranny and restraint.

(3.) The alteration in general and penal legislation brings us nearer to the religious side of Constantine. It is in these and in his laws directly concerning the Christians that he may be called, as Julian termed him, "novator turbatorque prisearum legum et moris antiquitus recepti" (Amm. Marc. xxi. 10). The reforms introduced by him in the laws relating to women, children and slaves, and the directions about certain punishments, may be mentioned as indicating a Christian influence. The Institutes of Lactantius were dedicated in at least one edition to Constantine (cf. Inst. Div. books i. ii. iv. v. ad init.: vii. 26, is possibly an interpolation), who had already shewn his confidence in the author by making him tutor of his eldest son, Crispus. It may be that passages like those in book vi. ch. 20, against gladiatorial shows and the exposure of infants had some effect upon his actions. The influence of Hosius of Cordova would no doubt be exerted in the same direction, as well as that of Eusebius in later years. One of the first laws in the Theodosian code decrees that if a slave condemned to the games or mines be branded it should not be on his face, "that the face which is fashioned in the likeness of the divine beauty be not marred" (ix. 40. 2, March 315). Victor mentions the abolition of the punishment of crucifixion and breaking the legs by Constantine, apparently about the same time (Cæs. 41). A rescript of his later years lays down the principle that in dividing estates the families of slaves should not be separated (C. Th. ii. 25, in 334).

Nevertheless slaves were far from having full protection of life accorded to them. Fugitives were to be examined by torture (Cod. Just. vi. 1, 4, in 317). Masters, indeed, were not wantonly to kill and torture their slaves; but inquiry was not necessarily to be made for the death of one in prison or under the lash, so that a master could only be accounted guilty if it was proved that he intended murder (Cod. Th. de emend. serv. ix. 12. 1, 2, in 319 and 326). A good deal was done however to reform the abuses of prison discipline. Of two laws of the year 320, the first forbids debtors to the state to be scourged or incarcerated, ordering them to be kept in "free custody" (id. xi. 7. 3); the second provides that persons under accusation should be allowed light and air, and be chained only for purposes of security, while all despatch should be used in bringing them to trial (ix. 3. 1). Again in 326 it was provided that no one should be committed to prison without being examined (auditus apud acta, ix. 3. 2), and in 328 that a copy of the "acta" should be given to the parties accused in criminal as in civil causes (ix. 1. 6). A law of Constantius, three years after the death of his father, ordered the separation of the sexes in prison (ix. 3. 3).

The prevention of infanticide and the reckless exposure of children was a subject which also early engaged his attention. Augustus and Nerva had given public aid for the support of children: Trajan, Antoninus, and Marcus founded institutions for their nurture, especially for that of girls, in Italy. Alexander Severus followed their example, and the names of other like benefactors are known. But their charities were of partial or local extent. Constantine (acting perhaps on the suggestion of Lactantius) issued a law in 315 from his own birthplace, Naissus, which was to be placarded in all the cities of Italy. This law made the fiscus and private estate of the emperor liable for the sustenance of all children whose fathers declared their inability to rear them. It was followed in 322 by another addressed to Africa, but apparently extending its provisions to other provinces (xi. 27. 1, 2). It may be readily doubted how far such indiscriminate benevolence is useful. But the pressure of public destitution was no doubt now very great. It seems to have been the reason for another and still more doubtful measure. This was one legalising the sale of children (forbidden under Diocletian), and securing the possession of exposed children to their preserver against the claims of the parents (C. Th. v. 8. 1, in 329, and v. 7. 1, in 331). The object no doubt was a good one, to give children of destitute parents a better chance of life. Exposure of children was, it is believed, not punish-able by law till 374, by a law of Valentinian, Valens and Gratian (Cod. Just. viii. 52, 2), but the phrase there—"animadversioni quae constituta est"—is not explained.

A similar desire to express Christian feeling dictated it would seem many of the laws relating to women and to marriage. There are not infrequent provisions for the saving of female modesty in judicial proceedings (e.g. i. 22. 1, 2, in 316 and 334). In 326, celibates and childless persons of both sexes were freed from the taxes laid upon them, a measure very grateful to Christians (vii. 16. 1; cf. Euseb. V. C. iv. 26). A law again of 316 took away the right of appeal from provincial courts possessed by clarissimi in criminal cases, the first named of which is rape. In 321 or 325 cohabitation with a concubine was forbidden to a married man (C. Just. v. 26). But to these must be added other laws of an extraordinary harshness, such that we can hardly believe them to have been put in execution. The first in cases of illicit intercourse punished both parties with death, the woman even if not consenting with disinheritation, while nurses and servants abetting the crime were to be executed with circumstances of great atrocity (C. Th. ix. 23. 1, also in 320, modified by Constantius ib. 2, in 349). The second doomed to death any free-woman who had committed adultery with a slave, and condemned him to be burnt (ix. 9. 1, in 326). The marriage of free persons with slaves and others of mean condition was meanwhile discouraged and disallowed in every way.

Another attempted reform was the prohibition of gladiatorial games, issued at Berytus in 325 (xv. 12. 1. ep. V. C. iv. 25, Soer. i. 8). The scope of this law certainly did not extend to Italy, though expressed in general terms (omnino gladiatores esse prohibemus), for there are in the code laws of Constantius and Honorius regulating their performance in Rome. We have also an inscription containing a decree of Constantine (probably of a later date than 325) in which he sanctions a new establishment of ludi scenici and gladiatorial games at Spello in Umbria, with the restriction that the temple there dedicated to his name should not "be polluted with the deceits of any contagious superstition." (O. Henzen 5580.) At Rome, as is well known, they continued till 404, the date of the heroic act of Telemachus. Constantinople on the other hand was never disgraced by such spectacles, and this we may well ascribe to the emperor's own desire. He who in his youth had sacrificed so many barbarians at Treves, grew in his later years notoriously averse to severe punishments and to bloodshed, so that his leniency to criminals became a matter of common and perhaps just animadversion (V. C. iv. 31; cf. iii. 1, 7).

A few civil laws may be mentioned. Usury on commodities in kind was restricted to 50 p. c. and to the rate of 12 p. c. for money (C. Th. ii. 33. 1, in 325). The power of foreclosing mortgages was abolished (iii. 2, 1. de commissoriis rescindenda). Something was done to relax the old severity of the patria potestas especially in allowing sons to receive inheritances from their mothers (viii. 18, 1, 2, 3). But the loosening of such ties had in part a political significance, as it increased the number of persons liable to be decurions (xii. 1, 7). As to Divorce the number of legitimate causes was limited to murder, poisoning and violation of sepulchres in the man, and adultery, poisoning and acting as a 'conciliatrix' in the woman. The principle of Antonianus Pius (Augustine ad Pollent. ii. 7) which equalised the guilt of the man in adultery was not yet carried out. On the other hand donations at betrothal were secured to the woman with a good deal of care (C. Th. iii. 5, 3, 5). Constantine also discouraged the use of concupitatus, but gave facilities for legitimising children born under it, by after-wedlock in the case of freeborn women (Col. Just. v. 27, 1 and 5).

The general tendency of these laws to recognise the rights of the individual, contrasts with the other attempts to reduce all men to castes prompted by political and financial necessities. They coexisted with other and no lesser inconsistencies in the mind of Constantine. He was great enough to see the importance of the moral teaching of Christianity, and great enough to organise his empire firmly according to the ideas which he gathered from his predecessors, but he was not great enough to combine and reconcile the two. He could not impart moral vigour to his official system; and he happily did not succeed in subjecting religion entirely to state control, though he laid the foundation of that Caesaro-Papalism, which afterwards so much fettered the Byzantine church. Nevertheless, we must give him credit for a sincere desire for moral reform, and confess that henceforward there was a marked increase, if not in nobility of character, at least in outward respectability of conduct.

B. RELIGIOUS POLICY.—The great change which makes the reign of Constantine an epoch in church history is the union between church and state, and the introduction of the personal interference of the emperor. The proximate cause of the great influence possessed by him, was the reaction of feeling which took place, when the civil governor from being himself a persecutor or an instrument of persecution became a promoter of Christianity. Something, no doubt, too, was owing to the teaching of Christian moralists as to submission to the powers that be, and to the general tendency towards a system of official subordination, of which the political constitution of Constantine is the great example. His success in establishing that constitution, without any serious opposition, seems to shew the temper of men's minds at the time, and the absence of individual prominence or independence of thought amongst either followers or opponents. This was true as well of the church as of the state. The great men who have left their mark on church organisation and policy had either passed away, like St. Cyprian, or had not yet attained their full powers. The two seeming exceptions are Hosius, bishop of Cordova and St. Athanasius. The first had great influence over the emperor, but probably lacked genius, and is but obscurely known to us. His assent in old age to the heretical formula of Sirmium, though extorted by persecution, was at any rate a sign of weakness. Athanasius, though he might have sympathised with some of the wide conceptions of Constantine, never came sufficiently into contact with him to overcome the prejudices raised against him by the courtiers: and the emperor could not really comprehend the importance of the points for which Athanasius was contending. The period, too, of his greatest activity was in the succeeding reign. The other ecclesiastics, as well as statesmen, who surrounded the emperor seem to have been deficient in sincerity and strength of character. Persecution had perhaps been effectual in strengthening their tenacity of dogma, but it had not fitted Christians for the direction of society at large.

Constantine, therefore, was left very much to make his own way, and to be guided by his own principles or impulses. In civil legislation we have seen two often discordant tendencies at work in him, the one towards uniformity, the other towards a recognition of individual rights. With regard to his religious policy we have an expression of his own, in his letter to Alexander and Arius, which may help us in our judgment of its merits (Eus. V. C. ii. 65). Two principles, he said, had guided his actions; the first to unify the belief of all nations with regard to the Divinity into one consistent form, the second to set in order the body of the world which was labouring as it were under a grievous sickness. Such, no doubt, were the real desires of Constantine, but he was too impulsive, too rude in intellect, too credulous of his own strength, to carry them out with patience, wisdom and justice.

In giving some details of this policy we shall arrange the matter under four heads:—(1) His acts of toleration, (2) relations with the Donatists (3) relations with Arianism, (4) his policy towards heathenism. As to the documents on which the narrative is mainly based, we must not discredit them too much on account of the affectation and exaggeration of their style which characterises almost all writings of the period. We must remark, however, that some of those reported by Eusebius are not—as he was himself conscious—very well translated from the Latin, and of this we shall point out one or two instances further on. Their genuineness, nevertheless, must be assumed in default of any serious case made out against them: though it is quite impossible to say how far they represent in all cases the feelings of the emperor, or how far he allowed them to be inspired or formulated by others.

(1.) Acts of Toleration. The policy of Constantine towards the Christians during the first period of his reign had not been very decided, though it is probable that he as well as Constantius Chlorus prevented any violent persecution. His first public measure of toleration, of which we have any certain record, was to join together with Licinius in the edict issued by Galerius in 311 (given in de M. P. 34 and more diffusely by Eus. H. E. viii. 17). The edict acknowledged that the persecution had failed and gave permission to the Christians to worship their own God and to rebuild their places of meeting, provided they did nothing contrary to good order (contra disciplinam, misrendered ἐπιστήμη in Eus.). Nay the emperors regret that the God of the Christians has, owing to persecution, failed to receive their intercessions for the good of the state, and they make a restoration of these a condition of toleration. The idea evidently is to bring in Christianity into the state as a 'religio licita,' a position with which it seems to be insinuated the Christians of earlier times were contented. The further details of this limited measure are lost. The death of Galerius followed almost directly, and in the spring or summer of the next year (312) Constantine and Licinius promulgated another of their own, which may not have been very different from that of Galerius. The text of it is lost, but we can to some extent infer its provisions from the references to it in the edict of Milan (de M. P. 48; Eus. H. E. x. 5) and from the parallel document promulgated by Maximinus Daza, which Eusebius compares with that of Constantine and Licinius (H. E. ix. 9; the matter of these edicts is here carefully discussed by Keim, Ueb. Const. pp. 14 sq., 79 sq., cf. his paper in Gött. Theol. Jahrb. 1852). The spirit of this one seems, as we have said, little in advance of that of Galerius. It allowed indeed liberty of worship, but specified certain hard conditions.^b These seem to have been amongst others that no heathen converts should be made; that no sect should be tolerated outside 'the body of Christians, the Catholic Church'; that confiscated property should not be restored, except, it may be, the sites of churches. This edict, issued before the conflict with Maxentius, contrasts strikingly with the much more liberal edict of Milan issued in the spring of 313, after the return of Constantine from Rome, which gave free toleration to every religious body. Constantine did not act in this matter without inquiry, though it is only accidentally that we hear of his particular examination into one of the largest of the sects, that of the Manichaeans (reference to the commission to Strategius afterwards called Musonianus in Amm. Marc. xv. 13. The date is unknown, but μην have been about this time.) The purport of the edict may be summed up as follows—"We have sometime perceived that liberty of worship must not be denied to Christians and to all other men, but whereas in our former edict divers conditions were added, which perhaps have been the cause of the defection of many from that observance, we Constantine and Licinius, Augusti, meeting in Milan, decree that both Christians and all other men soever should have free liberty to choose that form of worship which they consider most suitable to themselves in order that the Divinity may be able to give us and our subjects His accustomed goodwill and favour. We abolish all those conditions entirely. Further for the body of the Christians in particular, all places of meeting which belonged to them, and have since been bought by or granted to others are to be restored; and an indemnity may be claimed by the buyers or grantees from our treasury; and the same we decree concerning the other corporate property of the Christians. The execution of the law is committed to the civil magistrates, and it is everywhere to be made public." The change of feeling here evinced was more strongly marked in other documents that followed, which more peculiarly expressed the mind of Constantine. The first in order is a letter to Anulinus, proconsul of Africa, giving directions for the execution of the edict, in which the term 'Catholic Church' is substituted for that of body of Christians (Eus. H. E. x. 5, 15). Then follows another addressed to the same official liberating the clergy 'in the Catholic church of which Caecilian is president' from the pressure of public burdens. This concession at first apparently made to Africa alone was extended to the whole church in the year 319 (C. Th. xvi. 2, 2). The description of Christianity in the privilege granted to the African church is remarkable "as the religion in which the crowning reverence is observed towards the holiest powers of heaven" (H. E. x. 7). The mention of Caecilian and this definition of the Catholic church in the same document was not allowed to pass unchallenged by the Donatists. They presented to Anulinus an appeal, libellus Ecclesie Catholicae criminum Caeciliani, and a request for a commission of inquiry, both of which he forwarded to the emperor (August. Ep. 88 (68). 2; Migne, Const. Mag. col. 479). This occurrence brings us to a new stage in the religious policy of Constantine—his relations with the Donatist schism.

(2.) The Donatist Schism. The appeal of the Donatists brought Constantine directly into the heart of church controversies and was the first occasion of his gradually growing interference. Though his relations with this schism form only an episode in its history, their consequences were so important as to require a somewhat detailed account. The Donatists were a puritan party, very like the Novatianists some 50 years before, who held extreme doctrines with reference to those who had lapsed in persecution. They took their name first from Donatus of Casa Nigra who impugned the elevation of Caecilian to the bishopric of Carthage in 311, and secondarily from a greater Donatus who succeeded Majorinus as schismatic bishop. The objection to Caecilian was chiefly on the ground of his consecration by Felix of Aptunga, accused as a 'traditor' or betrayer of copies of the scriptures to the agents of persecution. Caecilian was consequently deposed by a conventicle of 70 Numidian bishops, who had at any rate only co-ordinate rights with the Africans, meeting in the private house of one of his enemies at Carthage, and Majorinus was elected in his place. This was the state of affairs when the letters of Constantine to Anulinus arrived. He was much discomposed at receiving the Donatist appeal which followed them (Eus. H. E. x. 5, 19): for he had, it seems, no idea of interfering in the internal affairs of the church. The position was rather thrust upon him, and though the catholic party in Africa seem to have accepted his intervention without reluctance, it is worth observing that the appeal to an emperor, practically to define Catholicity, came from the Schismatics. Neander certainly goes too far in representing the Donatist schism as a reaction against the confusion of ecclesiastical and political elements (Ch. Hist. vol. iii. p. 258, E. T.). Their position of remonstrance was a later one—'Quid est imperatori cum ecclesia?' belongs to a considerably subsequent date—A. D. 349 (see below under CONSTANS period i.).

The first reply which the emperor sent to the Donatists' petition was to bestow a sum of 3,000 'purses' (φάλλεις, folles here of uncertain value) on Caecilian, and to give him further credit with the procurator of his private estates. The sum was to be distributed according to a brief (βρῆβιον) drawn up by Hosius, who now first appears as possessing the confidence of the emperor. He further advised Caecilian if he or his people were molested by "any persons of an unquiet disposition" to bring them without hesitation before the magistrates who had instructions how to deal with them (Eus. H. E. x. 6). The Donatist petition had, however, requested the emperor to appoint judges in Gaul, as a country where no persecution had raged and where consequently impartiality might be expected, and the Catholics may also have joined in this demand. At any rate Constantine named the bishops of Autun, Arles and Cologne, and desired them to meet at Rome. At the same time he wrote a letter addressed to Miltiades bishop of Rome and Marcus (perhaps the Presbyter who succeeded Silvester), requesting them to bear the case with the Gallic bishops. The letter expresses, as we have implied, the discomposure he felt at the appeal, his regard for the Catholic church and his wish to leave no schism in it (Eus. H. E. x. 5, 18 foll.). The council was accordingly held on the 2nd of October 313 in the house of Fausta in the Lateran, a memorable site. To the three Gallican bishops were added fifteen from Italy and Rhaetia, and ten of either party were brought before them. Donatus was accused on his own confession of having practised rebaptism, and of having laid hands upon lapsed bishops which was contrary to church rule, and Caecilian on his part was unanimously pronounced innocent, but great facilities were offered to the Donatist bishops to return to the Catholic communion (Optat. de Schism. Don. i.; ep. Augustin. Breviculus Collationis Carthag. d. iii. c. xii. 24 sq. etc.) But the matter was not allowed to rest. Donatus appealed again apparently to the emperor and on the suggestion of one of his party, Filuminus, two bishops were sent to Africa by Constantine to decide by personal inspection which was the Catholic church (ubi esset Catholica). Caecilian meanwhile was retained at Brescia for a short time. The commissioners found great party commotions going on in Carthage, where they remained forty days, and in the end they decided by communicating with the clergy of Caecilian and then returned. Both the leaders then returned to Africa and the seditions went on as before. The Donatists complained that Melchisedes had not considered the case of Felix, on whose character as a 'traditor' the whole matter turned. Consequently early in the spring of the next year (314), Constantine gave orders to Verinus, the vicarius praefectorum, 'to make public inquiry into the life of Felix of Aptunga,' a commission executed by the proconsul Aelianus in consequence of the failing health of Verinus. The letter by which the guilt of Felix was supposed to be proved, was declared a forgery and he himself in his absence was absolved (Gesta Purg. Felicis apud Optat. and Migne Const. Mag. col. 718 sq.). Even this did not content the Donatists, and the emperor determined finally to heal the schism, and extending the precedent of the Lateran Synod, summoned representatives of the whole church of his dominions to meet at Arles the 1st of August, 314. It is obvious to remark that this would not have been done if the judgment of Rome had been held in any sense to be final. We possess two letters of Constantine with reference to this matter, one to Aelianus (also written Ablatius or Ablarius probably an error) authorising him to give public carriages to the bishops of both parties (evectio publica, δημόσιον ὄχημα, Migne, Const. col. 483), and one to Chrestus, bishop of Syracuse, invoking his attendance and that of a certain number of his suite (Eus. H. E. x. 5, 21). The number of bishops attending has been variously stated, but Dupin believes them to have been only thirty-three, though the number of 200 is perhaps generally assumed (see authorities in Hefele, Councils, § 15). They came at any rate from every quarter of the Western empire, from Italy, Sicily, Gaul, Britain (three bishops, a priest and a deacon), Spain and Africa, and so far might deserve the description which St. Augustine seems to give of it as "plenarium ecclesiae universae concilium" (Ep. 43. 7, § 19; his words, however, may admit of another explanation). They deliberated under the presidency of Marinus, bishop of Arles, and decided as all the other courts had done against the Donatists, who were 'aut dammati aut repulsi,' though we have no complete copy of the Synodal acts relating to them. It seems probable also that as great if not greater privileges were again offered to reconciled bishops, as were granted by the Lateran Synod. (Hefele, l. c. p. 179, French Tr.) They then proceeded to discuss other matters, especially the Paschal controversy, rebaptism and the position of the lapsed. The 7th canon is interesting as illustrating the rising connexion between church and state. Members of the church becoming provincial governors (praesides), and as such according to the constitution being always sent to a distant province, were to receive letters of communion (litteras ecclesiasticas communicatorias) but to be watched by the bishop of the place where they were appointed to govern, and excluded from communion only when they began to act contrary to discipline: and the same provision was extended to other officials. This therefore repealed the 56th canon of Elvira (305 or 306) which prohibited a municipal magistrate from the church during his tenure of office. These canons were communicated to the new pope Silvester, who had himself been unable to attend. (Migne, C. Mag. col. 815 sq. Mr. Foulkes informs the writer that he now (1876) believes all these canons to be spurious.) The emperor meanwhile was engaged in an important war with Licinius, yet he found time to interest himself in no small degree with what had taken place at Arles. His letter to the bishops of the council is one of the most curious of the documents which bear his name (C. Mag. c. 487). He confesses the goodness of God in bringing him out of darkness. He acknowledges that he had himself received great benefits when he had by his unrighteousness deserved evils. He rejoices that the providence of Christ the Saviour had been shewn in their judgment, even upon such arrogant and erroneous persons. He expresses his anger at their appeal. "They demand," he says, "my judgment, who myself expect the judgment of Christ. The judgment of bishops (sacerdotes) ought to be accounted as if God himself was sitting on the tribunal . . . O, raging audacity of their madness, after the example in Gentile causes they have interposed an appeal." He then dismisses the bishops, begging them to remember him that the Saviour may have mercy on him, with the assurance that he had ordered these seditious deceivers to be brought to him from Africa "that they may be kept from doing anything that will excite the wrath of God." The criticism of this important letter is rather difficult. We seem to trace an ecclesiastical hand in the expression "to expect the judgment of Christ," a phrase occurring twice in the mouth of Cyprian (see Ep. 67 and Sentent. Episcop. Cypriani). In other respects too the language has a clerical turn about it, which suggests the influence of such a man as Hosius. Similarly in the first letter to Anulinus the mention of Caecilian by name can hardly be explained except by supposing some such counsellor at work beside the emperor. On the other hand the vehemence of expression is not unlike Constantine, and he would hardly have permitted any one else to introduce the personal reflection as to his own sinfulness. The latter is striking as being almost the only evidence we have that Constantine had any feeling of self-distrust.

The result of the council was the return of a good many Donatists to the church, but others persevered in sedition and were summoned to the court. Here their importunity seems to have prevailed upon the emperor to reopen the question and to judge it himself. Both parties were cited by him to Rome, but Caecilian, for some unexplained reason, did not appear, and the trial was postponed. Finally it took place at Milan, Nov. 316, both parties being present. The emperor's own decision, like that of the two councils, was to condemn the Donatists and assert the innocence of Caecilian (Ang. Brev. Coll. Carth. d. iii. c. xix. 37; contra Epistol. Parmen. i. 11). His first impulse was to order the leaders of the schismatics to be put to death, but happily he was restrained (possibly by Hosius) and they were ordered into banishment and their churches confiscated (Aug. C. Ep. Parm. i. 13, Epist. 88, § 3, etc.). In 321, however, perceiving the uselessness of repressive measures and beaten by the obstinacy of the schism, he recalled the exiles and issued an edict of toleration, to the practice of which he exhorted the Catholics (Epist. 141, § 9, ad Verinum in L. post Collat. 54). Persecution was, however, renewed by Constans with even worse results; and the remains of the schism, notwithstanding the vigorous efforts of St. Augustine, lasted on till the seventh century.

The results of these proceedings are such a mixture of good and evil as seems inseparable from the union of church and state. To the church accrued the advantage of the development of her system of councils, and generally a growth in organisation and polity; the emperor gained a nearer insight into the feeling of the church, and the state in general obtained a most important support. On the other hand must be set the identification of the Catholic with the dominant and worldly church, and the precedent allowed of imperial interference in questions of schism. From the banishment of the Donatists for schism, was no great step to the persecutions of Arians and Catholics for heresy, and not much further to the execution of the Priscillianists by Magnus Maximus. But it is very difficult to lay our fingers upon the exact point of this process where the evil began. If Donatists made the first appeal, the Catholics had no scruples as to the power to which they made it, nor does Constantine himself seem to have been actuated by a wish to strain his prerogative, but only to produce unity and peace. The matter also was very much complicated by the civil turbulence of the Donatists, which necessitated the continued interference of the state, when it would gladly have left the matter alone.

(3.) The Arian Controversy. The relation of the emperor to this great movement was, as we have said, the result of his last achievement of power. His complete victory over Licinius in 323 brought him into contact with the controversies of his new dominions in the East, just as his victory over Maxentius had led to the Donatist appeals in the West. The first document which connects him with this controversy is a letter to Alexander and Arius (Eus. V. C. ii. 64-72; Soc. i. 7 gives only the latter half of it). Like most of these letters it is very verbose and contains very little. He expresses his longing for "calm days and careless nights," and exhorts the opponents to reconciliation. The whole has arisen from an unpractical question stirred by Alexander, and from an inconsiderate opinion expressed by Arius. Again and again he insists on the insignificance of the dispute (ὅτι μικρῶν καὶ λίαν ἐλαχίστων φιλονεικούντων—ὑπὲρ τῶν ἐλαχίστων τούτων ζητήσεων ἀκριβολογεῖσθε, etc.), shewing in a remarkable manner his own ignorance and self-confidence. This letter was sent by the hands of Hosius, but it had naturally no effect: though we are ignorant of his proceedings at Alexandria, except that he combated Sabellianism (Soc. iii. 8, p. 394 Migne; Hefele § 22). Arius seems to have now written a letter of remonstrance, to which Constantine, who was under other influences or in a different mood, replied in an extraordinary letter of violent invective. (This is the letter Ario et Arianis which Soerates, i. 9, places after Nicaea. But according to Epiphanius, Haer. lix. 9, it was despatched before the council, and so the best modern historians: see De Broglie, i. p. 388. It is printed in Migne, p. 510 f.) The detailed history of this time is involved in difficulty, but it is pretty clear that the expedient of a general council was a natural one both to the emperor and to the church at large. The Meletian schism in Egypt, and the Paschal controversy required settlement, and in Constantine's mind the latter was equally important with Arianism. The idea and its execution is ascribed to Constantine without any mention of suggestions from others, except perhaps from Hosius (Sulpic. Sever. Chron. ii. 40, S. Nicaena Synodus auctore illo confecta habebatur). He sent complimentary letters in every direction, and gave the use of public carriages and litters to the bishops. We have a letter of Constantine which (if genuine) shews that they assembled first at Ancyra and removed to Nicaea by his orders (Analecti Nicaena, pub. by B. H. Cowper, 1857. But see the criticism in the Christian Remembrancer, vol. xxxv., pp. 53-69). Besides the Catholic prelates, whose names may be seen elsewhere, he particularly invited the Novatian bp. Acesius. The council first met in the cathedral but probably not for regular deliberation (Eus. V. C. iii. 7 speaks of ὁ οἶκος ἐκκλησίας; but see De Broglie, ii. p. 27, note). The year of the council is allowed to be 325, but the day is much debated. The bishops seem to have waited some days or even weeks for the emperor, who was celebrating at Nicomedia the festival of his triumph over Licinius. Hefele discusses the various dates, and places the solemn opening on the 14th of June (Councils, p. 26). The bishops were arranged round a great hall in the middle of the palace, when Constantine entered to open the proceedings, dressed magnificently, and making a great impression by his stately presence, lofty stature, and gentle and even modest demeanour. He replied in Latin to the loyal speech of Eustathius of Antioch—who, as far as there was one president of the council, seems to have held the first place. He did not disdain to use Greek in his efforts to smooth over or to repress the differences of opinion that immediately shewed themselves. His speech, recommending peace and unanimity (as usual) and claiming the position for himself of fellow servant with those whom he was addressing, may be read in Eusebius (V. C. iii. 12). This is not the place to attempt to trace the course of the discussions that followed; how long the emperor was present at them is uncertain (cf. Hefele, § 30). Two points are deserving of note, first the story of his burning the memorials and recriminations of the different parties addressed to him; secondly, his relation to the ὁμοούσιον. As to the first, it is said that he brought them into the Synod in a sealed packet and threw them into the fire, saying to the bishops to this effect, "You cannot be judged by a man like myself: such things as these must wait till the great day of God's judgment," adding, according to Soerates, "Christ has advised us to pardon our brother if we wish to obtain pardon ourselves" (Soc. i. 8, p. 63 Migne; Soz. i. 17). It is curious however that Eusebius, who is ever ready to glorify his hero, makes no mention of the circumstance, which in itself is probable enough. The relation of Constantine to the ὁμοούσιον rests on the epistle of Eusebius to his own church, in which he gives an account of the Synod to his own advantage (Soerat. i. 8; Theodoret i. 12, Athanas. Devet. Synod. Nic. 4). He gives the text of the creed which he proposed to the council: and tells us that after it was read no one got up to speak against it, but on the contrary the emperor praised it very highly and exhorted everyone to embrace it with the addition only of one word—"consubstantial." He then proceeded to comment on it, declaring that the word implied neither a corporeal substance, nor a division of the divine substance between the Father and the Son, but was to be understood in a divine and mysterious sense. In another place Eusebius lays stress on the emperor's presence at the discussion; and it is evident that he wishes it to be believed that the creed of Nicaea was his work rather than that of the bishops—a conclusion with which other authors certainly do not harmonise (see Hefele, § 34). We must suppose, however, that something of the kind occurred, and though it is pretty clear that the word ὁμοούσιος was in the minds of the orthodox party throughout, they may not have felt it safe to propose it at first, inasmuch as its association with the case of Paul of Samosata was provocative of much disputation. Hosius, it may be, suggested to the emperor that the proposition of it should come from his lips. It is certain that he must have had some tuition in theological language, and that from an orthodox theologian, before he could give the interpretation of the word with which Eusebius credits him. When the creed was finally drawn up the emperor accepted it as inspired, and with his usual vehemence in the cause of peace proceeded to inflict penalties upon the few who still refused to sign it. He exiled Arius, Secundus and Theonas, and the priests who were attached to them, to Illyria. He ordered the books of Arius and his friends to be burnt and threatened with death anyone who concealed them. He wished even to abolish the name of Arians and to change it into that of Porphyrians (Epist. ad ecclesias, Migne, p. 506; Soc. i. 9). Later on Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nicaea were also deposed and banished, inasmuch as they had not recognised the deposition of Arius, though they had been brought to sign the creed. Constantine indulged particularly in invectives against Eusebius of Nicomedia, whom he accused of having stirred up persecution under Licinius, and of having deceived himself at Nicaea (Ep. ad Nicomedienses c. Euseb. et Theognium, Migne, p. 519 foll., from Gelasius, iii. 2, and the collections of councils). The other matters decided upon by the council may only just be mentioned; the Meletians were very gently handled, and the Paschal question was definitely settled, Easter being fixed as at present to the first Sunday after the full moon following the 21st of March. Constantine's dialogue with Acesius, on the occasion of these decrees, is characteristic (Socrates, i. 10). Acesius, who fully acknowledged them, tried to explain the reasons of the Novatian schism. Constantine merely remarked, "Set a ladder, Acesius and go up to heaven by yourself."

Constantine expressed an immoderate joy at the success of the council, considering it a personal triumph. Eusebius has preserved the letter which he wrote to all the churches on the occasion (V. C. iii. 17-20). He begins by speaking shortly and generally of the discussions on points of faith at which he glories he was himself present, and he declares that the unanimity which prevailed henceforth leaves no room for doubt. Then he goes on to enlarge on the anti-Judaic aspect of the decree about Easter, on which he lays great stress. A parallel letter to the church of Alexandria speaks rather more of Arius (Migne, Con-t. p. 507). Both these letters contain the phrase εἰς ἐξ ὑμῶν, συνθεράπων ὑμέτερος, and it seems very probable that it was on the occasion of the banquet given after the council that he gave himself the title of "bishop of the externals of the church by divine appointment" (ὅμοις μὲν τῶν εἰσὼ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, ἐγὼ δὲ τῶν ἐκτὸς ὑπὸ θεοῦ καθισταμένων ἐπίσκοπος ἂν εἴην, V. C. iv. 24; for the date cf. De Broglie ii. p. 61; and for the meaning cf. H. E. ix. 8, 15, and Heinichen's Meletiana, xxvii.). We have spoken above (Life, period iii.) on the declamations of Constantine, one of which is still preserved to us, the oratio ad Sanctorum coetum, which Eusebius gives as an appendix to his life. It is an interminable piece of rhetoric delivered shortly before an Easter, but in what year is unknown, and the doctrinal positions taken up in it are too vague to enable us to conjecture accurately.

The events of the next few years were, as we have seen, very tragical. The journey to Rome, the murders of Crispus and Fausta, the foundation and dedication of Constantinople, and the pilgrimage of Helena to Palestine have been already recounted, as well as the alteration of the emperor's feelings in regard to Arianism. The alienation of Constantine from the Catholics and the restoration of Arius is ascribed to the influence of an Arian priest, commended to him by his sister Constantia on her death-bed (Soc. i. 25). There is a difficulty in the narrative here caused by the fact that Eusebius of Nico-media and Theognis, in their "libellus paenitentiae" addressed to the bishops, speak of Arius as already recalled (Soc. i. 4; Soz. ii. 16). This seems improbable (as Socrates himself saw), and it is perhaps best to suppose that the document is false or belongs to some other circumstance in this long affair, for there are other inconsistencies in the libellus which it is not necessary to state here (see De Broglie, ii. p. 132 note). The natural sequence of events is to suppose that Eusebius was first to return, and that he prevailed over the emperor to restore Arius in the year 330. We have a letter from Constantine to Arius, in which he speaks with some wonder that he had not long ago answered a previous letter or letters by appearing before him (Soc. i. 25). If this πάλαι may be understood literally, it is possible that Eusebius and Theognis referred to some earlier despatches addressed to Arius, as if they constituted a recall from exile. Constantine was satisfied with his profession of faith, which alike avoided the bolder phrases of his own mis-belief, and the distinctly Catholic formulae (ap. Soc. i. 26; Soz. ii. 27). It would be only to repeat much that has been said elsewhere if we recounted here the tactics of the Eusebian party pursued during the remainder of Constantine's reign. Their programme was: "1. to maintain their hold over the emperor; 2. to get rid of the leading Catholic bishops; 3. to propagate Arianism in forms less offensive to general Christian feeling than those which the Council had anathematised" (Bright, History p. 35). The subtle influence of these men, aided largely by that flattery which was so dear to the emperor and so soothing to his troubled and in some ways sensitive conscience, obtained complete ascendancy over him. The false charges against Eustathius and Athanasius, though disproved again and again in civil courts and councils, were made to tell upon him by the extraordinary craft of the Arians. When after the profane and tumultuous proceedings of the council of Tyre, Athanasius was able to force the emperor in person to hear the truth, it seemed for a moment as if his cause would prevail (Athan. Apol. 86). Constantine wrote a peremptory letter to the bishops who had met at Tyre, recording his interview with Athanasius, and ordering them to appear before him (Soc. i. 34). They did not appear, but the chiefs of the party attacked the emperor on his weak side, and asserted that Athanasius had threatened to delay the corn ships, an absurdity which it was vain for him to deny. The result was the banishment of Athanasius to Treves, Feb. 336, but his see was happily not declared vacant. (Soc. i. 35; Soz. ii. 28 says that they revived the matter of Ischyris and the chalice, which Athanasius declares they durst not do, Apol. 9, 87; Bright, p. 42 n. For the charge about the corn ships cf. the case of Sopater, above Life, iii.)

The triumph of the Arians now seemed secure. Arius himself had all this time been unable to recover his position at Alexandria and appears to have been in retirement, but he was now again brought forward. Constantine examined him as to his faith, which was apparently expressed in the terms referred to above; and made him take an oath as to his orthodoxy, reminding him of the punishment of God for perjury. Upon this ground Arius was to be forced upon the communion of the church of Constantinople, notwithstanding the refusal of the bishop Alexander. His sudden death (whether that evening or the next morning is uncertain) must have reminded Constantine of his own warning, and may have caused him to reflect "that the witness of God had confirmed the creed of Nicaea" (Soc. i. 38). It was in vain however that attempts were made to induce him to recall Athanasius, by St. Anthony and others. He wrote to the Alexandrians that Athanasius had been banished as a seditious and arrogant man, and as condemned by a council, the members of which from their number could not have been influenced by prejudice and party spirit. The only thing obtained from him was the banishment of John the Meletian bishop, who was particularly distasteful to the Catholics of Egypt. This was his last official act in relation to the church.

Constantine's relation to Arianism is as we have seen a most perplexing subject. He was obviously the instrument for good as well as for evil. On the one hand he acted with good intentions, and was able by the superiority of his position to take a wide view of the needs of the church; on the other he was very ignorant, very self-confident, very credulous, and very violent. We know too little of the influences by which he was swayed; how, for instance, Hosius came to acquire and how to lose his ascendancy; what Eusebius of Caesarea really did; how Eusebius of Nicomedia obtained the power which he shewed in the last period of his life. We only know that the emperor, in his anxiety above all things for peace, was led to do violent acts of an inconsistent character that made peace impossible; but then we must always remember he was living in an age of violent men.

(4.) Relations with Heathenism. It will not be necessary to repeat here what has been already said as to the general and special legislation of Constantine. There are, however, a good many facts which remain to be recorded. For further details we may refer to two special works—A. Beugnot, Histoire de la destruction du Paganisme en Occident, 2 vols., Paris, 1835, an important and thoughtful book, unfortunately scarce; and E. Chastel, Histoire de la destruction du Paganisme dans l'Empire d'Orient, Paris, 1850—both crowned by the Academy. Less important is der Untergang des Hellenismus und die Entziehung seiner Tempelgüter durch die Christlichen Kaiser, by Ernst von Lasaulx, München, 1854.

We may distinguish changes in the animus of Constantine towards heathenism, which it will be well to refer to three periods. In the first, from his conversion till the final rupture with Licinius, he kept up pretty fairly an equilibrium between the two religions. In the second, that is till within a few years of his death, he depressed paganism and exalted Christianity more decidedly; while in the last, he shewed a tendency towards forcible suppression of the old religion. We must remember, however, that his wishes were not always equalled by what was politically and morally possible, and that especially in the West he was obliged to tolerate and even sanction much that he personally disliked and disavowed. The far greater vitality of paganism in the West than in the East, is most forcibly perceived when we compare the Christian apologists Lactantius or Firmicus Maternus with Eusebius and the church historians of the East, as Beugnot has done very effectively, pp. 118–129. The former shews that paganism towards the close of the reign of Constantine still swayed cultivated and enlightened men: the latter, addressing Constantine's sons, calls for edicts to repress the ancient religion by force.

First period. After the edict of Milan had enunciated the principle of universal tolerance, Constantine did all in his power to place the Christian church and priesthood on an equality with heathenism. We have already spoken of the subsidies first granted to the African church and of the privilege of exemption from the curia. He permitted enfranchisements to take place in churches as well as in temples (Cod. Th. xvi. 2, 4: 316–321), and he granted them similar privileges with regard to the reception of legacies. He commanded in the same year, 321, the observance of Sunday, by the interruption both of public works and of the sitting of the courts (Cod. Just. iii. 12, 3; cf. Cod. Theod. ii. 8, 1). It would be a mistake to suppose that he went much further at this period; the laws of 319 against divination and consultation of the haruspices, though severe in their penalties, were really re-enactments of an edict of Tiberius (Cod. Th. ix. 16. 1 and 2; cf. Chastel, p. 54). "Adite aras publicas atque delubra," runs the second law, "et consuetudinis vestrae celebrate solennia; nec enim prohibemus praeiterita usurpationis officia libera luce tractari." The law that follows against magic (in 321) expressly excepts those rustic ceremonies which were used for healing or for the preservation of the crops, &c. Similarly in 320 he decided that when public buildings were struck by lightning the haruspices should be consulted (Cod. Th. xvi. 10. 1). In his own person he retained the office of pontifex, and exercised some of its functions. We may notice, too, that shortly after his elevation to the empire he had instituted the Judi Francici, a. d. xiii. Kal. August., and in 322, after his victories over the Sarmatians, he appointed similar Sarmatic games which took place a few days later (vi. Kal. Aug.). Such games were mixed with heathen rites, and were frequently censured by the Christians on this account. (Beugnot, l. c. i. p. 92; cf. however the case of the games at Spello mentioned above, penal and other laws in which certain ceremonies are forbidden.)

Second period. This equilibrium was no doubt disturbed by the conflict with Licinius, detailed above. "After that," says Eusebius, "the emperor put his hand seriously to the work. And first he sent out to the nations of the several provinces governors who were for the most part sanctified by their saving faith, and forbade as many as appeared to be pagan to sacrifice; and the same law applied to those who were even of higher rank," &c. (Eus. l. c. ii. 44). He then goes on to speak of two laws, one forbidding sacrifice and pagan rites in general and the setting up of images, and the other ordering the enlargement and building of churches (Ibid. 46). The first of these is unfortunately not preserved to us, but that Constantine did issue such a law is certain from a reference to the "law of our divine father" made by his sons in 341. (C. Th. xvi. 10, 2. See Chastel, l. c. pp. 61, foll., and on the other hand Beugnot, l. c. p. 100, who with La Bastie limits the prohibition to secret cults.) We must remain in doubt as to the exact date and provisions of this law, and must suppose that it was by no means regularly carried out, especially in the West. (See the Roman inscriptions quoted by Beugnot, p. 100.) The destruction of heathen idols by private persons among the Christians, and other acts of zeal of the same kind, was the natural result of such a law. Constantine was obliged to restrain them in his edict addressed to the provinciis of the East (V. C. ii. Esp. 56 and 60), but the language of that document was not likely to make the position of pagans very secure. In the meantime he increased the privileges of the clergy in various ways (Soz. i. 8, 9), and did all in his power to promote conversion by indirect means, rewarding towns that had turned their temples into churches (Soz. ii. 5), and recommending such means to the bishops assembled at Nicaea as well as contributing to them from his own revenues (V. C. iii. 21). In 326 he decreed that all unfinished public buildings except pagan temples should be completed as soon as possible (C. Th. xv. 1, 3).

Third period. The contrast between East and West, which we have already pointed out, was sharpened by the foundation and dedication of Constantinople. There can be no doubt that many temples were spoiled to decorate it, and that the statues, &c. were regarded in general not as objects of worship, but simply as ornaments—and these were transported not only from Greece and Asia, but even from Rome, Sicily and Antioch (Chastel, p. 72, citing Heyne's essay priscae artis opera quae Constantinopoli existisse memorantur. See also the description in Eus. V. C. iii. 54). Libanius complains of these proceedings, asserting at the same time that liberty of worship was still allowed, though the temples were denuded of their revenues for the purpose of beautifying the new city (Pro templis, pp. 161, 162, and 183). Some temples, however, were actually closed and destroyed. The first naturally was the sanctuary of Aphrodite, erected over the Holy Sepulchre, which was of course removed from the foundations. That at Aphaca in Coele-Syria was destroyed, if we may so understand Eusebius's vague expressions (V. C. iii. 55), though there was still a place of worship there in the time of Zosimus (i. 58). The emperor also suppressed the immoral practices at Heliopolis in Phoenicia, and founded a church on the site (V. C. iii. 58), and destroyed a temple of Aesculapius at Aegae in Cilicia, famous for its oracle and miraculous cures (ib. 56), and did away with the cultus of the Nile, which was carried on by a set of androgynous priests (ib. iv. 25, cf. for all these Soc. i. 18, Soz. ii. 4, 5). The temple of Aesculapius was probably afterwards restored: see Chastel, p. 74; Beugnot, p. 92). Whatever may be said as to the restoration of heathenism or heathen practices in any of these cases we have a general confirmation of these statements in a passage of Eunapius who tells us that Aedesius of Cappadocia on succeeding his master Iamblichus [four years before the death of Constantine] did not exhibit an equal enthusiasm perhaps concealing his sentiments on account of the times. "Then Constantine was reigning, who overturned the most celebrated temples to raise churches upon their ruins" (Vit. Aedes. p. 37). The date of the doubtful law against sacrifice may possibly belong to the same time, i. e. a few years before his death. After his death "inter divos meruit referri," says Eutropius (Brev. x. 8), a statement fully confirmed by coins and inscriptions. (See the quotations in Beugnot, i. 109, 110, and the coin described below.)

IV. Character and Writings.—Constantine without doubt deserves the name of Great, whether we consider the political or the religious change that he effected, but he belongs to the second rather than the first order of great men. Notwithstanding his wide successes, and his tenacious grasp over the empire in which he worked such revolutions, notwithstanding his high sense of his own vocation and the grandeur of some of his conceptions, his personal character does not inspire us with admiration and scarcely with interest. With many of the impulses of greatness it remained to the last unformed and uncertain, and never lost a tinge of barbarism. He was wanting in the best heathen and Christian virtues; he had little of dignity and cultivation, little of depth and tenderness. The combination which he did exhibit was rather one of ambition to be great with religious zeal untempered by any real sense of personal shortcoming or sinfulness. This was no doubt in great measure the result of obvious circumstances, and a similar temper is observable in others of his house. It is sometimes remarked that religious pressure of a peculiar kind is characteristic of certain families, however differently it may shew itself in the different members. This was the case with the Flavian family, though the courses taken by Constantius the elder, by Constantine and his sons, and by Julian and Gallus were very different. It caused them to be very active in religious questions, and to be perpetually interfering with religious policy, while (judging from those we know best) the true sentiment of religion never penetrated thoroughly into their characters. Constantine and Julian both believed in their own vocation, and both looked for supernatural confirmations of it, and yet were wanting in a real sense of mystery. That Constantine was by nature "unreligious," and had merely fatalism as the foundation of his faith, is an assertion of Burckhardt's (p. 389), that can only be supported by discrediting and distorting the most trustworthy documents, e. g. those in the case of the Donatists. Rather we should say that he had strong and persistent, though imperfect feelings about religion, which were coloured very variously by the circumstances and persons about him. He looked upon himself as a minister of Divine Providence to glorious ends not as exalted by Fate (see esp. ad Prop. Pal. ap. Eus. V. C. ii. 28, 29, and Orat. ad S. C. ad finem and elsewhere). If we compared him with any great man of modern times it would rather be with Peter of Russia than with Napoleon.

The thoughts of Constantine had been early set on empire. "From his boyhood," writes Victor (Cæs. 40), "his strong and masterly mind was disturbed by the eager desire of reigning." Like many other aspirants he was confirmed in his hopes by oracles and divinations (Eumen. in nat. Urb. Trev. 21). Apollo or the Sun-God was the special object of his worship, the foreteller of his successes and the "unconquerable companion" of his triumphs. Through the worship of this deity as the supreme God, may perhaps be traced Constantine's approach to monotheism. His own personal appearance was compared to that of Apollo, and like Diocletian and Maximian, he was inclined to assume the character of his patron god, and was addressed by Eumenius as "praesentissimus deus" (ib. 22). This was of course a usual piece of flattery, and must not be made too much of. But even after his conversion he was constantly addressed as a sort of Sun or Light of the world (see King, Early Christian Numismatics, p. 19). His nature, though at times passionate and violent, was ordinarily cold, sensible, and unimaginative. He had been early trained to wait and to bear hardship, and he rose gradually without any acts of flagrant crime or great rashness. He was free from the grosser sensual vices, with which so many previous emperors had been stained; and though vain, and in later life extravagant in his surroundings, he had sufficient sympathy with human nature not to act as a mere despot from caprice and formality. His violent acts were the result of gusts of passion, inflamed in all probability in all cases by the intrigues of interested relatives and courtiers, and did not proceed from continued malice. It is in them that we see the barbarian soldier carrying out the law of war and the instinct of personal vengeance against those most near to him. "Proximorum fauces aperuit," is a slur on his memory that we can neither explain nor palliate. His self-confidence and self-satisfaction was no doubt at times disturbed by remorse, but continued good health, success, and a great capacity for the fatigues of business, kept him sanguine and at ease. In his latter years he required more and more the stimulant of an "intoxicating flattery" (as Eunapius well expresses it vit. Aedes, p. 41), and avoided contact with anything that could wound his sensibilities. We have often cause to wonder at the energy with which he threw himself into the most varied occupations within a short period. He had the instinct of work and of princely position far beyond a calculation of political expediency.

His conversion to Christianity, though obviously real as far as it went, was an adherence to a philosophy rather than a creed, obedience to a law rather than an energy of faith. Christianity in this form suited his character. It aimed like his policy at embracing the world; it appealed to his moral sense by its purity and simplicity; it satisfied his consciousness of inward greatness, and his craving for supernatural assistance by the doctrines of grace and of divine providence exercised by the Saviour, and specially by the lessons it drew from the Old Testament which have proved so constantly attractive to great soldiers. Christianity was to him an historical religion, the proofs of which could be arranged in a clear and systematic form, a side of it which he evidently much appreciated (see his oratio ad Sanctorum coetum). His natural contempt for idolatry and for the delusions of the masses, found a ready response among the Christians; and he found also an enthusiastic or superstitious side in many Christians which exactly adapted itself to his nature. A reverence for relics, a belief in his constant intercourse with the Deity in dreams and visions, a trust in the magical efficacy of a deferred baptism, were more congenial to his temper than the hot enthusiasm for Asian mysteries which swayed the sensuous temperament of Julian. He could not believe in the gods of Rome whom he had so often conquered, and the Greeks had long ceased to believe in their own Apollo. It is possible that the influence of Sopater, in those years of tragic passion and domestic bloodshed between Nicaea and the consecration of Constantinople, gave him for a time a turn towards heathen mysticism. But generally his intellect was too straightforward and sensible to indulge in the flimsy speculations and nervous excitements which made up the more pretentious heathenism of the time. He was, then, by no means a good Christian, but still a Christian, and one whom we must recognise decidedly as an instrument of God, and so far justified in believing as he did most strongly in his personal vocation as a Christian emperor.

As to the lighter side of his character we have some but not very detailed information. His nature was in general undoubtedly kindly, and he was inclined to friendship, and to trust those about him. Unfortunately he wanted subtlety in discerning character. He was lavish in his favour to his friends, "omitting no occasion (says Eutropius, Brev. x. 4), to render them wealthier and more honourable." But in many cases he was deceived, especially by the "ineffable dissimulation of those who crept into the church, and hypocritically assumed the name of Christians" (V. C. iv. 54, cp. Vict. Cues. 41, as to the admission of many unworthy persons to office). His wrath on the discovery of such deceit was unmeasured, and his vengeance summary. His manner towards such of his friends was "sarcastic rather than tender" (irrisor potius quam blandus, unde proverbio vulgari Trachala, Vict. Epit. 41). We may imagine him with his large person and ruddy upturned face and head always encircled with a diadem, thrown back upon its thick neck as he conversed with a supple courtier whose protestation he more than half suspected, while he greedily drank in his adulation. His conversation like his character must have been strange and inconsistent; at times a flow of wordy rhetoric or a burst of passion; at times a touch of genuine and simple humour. Some of his sayings have been preserved. When a courtier announced to him on one occasion that in a popular tumult his statues had been stoned, he smiled and passed his hand across his face remarking "it is surprising, but I feel no wound" (S. Chrys. ad pop. Antiochen., &c.). The anecdote about Acesius has been told already. A graver rebuke to a covetous official, probably Ablavius (see De Broglie, ii. p. 83), is also characteristic. "How far," cried he, "shall we strain our cupidity?" Then, with a lance which he happened to have in his hand, he drew upon the ground a space equal in length to that of a man's body, "If thou shouldst gain all the wealth of this life and the whole world, thou wilt carry away no more than this little span of earth, if thou hast even that" (Eus. V. C. iv. 30).

We have said that Constantine was deficient in cultivation, but he was superior to all the emperors of the time except perhaps Diocletian. He was a patron of letters and of literary professors, as well as of artists and men of science to whom he granted immunities (C. Th. xiii. 31, 2; cf. id. 4, 1; Vict. Epit. 41). Lactantius was the tutor of his eldest son, and Arborius of Toulouse, the uncle of Ausonius, the friend and probably the teacher of the others (Auson. de Prof. Burdig. 16). He directed in part the composition of the Augustan history, some books of which as well as the institutes of Lactantius were dedicated to him. The poet Optatian won his favour and a recall from banishment by his extraordinary and laboured compositions, and a literary correspondence passed between them which is still extant in part (Tillemont, Const. lxi.; Teuffel, Römische Lit. § 379). Constantine addresses him as 'frater carissime,' and discusses the difficulties of writing verses.

The bent of his own genius, however, was towards declamation, and we possess one long oration ad Sanctorum coetum of which Eusebius has preserved a Greek translation. We have also a number of epistles collected from Eusebius, Athanasius, Socrates, &c., and the acts of councils. These are all to be found in Migne's useful volume, the arrangement of which might be improved. On the whole we may accept the substance of these letters as expressing the mind of Constantine, though something of the rhetorical flourish may be his secretary's. There are two, however, of the most interesting among them that must be doubtful; that from Helena to her son and his reply. These are found in the spurious acts of S. Silvester, and are of the following import. Helena writes to approve his desertion of idolatry, but gives the Jewish account of the death of Christ. Constantine replies by asserting that a prince is empowered by God, and his will must be followed; and orders the "bishops of the Jews" to come before him and dispute out of the holy scriptures to the profit of his own faith as well as theirs. The contents of these letters are curious, but perhaps not sufficient to prove them either spurious or genuine. The phrase ἰουδαίων ἐπίσκοποι is rather in their favour, on the other hand the place where they are found is against them, as well as the phrase about the "holy scriptures." Eusebius we may remember ascribes Helena's conversion to her son.

The oratio ad Sanctorum coetum has been already mentioned more than once. It is a somewhat rambling treatise on Christian evidence, in the form of a declamation, taking up the recognised topics—the vanity of idolatry and of fatalism, the proofs of design in nature, proofs of Christianity from the character and miracles of our Saviour, and from Christian and heathen prophecy. In the last category he relies much on the Sibylline verses and on Virgil's Pollio. It ends with a comparison between Christian and heathen morals, between his own successes and the miserable deaths of the persecutors, among whom he does not however mention Licinius. This fact and the similarity of certain parts of his work to passages of Lactantius, as well as the quotations from Plato, whom he was not likely to have read, have induced some persons to suppose that the oration was not his own, but chiefly that of his panegyrist. (See the arguments of Rossignol's Virgile et Constantin le Grand in Broglie, ii. 79.) But Eusebius's account of it seems to leave no room for such a supposition, as he speaks of the emperor's orations as translated not by himself, but by those whose duty it was, i. e., regular officers of the court (V. C. iv. 32). It may be worth while to give the references to the parallels between the oration and Lactantius, as pointed out in Heinrich's edition: S. C. 3, 3. Lact. Inst. iv. 3, 18, sqq.; 4, 2=ii. 2, 4; 10, 3=i. 11, 17, sqq.; 11, 8=iv. 8, 13; 18, 2 foll.=iv. 15, 26 and vii. 15 foll. Cp. the reasoning on virtue and vice in his edict, V. C. ii. 48, with Lact. v. 7, 3, sqq. To say that Constantine in respect of theology was a learner from others, including Lactantius and Eusebius, is an obvious truism; to say that he was also an imitator and plagiarist is no more than is true of most writers of his age; but we have no real reason to doubt that Constantine was as much the author of this oration as most of the later defenders of Christianity were of their apologies. Whatever Eusebius's demerits were (and they are great in point of taste, especially in his Life of Constantine) no case of forgery can be made out against him.

We have obviously small means of judging Constantine's powers even as an orator, but tiresome as this piece is it is the work of a man who has taken pains with his subject, and who is capable of understanding argument, wherever he acquired his knowledge.

Besides these writings of which we have some knowledge, Constantine wrote his own memoirs, which are several times cited by Joannes Lydus.

V. Vision of the ✕.—The question of the reality of this vision is perhaps the most unsatisfactory of the many problems which meet us in the life of Constantine. The duty of the writer of an article like the present is to give the statements of the earliest authorities, and to point out the different ways in which they may be interpreted, and the reasons which make for this or that conclusion.

The almost contemporary account of Lactantius has been already referred to. Life, period i.; from De M. p. 44; "Commodus est in quiete Constantinus ut caeleste signum Dei notaret in scutis atque ita proelium committeret. Fecit ut iussus est et transversa X littera, summo capite circumflexo, Christum in scutis notat." This took place on the night before the battle of the Milvian bridge.

Eusebius's narrative (V. C. i. 27–32) contrasts very strikingly with this. He represents Constantine as looking about for some god to whom he should appeal for assistance in his campaign against Maxentius, and as thinking of the God of his father Constantius. He besought him in prayer to reveal himself, and received a sign, which the historian would perhaps have scarcely believed on the report of anyone else, but could not distrust on the word and oath of the emperor given to himself many years later. About the middle of the afternoon (for so the words seem to be best interpreted), he saw with his own eyes the trophy of the cross figured in light standing above the sun, and with the letters ϞΥΤΦ ΠΙΚΑ attached to it. He and the army that was with him were seized with amazement, and he himself was in doubt as to the meaning of the appearance. As he was long considering it night came on, and in sleep Christ appeared to him with the sign that appeared in heaven, and ordered him to make a standard of the same pattern. The next day he gave directions to artificers how to prepare the Labarum, which was adorned with gold and precious stones. Eusebius describes it as he afterwards himself saw it. It consisted of a tall spear with a bar crossing it, on the highest point of which was a \oplus encircled with a crown, while a square banner gorgeously embroidered hung from the cross bar, on the upper part of which were the busts of the emperor and his sons. He immediately made inquiries of the priests as to the figure he had seen in his vision, and determined with good hope to proceed under his protection.

Eusebius nowhere states exactly where or when this circumstance took place; on the whole his vague expressions make one suppose he means to place it near the beginning of the campaign. We have seen that the senate acknowledged an instinctus divinitatis, and that the contemporary panegyrist refers to divina praecepta in the campaign with Maxentius.

Another sort of divine encouragement is recorded later by the heathen panegyrist Nazarius in 321, ch. 14. "All Gaul," he says, "speaks of the heavenly armies who proclaimed that they were sent to succour the emperor against Maxentius." "Flagrabant verendum nescio quid umbone corusci et caelestium armorum lux terribilis ardebat . . . Haec ipsorum sermocinatio, hoc inter audientes ferebant 'Constantinum petimus, Constantino imus auxilio.'" A distinct incident is added by the late and antagonistic Zosimus, but he tells us nothing of what happened to Constantine, only of a prodigious number of owls which flocked to the walls of Rome when Maxentius crossed the Tiber (ii. 16).

On the Christian side the only independent account of later date seems to be that of Sozomen, i. 3, who afterwards gives the account of Eusebius. "Having determined to make an expedition against Maxentius, he was naturally doubtful of the event of the conflict and of the assistance he should have. While he was in this anxiety he saw in a dream the sign of the cross flashing in the sky, and as he was amazed at the sight, angels of God stood by him and said, 'O Constantine, in this conquer!' It is said too that Christ appeared to him and shewed him the symbol of the cross, and ordered him to make one like it, and to use it in his wars as a mainstay and pledge of victory. Eusebius Pamphili however," &c. Rufinus also gives both accounts. Later writers repeat one or other of these narratives in Eusebius and Sozomen, adding details of time and place, for which there is no warrant.

That something took place during the campaign with Maxentius which fixed Constantine's mind upon Christ as his protector and upon the cross as his standard, no unprejudiced person can deny. It is equally certain that he believed he had received this intimation by divine favour and as a divine call. Those who give him credit for inventing the whole story out of political considerations seem totally to misapprehend his character. But granting this, two questions obviously remain to be discussed, (1) which account is to be preferred, that of Eusebius or Sozomen? (2) can we speak of the circumstance as a miracle?

1. Eusebius's account, as in itself the most striking and as resting on the authority of the emperor, has been most popularly received. It is open to obvious difficulties, arising from the silence of contemporaries and the lateness of the testimony. Dr. J. H. Newman in his Essay on Ecclesiastical Miracles has said perhaps all that can be said for Eusebius. He thinks it probable that the panegyrist of 313 refers to this vision as the adverse omen which he will pass over and not raise unpleasant recollections by repeating (transacto nutu adversi ominis et offenso revocati cap. 2)—for the cross would be to Romans generally a sign of dismay, and Constantine (says Eusebius) was at first much distressed in mind with regard to it. The panegyrist also praises Constantine for proceeding "contra haruspicum monita," and asserts "habes profecto aliquod cum illa mente divina, Constantine, secretum, quae, delegata nostri diis minoribus cura, uni se tibi dignetur ostendere?" Optatian also, writing about 326, though he does not mention the vision, speaks of the cross as 'caeleste signum.' Those modern writers too, who think of a solar halo or parhelion as an explanation, must of course prefer the account of Eusebius. J. A. Fabricius was perhaps the first to offer this explanation (Exercitatio critica de cruce Const. Mag. in the 6th vol. of his Bibliotheca graeca) which is followed by Manso, Milman, Stanley, Heinichen and others.⁴ The latter in his 24th Meletema gives a useful résumé of the modern literature of the subject. It is curious how few historians adopt the alternative, which Schaff accepts, that of a providential dream (§ 134). It is difficult in fact to resist the impression that there was some objective sign visible in daylight such as Eusebius describes. The omission of it by Lactantius is not a sufficient argument to the contrary.

2. Can this sign be considered a miracle? The arguments for this conclusion are well put by Newman. He shews that little or nothing is gained by explaining the circumstances as a natural phenomenon or a subjective vision, if once we allow it to be providential; and that a priori this seems a fitting juncture for a miracle to have been worked. "It was first a fitting rite of inauguration when Christianity was about to take its place among the powers to whom God has given rule over the earth; next it was an encouragement and direction to Constantine himself and to the Christians who marched with him; but it neither seems to have been intended nor to have operated as a display of divine power to the confusion of infidelity or error" (§ 155). Schaff on the other hand thinks that "the combination of the holy symbol of redemption with the bloody standard, and of the mild king of peace with the God of battles is shocking to a healthy religious feeling, and requires almost too great an extension of the theory of the accommodation of divine revelation to the spirit of the time and the passions and interests of individuals" (§ 134, pp. 458, 459). But Newman seems to be right in arguing that nothing is gained—in regard to difficulties like this—by transferring the event from the category of miracle to that of special providence. What is gained or is thought to be gained is agreement with an historical theory, generally adopted by Protestants, that miracles are restricted to certain epochs such as the first century after the incarnation and cannot be proved to have occurred at other times. This is a subject on which further argument is impossible here (see MIRACLES).

Some minor points of difficulty may be mentioned. 1. Was the inscription in Greek or Latin, and what were the words? Eusebius gives the impression that it was in Greek, and this is expressly asserted by the emperor Leo. In this case the words would be τοῦτον νικα. Philostorgius, Nicephorus and Zonaras say that it was in Latin; the words would then have been hoc (or hac) vince or vinces. The popular version in hoc signo vinces seems to be an expansion of the earliest formula. Hoc signo victoris is found on coins of Vetricano, Magnentius, and Constantius junior. That the earliest form was in Latin seems pretty clear from the fact that Constantine's own language was Latin, not Greek. He wrote and naturally spoke in Latin, though he could speak in Greek if necessary in later years. 2. What was the form of the symbol? Lactantius's words are somewhat obscure, so are Eusebius's: and we are inclined to doubt whether the monogram was ✠ or ✡ . Both monuments and coins, however, seem to show that the first form was the earliest (see De Rossi in Spicilegium Solense, t. iv. pp. 517-539 and the section on coins). It is curious that a very similar monogram is found on Athenian tetradrachms and on coins of the Ptolemies (✠), in the latter case probably = ΧΡΥΣΙΠΠΟΣ . It was also introduced, probably by a Christian moneyer, into the legend on a coin representing the triumph of Bacchus issued at Maeonia in Lydia in the reign of Decius Trajanus A.D. 259-261, where the formula

B. A ✠ A. TO B.

= δὲς ἔρχοντος ἀγανοθέτου τὸ δεύτερον (see a paper by F. W. Madden communicated to the London Numismatic Society, 1866). The other form ✡ is however found on coins of Herod the Great, forty years before Christ (Garrucci, in King, p. 13).

VI. Coins.—We are now in a much better position for estimating the evidence afforded by coins as to the history of the lower empire than at any previous time. The principle of classification by mints rather than types or legends—devised by the late Count J. F. W. de Salis and introduced by him into the British Museum in a most public-spirited and devoted manner—has led the way to a chronological arrangement of all the coins, fixing their dates in most cases within short periods of years. The following paragraphs are chiefly based on his conversation and letters, and on personal inspection of the coins, especially those in the British Museum and at Berlin. At the latter place the writer also received some kind assistance from Professor Friedländer.

The best printed account of the coins is in Henry Cohen's Histoire des Monnaies frappées sous l'Empire Romain, Paris and London, 1863. See also Eckhel's well-known book, and some papers by Garrucci in the Revue Numismatique ii. and iii., and Cavedoni in the 5th vol. of the Opuscoli di Modena, and a paper by Mr. de Salis, Roman Coins struck in Britain, Numismatic Society, London, 1867. Mr. C. W. King's Early Christian Numismatics, Lond. 1873, contains a translation of one of Garrucci's papers and some important observations of his own.

The coins of Constantine may best be considered for our purposes under three periods, the first up to about 320, in which heathen types predominate and Christian signs where they do occur are rare, and probably rather owing to the artist than to government authorities. After 320 the indifferent types (camp gates, dates in a wreath, &c.) prevail; and for the time just previous to the second war with Licinius the monogram of Christ appears in almost all the mints of the western empire, evidently for political reasons. The third period is after the dedication of Constantinople in 330, in the last few years of which, after the deaths of Helena and Theodora, and especially in the last few years of the emperor's life, Christian signs again become frequent.

First period. The first thing that is noticeable is a deficiency in the coins of London, at the time of Constantine's proclamation, of any bearing his own name, although he then coined himself as Caesar at Lyons and Treves; a fact which seems explicable by his indecision whether or not to take the title of Augustus. In the middle of this period Constantine acknowledged Maxentius by striking coins with his name at Tarraco (not at Treves or Lyons) as Maxentius did for him at Ostia and Rome. The mint of Tarraco (which has sometimes been confounded with that at Treves: in the exergue T = Tarraco, TR = Treves, TS = Thessalonica) is remarkable as affording the most certain instances of early coins of Constantine with a Christian symbol. The monogram ✠ occurs double on the upper part of the emperor's helmet, which is generally filled with indifferent signs, and the date of this may be fixed at the end of the campaign (cf. Ens. V. C., i. 31, iv. 21, and Sozomen i. 8 towards the end, who mentions such coins as existing in his time). The significance of the signs ✠ and ✡ on other coins of Constantine and Licinius of the same place and date with the legend SOLI INVICTO COMITI is more doubtful, as is that of the signs ✠ ✡ and ✕ on the helmeted coins struck at Siscia. The ✠ on coins of Constantine with the same legend on the reverse, struck at Rome soon after the defeat of Maxentius, are much more remarkable (see figs. in Garrucci in Revue Numismatique, iii. 8). The rarity however of these, and of the helmeted coins of Tarraco, would lead to the belief that the idea was rather one of the particular moneyer than ordered by authority.

Second period. The universality, on the other hand, of the monogram in connexion with the labarum on coins of the Western empire previously to the war with Licinius, leads us to conclude that it was intended to give great weight to Christian feeling. Such were struck at Tarraco, Aquileia and Siscia with the names of Constantine and his sons and even of Licinius and Licinianus, while on those of London, Treves and Thessalonica the point of the spear which supports the banner was made to terminate in a cross. These may be placed between 321-323. It is remarkable too that no coins with the sun and the legend SOLI, etc., on the reverse occur after 320 or 321. The statement of Burekhardt is much exaggerated; the proportion of SOLI's being rather one in five than four in five as he gives it. On the defeat of Licinius coins were struck with the legend BEATA TRANQUILLITAS; and Helena and Fausta (first as NOBILISSIMA FEMINA, then as AVGVSTA) took his place to a limited extent in the Gallic mints. (King assigns the coins with Nobilissima femina to Helena, wife of Julian, and an unknown Fausta, p. 38.) Yet the name of the younger Licinius is still found after his father's death e.g. at Treves. Very soon after this, perhaps about the time of the council of Nicea, Constantine moved a mint to Byzantium, the same probably which had previously been moved from Sardica to Sirmium (circ. 315), and struck coins with the exergual mark CONS etc., standing for Constantinople. About the same time the name of Constantina for Arles came into use, the marks for which are sometimes liable to confusion with those of Constantinople, but may be distinguished by the Lat differential letter standing before CON. or CONST. or the figures I. II. or III. in the field of the reverse. To the same period we may refer two remarkable things, the substitution of the oriental pearled diadem satirised by Julian in his Cæsares for the oak-leaf chaplet of the earlier emperors, and the introduction of the type called the praying head. The first is never found except upon the emperor, and is always employed instead of the old diadem upon the latter type. This attitude in which the head is represented as slightly raised, with no legend surrounding it, represents perhaps really a position of prayer (to which Eusebius seems to refer it V. C. iv. 15, though we have no trace of the hands he mentions), certainly not a superstitious devotion to the sun or moon. Some numismatists (like De Salis) see in it an imitation of the well-known idealised head of Alexander the Great, with the horns of Ammon, which appears for instance on coins of Lysimachus, on those of Macedonia under the empire, and on contorniate medals of this very time. The similar position of the features is very noticeable, and in that imitative age Constantine seems to have had Alexander especially in his mind as a model (cf. Julian, Caes. where he is made to compare himself also with Caesar and other emperors, and his panegyric on Constantine, Eutrop. Vit. Const.). It may be noticed that Crispus is also represented in this attitude. Scarcely any light is thrown on the deaths of Crispus and Fausta by the coinage of the period: the name of Crispus appears till about 326, that of Fausta probably rather later, that is, till the date usually assigned for their execution respectively.

Third period.—At the reorganisation of the empire consequent on the dedication of Constantinople in 330, the mint of London appears to have been suppressed, as the coins struck after this date are not found there. Such are the two with legends CONSTANTINOPOLIS and VRBS ROMA. The latter of these has on the other side the she-wolf and twins, above which between the two stars the ✠ is sometimes found, perhaps rather to mark a particular year than as a sign of any change in religious feeling, as the same place is filled by various indifferent sigs. What is known as the 'two soldiers' type with the standard and GLORIA EXERCITUS, and sometimes (as at Siscia*) with a ✠, also belongs to this period: as do coins with the legends HELENÆ and THEODORÆ in the dative case, struck after their death, and commemorating in all likelihood the reconciliation of the two branches of the family of Constantius Chlorus. No support is given by coins to the theory of a Helena wife of Crispus, nor does Helena wife of Julian appear. Coins of Dalmatius and Hannibalian may be placed after 335; and the majority of those of this period with Christian signs seem to belong to these last years, perhaps even to the short interval between the emperor's baptism and death.

Constantine had a double commemoration, heathen and Christian, after his decease. He is represented veiled as DIVVS—being the last emperor so consecrated—and on the reverse in a quadriga with a star above him and a hand stretched out from heaven to receive him (So Eus. iv. 73). Heathen emperors had been represented as soaring aloft on the eagle, the bird of Jove. Then coins of Constantine are found with mint-marks of Alexandria, Antioch, and Carthage, and are not of rare occurrence (King, p. 53). Besides the coins with Christian emblems mentioned above, others have been at different times cited by numismatists, but from their rarity or doubtful genuineness they are not of much importance historically. Such are the two referred to by Eckhel as probably forgeries, IN UOC SIN (sic) VIC and the monogram, and the SPES PVBLICA with the labarum surmounted by the monogram, or ✠, and resting on a serpent. The banner has what seems, to some eyes at least, to be the word DEO upon it. Only four or five specimens of this last coin are known to exist, but it is now generally allowed to be genuine. It is quite small, and has on the obverse the head of Constantine the Younger with the title CONSTANTINVS AVG. It may have been minted on his appointment as Augustus just before his father's death. The idea was probably taken from the picture mentioned by Eusebius (V. C. iii. 3). See King, pp. xvi. 25, 58 f.

mianus after 353 and frequent references in the works of Julian (ed. Spanheim and the Epistles by Heyles) and Libanius (Orations ed. Reiske and Epistles ed. Wolf). Few modern authors have treated specially of these emperors, but the writers on Julian (q. v.) are naturally obliged to say a good deal with regard to Constantius. The history of the Arian troubles is fully given by St. Athanasius, especially in his Historia Arianorum ad Monachos, his Apologia contra Arianos and Apol. ad Constantium: references are made to the Benedictine edition, Paris, 1698. The ecclesiastical chronology of this period is often confused, but is generally to be restored from the Paschal letters of St. Athanasius lately discovered in Syriac (in Migne's edition and the Library of the Fathers) and the Fragments Historica of St. Hilary.

The sons of Constantine are, it need scarcely be said, personally of but little importance when compared to their father: and it will be unnecessary to treat of them in such detail. We shall first briefly characterise each of them, and then trace the history of their lives, chiefly noticing their connexion with the affairs of the church. Lastly, we shall give some account of the course of legislation and policy in their reigns, especially with reference to religion.

II. Characters of the three Emperors.—CONSTANTINUS II., the eldest son of Constantine by Fausta, born in A.D. 312, was made Caesar in 316 together with Crispus, and his quinquennalia were celebrated by the panegyric of Nazarius in 321. At the death of his father the empire was redivided, and Constantine as the eldest son seems to have made some pretensions to Constantinople, but these were overruled: see below History. Of his character we know little or nothing, especially if we reject the monody usually referred to his death (see above Constantine, Life, period iii.). He appears to have been a staunch Catholic, but his attack upon the dominions of his brother Constans does not put his character in a favourable light. His short reign makes him very unimportant.

CONSTANS I. the youngest of the three, was born about 320 and made Caesar in 333: he reigned as Augustus 337–350 when he was killed by the conspiracy of Magnentius. His character has been drawn by De Broglie (iii. pp. 58, 59) in terms which cannot well be improved. "As far as we can discriminate between the contradictory estimates of different historians, Constans was of a simple, somewhat coarse, nature, and one without high aims though without malice. As regards the inheritance of his father's qualities, while Constantius seemed to have taken for his share his political knowledge, his military skill and his eloquence (though reproducing a very faint image of them), Constans had only received great personal courage and a straightforwardness that did him honour. He was besides a lover of pleasure: he was suspected of the gravest moral irregularities—an accusation all the more accredited since, having been betrothed in his father's lifetime to the daughter of the minister Ablavius who was still a child, he had faithfully kept his promise notwithstanding her father's disgrace, and though now of mature years had remained a bachelor waiting till she was of age to be married. A great weakness of character which put him in the power of unwise counsellors, want of money and expensive tastes which made him at once avaricious and prodigal, rendered him on the whole a very mediocre sovereign. But he had firm, though certainly unenlightened, faith, and frequently gave proofs of it by distributing largesses to the churches and favours to the Christians;" cp. Entrop. Brev. x. 9, Viet. Caes. 41, Ej. ut. 41. Zosimus, ii. 42, gives him a worse character than the others, two of whom mention his vices. Libanius in 348 delivered a panegyric on Constans and Constantius, which is of course favourable: it is called βασιλικὸς λόγος, vol. iii. ed. Reiske, pp. 272–332. St. Chrysostom in the difficult and probably corrupt passage of his 15th homily on the Philippians p. 363, ed. Gaume, speaks of him as having children and as committing suicide, statements elsewhere unsupported. St. Athan. Hist. Arian. ad. mon. 69 refers to his betrothal to Olympias, mentioned above as daughter of Ablavius, whom Constantius married to Arsaces, king of Armenia, cf. Ammian. xx. ii. The most favourable evidence for Constans is the praise of St. Athanasius (Apolog. ad Constantium 4 sqq.; cf. the letter of Hosius in Hist. Arian. ad monachos 44). His conduct with respect to the Arian and Donatist controversies gained him the esteem of the Catholics, and he was a baptized Christian—while Constantius remained unbaptized till very near his death. (His baptism is referred to in Ap. ad C. 7.)

CONSTANTINUS II. The character of this emperor is much better known to us than that of his brothers, but what we know is hardly favourable to him. He was the second of the sons of Fausta, born at Sirmium Aug. 6, 317, and was emperor from 337 to 361. It may be worth while to give his character from the same writer whom we have quoted for his brother (De Broglie, iii. pp. 7, 8). "Of the sons of Constantine he was the one who seemed best to reproduce the qualities of his father. Although very small in stature, and rendered almost deformed by his short and crooked legs, he had the same address as his father in military exercises, the same patience under fatigue, the same sobriety in diet, the same exemplary severity in all that had regard to continence. He put forward also, with the same love for uncontrolled preeminence, the same literary and theological pretensions: he loved to shew off his eloquence and to harangue his courtiers. But the solid basis of talent and genius, which set off Constantine's brilliant external gifts and palliated faults only too real, was totally wanting in Constantius—no greatness in his ideas, no firmness in his resolutions, no generosity in his feelings shewed itself to justify his thirst for absolute power. Impatient of all rival authority, jealous of merit even when it pretended to be acting under his orders, he was at bottom weak and irresolute and secretly was entirely ruled by influences acting on him from below. A sort of consciousness of his own incapacity penetrated even through his ridiculous conceit, and contemporary writers amused themselves from time to time with his affected gravity, which did not permit him (so they said) to make any motion in public, neither to cough nor to spit nor to stir a finger, for fear lest a natural movement should in some way injure his theatrical dignity." Vietor Caes. 42 to whom he is "noster princeps" speaks well of Constantius: the writer of the Epitoma gives him credit for some virtues but speaks of the eunuchs &c. who surrounded him, and of the adverse influence of his wife Eusebia. Ammianus xxi. 16 gives an elaborate and balanced character of Constantius which seems to be fair. He accuses him of cruelty, suspiciousness and of misgovernment; and, what is remarkable in a heathen, blames him as "Christianam religionem absolutam et simplicem anili superstitione confundens." Julian (before his usurpation) and Libanius lauded Constantius during his lifetime, and were bitter and sarcastic against him after his death. Christian writers are naturally not partial to an emperor who leaned so constantly towards Arianism, and was such a bitter persecutor of the Nicene faith, and do not scruple to call him by the names of Ahab, Pilate and Judas. St. Athanasius nevertheless addressed him in very complimentary terms in the apology which he composed as late as 356. Constantius was not baptized till his last year, yet he interfered in church matters with the most arrogant pretensions.

III. History.—Period i. 337–350, to the death of Constans—Period ii. 350–361, Constantius sole Augustus.

Period i., 337–350.—Constantine II., Constans, Constantius II., Augusti. On the death of Constantine, Constantius hurried to Constantinople to take part in the funeral of his father. The armies, says Eusebius, declared unanimously that they would have none but his sons to succeed him (V. C. iv. 68)—to the exclusion, therefore, of his nephews Dalmatius and Hannibalian. This was followed shortly after by a general massacre of the family of Constantius Chlorus and Theodora. The victims were two of Constantine's half-brothers, Julius Constantius and another; and seven of his nephews, including the two excluded from power;—as well as the patrician Optatus, and his former minister Ablavius (Zos. ii. 40; Julian ad Athen. p. 270 ed. Spanheim; Athanas. H. Arin. ad mon. 69). There remained only two of his nephews, sons of Julius Constantius, Gallus who was supposed to be dying and the infant Julian who were saved by the care of the bishop, Mark of Arethusa. Many writers, and those of such distinct views as St. Athanasius, Ammianus and Zosimus as well as Julian, openly charge Constantius with being the author of this great crime, others imply only that he allowed it. (Ammianus says in his character xxi. 16, 8, "inter imperandi excordia cunctos sanguine et genere se contingentes stirpitus [or turpiter] interemit", unfortunately his detailed account is lost. Eutropius, x. 9, says of the death of Dalmatius "oppressus est factione militari et Constantio, patruelis suo, sinente potius quam iubente," and so Socr. ii. 25.) Beugnot, however, is inclined to see in it a pagan reaction which had long been brewing, and which would not have spared his children if they had not known how to strengthen their position by sacrificing the detested Ablavius (vol. i. p. 135). He allows that the cause of paganism really gained nothing: and we must conclude that this theory is not sufficiently substantiated. Constantine and Constans are in no way implicated in this tragedy. A new division of empire of course followed; for which purpose the brothers met at Sirmium. There are some difficulties as to the details of the partition, which need not be discussed here; generally speaking Constantine had the west, Constans the centre, and Constantius the eastern portion of the empire.

Constantine thus came into contact with St. Athanasius in his exile at Treves, and at once took him under his protection. He wrote a letter to the Alexandrians, declaring his respect for "the interpreter of our adorable law," and asserting that his father had banished him for his own safety and had intended to restore him [facts of which there is no sufficient proof], and evincing his intention to put this resolve into practice. (St. Athan. Apol. p. 805. Sozomen iii. 2 who gives this letter, says also "it is said that Constantine declared this resolve in his last will." This letter is dated June 17th; if it is of the year 337, St. Athanasius did not avail himself of it till about a year later.) A sort of compromise seems to have been established: other exiled bishops were restored, while Eusebius of Nicomedia was entrusted by Constantius with the education of his cousins Gallus and Julian, and was soon afterwards translated by him to Constantinople to the exclusion of the orthodox Paulus (Soc. ii. 7). In the year 340 Constantine invaded the dominions of Constans and penetrated into Lombardy, where he was killed in a small engagement. Constantius in the mean time was engaged in the war with Persia, which lasted in an indecisive way the whole of his reign. It may be mentioned that in 343 and later the Christians in Persia suffered terribly from persecution, being suspected as favouring the Romans.

It is from the division of empire between Constans and Constantius that we must begin to date the separation of the churches. The Eastern church recovered indeed at length from Arian and semi-Arian influences, but the habit of division had been formed, and varieties of theological conception became accentuated; lastly, the Roman church grew rapidly in power and independence, having no rival of any pretensions in the West, while in the East the older apostolic sees were gradually subordinated to that of Constantinople, and the whole church was constantly distracted by imperial interference.

Constantius was especially ready to intervene. In 341, in deference to the Dedication council of Antioch, he forcibly intruded one Gregorius into the see of Alexandria: in the next year he sent his magister equitum, Hermogenes, to drive out Paulus from Constantinople (who had returned after the death of Eusebius). Hermogenes was torn to pieces in a popular tumult, and Constantius came in person to punish the rioters, but was content with depriving the city of about half the dole granted by his father, and expelling Paulus: but he did not confirm Macedonius, the rival claimant of the see (Soc. ii. 13). These events took place while St. Athanasius was received with honour at the court of Constans, for whose use it may be noticed he had prepared some books of Holy Scripture (Athan. Apolog. ad Const. 4; πυκνία seem not to be a synopsis, but simply = libri). Constans determined to convocate another oecumenical council, and obtained his brother's concurrence. The place fixed upon was Sardica, on the frontier of the Western empire, where about 170 bishops met in 343. (For the numbers, see Athan. Hist. Arin. ad mon. c. 15. Socrates, ii. 20, and Soz. iii. 12 give the date 347, which was generally accepted, but this is probably an error in chronology like others in their histories. The discovery of the Maffean fragment and the festal letter proves the earlier date. See Hefele, Councils, § 58, De Broglie, iii. p. 66, Bright, Life of St. Athanasius, p. xlvii. note.) Then occurred the first great open rupture between the East and West, for which we must refer elsewhere [COUNCIL OF SARDICA], the minority consisting of Western bishops siding with St. Athanasius, while the Eastern or Eusebian faction seceded to Philippopolis across the border. After the dissolution of the council Constans still attempted to give force to the decrees of Sardica, by requiring of his brother the restoration of Athanasius and Paulus, threatening force if it was refused (Soc. ii. 22; Soz. iii. 20). The shameful plots of the Arian bishop of Antioch, Stephen, against the messengers of Constans were happily discovered, and the faith of Constantius in the party was somewhat shaken (St. Athan. Hist. Arian. ad mon. 20; Theodoret, ii. 9, 10). The pressure of the war with Persia no doubt inclined him to avoid anything like a civil war, and he put a stop to some of the Arian persecutions. Ten months later—after the death of the intruded Gregory—he invited St. Athanasius to return to his see, which he did in 346, after a curious interview with the emperor at Antioch (see the letters in Soc. ii. 23 from Athanas. Apol. c. Arianos, 54 foll.). Other exiled bishops were likewise restored.

In the West, meanwhile, Constans was occupied with the Donatists, whose case had been one of the elements of division at Sardica. He sent a mission to Africa which was intended to be conciliatory, but his bounty was rudely refused by that Donatus who was now at the head of the sect—himself a secret Arian as well as a violent schismatic—with the famous phrase: “Quid est imperatori cum ecclesiâ?” (cf. above, CONSTANTINE, relations with the Donatists). The turbulence of the Circumcellions provoked the so-called “Macarian Persecution;” some of the schismatics were put to death, others committed suicide, others were exiled, and so for a time union seemed to be produced. (Bright, pp. 58–60; Hefele, § 70, Synod of Carthage. The history is in Optatus Milev. iii. 1, 2.) Early in the year 350 Constans was assassinated, or rather forced to commit suicide, by the partisans of the usurper Magnentius. His death was a great loss to the orthodox party, whose sufferings during the next ten years were most intense.

Period ii., 350–361. Constantius sole Augustus. The usurpation of Magnentius in Gaul seems to have been in great measure a movement of Paganism against Christianity, of the provincial army against the court. It was closely followed by another, that of Vetricio in Illyria. We need not follow the strange history of these civil wars, nor recount how Vetricio was overcome by the eloquence of Constantius in 350, and Magnentius beaten in the bloody battle of Mursa, Sept. 351, that cost the Roman empire 50,000 men. Between these two events Constantius named his cousin Gallus Caesar, and attended the first council of Sirmium. Some time before the battle he must have received the letter from St. Cyril of Jerusalem, describing a cross of light which appeared “on the 7th May, about the third hour,” “above the holy Golgotha and stretching as far as the holy mount of Olives,” and seen by the whole city. St. Cyril praises Constantius and reports this marvel as an encouragement to him in his campaign. The genuineness of the letter has however been doubted, especially from the word “consubstantial” appearing in the doxology at the end. At the time of the battle of Mursa Constantius came much under the influence of Valens, the temporising bishop of the place, who pretended that the victory was revealed to him by an angel, and from this time he appears more distinctly as a persecutor of the Nicene faith, which he endeavoured to crush in the West. His general character also underwent a change for the worse after the unexpected suicide of Magnentius, which put him in sole possession of the empire. It is difficult to say whether he appears to least advantage in the pages of Ammianus or of St. Athanasius. It would take too long to recount the disgraceful proceedings at the council of Arles in 353, where the legates of the new pope Liberius were taken in, or at Milan in 355, when Constantius declared that his own will should serve the Westerns for a canon as it had served the Syrian bishops, and proceeded to banish and imprison no less than 147 of the more prominently orthodox clergy and laity (Hist. Ar. ad mon. 33, &c.; see De Broglie, iii. p. 263). The most important of the sufferers were Eusebius of Vercelli, Lucifer of Cagliari, and Dionysius of Milan. Soon after followed the exile of Liberius, and in 355 that of Hosius. All this was intended to lead up to the final overthrow of Athanasius. Early in 356 Syrianus, the duke of Egypt, began the open persecution of the Catholics at Alexandria, and Constantius when appealed to confirmed his actions, and sent Heraclius to hand over all the churches to the Arians, which was done with great violence and cruelty (Hist. Ar. 54). George of Cappadocia was intruded into the church, and Athanasius was forced to hide in the desert. In the same year Hilary of Poitiers was banished to Phrygia.

In the mean time Constantius had been carrying on a persecution of even greater rigour against the adherents of Magnentius, which is described by Ammianus (xiv. 5) whose history begins at this period. His suspicions were also aroused against his cousin Gallus, whose violence and misgovernment in the East, especially in Antioch, was notorious. The means by which Constantius lured him into his power and then beheaded him are very characteristic (Amm. xiv. 11). At the end of the same year, 355, he determined to make his younger brother Julian Caesar in his place, putting him over the provinces of Gaul, and marrying him to his sister Helena.

In the church worse things were yet to come: the fall of Hosius, who accepted the creed of the 2nd council of Sirmium, then that of Liberius, the first after torture and severe imprisonment, the second after two years of melancholy exile, both in 357. We cannot go into the details of the numerous councils and synods at this time. The most famous and important was that of Rimini in 359, in conjunction with one in the East at Seleucia, when the political bishops succeeded in carrying an equivocal creed approved by the emperor, and omitting the homoousion. Constantius, tired of the long controversy, attempted to enforce unity by imposing the formula of Rimini everywhere, and a number of bishops of various parties were deposed (Soz. iv. 23, 24). In 360 Julian was proclaimed Augustus by his army, and made a proposal for the division of the empire which Constantius did not accept (Amm. xx. 8). A civil war was impending: Constantius was at first contemptuous, but ere long began to be haunted with fears of death and caused himself to be baptized by Euzoios, the Arian bishop of Antioch. He expired, after a painful illness, at Mopsucrene at the foot of Mount Taurus, Nov. 4, 361 (Soz. ii. 47; Amm. xxi. 15).

Constantius was at least three times married: first in the lifetime of his father at his tricennalia, 336 (Eus. V. C. iv. 49), probably to a daughter of Julius Constantius, and therefore a sister of Julian (Hist. Arian. ad mon. 69; cf. Tillemont, iv. p. 264). She must have died before Magnentius sent to offer him his daughter. In 352 or 353, after the successful issue of the civil war, he married Aurelia Eusebia, a very beautiful, accomplished, and gentle lady, but an Arian, who had a great influence over her husband. (For details respecting her see the panegyric of Julian, Orat. 3, and Amm. xxi. 6, 4; and cf. Tillemont, pp. 380, 381.) She died some time before the usurpation of Julian. In the last year of his life Constantius married one Faustina, of whom we know very little. He had no children apparently by his first wife, and none by Eusebia, but had a posthumous daughter Flavia Maxima Constantia, who married the emperor Gratian (Amm. xxi. 15. 6; xxvi. 7, 10). Besides his wives, on whom he was accustomed to lean, his chief adviser was the eunuch Eusebius, of whom Ammianus says so sarcastically, "apud quem, si vere dici debet, multum Constantianus potuit." He also trusted much to a detestable man, the notary Paulus, nicknamed Catena, on account of his skill in linking one accusation on to another. Another of the same class was Mercurius, called Comes Somniorum, who turned even the accounts of dreams into suggestions of high treason (Amm. xiv. 5; xv. 3). These men, with an army of spies (curiosi), organised a sort of reign of terror for three years after the overthrow of Magnentius, especially in Britain, acting particularly on the laws against sacrifice and magic (cf. Liban. pro Aristophane, i. p. 430).

IV. Legislation and Policy.—The sons of Constantine effected no such great revolutions as their father had done, but they continued in great measure the same course of legislation, of which it is worth while to give a few details. They may be arranged under the following heads: (1) Laws in favour of Christianity; (2) Relations with heathenism; (3) Laws relating to marriage, &c.

(1) Laws in favour of Christianity. These will be found chiefly in the second title of the xvth book of the Theodosian code, headed de episcopis ecclesiis et clericis. They shew the tendency to create a clerical caste by extending privileges to the wives and children of the clergy, and even ordaining that their sons should "in ecclesia perseverare" if they were not subjected to be made deacons. Clerics engaged in trade were not to be subjected to the usual taxes (particularly, no doubt, the chrysargyrum) nor were they to be liable to forced service. An important law was put out in 355 ordering that no bishop should be tried before a civil judge but before other bishops (xvi. 2, 12).

In 357 the emperor confirmed all the privileges granted to the church of Rome, at that time under the emperor's nominee, Felix, whilst Liberius was in exile. Another of the same year is addressed to Felix, more explicitly guaranteeing the immunity from taxation and forced service. The next law of 360 refers to the synod of Rimini, and the opinion expressed by various bishops from different parts of Italy, and from Spain and Africa. This law, while it preserved the immunity already granted to church lands, did not concede it to lands held or rented by clerks for their own use, and restricted the freedom from taxes on trade to those in quite a small way of business, commanding that others, especially those who had passed from business into orders should pay like other traders. The last law in the series (in 361) is remarkable as the heading gives Julian the title of Augustus, and makes him party to a general statement that he, who (in the obscure phraseology of the time) "voto Christianae legis meritum eximiae singularisque virtutis omnibus intinaverit" is to enjoy perpetual security, and to be considered as working more for the state than one who works with his hands.

(2) Relations to heathenism. The state of things that we have seen in the last years of Constantine continued during his son's reign. There was the same disposition on the part of the empire to put down paganism, and the same elements of reaction. In the West, especially in Rome, real heathenism still retained much of its vitality, and still swayed the minds of the aristocracy and the populace; in the East the supporters of the old religion were the philosophers and rhetoricians, men more attached to its literary and artistic associations, than prepared to defend polytheism as a creed. They were of course mixed up with another class, the theurgists, practisers of a higher kind of magic, which, as we shall see, was particularly attractive to Julian.

The following laws from the tenth title of the xvth book of the Theodosian code relate distinctly to heathen sacrifice. Sec. 2, in 341, issued by Constantius, says: "Cesset superstitio, sacrificiorum aboleatur insania," and refers to the law of Constantine noticed above. A year or two later (the date is uncertain and wrongly given in the code), Constantius and Constans order the temples in the Roman territory to be kept intact for the pleasure of the Roman people, though all "superstition" is to be eradicated; almost at the same time they issued a law to the praetorian prefect inflicting death and confiscation on persons sacrificing. In 353 Constantius forbids the "nocturna sacrificia" permitted by Magnentius: in 356 he and Julian make it capital to sacrifice or worship images. Doubt has been thrown on these laws by La Bastie and Beugnot, partly from the inaccuracies or deficiencies in the dates given in the code, partly from the historical evidence that they were not carried out. They suggest the theory that the most important of them were never issued, but were projects of laws found by the younger Theodosius and inserted in his code. The reply to the first point is merely to shew that there are many similar inaccuracies in the code, in laws of undoubted genuineness. The theory accounting for these laws is itself very improbable; but the best refutation of it is to give historical authority on the other side. Such is the anecdote of St. Athanasius' warning to the Alexandrians, which made them believe him a prophet (Soz. iv. 10), and the express declarations of Libanius. We may instance his historical review of the policy of preceding emperors in his oration pro templis addressed to Theodosius the Great, where he says that Constantius, under the influence of his ministers, enacted among other bad laws "that there should no longer be sacrifices," and a little further on he speaks of his destruction of many temples (ed. Reiske, ii. pp. 163 and 185). Again he says of Aristophanes, "He came to the ruins of the temples, bearing neither incense nor victim, nor fire, nor libation (for it was not allowed) but a heavy heart and a lamentable and tearful voice," &c. (i. p. 438, Reiske; see further in Chastel, pp. 79, 91, &c.) In the West, too, Materus, who wished for very severe measures, writes in the time of Constans: "Little is wanting to complete the thorough prostration of the devil by your laws, and the extinction of the baleful contagion of idolatry" (de errore prof. rell. c. 21). The same author is of course adduced on the other side to prove that in the West heathenism was still very powerful. Constantius was very tolerant on his visit to Rome in 356: though he removed the statue and altar of Victory from the senate, "He respected," says Symmachus, "the privileges of the Vestals, distributed the priestly offices among the nobles, did not refuse allowances for the ceremonies, and accompanying the joyous senate through the streets of the eternal city contemplated its sanctuaries with a tranquil eye, read the inscriptions which they bore in honour of the gods, asked questions as to their origin, praised their founders: in fact, notwithstanding his attachment to another religion, he respected that of the empire." (Symmach. Epp. x. 61; cf. Amm. xvi. 10. See Chastel, p. 89; Beugnot, p. 146, who gives a number of pagan monuments of this reign, pp. 150-170, quoting among others a traveller in the year 374, who describes the pagan rites of the city as if Christianity did not exist.) What was true for Rome seems also to have been true for other cities of the East, such particularly as Alexandria, as well as Heliopolis in Phoenicia, and Olympia, Amyclae, Eleusis in Greece (Chastel, p. 90).

On the other hand heathenism was attacked less directly by the laws against magic. The laws de maleficis et mathematicis under Constantine were sufficiently strong, and when a suspicion of high-treason (maiestas) could be linked on to the offence by such men as Paulus and Mercurius, they afforded sufficient pretexts for many executions and banishments. In his latter years Constantius (and Julian) issued more stringent laws, by which consultation of an augur or haruspex, a Chaldaean or magician, or private divination of any sort was punished with death (C. Th. ix. 16. 4, in 357), and the most dreadful tortures were added in the next year (ibid. 6). Persons convicted of magic or maiestas were expressly exempted from the right of leaving their estates to their heirs, which was allowed to others who suffered the punishment of death (C. Th. ix. 42, de bonis proscriptorum, 2, 3, 4, in 356, 357, and 358). It is strange to find the name of Julian prefixed to all these laws, and we can scarcely wonder at the dissimulation he practised.

It may be noticed that gladiators were still allowed in Rome, notwithstanding the law of Constantine. In 357 Constantius forbade the keepers of schools of gladiators to solicit soldiers or palatini to join them under a penalty of six aurei, and also punished soldiers who joined of their own motion (C. Th. xv. 12. 2).

(3.) Laws relating to marriage, &c. Some of the most important laws with respect to marriage were placed on the statute book by Constantius, no doubt under Christian influence. In 342 he (and Constans) forbade marriage of an uncle and niece, as a capital crime, and in 355 made it unlawful to marry a deceased brother's wife or a deceased wife's sister, and declared the children of such marriages illegitimate (C. Th. iii. 12. 1 and 2).

In 349 he mitigated the severity of his father's law de raptu virginum, keeping however a capital penalty for freemen and that of burning for slaves (C. Th. ix. 24. 2). In 354 he equalised the penalty for violence done to a consecrated virgin and a widow of the church (ix. 25. 1). He also punished unnatural vice with decapitation (ix. 7. 3).

We have already referred to the law of 340 providing for the separation of the sexes in prison (ix. 3. 3). [J. W.]

CONSTANTINUS III. (or CONSTANS I.), and HERAKLEONAS, Eastern emperors A.D. 641. Constantinus was son of the emperor Heraklius by his first marriage. Heraklius is known as the author (with the patriarch Sergius of Constantinople) of the Ektthesis, or dogmatic edict on the Monothelite controversy. Constantinus was associated in the empire with his half-brother Herakleonas, son of Heraklius by his niece Martina. Soon after his accession Constantinus received a letter from pope John IV., who, under the form of an apology for pope Honorius, condemned the Ektthesis and the Monothelite opinion, begging the emperor to remove the scandal. Constantinus survived his father little more than three months. Martina then attempted to rule in the name of her son Herakleonas. But the senate, backed by the army and the inhabitants of Constantinople, deposed Martina and Herakleonas, as guilty of the death of Constantinus III. In their fall was involved Pyrrhus, patriarch of Constantinople, successor of Sergius. Being regarded as an accomplice of the empress Martina, he abandoned his patriarchate, and fled to Africa. (Hardouin, iii. p. 610, Paris, 1714; Maximus ap. Baron. xi. 640, 9; Niceph. Constant. cap. xiii. etc.; Patrol. Graec. cxix. p. 531; Ceillier, xi. 649, and xii. 295; Patrol. Lat. lxxx. col. 602; Baronius, Page, xi. 119; Theophan. 508.) [W. M. S.]

CONSTANTINUS IV. (or CONSTANS II.), Eastern emperor A.D. 641-668. Son of Constantinus III., and grandson of Heraklius, the author of the Ektthesis. He was set on the throne after the expulsion of his half-uncle Herakleonas and the empress Martina. In A.D. 648, at the instigation of the patriarch Paul of Constantinople, he put forth a new formulary, composed by the patriarch, and intended to supersede the Ekthesis. This document was called the Typus, or Model of Faith. Much complaint had been made by the Western church about the Ekthesis, which was still placarded by authority. John IV. and Theodore I., successive popes of Rome, had urged the emperors to withdraw it. At the time of the publication of the Typus, there was open enmity between the patriarch Paul and pope Theodore. After an unsatisfactory correspondence on the Monothelite controversy, Theodore had gone so far as to excommunicate Paul, and Paul had retaliated by overthrowing the altar of the papal chapel at Constantinople, and by persecuting the Roman envoys. When the Type appeared, it forbade, like the Ekthesis, all discussion of the controversy and the use of obnoxious terms. Unlike the Ekthesis, it betrays no inclination on either side. The quarrel now raged more fiercely than ever. Maximus, a monk in Africa, of a noble Byzantine family, the ablest of the opponents of Monothelism [MAXIMUS], stirred up opposition. Rome was beset from Africa, Greece, and other parts of the world, with entreaties to defend the faith. In A.D. 649, pope Theodore I. was succeeded by Martin I. The new pope held a council in the basilica of Constantine, near the Lateran Palace, at which it was laid down that in the person of our Lord are two wills and two operations in union. Anathemas were decreed against Theodore of Pharan, Cyrus of Alexandria, Sergius, Pyrrhus, and Paul of Constantinople. Condemnation was pronounced on "the most impious Ekthesis," and "the most impious Typus." Pope Martin despatched the acts of the council to the emperor with a letter. During the council, the exarch Olympius arrived at Rome with orders to enforce the Typus. Whether, as Martin recounts, Olympius had ordered a soldier to murder the pope at communion, who was struck with blindness, or, as seems probable, the exarch meditated a revolt, and abstained from executing his commands in order to court papal influence; at any rate he did nothing, and was soon afterwards killed, fighting against the Saracens. In A.D. 653, however, a new exarch, Theodore Kalliopas, arrived at Rome, seized pope Martin, and carried him with the greatest cruelty to Constantinople. After suffering the utmost barbarities, Martin lingered in exile till A.D. 655. Maximus had also been carried to Constantinople, was no less maltreated, and died in 666. His sentence was changed by Constantinus IV. from death to exile at the request of the ecclesiastics at Constantinople. These savage acts were sanctioned by the emperor. In visiting the lying patriarch Paul, he related the treatment of pope Martin, and was surprised at the remorse of the patriarch. In A.D. 658, we find Constantine IV. renewing the privileges of the church of Rome, and making presents to pope Vitalian. But his execution of his own brother, and other ferocious cruelties, provoked the detestation of his Eastern subjects, and in A.D. 663 he retired to Rome. Pope Vitalian received him with great honour; but the emperor stripped the brazen roof off the Pantheon, which had been a church from the reign of Phocas, and ruthlessly plundered that and other churches. He then passed into Sicily, where he indulged his tyranny and vices without control. He became a terror even to himself from horrible dreams which haunted him. In A.D. 668, he was murdered by a slave in a bath at Syracuse. For the annals of his reign and his wars with Mavia the Saracen general, see Theophanes, Chronographia, Patrol. Græc. cviii. p. 698. CONSTANTINUS V., POGONATUS (or CONSTANTINUS IV.), Eastern emperor A.D. 668-685. Son of Constantinus IV. (Constans II.). He appears to have been a peaceable and ecclesiastical prince, and is a hero in the Western church for bringing over the Easterns to unity with Rome on the Monothelite controversy. His sobriquet was given because on returning to Constantinople, after the death of his father in Sicily, he had grown a beard. In A.D. 677 he made a peace of thirty years with the caliph Moavia, and with other peoples of the East. Distressed by the divisions of the church, he resolved to attempt a remedy. Accordingly, in A.D. 678, he wrote to Donus, bishop of Rome, desiring that delegates should be sent to Constantinople for a conference on the existing troubles. Before his letter arrived, pope Agatho had succeeded, by whom it was received. On the receipt of the letter, Agatho assembled a council at Rome, which was attended, amongst others, by Wilfrid of York. Monothelism was condemned by this council. A mission was then despatched to Constantinople. Two bishops and a deacon represented the pope, three bishops the council. The accompanying letter of Agatho regretted that the troubles of Italy interfered with theological study, and professed to lean mainly on strict fidelity to earlier councils. Pogonatus now determined to assemble an "œcumenical council," which appears to have been collected from the empire only. [6th GENERAL COUNCIL, 3rd of CONSTANTINOPLE.] This assembly sat from November, A.D. 680, till December, 681. It met in the Trullus, or palace with a domed roof, whence one of its names. The emperor presided at the first eleven sessions, and at the last; when he was absent, the presidential chair was left empty. Twelve high officers of the empire, and certain monks, were present. The assembly is notable for its decency and impartiality, in contrast with the violence of earlier synods; and the conduct of the emperor was highly creditable. His influence appears to have been great; converted to Latin doctrine himself, he was followed by the patriarch and the whole Eastern church, with the exception of Macarius of Antioch, and the six oriental sects, Nestorians, Jacobites, Maronites, Armenians, Copts or Egyptians, Nubians and Abyssinians. The emperor was now hailed as a new Constantine the Great, a new Theodosius, a new Marcian. Anathemas were pronounced against Macarius, and the Monothelites were condemned. The decrees of the council were confirmed by the emperor with penalties. In A.D. 682 Pogonatus wrote a letter to pope Leo II., approving the letters of pope Agatho, and saying that all but Macarius had received them "as if Peter had spoken." In A.D. 683, on the succession of pope Benedict II., the emperor wrote to the people and army of Rome saying, that for the future they need not signify the papal elections to Constantinople, but that it would be enough to obtain the consent of the exarch of Ravenna. Following a complimentary custom of those times, he also sent to pope Benedict the hair of his sons Justinian and Heraklius, as signs of their adoption by the pope. He died in A.D. 685. His reign was not undisturbed by the usual fraternal discords of the Constantinopolitan court. His two brothers, Heraklius and Tiberius, conspired against him, and were degraded and deprived of their noses in the presence of the Catholic bishops assembled at the 6th General Council. CONSTANTINUS VI. COPRONYMUS (or CONSTANTINUS V.), Eastern emperor A.D. 741-775. Son of the emperor Leo the Isaurian. His sobriquet is supposed to originate from his fouling the font at his baptism as an infant. He was also called Caballinus. His life in some respects is a parallel to that of King Henry VIII. of England. He married a barbarian wife, daughter of the khan of the Khazars. Copronymus, whose disposition must have been naturally ruthless, has the misfortune to be represented by Catholic authorities, who resented beyond measure his violent hostility to images. He is accordingly charged by ecclesiastical writers with monstrous vices and magical arts. His apologists describe him as particularly chaste and temperate. What is certain is, that he was conspicuous for vigour, ability, and cruelty. We read of successes against the Saracens and Bulgarians, and of great internal improvement in home affairs. Among his works were the restoration of an ancient aqueduct, the redemption of 2500 captives, the peopling of Constantinople and the Thracian cities by new colonies; the times were marked by uncommon plenty; he displayed his courage on horseback at the head of his legions; and although not always victorious, he triumphed by sea and land, on the Euphrates and on the Danube, in civil and barbarian war. His memory was long cherished by his armies. During his absence from Constantinople, the popular discontent at his opposition to images, as well as the Saracen war, induced Artavasdus, the husband of his sister Anna, to revolt. It was pretended indeed that Copronymus was dead. Artavasdus was crowned in the cathedral by the patriarch Anastasius, who swore, as he held the cross, that Copronymus had declared to him his belief that Jesus Christ was born as any other man. The people immediately shouted: "Let his body be dug up!" Pope Zacharias acknowledged Artavasdus; but after three years the pretender was put down. The patriarch Anastasius was blinded, and exhibited in the hippodrome at Constantinople on an ass; he was afterwards restored to his functions, by way, perhaps, of contempt for the clergy. If Constantinus V. did really lean to Nestorius, and disbelieved the intercession of the Virgin and saints, it was at any rate his policy to feel his way. As to images, after conquering the Armenians, he summoned a council for A.D. 754; desiring that in the preceding year the question should be discussed in the provincial assemblies of bishops. By this council, which is repudiated by papal writers, images were denounced. Copronymus immediately ordered their removal. Birds, fruits, decorative scenes from the chase, theatre, and circus (it is said), were to be painted on church walls, instead of pictures of religious subjects. The emperor singled out the more noted monks, and required them to comply with the decrees of the synod. In A.D. 766 he exacted an oath against images from all the inhabitants of the empire. The monks refused with violent obstinacy, and Copronymus appears to have amused himself by treating them with ruthless harshness. The emperor indeed seems to have contemplated the extirpation of monachism. John the Damascene he persuaded his bishops to excommunicate. Monks were forced to appear in the hippodrome at Constantinople hand in hand with harlots, while the populace spat at them. The new patriarch Constantinus, presented by the emperor to the council the last day of its session, was forced to forswear images, to attend banquets, to eat and drink freely against his monastic vows, to wear garlands, to witness the coarse spectacles and hear the coarse language which entertained the emperor. Monasteries were destroyed, made into barracks, or secularised. Lachanodraco, governor of the Thracian Theme, seems to have exceeded Copronymus in his ribaldry and injustice. He collected a number of monks into a plain, clothed them with white, presented them with wives, and forced them to choose between marriage and loss of eyesight. He sold the property of the monasteries, and sent the price to the emperor. Copronymus publicly thanked him, and commended his example to other governors. Amongst the destruction of images and monasteries, still greater discontent was aroused by the loss of popular relics. Brutal as the emperor's conduct must have been according to the ecclesiastical writers, he was certainly provoked by the fanatical fury of the monks. Peter the Calybite broke into his presence, and upbraided him as a modern Valens and Julian. He was scourged and strangled. Stephen, a celebrated anchoress, boldly rebuked the tyrant, stamping on his coin to see how the emperor relished such an application of iconoclasm. Hearing of his unbending resistance in prison, Copronymus exclaimed: "Am I or is this monk emperor of the world?" Some patricians, like the knights of Henry II. of England, caught up his words; the prison was broken open, and Stephen was dragged about by one leg till he was dead. At length the compliant patriarch Constantine himself was suspected and banished, and Niketas, a Slavonic eunuch, enthroned in his place. In A.D. 767, the ex-patriarch was brought back; he was beaten till he could not walk; set in the pulpit in the cathedral at Constantinople while his accusation was read, and then degraded; his hair, eyebrows, and beard, were plucked out, he was placed on an ass and forced to hold the tail, and was led in the hippodrome by his nephew, whose nose had previously been cut off, while the spectators hooted and spat. He was then thrown to the ground, his neck was trodden under foot, and he lay a laughing-stock to the crowd until the games were over for the day. A few days later he was examined in prison about the emperor's orthodoxy by some patricians. Hoping to soothe his tormentor, he approved of everything. They immediately beheaded him, saying that was all they wished to hear from his impious mouth. In A.D. 775, while Copronymus was on a military expedition, he became ill with boils and burning pains in his legs. He is said to have screamed "that he already felt the pains of hell." He died at sea en route to Constantinople, and was succeeded by his son, Leo IV. Theophanes gives details of the crimes and vices imputed to him; but he wrote about two centuries later. CONSTANTINUS VII., PORPHYROGENITUS (or CONSTANTINUS VI.), Eastern emperor A.D. 780-797. Son and successor of the emperor Leo IV. by Irene the Athenian, and grandson of Copronymus. At his father's death he was only ten years old. Irene was appointed sole regent and guardian by the will of Leo IV. She was a devoted adherent of the cause of image-worship. She could not carry at once the measures she desired, as the soldiers were devoted to the memory of the iconoclast Copronymus, who in their eyes was always a brave and successful general. But as a step towards her object she passed, like James II. of England, an edict for toleration. The monks returned, and popular enthusiasm ran high. In A.D. 784 Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, retired; and when the empress visited him, expressed his remorse for having taken vows against image-worship, and declared for a general council against the iconoclastic synod of Copronymus. Shortly afterwards he died. Irene succeeded in getting elected in his place Tarasius, one of her secretaries of state, a man of consular rank and good personal repute. Tarasius consented on the understanding that a general council was to be summoned according to the suggestion of Paul. To this general council (7th GENERAL COUNCIL, 2nd of NICAËA) pope Adrian I. sent a deputation with compliments, accompanied by demands for the restoration of the ornaments taken from Rome by Copronymus, and criticisms of the irregular election of Tarasius. By this council religious paintings on a flat surface were recognised, and by its decision the Greek church still abides. The young emperor Porphyrogenitus (so called, like the next Constantine, from the room in which he was born) grew up in the society of women and eunuchs, entirely subject to Irene. While he was a child, Irene ably and assiduously discharged in her public administration the duties of a faithful mother. The place assigned her in the Greek calendar for her zeal in the restoration of religious pictures as objects of reverence has not been obliterated by the atrocity of her subsequent crimes. But as Constantine advanced towards maturity, his mother's will became arbitrary and intolerable. Before the council of Nicaea, Irene had wished to strengthen her cause by marrying her son to a daughter of Charlemagne; but after the favourable result of the council, when the iconoclasts were no longer formidable, she broke off the match, and united Constantine against his will to an Armenian princess, Marina or Mary. Instigated also by the promises of magicians, Irene aimed at making her son detestable to his subjects, and to the powerful monastic party, by encouraging him in every kind of cruelty and debauchery. About the age of twenty, however, the flattery of his comrades persuaded the emperor to rebel. He consented that Irene should be exiled in perpetual banishment to Sicily. Irene discovered the plot, punished the ringleaders, and chastised her son. Henceforward the court was divided by two bitterly hostile factions; and Irene found that she held a captive and an enemy. Her ascendancy was for a time overthrown by an abuse of victory. She insisted that the oath of allegiance should be taken to herself alone. Many of the troops murmured at this, but it was openly refused by the Armenians. Constantinus VII., son of Leo IV., then ascended for a time the throne of the East as sole emperor, dismissing Irene to retirement. But she skilfully dissimulated, flattered the bishops and eunuchs, and regained the confidence of her son. The empire was distracted by revolutions that were stained with all the perfidy and atrocity of the later Greeks. Irene, when re-admitted to power, pursued the same execrable policy as before; inciting her son to earn universal loathing by abominable crimes. At length Constantine determined to repudiate his wife Marina, and to marry a lady of that princess's court, named Theodote. When the patriarch, Tarasius of Constantinople, opposed, Constantine threatened to restore paganism. Some monks (among them Theodore the Studite), who ventured to excommunicate him, were treated with great cruelty. Galled to extremities by his mother, Constantine, with his friends, organised a second conspiracy, which remained secret for eight months. But when Irene shewed her suspicions, the emperor escaped with the intention of appealing to the provinces. He was seized, and carried to the porphyry room where he was born. There he was deprived of his eyes with such violence that he nearly lost his life. It was noticed that after this crime, a fog of extraordinary darkness overhung Constantinople seventeen days. Constantine survived many years, oppressed and forgotten. His unnatural mother reigned alone for six years after his deposition. The annals of his reign, his wars with the Bulgarians, and his defeats, are given by Theophanes.

CONSTANTINUS. Tyrant of Gaul in the time of the emperor Honorius, A.D. 407. The British legions were in revolt. They first placed Marcus on the throne, but hastily murdered him. Their next choice fell on Gratian, who in four months shared the fate of Marcus. Finding in their ranks a private who bore the honoured and popular name of Constantine, they called him to the purple. In spite of his incapacity, alarmed by the fate of his predecessors, he determined to subdue the western provinces. Landing at Boulogne, he quickly rallied Gaul around him. After some empty successes over the Germans, Constantine entrenched himself in Vienna; the army of Honorius precipitately retreated, and the Alps became the frontier between himself and Constantine. In 408 Constantine reduced Spain, which submitted without difficulty. In A.D. 409, although stained with the blood of the kinsmen of Honorius, he obtained a ratification of his claims from the court of Ravenna. But during the absence from Spain of Constans, son of Constantinus, who had been associated with him in the empire, the bravest of his generals, Count Gerontius, revolted in that province, and placed the crown on the head of a friend of his own, Maximus. The son was seized and put to death at Vienne. The father was besieged at Arles. But the approach of the army of Honorius put Gerontius to flight. Arles stood a second siege. Constantine in vain engaged the Franks and Alemanni to assist him. They were routed; he was forced to surrender, on a promise of security, and after receiving the ordination of a Christian presbyter. He was sent with his son Julian into Italy, where both were put to death, Nov. 28, A.D. 411. Constantine was protector of Lazarus, one of the accusers of Pelagius. Pope Zosimus represents Lazarus as the habitual calumniator of the innocent, notably of St. Britius, bishop of Tours; Proculus of Marseilles had condemned him as such at the council of Turin; and had ordained him some years later to the see of Aix, only to support the command of Constantine. Lazarus is mentioned with respect by other writers, and especially by St. Augustine. (Mercator, p. 82, Patrol. Lat. tom. xlviii.; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, chap. xxx.; Ceillier, vii. 531, n. 3.) [W. M. S.]

CONSTANTINUS I., pope, succeeded Sisinnius, who had been pope for twenty days after the death of John VII., in A.D. 708. He was a native of Syria, the son of one John: and his character is summed up in the single word "mitissimus."

The first strife in which he was involved was one with Felix, archbishop of Ravenna. On his appointment, Felix came to Rome for consecration, but refused to sign the customary act of submission to the Roman church. He was however met by the menaces of the imperial ministers at Rome, which so far prevailed that he offered to subscribe a document of his own drawing up, in which he declared himself to submit under protest. This was accepted, but a few days afterwards was found in the Roman archives blackened and shrivelled as if by fire. But summary vengeance was taken on Felix by the emperor Justinian II., not by the pope. A fleet and army were sent from Sicily to Ravenna, the city was sacked, and the archbishop blinded and banished to the Crimea, A.D. 709 (Anast. Biblioth.).

Justinian II., though he had taken his own revenge upon the archbishop of Ravenna, had no intention of leaving the see of Rome independent.

He summoned Constantine to Rome, in order to declare his submission to the canons of the Quinisextan council, against which the three former popes had protested. The time had not yet come when a pope could afford to disobey such a summons. He set out from Rome (Anast. B.) in October, A.D. 710, with a company of two bishops, three priests, and eight others. He was received with all honour in his passage through Sicily and Greece; and upon his arrival in Constantinople the emperor himself came from Nicaea as far as Nicomedia to meet him, and prostrated himself—so we are told—at his feet. We are not told how the matter of submission to the council was settled; but Constantine satisfied the emperor, and returned to Rome after exactly a year's absence with a ratification of the privileges of the Roman church (Anast. B.) Justinian's death brought a change of dynasty: and Philippicus, the new emperor (Dec. A.D. 711), tried to restore Monothelitism. But the Romans rose against Peter, the new exarch whom he sent; and before the strife was over, Philippicus himself was succeeded by Anastasius II. on the imperial throne (A.D. 713). In reply to his letters the pope sent Cardinal Michael as ambassador to Constantinople. Constantine died in April, A.D. 715.

[G. H. M.]

CONSTANTINUS II., Usurping Pope, A.D. 767. After the death of pope Paul I., a duke named Toto caused one of his brothers, named Constantine, to be elected by main force. He was a layman at the time, and Toto forced him with the same violence through the subordinate ecclesiastical grades. He remained in possession of the Roman see thirteen months. During this time he wrote to king Pippin, advertising him of his succession, and saying that he sent him all that could be found of the acts of the saints. Pippin paid no attention to this letter. Constantine followed it by another, in which he begged Pippin not to believe malicious reports about him, and speaking of a letter addressed by the patriarch of Jerusalem to his predecessor Paul I., which shewed the zeal of all Eastern Christians for the cultus of images. Pippin paid no more attention to this letter than to the former. At Rome, Christophorus, primicerius and counsellor of the see, with his son Sergius, the treasurer, resolved to risk everything in order to get rid of the usurper. Pretending to start for the monastery of St. Saviour in Lombardy, they left Rome, Christophorus having sworn to Constantine that he would attempt nothing against him. They went to Desiderius, king of the Lombards, who gave them troops. Returning to Rome, they forced Toto and Constantine to abandon the patriarchal palace of the Lateran. Christophorus assembled the bishops, the principal clergy, and military officers, the army and the Roman people; they all agreed to place in the Roman see Stephen the Sicilian. Constantine was immediately deposed, and treated ignominiously with his principal officers and partisans by some worthless opponents. His eyes were torn out, and some of his friends suffered terrible outrages. The council of 769 condemned him, and made arrangements about his episcopal acts. The letters of Constantinus are given in vol. xvii. of Migne's Latin Patrology, pp. 227, 233. (Anastas. Bibliothec. Hist. de Vit. Rom. Pontif. xcvi. §§ 263-280, Patrol. lat.

cxviii. 1150; Ceillier, xii. 117; Fleury, Ecol. Hist. bk. xliiii.) [W. M. S.]

CONSTANTINUS I. (1), 38th patriarch of Constantinople, succeeded Joannes V., A.D. 674; died A.D. 677, and was followed by Theodorus I. (Theophanes, Chron. p. 295, A.M. 6166; p. 295, A.M. 6168; first year of his successor.) [P. O.]

CONSTANTINUS II. (2), 47th patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 754 according to the Art de Vérifier les Dates; but 745 according to Theophanes Chronographus, i. 660. He had previously been a monk and bishop of Sylaeum. He assumed the patriarchate under unusual circumstances. The see had remained vacant for six months after the death of Anastasius. During this time Copronymus had summoned a council favourable to iconoclasm. It dates from Feb. 10 to Aug. 8. On this latter day the emperor attended, and, mounting the ambon, holding the hand of the new patriarch, himself announced the appointment which he had made without any canonical form. A few days afterwards the emperor, accompanied by the new patriarch and some other bishops, publicly announced the decrees of the council, and anathematised Germanus, George of Cyprus, and Johannes Chrysorrhoeas of Damascus, son of Mansour. (Theoph. Chron. p. 359, A.M. 6245. Niceph. Constant. Breviarium de Rebus post Mauricium gestis, p. 42.)

The following story illustrates the relations between the emperor and his patriarch. It was a period of portents in earth and sky, and great public alarm. The monarch, taking the prelate aside, asked him if there could be any harm in speaking of the Θεοτόκος as Χριστοτόκος? The patriarch, as soon as he heard the question of Copronymus, embraced him, crying, "Mercy, sire! Do you not see how Nestorius is anathematised through the whole Church?" The emperor caught the alarm, said the question was intended only for his own ear, and merely for information (Theoph. Chron. p. 366, A.M. 6255). The patriarch appears to have aroused against himself the enmity of the emperor, which shewed itself in various ways. On one occasion he was compelled to mount a pulpit, raising in his hands aloft emblems of peculiar veneration, and publicly abjure the worship of images. He was immediately obliged, in despite of his monastic vows, to sit crowned with nuptial flowers at one of the imperial banquets, and to listen to the forbidden strains of harpers, while he feasted on unlawful dainties (ibid. p. 388, A.M. 6257). This may have been merely a part of the emperor's design to bring all monastic institutions into ridicule and disrepute among the populace. What followed indicated fierce personal resentment against the patriarch. In A.D. 764 he was charged with having spoken ill of the emperor, and exiled first to Hieria, a palace of his master, and then to the island Principus (ibid. p. 369, A.M. 6257; Niceph. Constant. Breviarium, p. 48). The malice of the emperor did not forget him even in his exile. In A.D. 767 he was sent back to Constantinople, beaten till he could not stand, carried on a litter to the great church and forced to sit on the solea (ἐν τῇ σολεύῃ). An act of discussion was read, and at every fresh charge the secretary of the emperor struck him on the face. He was then deposed by Nicetas, who afterwards succeeded him, stripped of his robes, and thrust with contumely out of the church. On the following day he was brought into the hippodrome, with his head, beard, and eyebrows shaven, clothed in a scanty tattered garment, and seated on an ass with his face towards the tail, which he held in his hand. The ass was led by his nephew, whose nose had been previously cut off. He was thrown to the ground and trodden on, and obliged to remain there, exposed to the derision and execrations of the populace, till the games were finished. A few days afterwards some officers of the court were sent to his prison by the emperor, who asked him what were his views concerning their faith and a synod which they had held. The patriarch, thinking in his misery even yet to receive some pity from the emperor, replied that they held the true faith and had done right in holding the synod. The officers replied that this confession was all which they wished to obtain from him, and that he might now depart to the condemnation which he had earned. He was soon afterwards beheaded, ἐν τῷ τῆς πύλωνος κυνηγίῳ (probably the public hunting-ground), his body was dragged by the feet through the public streets; while his head, hanging by the ears, was exposed in public for three days in the place called Μίλιον or Millo. This is usually placed in the year 776, after a patriarchate of 12 years. (ibid. p. 372, A.M. 6259; Niceph. Constant. Breviarium, p. 48.) [P. O.]

CONSTANTINUS (1) Bishop in the Romagna in the 4th century, addressed by St. Ambrose A.D. 379. After giving advice for his sermons, Ambrose exhorts him to attend to the neighbouring church of Forum Cornelii (Imola), where he hopes that soon there will be a bishop. Ambrose is unable to go so far, by reason of the instruction of the catechumens during Lent. He warns him against the Illyrians, as infected to a great extent with Arianism through Valens and other heretical bishops. The Illyrians had been obliged to take refuge in Italy by the ravages of the barbarians. Ambrose concludes by recommending him to be cautious and yet not too difficult in receiving heretics. There is a second letter offering explanation of various points connected with circumcision. (Ambros. Epist., Patrol. Lat. xvi. p. 878, 1245; Ceillier, v. 480.) [W. M. S.]

(2) Bishop of Laodicea, originally a "magister militum," consecrated in 510 bishop of Laodicea. He was a leading Monophysite, and as such was deposed by Justin I. in the year 518. Themistius the Agnoetist deacon of Alexandria, attacked him, and he was combined with Anthimus and Severus, and other conspicuous heretical teachers in anathemas contained in letters of pope Vigilius to the emperor Justinian and the patriarch Mennas in the year 540 (Labbe, Concil. v. 316, 318). Constantinus is reckoned by Dionysius the Jacobite and Bar-Hebraeus as among the chiefs of the Monophysite body. He is commemorated by the Jacobites on the 26th of June (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. ii. 327; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus). [E. V.]

(3) Or CONSTANTIUS, bishop of Gap (Vapincum). The Sammarthani in Gallia Christiana gather from many ancient monuments and documents of that church that probably several others preceded Constantinus, and that St. Demetrius was the first. It is evidently uncertain whether he was bishop in the time of pope Symmachus and king Clovis or not. It was after the death of each of those potentates that Constantinus subscribed at the celebrated council of Epaonum, in the year A.D. 517, when Sigismundus was king of Burgundy, and Hormisdas pope. There were twenty-four bishops present at the council of Epaonum, and Constantine subscribed eighteenth in order—"Constantinus in Christi nomine episcopus civitatis Vapincensis." Shortly after the year 527, under Athalaricus, king of the Goths, a council was held at Carpentras, to which some Constantine subscribed, and Sirmondus in each index conjectures that it was the bishop of Gap. When at the council of Epaonum he had only been recently ordained bishop. He is commemorated on the 12th of April (AA. SS. Boll. April, ii. 90; Gallia Christiana, i. 454). [D. R. J.]

CONSTANTINUS (4) Abbat of Monte Cassino after the death of St. Benedict. He was one of his disciples, and ruled the monastery from A.D. 543—circ. 560. He was one of the four whom St. Gregory consulted as witnesses to the life and works of their founder. (Baron., ad an. 420, num. 49; Greg. Mag. Dialog. ii. 208; Ceillier, xi. 634.) [W. M. S.]

(5) ST. Is said in the breviary of Aberdeen to have been the son of Paternus, king of Cornwall, and to have married the daughter of the king of the Lesser Britain. On her death he adopted a religious life in Ireland, and went as a missionary to Scotland, where he was martyred in Cantire, about the end of the sixth century. Gildas, writing in 547, calls him "the tyrannous whelp of the filthy lioness of Damnonia," and says he had murdered two royal children in a church that very year, and had divorced his wife many years before. The various annals place his conversion in 587-9 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 120, 157, and ii. 147). The Irish martyrologies commemorate a St. Constantine on March 18 (Aengus has "March 11," see Acta Sanctorum, March 11, ii. 64; Bp. Forbes, Kalendars of Scottish Saints, Hardy, Catalogue of Materials, i. 118, 159). The parish feast of the parish named after him in Cornwall (which lies between Budock and Wendron) is on the nearest Sunday to March 9, and that at S. Constantine's Chapel in S. Merryn on the nearest Sunday to March 10; William of Worcester says: "rex et martir, 9 die Marcii, E. littera." One of the lives of S. David makes him enter S. David's monastery at Menevia, in Wales. On the close connexion of the kings of Damnonia with Wales at this time, see Dr. Guest in Arch. Journal for 1859, p. 126. Some make this Constantine great-grandson of the Cystennyn Gorneu (Constantine of Cornwall), whom the Welsh pedigrees in Rees put at the head of the lists, thus—

CYSTENNYN GORNEU.

St. Petrock, whose death is placed in 564, is said to have been received by Theodore and Constantine (Leland, de Script. Brit. 61), and there was a chapel and holy well of St. Constantine near St. Merryn, on the shore of the estuary of Padstow (Petrockstowe). There is no need to describe how some of the notices given above have been wrought into the legend of Arthur and Mordred. [C. W. B.]

That a Constantine was engaged in the conversion of Scotland seems beyond dispute in the face of the general tradition. That this could not have been Constantine the son of Fergus, who died A.D. 820, a monk at Rahen, under or after St. Carthach, who was driven from that monastery A.D. 630, and also a missionary under St. Columba, and martyr A.D. 590, is undoubted. But the intercourse between Ireland and the south of England was such that a Cornish prince might have found refuge with St. Columba in Ireland, accompanied or followed him to Scotland, and gained the crown of martyrdom in the wildernesses of Kintyre: and that another from the same country might have taken up his abode in or near Rahen, in the interval possibly between the departure of St. Carthach, A.D. 630, and the second foundation of the monastery by Fidhairle Ua Suanáigh, who died A.D. 763. [FIDHAIRLE.] In purely Scotch history, a king of this name, Constantine III., abdicated his throne and retired to a monastery in St. Andrew's, but this was in the middle of the 10th century. St. Constantine had many churches in Scotland dedicated to his memory. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 311-4; Bollandists, Acta SS., Mart. tom. ii. 62-3; *Brev. CONSTANTINUS (6) Surnamed or perhaps christened SILVANUS, the founder of the Paulicians, was native of Mananalis, a village in Armenia, near Samosata, in the latter half of the 7th century. His history is known only from his enemies, who have overlaid the facts they relate with abundance of vituperations and imputations of evil motives. But this statement, though true, is not quite fair, as the chief of these hostile authorities is Petrus Siculus, who gives the traditions he gathered during a nine months' stay among the disciples of Constantinus two centuries after the events. We shall give his story, which seems to be simple truth, such as neither disciples nor enemies have really perverted. He informs us that Constantinus had been a Manichean, but that he hospitably entertained a deacon who was on his way home after release from captivity in Syria, and who left with him, in requital for his hospitality, a copy of the gospels and another of the epistles of St. Paul. Reading in these, Constantinus was convinced of the absurdity and loathsomeness of the Manichean books, and burnt them all, along with those of Valentinus and others. He taught his followers to read no other book at all beside the gospels and epistles, and to anathematise

the Scythian, Budas, and Manes. He left Mananalis, and went to the fortress, Cibossa, near Colonea, shewed the people the book of epistles he had received, and said, "Ye are the Macedonians; I am Silvanus sent to you by Paul." We must note by the way that the mission of Silvanus, as a faithful brother, to which Petrus Sicilius supposes him to refer, is the act of Peter, not of Paul (1 Pet. v.). For twenty-seven years he continued teaching. Then the emperor—Constantinus Pogonatus is the emperor in whose time he is said to have been—heard of it, and sent one Simeon to have the ringleader of the sect stoned to death, and his adherents brought over to the church. Simeon took a local chieftain named Trypho for an ally, and took captive all the followers of Constantine. He is said to have given them all stones to stone their old teacher, but only one renegade was found willing to cast a stone at him, a man named Justus, whom Petrus Siculus likens to David. A great heap of stones was raised over him, and the place called Soros, or Heap, "unto this day" (Petr. Sic. Hist. Man. 23–26).

A thorough investigation of the doctrines of Constantinus will come more appropriately under the title of the sect he founded. But a few observations here seem necessary.

(1) He was the real founder of the Paulician sect. To suppose that they have anything to do with Paul of Samosata, son of a woman named Callinica, and brother of John, is not so much a calumny as a blunder of the Catholics. This Paul is the noted heretic of the time of Aurelian (cf. Petr. Sic. Hist. Man. 21, 23, 28).

(2) Their rejection of the Old Testament, and of the epistles of Peter, if it be a fact, which is doubtful, seems to be accidental. The gospels and Pauline epistles, or at any rate the New Testament, constituted the whole of the Bible brought by the missionary to whom their rise is due.

(3) We have here the first striking instance of the living power of the written word, apart from the office of the church, of the voice of the ancient apostles, speaking as from the dead, without the attestation of their successors.

For that Constantinus was converted from his old creed his acts sufficiently testify. Remnants of his former error may have clung about him. But if his followers, when tempted with the good things of this world to renounce their faith and bow down to images, scorned them as the work of the god of this world, not of the Father in heaven, does it prove much against him? That he was ever a Manichee proper must be considered doubtful—the term is used so loosely. That he did not remain a Manichee after his conversion should be placed beyond doubt by the contrast between his doctrines and those of Manes, when both are anathematised side by side (Cotelier, Patr. Apost. i. 537). [E. B. B.]

CONSTANTINUS (7) Bishop of Nacolia in Phrygia, about A.D. 727, the principal supporter, among other bishops, of the emperor Leo III., the Isaurian, in his polemic against images. Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, tried to recall these bishops to the cultus of images. In a letter to John, bishop of Synnada, in Phrygia, Constantine's metropolitan, Germanus gives an account of his argument with Constantine.

Constantine had cited the text, "Thou shalt not make any graven image to worship it, whether it be of that which is in heaven above or in the earth beneath," and added that the works of men must never be worshipped, while he regarded the holy martyrs as worthy of all honour. Germanus represented himself as replying that pictures were to shew affection and to strengthen faith; and concludes by saying that Constantine had agreed to this. This letter Germanus entrusted to Constantine; but, instead of delivering it to his metropolitan, he kept it secret. Germanus then wrote to Constantine, ordering him to submit in all things to his superior, and forbidding him, in the name of the Trinity, to perform any episcopal function until he should have delivered the letter to his metropolitan. (Hardouin, Act. Con. il. iv. p. 243 (Paris, 1714); tom. xcvi. Patrol. Gr. col. 155; Ceillier, xii. 37.)

[W. M. S.]

CONSTANTINUS (8) Bishop of Ratisbon, otherwise called Constans Sacerdos, towards the end of the 8th century, supposed to be the bishop referred to by Dom Bernard Pez in the 4th vol. of his anecdotes (Pez, Anec. t. iv. pars ii. pp. 23–28). But there is no proof that there was a bishop of that name in the church of Ratisbon at that time (Histoire littéraire de la France, iv. 199; Patrol. Lat. xvi. p. 1368). [D. R. J.]

(9) and PEREGRINUS, SS., were two bishops whose relics were found in the church at Gemirge in Normandy, but it is not known when or where they lived. They are commemorated in that church June 15. The Bollandists omit them (AA. SS. Bolland. June, tom. ii. p. 1010). [D. R. J.]

CONSTANTIUS I. FLAVIUS VALE-RIUS, surnamed CHLORUS (ὁ Χλωρός, "the Pale"), Roman emperor, A.D. 305, 306, the father of Constantine the Great, son of Eutropius, of a noble Dardanian family, by Claudia, daughter of Crispus, brother of the emperors Claudius II. and Quintilius. Born about A.D. 250. Distinguished by ability, valour, and virtue, Constantius became governor of Dalmatia under the emperor Carus, who was prevented by death from making him his successor. Diocletian (emperor, A.D. 284–305), to lighten the cares of empire, associated Maximian with himself; and again arranged that each emperor should appoint a co-regent Caesar. Constantius was thus adopted by Maximian, and Galerius by Diocletian (March 1, A.D. 292). Each being obliged to repudiate his wife, and marry the daughter of his adopted father, Constantius separated from Helena, the daughter of an innkeeper, who was not his full legal wife, but was mother of Constantine the Great, and married Theodora, stepdaughter of Maximian, by whom he had six children. As his share of the empire, Constantius received the provinces Gaul, Spain, and Britain. In A.D. 296, he re-united Britain to the empire, after the rebellion of Carausius, and an independence of ten years. In A.D. 298, Constantius defeated an invasion of the Alemanni at Lingones (Langres). In A.D. 305, after the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian, Galerius and Constantius became Augusti, and ruled together. As the health of Constantius began to fail, he sent for his son Constantine, who was already exceedingly popular, and who was jealously kept by Galerius at his own court. Constantine escaped, and arrived at his father's camp at Gessoriacum (Boulogne-sur-Mer) before embarking on another expedition to Britain. In A.D. : 06, Constantius died in the imperial palace at Eboracum (York). He is described as one of the most excellent characters among the later Romans. His subjects found him mild, prudent, and just. He took the keenest interest in the welfare of his people, and limited his personal expenses to the verge of affectation, declaring that "his most valued treasure was in the hearts of his people." The Gauls delighted to contrast his gentleness and moderation with the haughty sternness of Galerius. His internal administration was as honourable as his success in war; he abolished sinecures, protected the people from the rapacity of superfluous officers, and employed his wild German captives in the cultivation of waste lands. The Christians always praised his tolerance and impartiality. Theophanes calls him Χριστιανόφρων, a man of Christian principles. He had Christians at his court. On one occasion he adopted a ruse to test them, and dismissed those who consented to offer pagan sacrifices, saying that if they betrayed their God they would betray their prince. He often declared his belief in one ruler of the universe; and his peaceful death sustained by this principle, in contrast to the ends of heathen emperors, weighed with his son Constantine towards a Christian profession. Constantius, although a pagan, disapproved of the persecution of Diocletian, and contented himself by closing a few churches and overthrowing some dilapidated buildings, respecting (as the author of the De Morte Persecutorum says), the true temple of God. Christianity spread in Gaul under his peaceful rule, and at the end of the 4th century that province had more than twenty bishops (Eutrop. ix.; Aurel. Vict. Cæs. 39, etc.; Epit. 39; Zosim. ii. 7, etc.; Theoph. pp. 4-8, ed. Paris; Panegyric. Veter. iv. 3, vi. 4, 6; Euseb. Vit. Const. i. 13-21; Oratio Const. ad Sanct. Coetum; Treb. CONSTANTIUS II. [CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, p. 651 sq.]

CONSTANTIUS (1) Bishop of Faenza in the Romagna, A.D. 313, present at the council of Rome concerning Caecilian. (Optatus, de Schism. Don. i. 23, Patrol. Lat. ii. 931; Ceillier, ii. 625.) [W. M. S.]

(2) Bishop of Siscia (now Sissek, on the Save), attended the council of Aquileia, and joined in the condemnation of Palladius and Secundianus (Ambrose, iii. 821-843). [J. Ll. D.]

(3) Bishop of Aarausio (Orange), was legate of the Gauls at the council of Aquileia, and joined in the condemnation of Palladius and Secundianus (Ambrose, iii. 821-843). [J. Ll. D.]

(4) A presbyter of Antioch, in whom Chrysostom reposed much confidence, and for whom he entertained a very warm regard. We know little of his parentage, but his mother was resident at Antioch in 404. He had also a married sister, the mother of several children, one of whom, a daughter named Epiphania, was regarded by Constantius with peculiar affection. This sister was far from wealthy, but she allowed no worldly anxieties to be a hindrance to her religious life. Her brother praises her highly for the care she took of her aged mother, and of the education of her children (Chrysost. Epist. 238). Constantius was employed in the service of the church of Antioch from his earliest years, first as a bearer and writer of despatches, then successively as reader, deacon, and presbyter (Pallad. 144). He won the love and respect of the people of Antioch by his cheerful disposition, his modesty, and his incorruptible integrity, as well as by his high standard of Christian piety. He was a good man of business, clear in discernment and prompt in action, and proved an able coadjutor in Chrysostom's designs, especially the management of the missions in Phoenicia, of which he was the treasurer. Chrysostom wrote many letters to him on this business, of which only one remains, dated July 4, 404 (Pallad. 145; Epist. 221, 54). On the death of Flavian, bishop of Antioch, nearly at the same time with Chrysostom's exile, there was a general desire to elect Constantius as his successor, but this design was frustrated by the ambitious and unscrupulous Porphyry, who had marked the episcopal seat as his own. By flattery, bribery, and other base arts, he gained the favour of the magistrates and chief authorities of the city, which he adroitly used to secure his own elevation. Constantius was driven from Antioch and joined Chrysostom at Cucusus, very soon after his arrival there. [PORPHYRY.] He wrote thence to his mother and sister to console them under the trial of his expulsion from his home, which he assured them was fully compensated for by the privilege of his intercourse with his beloved master (Epist. 237, 238). Porphyry having scandalously usurped the episcopate, and exercised its powers with the utmost tyranny towards the friends of Chrysostom, supported by the authority of the court of Constantinople, Constantius would have been glad to remain at the inhospitable Cucusus, as a place of refuge from more formidable evils, but he was compelled to return to Antioch by some judicial proceedings apparently arising from his fidelity to the banished prelate. Chrysostom did what he could for him by letter, but without effect. Porphyry excommunicated him, and procured his expulsion from the city, and he was compelled to seek safety in concealment (Epist. 233). Porphyry subsequently obtained an imperial rescript condemning him to banishment to the Libyan Oasis, as a disturber of the public peace. Timely intelligence enabled Constantius, by the assistance of his friends, to escape to Cyprus (Pallad. 145). There are five letters of Constantius' in the collection of Chrysostom's epistles (Nos. 237-241). It is possible that he may be the same Constantius by whom Chrysostom's Homilies on the Epistle to the Hebrews were transcribed from his notes, and published. [E. V.]

CONSTANTIUS (5) A presbyter of Antioch, to whom Chrysostom wrote shortly after his arrival at Cucusus (Epist. 225), expressing his disappointment at not having received any letter from him, though during his journey he had been so near him, and the visit of Libanius had given him an opportunity of sending letters. He commends Constantius very highly for his charitable works towards the widows, orphans, and needy, of whom he had shewn himself the "common father" (Tillemont, xi. pp. 278, 628, note v.). [E. V.]

CONSTANTIUS (6) the Manichean, collected many of his sect at his own house at Rome to observe the precepts of Manes more fully, and afterwards returned to the church and bravely resisted the Pelagians. He is mentioned by Augustine (de Moribus Manichæorum, c. 20; contra Faust. v. 5). Compare Beausobre, ii. 786, 795; Basnage, Thesaur. Monum. Eccl. vol. i. p. 299). [E. B. C.]

(7) Bishop of Uzès (Ucetia) in Gaul in A.D. 419. In A.D. 462 pope Hilarus wrote to the bishops of Gaul about the disputed succession of Hermes to the bishopric of Narbonne. He was to retain his see, but as long as he lived the power of ordaining bishops which pertained to that church as metropolitan, should be transferred to Constantius, bishop of Uzès, as the oldest in that province. (Patrol. Lat. lviii. p. 24; Hil. Epist. 8; Ceillier, x. 337; Gams, Ser. Episc. 645.) [W. M. S.]

(8) Or CONSTANTINUS, deacon and apocrisiarius of Eutyches, summoned with others to the council of Constantinople, A.D. 448, to carry on the accusation against Eutyches. He was also sent by Eutyches to the council of 449. Constantius here asserted that, during the reading of the former sentence, Eutyches had appealed to the councils of the bishops of Rome, Alexandria, and Jerusalem. He also asserted that the sentence was written before the council, and that the acts of the council had been falsified. (Hard. Act. Concil. ii. pp. 147-214 (Paris, 1714); Ceillier, x. 674.) [W. M. S.]

(9) A bishop of the 5th century, sent with another bishop, Nectarius, by Hilary, bishop of Arles, to Leo I., bishop of Rome. Hilary had deposed a bishop named Celidonius; Celidonius appealed to Leo; and Leo supported him, in order to increase the jurisdiction of the Roman church. To maintain the independence of the Gallican church, Hilary journeyed on foot to Rome in the depth of winter. His intercourse with Leo being unsatisfactory, he returned to Gaul. Falling sick, he deputed to Rome first the presbyter Ravenna, who afterwards succeeded him, and then the bishops Nectarius and Constantius. Auxiliarius, prefect of Gaul, also supported his cause at Rome. But their overtures were unsuccessful. (Vit. Hilar. p. xvii.; Patrol. Lat. tom. i.; Ceillier, viii. 437.) [W. M. S.]

(10) A Tuscan, father of pope John I. (Lib. Pontifical. tom. iv. Concil. p. 1600; Ceillier, xi. 112.) [W. M. S.]

(11) A presbyter of Lyons, the friend of Sidonius Apollinaris, lived in the latter half of the 5th century. He was a native of Lyons, and of a noble family. All our knowledge of Constantius is derived from the letters of Sidonius, four of which (Epist. i. 1; iii. 2; vii. 18; ix. 16) are addressed to him. Sidonius uses language of great deference and respect in adressing Constantius, by whom he was prevailed upon to collect his letters, which after very careful correction he published in eight books, dedicated to Constantius, c. A.D. 477 (Sidon. Ep. vii. 18; ix. 16.) In the winter of 473, when Sidonius's episcopal city of Clermont was besieged by the Visigothic king Euric, who was extending his conquests from Spain into Gaul, and the inhabitants of Auvergne were sustaining the miseries of war, pestilence, and famine, Constantius, who was considerably advanced in life, braved all the difficulties and dangers of the journey, and having made his way into the city, which is described as devastated with fire, and rent asunder with civil dissensions, by his influence restored unanimity to the citizens and roused them to repair their fortifications and maintain a successful resistance to their enemies (Ep. iii. 2). Constantius was the author of a copy of hexameters, celebrating the erection of a church at Lyons by Patiens the bishop of that city, affixed to the wall near the altar (Ep. ii. 10), and of a life of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, dedicated to Patiens and Censorius of Auxerre. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 434; Tillemont, xvi. 263-268.) [E. V.]

CONSTANTIUS (12) A bishop addressed by Avitus, bishop of Vienne (A.D. 494-517). He is directed not to refuse communion at Easter to persons convicted of light faults. (Avitus, Ep. 61, Patrol. Lat. tom. lix. 262; Ceillier, x. 562.) [W. M. S.]

(13) Monk of the abbey of Classis. After the death of the abbat Claudius the monks asked Gregory the Great to appoint Constantius. Gregory refused, because Constantius had a taste for property, and shewed by his conduct that he had not the spirit of a monk. Gregory appointed instead Maurus, cellarius of another monastery. (Greg. Epist. xii. 24, 1194, Patrol. Lat. lxvii. p. 1232; Ceillier, xi. 528.) [W. M. S.]

(14) Bishop of Alby. He attended the council of Rheims in the year 625, and lived at least to the year 647. A joint letter from him and Dado to Desiderius bishop of Cahors is found among the Epistolæ Desiderii, lib. ii. No. 4 (Migne, Patrol. lxxxvii. 217). [E. V.]

(15) Or CONSTANTINUS, Presbyter of the church of Apamea, metropolis of Syria Secunda. He was introduced to the third council of Constantinople (6th general, A.D. 680) to give an account of his faith. He said he recognised in Jesus Christ two natures and two properties, according to the decision of Chalcedon; but only allowed one will. When asked whether this was divine or human, he replied it was the will of the Divinity. He added that Christ had a human will till the crucifixion, but after His resurrection it was swallowed up in the divine. This doctrine he said he had learnt from Macarius of Antioch. Unable to persuade him to alter his views, the council anathematised him and expelled him from the assembly. (Pope Paul V. Concil. Gen. Eccl. iii. 226-232; Ceillier, xii. 954.) [W. M. S.]

CONSTITUTIONS, APOSTOLICAL [Dict. of Christ. Ant. s. v. APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS.]

CONTENTUS, said to have been one of the early bishops of Man (Stubbs, Regist. 154.) [C. H.]

CONTEXTUS, ST., bishop of Bayeux, cir. 480-513 (Gams, Series Episc.). He is placed as sixth prelate of that see by Sainte-Marthe. His name is otherwise spelt Contestus, Contestius, and Contessus. The account given of him by Sainte-Marthe is that he was born in the neighbourhood of Bayeux, and gave himself wholly to the fear of God from his very cradle. He was far advanced in age when universal consent pointed him out as the successor of Manvaeus. But he preached so constantly against the wickedness of the citizens, that he attracted the hatred of all. Unable to overcome this feeling, he retired to a solitary place. Here he suffered the wiles of the Evil One, but came victorious from the struggle. At length he returned, and governed his flock with unremitting vigour, maintaining his recluse habits and the austerity of his former retirement. The Bollandists describe the fame of his temptation and victory as bringing many pagans to baptism. Druidism is said to have flourished in some parts of Gaul in his time, especially at Bayeux. They also mention his rescue of many harlots. He died illustrious for his virtues and wonderful works. His body was translated to Fécamp (Fiscannum), where it was preserved above the altar. His day in the Roman calendar is Jan. 19. (Gallia Christiana, xi. 348; AA. SS. Boll. Jan. vol. ii. 227.) [W. M. S.]

CONTHIGIRNUS (Annal. Camb. ad an. 612), bishop of Glasgow. [KENTIGERNA.] [C. H.]

CONTOBARDITAE, a section of the AGNOETAE, so called from the place where they had their head-quarters (Niceph. Call. xviii. 50). [G. S.]

CONTUMELIOSUS, bishop of Riez in Gaul, A.D. 524. He was addressed by Avitus, bishop of Vienne, who sent him one of his works, and asked him to criticise and alter as he should deem fit. Contumeliosus was learned, but his private life was much suspected. About A.D. 534 Caesarius, bishop of Arles, and other prelates of Gaul wrote to pope John II, complaining of Contumeliosus, who by his own avowal had been convicted of several crimes. The pope wrote letters to Caesarius, to the bishops of Gaul, and to the clergy of Riez, saying that he had forbidden Contumeliosus all his functions, and that Caesarius was to see him shut up in a monastery that he might repent. Contumeliosus appealed to pope Agapetus, who accepted his appeal, and wrote to Caesarius wishing that he had delayed the execution of the decree of John II. The appeal seems not to have been determined: meantime Contumeliosus was to remain suspended. (Patrol. Lat. tom. lxxvi. p. 31, lix. 232, Aviti Vienn. Epist. 13; lxxvi. 24, Johan. Pap. II. Epist. 4; lxxvi. 46, Agap. Pap. I. Epist. 7; Cellier, x. 558; xi. 118, 120.) [W. M. S.]

CONUUALH (Bede, ed. Stevenson, Vit. Abbat. c. 4); CONWALH (Bede, ed. Giles, Vit. Abbat.), king of the West Saxons. [COINWALCH.] [C. H.]

CONUULFUS (Bede, H. E. Contin. ad an. 740), edd. Smith, Moberly); CONWULFUS (ibid. ed. Giles), bishop of Lindisfarne. [CYNEWULF.] [C. H.]

CONVALLANUS, abbat, commemorated Oct. 13. He is said by King to have been abbat in Scotland, and confessor under king Conranus (probably Chalmers's Gauran, son of Domangart, A.D. 535-557), and his obit is placed in A.D. 527. But Dempster and Camerarius (Oct. 5) call him abbat of Iona, and preceptor of king Ferquhard (probably Ferchar, the son of Eogan, A.D. 621-637). Boeoe (Bellend, transl. lib. ix. c. 6, ed. 1821, vol. ii. p. 73) says he introduced the gang-days (Rogation days) into Scotland, was abbat of Iona, had the gift of prophecy, and lived in the days of king Arthur; but on this we can lay little stress, as depending solely on the authority of some books said to have been seen by Boeoe, and as being contrary, in the leading points, to ascertained history (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 164, 214, 241, 315; Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 285). [J. G.]

CONVALLUS (1) (CONWALL), said to have been the 47th king of Scots (A.D. 568-578), celebrated for piety and for assistance rendered to Kentigern and Columba. He induced Brudus king of the Picts and all his subjects to renounce Pelagianism and embrace the Catholic doctrine. He was noted for the great devotion he paid, and obliged his courtiers to pay, to the symbol of the cross. (Camerarius, Histoire Abregée, ff. 68; Cressy, Church Hist. of Brit. xiv. 14, 18.) [C. H.]

(2), confessor, commemorated May 18, Sept. 28. One of the favourite pupils of St. Kentigern at Glasgow was a Convallus, whom the Scotch calendars commemorate, but without uniformity as to details of history or day of observance. He is described as the son of an Irish prince, and is usually associated with St. Kentigern, whom he outlived by about nine years; King places his death in A.D. 612. He is said to lie at Luchinann, near Glasgow, and Cumnock, Ayrshire, was under his patronage (Fordun, Scotich. iii. c. 29; Boeoe, ix. c. 17; Brev. Aberd. p. aestiv. f. cxvii.; Orig. Par. Scot. i. 66, 78; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 315, and Kals.; Bolland, Acta SS. Maii 18, tom. iv. 183; "De S. Convallo Archidiacono Glascuensi in Scotia," saec. vii.). There is another St. Convallus, a monk, commemorated by Camerarius on Sept. 14, but as he is said to have been brought up in the monastery of Crosraguel, in Carrick, he cannot have been earlier than the 13th century (Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 173). [J. G.]

COPTIC CHURCH.* This is the name assigned to the church among those descendants of the ancient Egyptians who now bear the name of Copts. Lane prefers to derive this name from "Coptos," a city in Upper Egypt, now "Kuft" or "Guft," to which many Egyptian Christians fled during the Roman persecutions; but others trace in the forms "Kubt," "Gubt," "Kubtee," "Gubtee," resemblances to the Greek name of Egypt (Αἴγυπτος). Another, and a very unscientific, derivation was attached to the name by the Catholic patriarch Cyril Lucar (see infra).

* The unique character of the Coptic Church will, we hope, be regarded as a sufficient apology for the usual limits of the Dictionary having been in this instance transgressed, so as to present to the reader a complete sketch of the subject down to the present time.—[EDD.]

I. In dealing with the history of the Coptic Church it will not be necessary to trace it back to the earliest times. It will be sufficient to refer the reader to the articles in this Dictionary on ST. MARK, ORIGEN, ST. ANTONY, ST. ATHANASIUS, ST. CYRIL, and the MONKS OF NITRIA. The history of the Church of Alexandria up to the time of the council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) is also the history of a church which united in one body all Christians. The Copts formed up to that date one of the component elements of a church which traced (traditionally) its origin back to St. Mark. But with that council began a new and sadder state of things.

The council of Chalcedon had deposed and banished to Gangra in Paphlagonia, Dioscurus, patriarch of Alexandria. There was no question, from the orthodox point of view, of the justice of the sentence; but the results were such as could certainly never have been anticipated. The schism in the Church of Alexandria, which continues to the present day, owes its origin to that deposition. The Coptic Church, as a separate and heterodox branch of the Church Catholic, dates from the unhappy mistakes and furious party-spirit which transformed the persecutor Dioscurus into a persecuted professor of "the faith;" and which made, and still makes, the bare mention of the decrees of Chalcedon hateful to every Jacobite, Monophysite, and Monothelite. It is only necessary, in this article, to consider the Coptic Church as a separated body.

Proterius, a disciple of Dioscurus, and arch-priest of Alexandria, was elected (A.D. 452) to succeed his master; but his tastes were those of a student, not of a leader; he had neither the tact nor the strength requisite for the crisis in which he found himself placed. Dioscurus died in A.D. 454; but the hope expressed by Leo, pope of Rome, that his heresy would die with him was not fulfilled. Monophysitism (see under the name), the name which sums up conveniently—though not always explicitly—the views adopted by Dioscurus and his followers, has ever since been the tenet of Egypt; and it found an immediate supporter after the death of Dioscurus, in one Timothy Elurus, or the Cat. This man was an Alexandrian presbyter. He collected together monks and bishops, who detested, equally with himself, the decrees of Chalcedon; and, when anathematised by Proterius and expelled by the government, he kept up the courage of his adherents by a cat-like species of ingenuity and activity, which has probably given him his name. He visited the cells by night; and, standing outside and proclaiming himself an angel from heaven, he bade his awe-struck listeners avail themselves of the first opportunity of forsaking Proterius and of electing Timothy (i.e. himself) in his place. The opportunity came with the death of the emperor Marcian. Timothy, heading his monks, proceeded to the Caesarea or the great church of Alexandria, and was consecrated by two deposed and but lately exiled bishops, A.D. 457. The governor's first act, on his return, was to forbid re-admission to Timothy, who had left Alexandria. This infuriated the Timotheans, who turned upon Proterius, dragged him from the baptismery of the church in which he was engaged at prayer, murdered him, exposed his body, burnt it, and cast the ashes into the sea.

This infamous act was the first stage of a persecution which permitted Timothy to assume at once patriarchal functions, but which drove many Egyptian bishops to Constantinople. They memorialised the new emperor Leo, who, as soon as possible, submitted the matters of Egypt to the patriarchates and other sees convened, not in oecumenical council, but in other provincial synods. Their condemnation of Timothy was unanimous, and Leo banished him to the Chersonese. For fifteen years Timothy remained in exile. Political events then placed Basiliscus in power at Constantinople, and the Monophysites urged successfully Timothy's recall. He entered Constantinople in triumph, his adherents shouting before him as he rode upon an ass, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Later on Timothy proceeded to Alexandria. Basiliscus, the usurper, had supported what Zeno, the rightful occupant of the throne, had disliked. The former, by the advice of Timothy, had issued a circular letter endorsing approval of the faith laid down in the three first oecumenical councils, but not that of Chalcedon; the latter, always well-disposed to the last-named council, now announced his intention of expelling such nonconformist bishops as had been appointed by his rival. Timothy's age was, however, allowed to stand as an excuse for not interfering with him; and in a few months more he died, leaving behind him a memory which even the writers of his sect are unable to rescue from charges of infamy and violence.

He was succeeded (A.D. 477) by a man equally tyrannical and more double-dealing, Peter, surnamed Mongus or Moggus, the Stammerer. Zeno was naturally indignant at such presumption, and passed sentence of death upon him. This was commuted into banishment upon the intercession of the Catholic patriarch of Alexandria, Timothy Salophaciolus;^b but Timothy's death (A.D. 482), and the unfortunate mistakes which are connected with the conduct and election of his successor John Talaia, made the restoration of Peter Mongus possible, while his ready acceptance of Zeno's Henoticon dissipated any anger or suspicion which might still have lingered in the emperor's mind. Zeno's famous document, issued by the advice of Acacius of Constantinople, was intended to re-unite the Catholics and Monophysites on the basis of compromise. It was originally addressed to the patriarchate of Egypt, but during the reigns of Zeno and Anastasius, it became the test proposed to all the bishops of the East. There was much in the Henoticon which would make it acceptable to the Egyptians. The creed adopted by the councils of Nice, Constantinople, and Ephesus was asserted and confirmed; and the doctrine established at Chalcedon was stated, though certain expressions there used, and the confirmation of that council, were studiously avoided. Peter Mongus accepted this document for himself, and proposed it to the Alexandrians, whether Catholic or Monophysite, as a form of union. At first his offer was largely accepted, but Peter's subsequent acts—one day denouncing the council of Chalcedon, another accepting its decrees—alienated alike the consistent Monophysite and the consistent Catholic.

While the patriarch's name was inserted in the diptychs of Constantinople, the church over which he presided was torn into three divisions. The Catholics called themselves Proterians, out of respect to their martyred patriarch; Peter retained a few followers; and the sterner Monophysites and Eutychians were surnamed Acephali, as preferring no chief or head to union with their trimming bishop. It was Peter's policy to let these last alone, and schism after schism racked and split up the Acephali for more than two hundred years. Esaiianites, Barsanuphites, Anthropomorphites, and Semidalites are mere names now, and it is unnecessary to dwell upon them; but they serve, together with many others even more obscure, to exhibit the distraction and degradation which had befallen the once great church of St. Mark and St. Athanasius. But if Peter ignored and despised the men of his own communion, he turned the more bitterly upon the Catholics who refused it. Their eyes had been opened to the meaning of the compromise as interpreted by Peter, and they were made to suffer for their indignation. Events outside of Egypt, combined with persecution at home, would seem to have made the patriarch indifferent to the convictions or the miseries of the unhappy Alexandrians. An attempt made by Felix, pope of Rome, to procure his banishment, was met by the bold step of arresting the papal legates who appeared at Constantinople; they were imprisoned, threatened with death, and only released when they joined in the public service with Acacius, and—at least tacitly—gave the sanction of Rome to Peter's tenure of office. Rome's disavowal of this act of the legates and her subsequent fulminations against Acacius and Peter were scorned; and during the lifetime of the former Alexandria was at the mercy of the latter. Imperial representations, the protests of the governor, and the cries of the sufferers, were despised or set aside by Mungus, till death came and removed him (A.D. 490).

Peter's immediate successors were not remarkable men. The liberal and virtuous Athanasius II., the conciliatory and gentle John I. (A.D. 497), the recluse John II. (A.D. 507), and Dioscurus II. (A.D. 517), made efforts more or less vigorous to restore communion between the two principal sections of the Alexandrian Church; but the time was a time of triumph for the Jacobites, and communion meant for the Catholics—especially in the days of John the recluse—the surrender of their own tenets and the adoption of Jacobite opinions. About this time the practice of sending synodal letters between Antioch and Alexandria began, a practice which has been continued with but few interruptions up to the present day.

Timothy II. (A.D. 520) was, at the onset of his patriarchal life called upon to deal with the then all-engrossing disputes between the Corrupticolae and the Phantasiasts. Julian of Halicarnassus, and Severus of Antioch, the great champion of the moderate section of the Acephali, had been deprived of their sees by the emperor Justin, and had both found refuge in Egypt. Julian, an Eutychian, taught that the Saviour's body was incorruptible, that His hunger, thirst, weariness, and rest did not arise from the constitution of His nature, but were mere feelings to which He voluntarily submitted Himself. Hence he and his followers, who were chiefly monks and anchorets, received the nickname of Aphthartodocetae and Phantasiasts. They retorted by surnaming the followers of Severus, Corrupticolae, or worshippers of the corruptible. The Jacobites ranged themselves by the side of one or the other of these leaders; and when Timothy was found inclining by preference to the opinion of Severus, many Alexandrians, headed by a deacon named Themistius, separated from communion with him, and, as Agnoites, added another name to the long catalogue of schismatics.

The historian Eutychius, introduces into the time of the patriarch Timothy II., the attempt of Apollinarius to restore in Alexandria the Catholic succession of bishops, which had been in abeyance since the time of John Talaiä. The whole history is beset with difficulties and contradictions, one writer placing the events at the time of Timothy's accession, another at the close of his life; but the possibility, and even probability, of the occurrence is supported by the known facts and sympathies of the day. In the eyes of the emperor Justin, Timothy was a heretic, and to be displaced. The Catholic communion in Alexandria was too feeble to move on its own account; it could do nothing without the support of the government and troops. Apollinarius, a patrician, appeared at Alexandria by the emperor's command and demanded consecration. The Jacobites scorned him. He fixed a day on which to meet the people in the great church, stationed troops at the doors and in the neighbourhood of the sacred building, and surrounded his own person with a body-guard. The people saw him pass through the streets and enter the church dressed in a military cloak, and wearing the insignia of his patrician rank. He mounted the pulpit, the cloak was dropped; Apollinarius was seen vested in the patriarchal robes. He began to read the tome of Leo, or the definition of faith passed at the obnoxious council of Chalcedon. Amazement gave place to indignation; loud and angry protests against the council and the definition drowned the voice of the speaker. Apollinarius gave the signal; the swords of the soldiers pierced that unarmed multitude; and the house of God became the scene of a furious butchery. Apollinarius himself disappeared from the scene, unless he is to be identified with a bishop who became Catholic patriarch of Alexandria some fifteen years after the death of Timothy (A.D. 536).

It was the custom at Alexandria that the successor of a defunct patriarch should watch by the body of the dead, place his right hand upon his head, take the pallium of St. Mark from his neck, and assist in the burial. This constituted legitimate succession. One Theodosius, a member of the Corrupticolae, had the support of the secular clergy and of the court party. He was engaged in these rites when a mob, headed by some monks, burst into the church with their choice, one Gaianus, a Phantasiast, and expelled Theodosius from the city. Imperial officers presently appeared from Constantinople, commissioned by the emperor to make full investigation into this matter, and to institute the candidate whose ordination should be proved to have been canonical. Theodosius was restored, and, according to the historian Severus, Gaianus became his archdeacon, or, according to other accounts, was banished. The party of Gaianus was implacable, and left Theodosius but little peace. Whether with the object of seeking further remedy against the bickerings and violence of party feeling, or in consequence of an imperial command, Theodosius before long went to Constantinople. Either previously to, or at the time of his arrival at the city, he was expected to repay imperial assistance by conformity to the faith of Chalcedon. An attempt was made, according to Severus, to silence the scruples of his conscience by the bribe of secular as well as patriarchal power, but he spurned it from him with a contemptuous comparison of the bribe to the third temptation of his Master (St. Luke iv. 6), and with a fervid denunciation of council and emperor. He was banished; and Justinian, whose theological convictions were at the time Catholic, elevated to the see of Alexandria a monk named Paul (A.D. 539). This man's character was not one calculated to inspire respect. The military guard and the imperial favour protected his person, but the biting wit of the Jacobite surnamed him 'the new Judas,' and hardly a Catholic resorted to his communion. Theodosius, from his place of exile, kept up the faith and hopes of his followers, and the church of the Angelium rose in proud defiance of the Caesars, and as a refuge for Monophysitism. Paul, Zoilus, and Apollinaris, successively Catholic patriarchs of Alexandria, did but little to induce the Jacobites to surrender their faith and seek communion with them. Their age was the age of doctrinal contest, when men's minds were perplexed or refreshed, depressed or elevated, by 'the three chapters,' and by the decisions of the fifth oecumenical council at Constantinople. Justinian, before his death, joined the sect of the Phantasists; but his succession, while a great blow to the Catholics, brought but little advantage to the Jacobites generally. Theodosius died in exile (A.D. 567).

His successors Peter III. (A.D. 567), Damianus (A.D. 570), and Anastasius Apozgatius (A.D. 603), were learned men, but they were harassed by the schisms within their own communion; and the lustre of their own life and learning paled before the super-excellent abilities and virtues of the Catholic patriarchs St. Eulogius and St. John the Almoner. The episcopate of Anastasius, if gratefully remembered by Jacobite writers for the cessation of the schism between the chairs of Alexandria and Antioch, was noted by Catholics as stained by the death of Theodore (the immediate successor of Eulogius), under circumstances as vindictive and barbarous as those connected with the martyrdom of Proterius.

The political events of this time were fierce and exciting. The emperor Phocas was dethroned and beheaded by Heraclius, the son of the exarch of Africa (A.D. 610), and Heraclius was himself called upon to defend his possessions against the conquering hosts of Chosroes II., king of Persia. The tide of fortune did not turn till Syria, Palestine, and parts of Egypt had felt the fury and bigotry of these soldiers; and Christian refugees from Jerusalem, who had sought and received food and shelter from the Catholic patriarch of Alexandria, found that they had but exchanged one funeral pile for another.

The misery and anguish engendered by these troubles, soon, however, to be forgotten in the horrors of Mahommedan conquest, had hardly past, when the distracted church of Alexandria was called upon to face the newly-broached doctrine of Monothelism (see under the name).

Cyrus was then (A.D. 630) the (so-called) Catholic patriarch. He owed his preferment to his adoption of the Monothelite views of the emperor Heraclius and his imperial adviser, Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople; one acknowledged duty attached to that preferment being the reconciliation, on a Monothelite basis, of the Jacobite and Catholic sections of the Alexandrian Church. The proposals of Cyrus were greeted favourably by those whose applause should have made him suspicious, and unfavourably by those whose opposition should have opened his eyes to the perils of compromise. The patriarch drew up a scheme of re-union, which declared, in its seventh article, that the Lord Jesus Christ "wrought the acts appertaining both to God and man by one the-andric (or divinely-human) operation," an expression which was interpreted by the Monothelite to admit of a single, if confused, mode of action. In the spring of A.D. 633, reconciliation was formally ratified by Catholic and Jacobite, in spite of the passionate entreaties of Sophronius, the friend of St. John the Almoner, on the one side, and the cold refusal of Benjamin, the Jacobite patriarch, on the other. The Monophysites proclaimed their triumph in stinging words; "We have not gone over to the council of Chalcedon; the council has come over to us;" and the Catholics were desired to silence their scruples by the welcome sight of union, in comparison with which orthodoxy on abstruse subjects was to be excused. But the truce did not last long: theological and political partisanship united in breaking asunder bands which were rotten from the first.

The rise of Mahommedanism, the details of its creed, progress, and conquests, must be read elsewhere: here it can only be considered as it affected the Coptic Church. In A.D. 640, Alexandria fell into the hands of Amer, the lieutenant of the caliph Omar. From that time the "Ecthesis" of Heraclius, the "Type" (or formulary) of Constans II., the decisions of the first Lateran (A.D. 649) and sixth general councils (A.D. 680-1)—successive efforts to stem opposition to the will of the emperor, or define the Catholic faith—were powerless to restore unity to Alexandria. The Copt of Egypt held out the hand of friendship to the Mahommedan, and Monophysite patriarchs and Monophysite creeds received the support and protection of the Crescent.

According to Severus, Cyrus poisoned himself, while Benjamin left his place of refuge in the desert. The passport of safety, accorded to him and to those who had harboured him:—"let every place in which may be Benjamin, the patriarch of the Coptic Christians, enjoy full security, peace, and faith from God; he himself may come, conscious that he will be safe, and freely administer the affairs of his church and people"—was the death-knell to any other Christian establishment.

The pre-eminence which the Monophysite could not obtain from his theological superiors was accorded to him on political grounds. In the eyes of Amer every orthodox Catholic was a Melchite, pledged to support the emperor of Constantinople, the chief and unbending opponent of Mahommed and his successors. A leading Monophysite, Mocaucasus, had, moreover, impressed Amer with the conviction that, provided the religious belief of his party was respected, something more than negative support would be forthcoming. "I desire," he had said, "no communion with the Greeks either in this world or the next. I abjure for ever the Byzantine tyrant, his synod of Chalcedon, and his Melchite slaves. For myself and my brethren, we cannot embrace the relations of your prophet; we are resolved to live and die in the profession of the Gospel and in the unity of Christ; but we also wish for peace; we will cheerfully submit to paying tribute, and we will render obedience to the prophet's temporal successors;" and the astute Arab ratified a pact which flattered the Monophysite by the suppression of Melchite civil and ecclesiastical supremacy, while it left in his own hands a weapon which could be used against his Coptic adherents should they seek their own independence. To this day the Coptic patriarchs deduce their succession from the patriarch Benjamin in preference to any other, and trace their stringent use of the Coptic language in their ritual and sacraments, to the time when Greek rites, offices, and language, were practically suppressed by the sword of Islam. In their partisan hatred, no Monophysite voice was raised to save from the flames the venerable church in which reposed the relics of St. Mark; and Monophysite selfishness, seeking the celebrated library of Alexandria for a learned grammarian, ended by consigning to the public baths the literary stores of a precious antiquity.

The last years of Benjamin were spent in collecting together his hitherto scattered flock, in building and restoring churches and monasteries, and in teaching and reforming his people. The Church of Ethiopia owed to him the Metropolitan Cyril and Teklahaimanot, the founder of the monastic life in that country.

The new governors of Egypt soon shewed their intention of interfering in all matters ecclesiastical as well as civil. Though responsible to the caliph, they were practically independent; and, provided that tribute and presents were forthcoming for the use of the central government, inquiry as to the mode by which these were raised was not unduly pressed. The name of Abdel-Aziz is connected with many interesting facts appertaining to the first years of Alexandrian life under Mahommedan rule. His passion for building gained for him the title of a second Pnaraoh; and Christians toiled at Alexandria, Holwan, and Misra (old Cairo)—building, at his command, baths, aqueducts and public squares, and, by his gracious permission, a church or two. This semblance of concession to their spiritual wants finds further ironical analogy in his treatment of the Coptic patriarchs. John Sennudæus (A.D. 677) was an excellent man; but at the time of the confirmation of his election he made the mistake of forgetting to obtain information about Abdel-Aziz's movements, and omitted to pay his respects to the expectant governor. Abdel listened immediately to slander against John circulated by his enemies, and the unhappy patriarch suffered inconceivable torture before the mind of Abdel was disabused. Isaac the Just, John's successor, who owed the confirmation of his election (A.D. 686) to Abdel's ruling a disputed point in his favour, was Christian-minded enough to endeavour to bring about peace between the belligerent kings of Ethiopia and Nubia. But his act was represented to the emir as a political interference, and the patriarch nearly lost his life. His fellow-Christians were mocked and beaten; they saw their gold and silver crosses broken up, and were condemned to read on their church-doors such insulting comparisons and sentences as—

(a.) Mahomet, the Great Apostle of God; Jesus Christ, the Apostle of God.

(b.) God neither begetteth nor is begotten.

On another occasion, when the course of political events at Constantinople had expelled the emperor Justinian, Abdel summoned to his presence the Alexandrian prelates, with Simon the patriarch (A.D. 689) at their head. He wished to amuse himself with their dissensions. He turned to the bishop of the Gaianite sect, and desired him to name the prelate not belonging to his party, who, in his opinion, was most orthodox in his doctrine. The bishop replied, Simon. Abdel put the same question to the Melchite bishop (?); and to the Barsanuphian bishop, and received the same answer. Then came Simon's turn. Simon thoughtless of, or superior to, the amusement his answer would afford the Mahommedan, appropriated this superiority to himself, and anathematised the rest. Yet Simon was the one of the patriarchs contemporary with Abdel who received from the emir the highest possible character for excellence and moderation; and the Coptic and Ethiopian Churches are justified in commemorating his virtues. He owed his election to his learning and modesty; his own preference for the election of his teacher the abbat of Mount Nitria, and his Syrian birth, being counted no valid obstacles. And his after-acts proved that the electors had chosen wisely. Legends of his miraculous power and miraculous deliverances are recorded in the pages of Renaudot; but more noteworthy for the edification of his flock were the sterling efforts he made to prevent cruelty in monasteries, to check lawlessness in divorce, and to help forward the propagation of his faith, though each endeavour may be said to have been opposed by theological or political opponents, and in some cases to have brought him great personal suffering.

The patriarchate of Alexander (A.D. 703), Simon's successor, was marked by a series of Mahommedan persecutions, each more fierce than its predecessors. The emirs of Egypt seemed to have vied with each other in acts of cruelty. An apostate monk inflamed Asabah, the son of Abdel-Aziz, against the monasteries; but the capitation tax then first imposed upon the monks was nothing compared with the branding with name and number devised by Asamah. Both these men prohibited the assumption of monastic vows: a third commanded Christians to wear—as a mark of shame as well as of identification—a leaden seal, stamped with a lion, and suspended round their necks; a fourth imposed a passport-tax on travellers; and the touching story is told of a poor mother seeing her son, in whose care was the passport, devoured by a crocodile, and she herself obliged to sell her robe and beg before she could resume her journey. No wonder that the Christians recognised the hand of God in the miserable death which befell some of their persecutors. It is told of Abdel-Aziz by Elmacinus, and of Asabah by Severus, that having entered a church in which was an icon of the Virgin and Child, the emir spat upon it, and gave vent to his fury in horrible blasphemies. That night he was terrified by a vision of the judgment. He saw One sitting upon the throne clothed with light and majesty, and surrounded by legions of white-robed saints; he saw himself standing before Him; and he heard the command given to transfix the blasphemer through the heart with a spear. He woke, was attacked by a violent fever, and in a few hours was dead.

Alexander, on the accession of Abdallah, waited upon the new emir to present his congratulations. He was insulted, and dismissed with a fine of 3000 pieces of gold. Unable to raise the money in any other way, the patriarch was taken about the country begging alms from all who would love or pity him. The same tribute was imposed by Korah, Abdallah's successor; and Alexander had to repeat his painful journey. The accidental discovery of some chests of money—the voluntary donation of all but one to the patriarch, by whose officers it was appropriated—was made the cause of a fresh charge against him. The finers of the treasure, who were monks, spent the reserved portion in debauchery. When Alexander pleaded poverty, this gift of the chests was quoted against him, and collusion insinuated between him, his officers, and his monks. In vain did he plead ignorance of the whole transaction; in vain did he prove that he had not received a penny. Korah imprisoned him, threatened him with death, and only released him to permit him to proceed on his mendicant-mission. This prelate's career was, indeed, one long struggle against Mahomedan persecution, a struggle which ended only with his life (A.D. 726): while he had not unfrequently to contend against the grasping selfish habits of his own clergy and co-religionists. One of the few gleams of sunshine which lightened that otherwise troubled life is to be found in the restoration to his communion of many Gaianites, Semidalites, and Barsanuphians, whom he re-baptized when engaged in a patriarchal visitation.

About this time (A.D. 727), and after a lapse of ninety-seven years, the Catholic Church of Alexandria was enabled to restore to its members episcopal authority in the person of Cosmas. A direct appeal to the caliph Hischam procured the restoration to the Catholics of the Caesarea and many churches occupied by the Copts, and a vacancy of some years in the Jacobite patriarchate was employed by Cosmas to consolidate his party.

In A.D. 743 Chail I. was elected; and his episcopacy is memorable in Coptic annals, not only for the political crisis through which he successfully passed, but also for the part he played in the theological disputes of his age. The caliphs of the house of the Omniadae had been gradually losing the affections of their people, and exciting their hatred by vices, cruelty, and exactions. Abdallah, the leader of the Abbasidae, who traced their descent and took their name from Abbas, an uncle of Mahommed, at length branded the Omniadae as usurpers, and drove Meruan, the last of the Omniadae caliphs, into Egypt, and beheaded him (A.D. 750). Catholics and Jacobites both suffered, as was to be expected, during these political convulsions, and each in proportion as the governors of Egypt sided with Chail or Cosmas. Under the emir Abdel-Melech there arose a discussion relative to the church of St. Mennas, famous for its miracles, and which both parties wished to possess. The question was referred to Abdel-Melech, who commanded the Catholic and Jacobite patriarchs to come before him and discuss their respective doctrines. The discussion, as reported by Severus, must from the first have been fruitless: the reasons put forward by each party, when reduced to writing, were convincing only to themselves; and when overtures for union fell through, Abdel-Melech decided that the church should be given to the Jacobites on the ground that a Jacobite patriarch had finished the building.

Chail and Cosmas were once again brought together before this same emir and his master, Meruan. The Christians of Egypt, forgetting for a time their theological differences, had thrown in their lot with the Abbasidae, and defeated Abdel-Melech's troops. The patriarchs were taken prisoners, and brought before Meruan. Cosmas bought his life by a speedy payment; but Chail, having no money, was commanded to use his influence with the revolted Christians and bring about a peace. Abdallah in the meantime advanced, and Chail was powerless. Summoned to the presence of Meruan, the patriarch pronounced over his kneeling companions the beautiful prayer of Absolution used in the Coptic church, and prepared himself and them for the horrible death, in the presence of their countrymen, which Meruan had commanded. By God's providence they were spared. The caliph's own son pleaded for them, and they were cast into that prison from which Abdallah delivered them.

The firmness as well as piety of Chail is remembered by the Copts in connexion with the discipline required of penitent apostates, fasting-Communion, original sin, the baptism of infants, and the line he took at the council of Misra (A.D. 755), when he refused his assent to the violation of the canons in the case of translation to the see of Antioch. His virtues alone may have suggested to the Arab historians the romantic expedition of Nubian hosts hurrying to his rescue when in prison; but—together with the prayers which pious tradition asserted powerful to influence the rise and fall of the Nile—they secured for him at the hands of Abdallah's emir that respect and peace which were granted to his declining years. He died A.D. 766.

The next patriarch of any distinction was Yuçab (A.D. 837). The history of the Alexandrian Christians in Egypt had been, during the interval, the history of men persecuted or not as the temper of the caliph and his lieutenants was avaricious or indifferent, cruel or lenient, and swayed by Jacobite or Melehite. The Coptic patriarchs, to their credit, did not abandon their flocks when distress came, but relieved them, encouraged them to patience and perseverance, combated earnestly new forms of heresy, and—as in the case of Mark II. (A.D. 799) and the Barsanuphians—succeeded in bringing back to the fold those who had wandered from it. Yuçab was abbat of the famous monastery of St. Macarius, and was chosen in preference to Isaac, a wealthy but married man, in whose behalf some of the bishops wished to break the canon, and avail themselves of his promises to restore the churches, pay tribute, and give alms to the poor. The new patriarch employed his first efforts in quelling a revolt among some Christian Bschammyrites; and, though unsuccessful, the favourable impression he produced on the caliph would probably have at once procured security and peace for his people, had not some bishops, deposed by him for their bad conduct, insinuated to the emir Afschin that Yuçab's conduct was hypocritical. His death was ordered, and Afschin's brother was despatched to assassinate him. Tradition declares that sabre-stroke and dagger-thrust were powerless against the innocent patriarch, and the would-be-murderer led him to the emir. Once there, Yuçab had no difficulty in exposing the falsehood of his accusers; while he excited the admiration, and even the esteem, of all present, by asking that their lives might be spared. He received his reward when the caliph commanded that no appeal, on the part of the Christians, from the judgment of their patriarch should be entertained. This served him in good stead when the bishop of Misra—wishing to make himself independent of the see of Alexandria, and calling to his aid the interference of the Mahomedan courts—was forced by those same courts to admit the title and authority of his superior. "I have received my authority from God and your princes," said Yuçab; and, shewing to the cadi the privileges conferred on his see by Almamon, the victorious son of the celebrated Aaron-al-Raschid, the appeal of Misra was rejected.

Yuçab had set his heart on the accomplishment of three things; personal communion with the patriarch of the Jacobites at Antioch; the obtaining from the caliph sufficient powers to govern adequately his churches; and the opportunity of regulating the affairs of Nubia and Ethiopia. By the providence of God, he was permitted to see the accomplishment of all three. Dionysius of Antioch came in the company of Almamon, and the two patriarchs were enabled to express to each other personally that mutual respect and affection which synodal letters usually conveyed. The fulfilment of his last wish was due, as regards Nubia, to the visit of George the son of the reigning emperor. The prince was warmly received, and returned to his country gratified by the patriarch's instructions, and by the gift of a portable altar suited to the habits of a people who preferred a nomad and camp life to cities with churches and houses. John, the bishop of Ethiopia, was at that time a refugee in Egypt. He had been expelled by his enemies on the authority of the queen during the king's absence on some war expedition. That expedition was attended by disaster and defeat, and the king on discovering John's banishment attributed his ill-success to the Divine anger. At his earnest entreaty John was returned to him; and the Ethiopians insisting that their bishop should be, like themselves, circumcised, it was proved to them that John was this, though he appears to have been himself ignorant of what had been probably done in his infancy by some Mahomedan. But in addition to these special acts for these countries, Yuçab ordained bishops and sent them in every direction in his own diocese, affirming in the spirit of a true servant of the propagation of the Gospel, that there was danger lest the flocks should perish if they had not many pastors.

The excellence and gentleness of his nature was such that the historians of his age have noted, as something exceptional, his intimate friendship with the Catholic patriarch; and it might almost be asserted that Yuçab received kinder treatment from Christians opposed to his communion than from those presumably agreeing with him in matters of faith. He died (A.D. 850) a victim to the tortures which a new and persecuting emir inflicted upon him.

Jews and Christians were now called upon, as a mark of shame, to wear garments of a dark colour with particoloured fringes; the use of the girdle was taken away from the women to whom it was appropriate, and made obligatory on the men who detested it. They were forbidden admission to public offices, or instruction from Mahomedans; their new churches were levelled, their sepulchres destroyed, the use of crosses forbidden, and figures of demons ordered to be placed above the house doors. Another emir went even farther, and forbade religious rites for the dead, prayers except in a low voice, the ringing of bells, and the use of wine for the Eucharist.

Chenouda became patriarch in A.D. 859. To him is traced the custom, still observed in Egypt, of heading letters and documents with abbreviations (IC. XC. TC. ΘC.) significant of Jesus, Christ, the Son, God. His theological reputation was very great, and he was instrumental in restoring to his Church, by confirmation, a body of Quartaecimans who had appended to their original error various tenets adopted from Barsanuphians, Phantasiasts, Julianists, and Gai-anites. A paschal letter of this patriarch is given by Renaudot, which was considered by many a faithful exposition of the teaching of the great St. Cyril; some however, while approving the distinctive Monophysite phraseology of part, found fault with language which, in their opinion, asserted that the Divine nature had suffered and died. Chenouda silenced the objectors. In the earlier part of his patriarchate, he was successful in obtaining from the caliph at Bagdad the restoration of liberty to his church; but in the time of Ahmed—the first of the Tooloonidae or that house which owned the spiritual authority but rejected the temporal power of the lineal descendants of Mahommed—persecutions of the cruellest kind were undergone by his communion, which the Catholics escaped. As had been so often the case with other patriarchs, the originators of the slanders and insinuations which brought trouble upon Chenouda were men who owed him a spite, and cared very little if the whole community suffered provided that their own personal grudge was satisfied. A deacon and a monk, to both of whom Chenouda had refused ordination, successively accused their patriarch of possessing and concealing vast sums of money; and the sufferings mental and bodily which he endured shortened his life.

Chenouda was succeeded, in A.D. 881, by

Chail III.; a man whose simony led him to term himself Chaïa or 'the last,' as being the most unworthy of the sons of the church, or (as others read) Kaïal, 'the steward,' in ironical comment upon a stewardship which abused the trust committed to him. Chail's fault arose from the following circumstance. He was invited to be present at the consecration of a church at Denuschar in the diocese of Saca. He went, accompanied by a large body of prelates, clergy, and laity. When the hour of celebrating the liturgy came, all were kept waiting by the absence of the bishop of Saca. On inquiry, this bishop was reported to be engaged in preparing a banquet for his guests. The assembly waited till they would wait no longer, and the patriarch was pressed to proceed with the service. He had hardly offered the oblation ($\tau\delta\ \delta\acute{\alpha}\rho\omicron\nu$) on the altar when the bishop of Saca appeared; and, mad with rage, asked how any one could dare to act thus in his diocese and without his permission. He leaped upon the altar, took the bread, crumbled it to pieces, threw it on the ground, and left the church. The patriarch took fresh bread, gave the Communion to the people, and finished the service. On the next day, with the full consent of a synod of bishops, he deposed the bishop of Saca. The deposed man immediately proceeded to Cairo. Ahmed was preparing for an expedition to Syria, but wanted money. The bishop represented himself as an injured man, who was ready to give the Mahomedan important information. "We want nothing," he intimated, "but food and raiment: there is plenty of plate, gold and silver work, vestments of silk, and works of art in our churches: make the patriarch give you these, and your coffers will be full." The patriarch was summoned. His disproof of the bishop's charges was useless, his assertions that he and his were penniless were scoffed at. He was imprisoned, and only released at the expiration of a year, on condition that he raised 20,000 pieces of gold, one-half to be paid within a month, the rest in four. No means of procuring this sum were forthcoming, when it was hinted to Chail that ten sees were vacant, and that half the fine might be raised thus. The patriarch yielded. A second fall was easy after the first. Chail went to Alexandria to collect there sums additional to those already procured by the bishops from their respective dioceses, and by himself from the monasteries. He tried to persuade the clergy to give up and sell the church ornaments, but in vain: at last he obtained their consent to the sale of certain house-property attached to the church, on condition that he and his successors should pay them annually 1000 pieces of gold. About half the fine was thus paid, but at a cost to the fair name of a Church, and to the character of its patriarch which were never recovered. Though he lived till A.D. 899, Chail was never able to undo the effects of the degradation he had brought upon his Church and office. He began simony, and his successors continued it. He imposed a heavy impost upon the future patriarchs of his see, which continually brought them into collision with their clergy at Alexandria; and in one case, that of Theophanius (A.D. 954), resulted in passion, frenzy, madness, and death.

The political events of this period, such as the expulsion of the Tooloonidae, and the return of a caliph of Abbasside descent, were fruitful in misery and suffering to Christians. No men of mark appeared among the Jacobites, except Severus, bishop of Aschmonin, the historian and theologian: while among Catholics the historian and patriarch Euty chius is almost the only man whose name emerges from obscurity.

The Abbassides were in A.D. 968 expelled from Egypt by the successful general of Muazzi the second of the Fatemites, or descendants of Fatema, the only child of Mahommed, and the wife of Ali; and until the time of Saladin, Egypt was lost to the Abbassides, and New Cairo became (A.D. 972) the seat of the Fatemite Caliphate. This change of masters brought with it, for a time, rest and peace to the Christians from without; but it developed only the more flagrantly the corruptions prevalent in their own body, and especially among the clergy. The patriarch Ephraim (A.D. 977) boldly faced the two crying evils of the day, simony and concubinage. He abolished the simoniacal consecrations begun by Chail III.; and in his determination to put down the lax and immoral habits prevalent among the rich, he excommunicated a Jacobite courtier of great wealth and position. This man, angry at the attempt to make him part with his concubines, and irritated at the ecclesiastical censure, caused the patriarch to be poisoned. With the reformer's death ceased the power or wish to reform. Social abuses became worse than ever, and Philotheus (A.D. 981) renewed and developed the hateful practice of simony.

Renaudot attaches to this period the history of Vazah, the son of one of the caliph's councillors. Vazah was a fanatic in his zeal for Mahomedanism, and on one occasion insulted an apostate from that creed, who was being led to the stake. The martyr prophesied that his insulter would one day recognise the verity of the faith he then reviled, and would suffer in its behalf. The dying man's words, like those of another St. Stephen, sank into Vazah's mind. He tried to shake off their impression, and undertook the pilgrimage to Mecca. His journey there was thrice disturbed by visions of a monk who bade him follow him if he valued his soul's salvation; and Vazah left Mecca as depressed and unsatisfied as before. On the return journey, he got separated from his companions. While wandering in the desert, full of fear lest the wild beasts should attack him, he was startled by the sight of a horseman, splendidly dressed, and girt with a golden zone. The mysterious stranger asked him kindly why he was wandering there, bade him seat himself behind him, and in a moment he was translated to the church of St. Macarius at Misra. That, as in the case of the conversion of St. Paul, was the turning point of his life. Vazah was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. He recognised in the portrait of St. Macarius the features of the angelic horseman. He prayed, he studied, he was baptized, and took the name of Paul. After some time he was discovered. Now came his suffering for the faith which once he persecuted. He openly professed his faith on the very spot where he had reviled Christ's martyr: he saw his wife insulted and his child drowned before his eyes, and he heard himself denounced to the caliph. When set free, he retired to a lonely spot on the canal of the Nile, where he built a church to St. Michael the Archangel, and passed his time in writing theological works and his autobiography. Before he died he was ordained priest. He used to say that, though his life had been full of danger and sadness, but three things had ever distressed him: the execrable treatment of his wife by his own brother; the deliberate murder of his boy; and, last but not least, the bare-faced simony of Philothens.

Simony among prelates, and ambition among the lower clergy became, in fact, productive, about this time, of external persecution and internal disorder of the most aggravated kind.

The persecution under Hakem the third of the Fatemites, who was himself the son of a Christian mother, and whose uncles were respectively Catholic patriarch of Alexandria and patriarch of Jerusalem,—is counted by historians as the most severe which the Christians had yet had to suffer from their Muslim masters. Makrizi attributes the cause to the arrogance of certain Christians who had attained the rank of vizirs, and used their position to oppress Mussulmans as well as display their wealth and importance; but it is quite as, if not more, probable that scandals among the clergy caused the half-superstitious, half-fanatic Hakem to turn against Christians, Jews, and all who denied to him the title of another Christ so blasphemously assigned to him by his courtiers. John of Abunefar, the parish priest of an obscure village, near the monastery of St. Macarius, observing that others could be made bishops if they paid for it, requested of the patriarch Zacharias (A.D. 1005), to make him a bishop—without payment. The patriarchal council rejected the request, but that request was backed up by the Christians at Cairo. In order to prevent John petitioning Hakem, the patriarch's nephew ordered some Arabs to cast John into a dry well and stone him. John escaped. He was pacified, but again disappointed; and finally he appealed to Hakem. The patriarch was cast into a dungeon, and exposed to lions which refused to touch him; when released, through the intercession of a friendly Arab, Zacharias was compelled by the raging persecution to take refuge in the desert of St. Macarius, where the predatory bands kept at a distance the would-be destroyers of church and monastery, clergy and monks. The annals of the time record the heroic sufferings and Christian martyrdom of the caliph's principal secretary, and of his own uncle St. Jeremiah of Jerusalem. Christians were obliged to wear a wooden cross of 10 lbs. weight, and Jews were compelled to hang bells round their necks. Public processions on the great festivals, and public baptism on the banks of the Nile, were forbidden. Churches were pulled down, and monasteries given to the soldiery to sack: their endowments were confiscated to the public treasury, and their places occupied by mosques. The celebration of the liturgy and of the usual offices had well-nigh ceased in Egypt before those terrible nine years of oppression and cruelty had expired.

Hakem, at last, partly tired of the desolation around him, and partly surprised into mercy by the following circumstance, stopped the persecution, restored churches and property, and removed the distinctive marks of degradation which he had enforced on all who were not Mahommedans. A monk, who had obtained some influence over him, introduced again Zacharias to him. Hakem was astonished at the reverence paid to an apparently insignificant man, bearing no insignia of authority, and wearing no robe of rank. His astonishment was increased and changed into respect when he was told that that insignificant man's authority extended over Egypt, Ethiopia, Nubia, Pentapolis, and the other provinces, and that his mandate or letter, when signed with the cross, needed no support from money or man to secure for it ready obedience. "If that be so," said the emir, "there is no religion in the world which can compare with the Christian. We shed blood, spend money, and collect troops, and yet not even so are we obeyed. You Christians pay so much respect to one contemptible old man that no one of you opposes his command!" But it had cost the Christians under his dominion 3000 (not 30,000, Neale) churches before Hakem discovered this, and Christianity had received a blow from which it may be said never to have recovered.

The simony which had been distasteful to Zacharias personally, but not to his advisers, was continued by his successor Chenonda II. (A.D. 1032). This man, after binding himself to accept no money for conferring ordination, and after accepting the offer of a good deacon, named Bekir, to pay the demands of the Alexandrian clergy, actually procured the justification of simony by a host of bishops. His conduct had the effect of driving many from his communion to the purer shelter of the Catholic community; and it is significant of the frightfully low estimate of morality prevalent during this century among the Monophysite patriarchs of Alexandria, that Chail IV. (A.D. 1092) bound himself to the performance of these and similar pledges, and, with equal indifference to his own character, unscrupulously broke them.

Political events were now tending rapidly onwards to the fall of the Fatemite dynasty. Rebellion among the Turks of Lower Egypt was followed by war, pestilence, and famine, and the incapacity of the caliphs to quell such seditious movements was only equalled by their incapacity to resist the almost open independence of their imperious vizirs. The state of the Christians was one of comparative peace, or of intense suffering, according as these men ignored or noticed them. For example: that the caliph Moustansir should receive the patriarch Cyril II. (A.D. 1078) with great honour was no solace or compensation for imprisonment and misery endured in A.D. 1057 by Cyril's predecessor, at the hands of the vizir of Egypt. Again, the very fact of an Armenian Christian, Taged-doula, having been raised to the vizirate during the caliphate of Hafeth (A.D. 1131), following, as it did, upon the stern and contemptuous rule of Beder-el-gemal and the twenty years humane government of his son Afial, may even have been among the causes of renewed insult and depression, to which Christians were exposed so soon as Mahommedan zealots, like the vizirs Rodowan and Talahia, acquired power. The events in Syria, connected with the first and second crusades, could not fail, in their turn, to re-act upon the Christians in Egypt. Whether defeat or victory attended the Mahommedan arms, the result appears to have been the same; it always meant contempt or persecution; and the hope of relief from the yoke of centuries, which may have flashed across the minds of the Christians of Alexandria, when stragglers came hurrying in to tell how Christian standards waved on the walls of Damietta, must have sunk and died out speedily when Chiracou and Saladin entered their city, and the latter became vizir, and vowed war against the followers of the Cross.

During these political events, the Monophysite patriarchs of Alexandria reckoned in their succession men to whom the Coptic Church owes canons, held in esteem to the present day, and others who were a disgrace to their order through their simoniacal transactions or their absolute ignorance.

Among the most celebrated of the canons were the 'Constitutions' of Christodoulos (A.D. 1047). These forbade the baptism of a male and female child in the same water, and accompanied baptism with administration of communion, the child to be, if possible, fasting. Baptism and ordination were not to take place at Pentecost. The faithful were enjoined to stand reverently in the churches on Sundays and festivals, and not to converse with each other during the service. Modesty and silence were similarly enjoined on women, who had their proper place separate from that assigned to men. The faithful were expected to observe the fast of Lent in continence and humility; matrimony being forbidden during that season, and various rules being laid down for the observance of Holy Week. Fasting on Wednesdays, Fridays, and previous to the feasts of the Nativity and of the Apostles was commanded. Marriage between a Jacobite man and Melchite woman was only allowed if the crowning was performed by a Monophysite priest, and a promise given that the children should be baptized by Monophysite clergy. Strict rules were also laid down in relation to clerical discipline. No strange bishop, priest, or deacon could perform any official duty in Alexandria. Priests and deacons were charged to be earnest and attentive to their duties: quarrelling and disobedience on the part of the lower clergy towards their superiors was reprobated; and, in the case of any dispute, appeal to temporal authority in preference to ecclesiastical, was to be punished, in the case of the clergy, by suspension; in the case of the laity, by excommunication. These 'Constitutions,' founded upon the ancient canons and traditions, were probably drawn up to meet the special circumstances of the day and diocese; and the same is, perhaps, to be said of the canons of Cyril (A.D. 1087), which Renaudot does not give at length, and which were declined by the clergy of the Sahid district, on the ground that they would not change their ancient statutes.

Macarius II. (A.D. 1102), in whose patriarchate Jerusalem was conquered by the crusaders, recalled into existence old rules which, through time or ignorance, had lapsed or been neglected. The Copts were in the habit of first baptizing their children and then circumcising them. Macarius reversed this order, adopting the more primitive practice. He forbade also betrothals and any part of the wedding service in private houses, and recalled his people to the sense that the church was the best and most fitting place for sacred rites.

Gabriel II. (A.D. 1131), the successor of Mac-

carious, whose character stands high for piety, learning, and consistent opposition to simony, also issued a set of synodal constitutions, 30 in number, which significantly illustrate the manners and customs of the clergy and laity of his age. The first excommunicated any one who gave, or any one who received, money for ordination. The second exhorted Christians to attend the churches for morning and evening prayers. The third charged the bishops to explain the creed and the Lord's prayer in the 'vulgar tongue,' a proof how completely Arabic had superseded Coptic among the Christians of Alexandria. Other articles concerned ecclesiastics. They were not to attend the games and dances, nor permit the introduction of stage-players and mimes into their churches: they were charged not to appropriate to their own use the oblations offered by the faithful, the practice having crept in of even using as common food that which was intended for consecration at Communion: they were not to celebrate the liturgy in any other manner than that prescribed by authority, and they were to be robed in their distinctive vestments. All, destined by their parents for the life of the ecclesiastic, were to be taught the Scriptures and the discipline of the church from their earliest years: no one was to be admitted to the monastic profession except after a probation of three years. The laity were charged to support the clergy; and not to neglect offering their oblations, first-fruits, and tithes: while the clergy were forbidden to turn the church into a house for themselves and their families; or to have in their house any woman, unless of an age and relationship which would place them beyond suspicion. Other customs, some religious, some social, were dealt with as follows. All who came to Holy Communion were charged to prepare themselves for it by prayer and fasting. Marriages were not to be performed during Lent or at Easter; and such practices as spending the marriage-day in games and dancing, so that the liturgy was deferred till night-time, were forbidden. Baptism was not to be celebrated during the public service, and no child was to be circumcised after baptism. Concubinage was strictly forbidden, as was also burial in churches.

These various and successive constitutions tell almost as much by what they omit as by what they record. They expose follies as well as affirm virtues; they indicate crimes as well as illustrate methods by which crime or folly might be restrained and subdued. They enable the reader to appreciate the efforts made by devout minds to retain their faith and practice in troublous and eventful times; and they equally permit him to understand many fruitful sources of jealousy and opposition, not only between laity and clergy, but between clergy and clergy. It will be sufficient to give one instance of these class-contentests respectively, in illustration of a necessarily broad statement.

Among the regulations pressed upon the Monophysites by Christodoulos, was one charging them to prepare, at their own home, the oblations intended for use in the church: these oblations were to be prepared according to the ancient custom; that is, they were to be made of water, flour, and leaven. The Jacobites and Nestorians of Syria were in the habit of adding to this salt and oil. On one occasion Christodoulos was present in a church, when a Syrian, the principal physician to the caliph Moustansir, brought an oblation made after the manner of his country. The patriarch not only refused the gift, but gravely rebuked the giver, and finally drove him out of the church wounded. The injured layman appealed to his own patriarch, John X. of Antioch, but without any more satisfactory result than a written defence from John of the Syrian practice, and a laudable silence upon the aggressiveness of his brother of Alexandria.

The bitterness, party-spirit, and selfishness, only too common among the clergy, is, in its turn, painfully exhibited in the contest which took place (A.D. 1086) between the patriarch Cyril and his bishops. Cyril, before his elevation, was not a man remarkable for learning; and it would seem that the bishops of Lower Egypt gave their votes in his favour, in the hope that he would turn to them for counsel and advice, and that, practically, the real power would be in their hands. But after his consecration Cyril devoted himself assiduously to study as well as to gaining a practical acquaintance with his diocese. As his practical experience and mental culture expanded, he felt more and more disposed to go alone: and the exercise of his own judgment was eventually the cause of his displeasing his suffragans. Cyril had promised the bishops and some of the principal laymen of Misra, to remove from his company some bishops and monks who were distasteful to them. He declined, however, to fulfil his promise, probably acting upon better and less prejudiced information. The bishops appealed to the vizir, Beder-el-gemal, an act of glaring disobedience to the constitutions of Christodoulos. The vizir summoned them to the suburbs of Misra, and they met to the number of 47. Beder-el-gemal's opening words astonished and confounded the men who had hoped for his assistance. He gravely rebuked them for their want of respect and deference to the authority of their patriarch, and dismissed them with the charge that he and they should submit to him copies of those canons which regulated their discipline and order. Cyril and his opponents prepared respectively their canonical compendiums, and again waited upon the vizir. On meeting them, Beder-el-gemal thanked them for the synopsis each party had given him, and added; that, while he did not want these laws for himself, he certainly thought that those before him, who had now refreshed their memories with a study of their own canons, would do well not only to read them, but to conform to them. He concluded with the sarcastic rebuke: "If you profess the same religion, live harmoniously: render to your superior the obedience due to him; do not think so much as you do of getting rich, but be more liberal in your almsgiving to the poor, as Christ your master has charged you." The humiliation must have been felt to be all the greater, when it was remembered that it was a Mahommedan who was pointing out to Christians their duties.

During the lifetime of this same patriarch, Cyril, much was done towards spreading and confirming the Jacobite faith in Nubia and Ethiopia; bishops in the former country, and the Metropolitan in the latter, united to improve the morals of the people and cement ecclesiastical authority.

The early years of Saladin's sultanate (A.D. 1171) were marked by acts towards the Christians of Egypt which his after conduct explains to have been due to political considerations rather than to theological differences. He found the chief posts at the court of Aded, the last Fata-mite caliph, occupied by Jews and Christians; and, just as he found it good policy to distribute among his rivals and dependants the vast treasures which the caliphs of that dynasty had accumulated, so now he removed from officemen employed by them, but hateful to every conscientious Mussulman. He re-enforced the then almost obsolete statutes: Christians and Jews were to wear the girdle and dress which would distinguish them from Mahommedans; they were not to ride on horses or mules; they were not to hold public office—a condition which transformed many a Christian into an apostate from the faith, that he might retain the emoluments of his post. The churches were befouled with mud, the crosses erected over them were thrown down, the use of the church bells was forbidden, the solemn processions customary on Palm Sunday were stopped, and the prayers within the sacred walls were only to be recited in a low voice. But when Saladin felt his power assured, his natural hatred of such petty restrictions prompted the assumption of a more generous line of conduct. He removed these restrictions entirely or in part, the taxes were lightened where they were not altogether abolished; Christians were once more permitted to aspire to posts at court or in the public departments; and so rapidly did they make up for their temporary exclusion, that they were soon found occupying again their former lucrative and honourable offices. It must, however, be noted, that the majority of the Christians thus favoured were Jacobites. The old feeling always strong against the Melchites, that they were more or less in league with the opponents of Mahommed, was stronger than ever at a time when crusaders were striking death-blows at Damietta as well as at Ascalon, at Alexandria as well as at Acre. The Catholics of Egypt did not attempt to disguise their hope that the champions of the Cross would eventually turn their victorious arms to the adopted land of St. Mark; and the frequent and ignoble failures, such as the capture of the Holy Sepulchre by Saladin (A.D. 1187), and the re-conquest of Damietta by Kamel (A.D. 1221), only served to make the orthodox Alexandrians hope against hope, and suggest to the pope of Rome, and all whom he could influence, fresh schemes of conquest and fresh modes of successful inroad upon the Saracen possessions in Egypt.

But, however free the Jacobites were, comparatively speaking, from external and political agitation, the records of this period exhibit the worst features of superstitious irreverence and internal dissension distracting their ecclesiastical communion. The great confessional controversy of the time, and the miserable party spirit, jealousies, and abuses connected with the name of the patriarch David-Cyril cannot be passed over in silence, however painfully they may exhibit theological ignorance and clerical arrogance.

During the lifetime of the patriarch Mar Ill. (A.D. 1164), a man who, on his elevation seems to have abandoned the austerity of his previous monastic life for one of luxury, another Mark, surnamed ben-el-Konbar, and also a monk, preached earnestly and eloquently that men could not obtain remission of sins unless they confessed to their priests, and fulfilled the penitential discipline required by the canon. From the very earliest times the Eastern and Western Churches had agreed in recommending the practice of confession, and had gradually changed it from a voluntary into a compulsory act. But by degrees a habit, partly due to the infamous character of the priests, had grown up which practically dispensed with the obligatory nature of confession. Incense was burnt at the commencement of the celebration of the liturgy while the people were engaged in private confession; and the belief was gradually introduced into the Coptic Church that remission of sins was in some mysterious way connected with that burning. Gradually, says Neale, the rite was considered to convey sacramental absolution; and, by a natural deduction from false premisses, confession in a private house before a lighted censer was elevated to the same dignity: and the office of the priest was disused as superfluous. Penitential discipline, again, however stringent in theory, had become in practice reduced to nothing. The mere profession of regret for apostasy was now sufficient to procure re-admission to full communion. Patriarch-reformers and compilers of canons might sigh for the times when such men as Vazah lived and suffered at the bidding of penitential laws; but the day for enforcing them had passed. The Jacobite-apostate, if irritated and refused absolution, had but to threaten that he would turn Melchite, and none could be more accommodating than his spiritual pastors and masters. It is significant of the powerlessness, if not of the incompetency, of the clerical leaders of the times, that not only was the spiritual power of binding and loosing neglected and denied, but even so good and learned a man as the patriarch John V. (A.D. 1147) actually authorised the abuse of confession previously mentioned.

The fulminations of Mark ben-el-Konbar against such degeneracy, and his earnest efforts for the revival of discipline, were as unwelcome to both John and Mark, as they were welcome to those members of their communion who preferred earnestness to luxury and spiritual activity to ascetic solitude. John listened to insinuations against Mark ben-el-Konbar's private character, and excommunicated him; and the patriarch Mark summoned him to his presence to answer to the charges, not only that he persisted in propagating his views, but also, though excommunicated, gave penance and absolution to the multitudes who flocked to him. Whatever passed at the interview, whether Mark ben-el-Konbar promised to conform to the patriarch's wishes or not, in a very few months the reformer was actively at work again, and with such success that the bishops either synodically, or by letter, demanded his deposition and excommunication. Mark appealed to the civil powers, but nothing issuing from that appeal, patriarch and monk both appealed to Michael the Great, the Jacobite patriarch of Antioch. Michael's answer was, in one respect, sensible: he replied that while one exaggerated the other depreciated the importance of confession; but it was unfair to the personal character and belief of Mark ben-el-Konbar. Michael's mind had been poisoned against Mark by the insinuation that he held Massalian tenets, and he therefore condemned him. The rest of Mark's life was a sad one. He became a Melchite, then he returned to the Jacobites, then he became a Melchite again, and so on, seeking peace first in the one communion, then in the other, anxious to deepen the spiritual life of the Christians by the means which best commended themselves to his mind and belief, and clinging, in order to do so, to that communion in which he had been brought up, but which positively refused the help of so true a son. If he has been called the Egyptian Chillingworth, he deserves also to be called something of an Egyptian Savonarola.

The accession of Cyril to the dignity of patriarch (A.D. 1235) was preceded by twenty years of disputed elections, charges and counter-charges, fraud, bribery, and corruption, in which Cyril himself, then a monk, and known by the name of David ben Laklak, and his friends were chiefly conspicuous. When he finally attained the object of his ambition, it may be readily supposed that he verified the fears always entertained respecting him. He made his entry into Misra, accompanied by vast crowds: the gospels and crosses were carried before him; priests, deacons, and the leading laity, many on horseback, swelled the procession; musicians played their pipes, trumpets, and drums; torch-bearers lit up the darkness. It was evident that Cyril meant to be a great man, and the angry Mahomedans openly resented his pomp. No sooner did Cyril feel his position fairly secure than he began to shew his true colours. He had surprised and pleased both friends and foes by refusing to take any money for ordaining priests and deacons, but this assumption of virtue was soon cast aside. Almost all the episcopal sees were vacant, owing to the long interregnum. These Cyril proceeded to fill up, demanding and receiving sums in proportion to the value of the post. His proceedings were so outrageous, and the alienation of the people so much on the increase, that his brother bishops assembled in the church called Moallaqah, courageously rebuked him, and made him promise that he would cease his simoniacal practices, as soon as he had paid the usual tribute to the sultan. Cyril promised, and not only broke his promise at the first opportunity, but immediately proceeded to do what would prove to the bishops that he would not be called to task by them. He constituted all the monasteries of Egypt patriarchal; that is, he transferred jurisdiction over them to himself; this left to the bishops authority over the churches only in which were no monks, while it considerably increased his own revenues.

This was met by retaliation. Cyril was accused to the Mahomedans of having amassed a large fortune, and he had to pay largely for his liberty. This charge was renewed when Adel became sultan (A.D. 1237), but unsuccessfully, and Cyril himself declined to take any notice of propositions for reform submitted to him while in prison. In A.D. 1239 fourteen bishops met at Misra, and fairly told the patriarch that they would remain in communion with him only on condition of his subscribing certain articles then and there agreed upon. The principal of these articles for the reformation of the Church were as follows:—No one was to be ordained bishop unless he were a learned man, and approved for the post by the united suffrages of bishops, clergy, monks, and laymen. No money was to be taken for ordination to any ecclesiastical rank; and ecclesiastical judges were warned against accepting presents under any pretext. Excommunication was to follow the breach of these statutes. The patriarch was requested, in conjunction with the bishops, to prepare a set of canons dealing principally with things lawful and unlawful, matrimonial and hereditary matters, and the right and due administration of the sacraments. The bishops were to meet once a year synodically, in the third week after Pentecost. The customs of the Coptic Church were not to be changed. Circumcision was to precede baptism unless necessary impediments were alleged. Men of illegitimate birth or of servile condition were not to be ordained, exception being made in the case of Ethiopian and Nubian captives. The practice of giving the nuptial blessing and of celebrating the marriage rite without the liturgy, and in private houses rather than in churches, was prohibited. Other statutes forbade the ordination by patriarch or bishops of any one outside their own dioceses; and the ordination of a bishop was made contingent on the assent of the people of the diocese and of the ordaining bishop; statutes evidently framed to prevent, as far as possible, such acts as Cyril's ordination of a metropolitan at Jerusalem, on the one hand; and, on the other, the command to ordain so frequently urged by Mahomedan secretaries and emirs. Bishops, fairly inducted to their sees, were to enjoy authority over their entire diocese without any deduction of city or authority; a statute intended to prevent the recurrence of such acts as those by which Cyril had constituted "patriarchal" churches. Other provisions had a similar tendency: the patriarch was not to assign to himself the offerings made in the churches on festival days or in accordance with local custom; the bishops might, if they pleased, assign them to him in lieu of the ordinary pension. Patriarchs were not to excommunicate laymen or clerics without legitimate and canonical cause; and they were never to do this in ex-metropolitan dioceses, unless under most exceptional circumstances. Various rules affecting monks and monastic habits, and defining liturgical "decency and order," conclude a document valuable for the light it throws upon the ecclesiastical manners and customs of the time. The patriarch and bishops signed these statutes, and prepared and signed the further collection of canons dealing specially with the points named in the statutes.

But so far as Cyril was concerned, his signature was worthless. Within a very short time he was again accused to the sultan of excessive cruelty and of simony; yet, strangely enough, though the patriarch's practice was everywhere known, no two bishops could be got to witness against him; a fact in itself sufficiently significant of the manner in which the majority had obtained their preferment. Again a meeting was called by bishops and laymen; again they urged Cyril not to break the ecclesiastical laws; again they threatened to break off communion with him; and again they proposed articles of reformation. Cyril retorted that they should first settle their own differences. A personal friend endeavoured to procure what others had failed to do. At his suggestion the patriarch signed a paper submitted to him. He allotted to a faithful and trustworthy priest the distribution of the fruits of the churches he, Cyril, was accused of misappropriating; a fourth part was to go to the reparation of churches; a fourth to the necessary daily expenses, and two-fourths to the support of the poor. He further promised to ordain bishops for the two important sees of Misra and Khandeka, sees which he had kept vacant in order to enjoy their revenues, and to fill up other vacancies. He agreed to nominate two teachers who should expound the Scriptures and teach the laity their duties, one at Misra, the other at Cairo. He consented that the monasteries which he had reserved to himself should remain under their proper episcopal authority. Whether or not Cyril was in earnest, it is impossible to determine now. If he was, those whom he had offended did not give him an opportunity of proving his earnestness: they rejected his paper as deficient. In A.D. 1240, one of Cyril's own collectors and most intimate friends, disgusted with his patron's avarice and obstinacy, accused him to the emir. Cyril was again imprisoned. Nine bishops, who were consulted by the emir, were compelled to admit that the charges against their patriarch were only too just, and the amount of his extortion was variously computed at 15 to 17,000 pieces of gold. But they agreed to forgive and forget if Cyril would sign a paper similar to that which had been signed by his immediate predecessor, John VI. In substance the paper was similar to what Cyril had already signed. He was quite willing to sign again:—and to break his promise. The following year the emir had to listen to the renewal of the old charges, coupled with a request that Cyril might be deposed: and the sequel to this fresh appeal explains how it was that a man like Cyril could continue his notoriously uncanonical practices with very little fear of ultimate consequences. "Can you depose him?" asked the judge: "do your disciplinary laws permit it?" The plaintiffs were forced to confess that existing laws did not touch the case, and that they could not convene a council with sufficient authority to pass the requisite canons. To the end of his life Cyril continued as he had begun: and when he died, in A.D. 1243, he left behind him the reputation of one who for twenty years had sought to obtain the patriarchal dignity by every means of corruption within his reach; and who, when he had attained it, degraded it for seven years by conduct worse than that of the most worthless enemies of Christianity. However often convicted of simony, and however often he promised amendment under pain of anathema, he always plunged again into the same abyss of avarice and sacrilege: he thought of nothing else but accumulating money.

It is a relief to turn from these black pages in the history of the Coptic Church to a series of events which took place in connexion with the Jacobite communion in Ethiopia about the years 1209 and 1210. Lalibela, the "lion," and Mascall-Gabrit, "the handmaid of the cross," were king and queen of that country, and the virtues and pious works of the former have secured him a place in the catalogue of Ethiopian saints. A mission came from them to the patriarch John VI. (A.D. 1189) desiring the ordination of a new metropolitan. After some delay, due apparently to the difficulty of making a suitable appointment, Kilus, bishop of Fna, was translated, and probably reconsecrated. The position of "Abuna" of Axum was, with respect to emoluments as well as to peace and security, the most enviable of the time; and Kilus was received with befitting pomp and warm welcome by king and people. But after four years Kilus was back again in Egypt, complaining of ill-treatment and of the usurpation of his authority by the queen's brother, whom he had raised to the episcopate. He asserted that his life had been attempted, that of the hundred followers who had fled with him all had perished from want except the two male servants and one female who were then with him. The story was so strange that John ordered him to remain at Misra, till he had sifted the matter thoroughly. A mission to Ethiopia brought back a very different account of Kilus' conduct. He was stated to have killed the treasurer of the metropolitan church on the supposition of his having committed theft; and to have fled to avoid the just vengeance of the victim's friends. The other statements put forward by Kilus were proved to be groundless, and the patriarch was urged to appoint another metropolitan. John deposed Kilus, and consecrated a monk named Isaac; and under this prelate the work of confirming and preaching the Jacobite faith progressed with the hearty assent of Lalibela and his subjects.

From the time of Cyril to the present day, the history of the Coptic Church may almost be said to be a blank page. Scholars have been unable to discover MSS. dealing with the period in the monasteries of Egypt, or have failed to transcribe them: and a consecutive narrative of events is hardly to be framed from the few allusions to be gleaned here and there from ecclesiastical and historical notices. A few facts and a few names are all that can be dealt with.

After about eight years from the death of Cyril the hitherto vacant patriarchate was filled up by the appointment of Athanasius III. (A.D. 1251). It is impossible now to determine whether this long voidance of the see was due to the unwillingness of the electors to appoint another spiritual head whose character and conduct might prove like that of his predecessor, or to the stirring political events connected with the second capture of Damietta by the crusaders (A.D. 1249), and the subsequent retreat, captivity, and liberation of St. Louis of France (A.D. 1250), or to a combination of the ecclesiastical and political agitations of the time. Athanasius, a good, just, and humble man, did his best to remedy the crimes and follies of Cyril; but violence and party spirit broke out again within a few days of his decease.

A story told by the Arabic annalist Makrizi, and which is probably to be placed about the year A.D. 1290, illustrates painfully the degraded moral condition of the believers of the day. During the sultanate of El-Melki el-Ashraf, the emirs employed largely the services of Christians as their secretaries; and, as appears to have been almost invariably the result, the Christians shewed themselves overbearing to the Mussulmans, and assumed superiority in dress and demeanour. One day a dispute took place in the street between a Christian secretary and a Mussulman agent with reference to some money due from the latter to their common master. The secretary tied the agent's hands behind him, and bade him walk on. A crowd of Mahommedans rushed to the rescue, freed the agent, and, when driven away by the secretary's servants, flew to the castle and appealed to the sultan. The tumult was so great, and the secretary's conduct so indefensible, that a general sacking of the houses of Jews and Christians followed, churches were plundered, and people murdered. The sultan with difficulty checked these outrages; and, with the comment "I will not have a Christian diwan in my government," gave the secretaries their choice, Islamism or death. The emir assembled them, and told them the sultan's ultimatum: "He who prefers his (Christian) religion is to be put to death; but he who prefers El-Islam shall receive a robe of honour, and it will be well with him." One of the secretaries of state answered him: "O lord, which of us men high in office would choose death for religion? By God, a religion for which we should have to die and go, God hath not written on it His peace. Tell us—you, the sultan and yourself—the religion you wish us to choose—and to follow." The emir burst out laughing, and said: "What religion should we choose but El-Islam?" The notaries came in, and the secretaries were recorded Mussulmans; they received their robes of honour, and made their profession in the presence of the council. In a very short time these men, despised by their fellow-Christians, began in their turn to despise and take their revenge on the Mahommedans; and the state of things was pithily summed up by a correspondent of the emir: "These infidels have adopted El-Islam through the sword and by force; but no sooner have they become free than they have denied the faith. They have embraced El-Islam for mere love of gain and of rest. It is true that they are free, but they are not Mussulmans."

The patriarchate of John VIII. (A.D. 1300) was also agitated by a persecution mainly due to the arrogant behaviour of the Christians employed in civil offices. The vizir, El-Maghrib, came to Cairo while on a pilgrimage. When riding in the street he met a man on horseback, wearing a white turban and a gorgeous cloak, followed by a multitude of petitioners praying him to attend to their requests, a prayer which he answered by blows or by scornful silence. El-Maghrib, naturally indignant, was filled with fury when he discovered that the man was a Christian. He went to the palace. He demanded of the emirs how Christians had acquired power not only to make Mussulmans supplicate before them, but actually serve them; he protested with passionate tears against the indignities he had witnessed; he asked how his fellow-countrymen could ever expect to conquer their foes when they neglected altogether the ancient laws against the Christians; he insisted that the laws passed by the great Omar, on the first capture of Egypt, should be re enacted. The principal emirs sided with him. The two patriarchs, according to Makrizi, the chief judge of the Jews, the representatives of the church of Moallaqah and of the leading monastery, were summoned, and commanded to enforce upon their people these obsolete laws:—Christians were to wear turbans of blue and a girdle; they were forbidden to ride on horses; and disobedience to these injunctions was to be followed by excommunication: the Jews were to wear yellow turbans, refusal being followed by a heavy fine, if not by blood: no Christian or Jew was to hold an appointment under government. The news spread, and the Mahomedan population, noting the bent of their emirs, destroyed or closed churches; and it was not till James king of Aragon interfered in behalf of the Christians that the houses of God were again opened.

Apparently, the Christians either could not, or would not, learn wisdom. Fifty years (A.D. 1348) had hardly passed when a fresh and fiercer persecution broke out, originating in the same cause. The ostentation, luxury, arrogance, and even immorality, of so-called Christians employed in every department of court, official, and civil business had reached a pitch which the Mahomedans were determined not to tolerate any longer. The Church lands amounted to 50,000 acres, and the wealth of individuals was notorious. It was but a little spark which set the flame alight; but the conflagration which it originated left marks as disastrous as those which tracked the path of Mahomedan hatred on the first conquest of Egypt. One of the Christian secretaries, escorted by footmen before and by slaves behind, passed a famous mosque. He flaunted before the enraged fanatics the forbidden white turban, and caracoled his steed in defiance of the law which degraded him to a mule. He flaunted before the enraged fanatics the forbidden white turban, and caracoled his steed in defiance of the law which degraded him to a mule. His insolent and contemptuous bearing irritated the mob beyond endurance; they dashed upon him, and with difficulty were induced to spare his life. The tumult and the outcry was such that the emir promised immediate interference. The patriarch and his bishops, the chief ruler of the Jews and his elders, were again commanded to appear before the sultan, attended by his emirs and eadis. In the most formal and solemn manner the private secretary of the sultan read before Christian, Jew, and Mussulman the treaty which all should bind themselves to keep:—

The laws of Omar were to be enforced with the most absolute strictness, and fresh ones, calculated to prevent the recurrence of offences so scandalous to the followers of the Prophet, were introduced. It was decreed that Christians and Jews should be shut out of everything connected with the sultan's court and government and of the courts of the emirs, even if they professed Islamism; and that any who did profess it should never be allowed to return to their house and family unless they also became Mahomedans. Christians were not to be allowed to build monastery, church, or cell anywhere in Mussulman dominions, nor to repair existing edifices. They were to wear the distinctive turbans, and never think of entering the public baths without the prescribed token, made of brass, iron, or lead, hanging round the neck. If they met Mahomedans in the road, they were to make way for them, and never refuse them food and shelter in church or monastery for three nights. They were forbidden to have or buy Mahomedan male and female servants; they were not allowed to teach the Koran to their own sons, while they were not to hinder them from becoming Mussulmans. They were not to assume Mahomedan names, cognomens, or agnomens, nor to use seals with Arabic characters, nor to allow their women to adopt Mahomedan customs. Burial of the dead was to be conducted without public procession, and their sepulchres were to be of low height. Their houses were not to be built so as to overtop others, and they were forbidden to follow the medical profession. Bells, or rather the wooden clappers in use in churches, were not to be struck loudly, and loud singing was equally prohibited.

The excited populace turned upon men thus handed over to their fury, and for a month life and property were at their mercy. Churches and houses were destroyed in spite of the interference of the emirs. Christians were publicly insulted, beaten, and killed. They did not dare to leave their hiding-places. The terror was so great that a number of Christians in the Sahid, or Upper Egypt, pulled down their churches and erected mosques, embraced Islamism, and studied the Koran. In one village more than 450 Christians are said to have become Mussulmans in one day. Their intermarriages with Mahomedan women perhaps rendered these apostasies more easy; and the hope that, when the storm had passed, they might again creep into public offices, was certainly more potent than attachment to the faith of Jesus Christ.

The patriarchate of Gabriel V. (c. A.D. 1411) is still remembered among the Copts for the emendation, and confirmation by patriarchal authority, of the ritual of the sacraments. His work contained the rules for the administration of the Offices, the prayers being designated by their opening words. In the volume were contained the order for the administration of baptism, for the absolution of penitents, for matrimony, for holy orders, for unction of the sick, the special ritual for the celebration of the liturgy, prayers to be used when conferring the monastic habit, &c.

Some thirty years later, the decrees of reunion between the Eastern and Western churches, passed at the council of Florence, induced the Coptic patriarch, John XI., to send an embassy to that city. He professed himself desirous, on behalf of the Jacobite Church, of a nominal union with Rome, and a decree to that effect appears to have been made, but no result came from it.

Similar wishes, followed eventually by similar results, recur in the history of the Portuguese interferences with the Coptic Church in Ethiopia and Abyssinia. David (A.D. 1503–1540), king of these territories, was himself personally favourable to the Roman faith, and letters from him to pope Clement VII. are extant. When the Abuna Mark became too infirm to manage the affairs of his church, David persuaded him to consecrate as his successor a Portuguese named Bermudez. Mark did so. Bermudez proceeded to Rome to obtain the pope's ratification, and to Lisbon to urge again the terms of an alliance between Abyssinia and Portugal against the Mahomedans which had been proposed many years before. When Bermudez returned David was dead, war was raging everywhere, and the new king, Claudius, a Jacobite, resented the subjection of Ethiopia to Rome. Disputes between Claudius and Bermudez waxed so warm that the king at length wrote to the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria; a new Abuna, Joseph, was sent, and Bermudez retired to Goa, and eventually to Lisbon. The court of Rome made another effort to retain their hold on Ethiopia, and failed. A Jesuit was sent to the Jacobite patriarch, Gabriel VII. (c. A.D. 1560), who treated him courteously, but sent him away as empty as he came.

For about 60 years (c. A.D. 1560—A.D. 1625) correspondence and negotiations were more or less frequent between the Coptic patriarchs and the popes of Rome on the subject of re-admission to the Roman communion; but the results were invariably unsatisfactory. This alliance appears to have been especially hateful to the great Cyril Lucar, successively (Catholic) patriarch of Alexandria (A.D. 1602) and of Constantinople (A.D. 1621). In a letter he addressed to M. Uytendogaert, minister at the Hague, and in answer to that minister's questions, he proceeds to give him information respecting "the heretics in the East;" and that information is so curious in itself that the paragraphs relative to the Copts are well worth extracting. The intense bitterness and (often) ignorance displayed in them, while it has made some critics question the genuineness of the letter, is perhaps to be explained by that similar ignorance more or less found in every partisan who does not care to know too much about his next-door neighbour's schism.

"There are four sects," says Cyril, "with whom our church does not communicate, the Armenian, the Coptic, the Maronite, and the Jacobite, whose mode of worship is unsightly, and their ceremonies worse than brutish. In matters of faith, they are heretics; in habits and other circumstances of an ecclesiastical nature, you would say that they differed nothing from beasts. They are so sunk in darkness as scarcely to know if they believe, or what they believe; but each of them is obstinately attached to its own superstitions and errors. . . . The Copts follow the doctrine of Dioscurus and Eutyches, a filthy and barbarous race. They are called Copts, because they used to circumcise themselves; but this they do no longer: not, however, as they state it, because circumcision is vain and against the law (for our Lord Christ Himself was circumcised), but because they thereby gave other Christians, who do not practise circumcision, an occasion of laughing at them. I have abundant acquaintance with these pests in the city of Grand Cairo; for as this was formerly an archbishopric of the patriarchate of Alexandria, I have for the most part taken up my residence there, on account of the salubrity of the air, seldom visiting Alexandria. These Copts are so numerous there, that if the Greeks were counted against them, as Homer wrote of the Greeks and Trojans, the Copts would be ten times as many as the Greeks, and many a dozen would lack a cup-bearer. My predecessors in the patriarchate, and especially Meletius, my last predecessor, have made many efforts to bring them back to the way of truth, but without success.

"Pope Clement VIII. of Rome both did and bore many things to come to an arrangement with them; and you would laugh, sir, if you knew what arts the Copts used in that business, and how much the pope was imposed upon; although Baronius, the new historian, before he became acquainted with the real state of things, and perhaps with a view to flatter Clement, after the fashion of the court of Rome, was in a hurry to give him the credit of having accomplished by his newly-acquired industry the conversion of the Copts to the Church of Rome, and chose to give an account of it in his annals, which proved, not long after, to be entirely false. In fact, Paul, the present pope, for that very cause banished several Copts from Rome.

"They have a superior, who is called in their own language Jabuna, which means, my Lord. He came several times to visit me in Egypt; but every time he came, he came in silence and went in silence. One of his people spoke for him, and he signified his assent to, or dissent from, the speaker by the inclination or holding back of his head; but he never opened his mouth, because, as he says, it is not allowed. For my part, I am a talkative and chatty person, who think that I ought to speak with my own mouth and not with that of others. But the thing which more displeases me in that good lord is, that he never shewed me any part of his face except his eyes. His whole head, whether he raises it or inclines it, is covered with a cloth, so that he will never give you a glimpse of his face. I am unwilling to trouble a person of your sagacity any further about such absurdities."

In another letter, addressed to the archbishop of Spalatro in A.D. 1618, he alludes again to the so-called Copt embassy to Clement VIII., and calls it "an imposture," "a trick," "a farce;" and in a third letter to a M. de Wilhelm, when speaking of the troubles which had apparently lately come upon the Copts through the death of their patriarch, he has the heartlessness to write: "The poor wretches go on from bad to worse, and one can expect no other end but their total ruin, because they will not place themselves under our government; which, as my predecessors tried for many years with loss, and in vain, I have determined not to undertake." This is not the place to enter into a discussion of the character of one who has been called a martyr by some and a fiend by others; but humility and patience with the Copts were certainly not amongst his virtues.

Rome did not cease her efforts to bring Abyssinia into her communion. In A.D. 1558 the pope, at the instance of the great Ignatius Loyola, actually consecrated a patriarch and sent him with two bishops on a fresh mission; and followed it up in a few years (c. A.D. 1560) by those direct overtures to the Coptic patriarch at Alexandria, to which allusion has been made. When Melec Segued, the nephew of Claudius, became king (A.D. 1563), he permitted the patriarch, intruded by Rome, to live in peace; but it soon became evident that the mission was making no progress; and the lamentable belief, imitated from the Mahomedans, took possession of the Portuguese that the true faith was to be propagated by the sword. Eventually that faith and its propagators perished by the sword.

In A.D. 1604, and in the reign of Za Dengeh,

Segued's nephew, a Jesuit, Pedro Paez, arrived at the Abyssinian court. His piety, learning, and eloquence were rewarded by the most unexpected results. The king and many of the courtiers abjured the Monophysite creed and embraced the Roman. But this arrayed against Za Denghel both those who hated this change of religious belief and those who fretted under his powerful yoke. The king appealed to the pope and to the king of Spain and Portugal for help; the Monophysite Abuna fulminated his excommunication against the king, absolved his people from their allegiance, and the rebels flew to arms. Za Denghel was slain; and eventually one Socinius became emperor. The hopes anticipated of him by the adherents of the old religion were soon disappointed. The preaching of Paez, and the public discomfiture in controversy of the Abuna Simon, were followed by an embassy to Rome, intimating the adhesion of Socinius to the Roman faith. Again the standard of revolt was raised, and again the Abuna excommunicated the king; but this time the royal troops reversed their previous defeat. The leader of the rebels and Simon were both left dead upon the field. Socinius became more and more angry with these religious dissentients; he issued proclamations forbidding practices common among them, such as the Jewish observance of the Saturday, which only served to exasperate them and foment further rebellion. A kinder and more conciliatory policy might have been successful, but he chose to crush where he might have led; and when the influence of Paez was removed by death, the king threw away restraint, and yielded himself to the wishes of Mendez the new patriarch. This man had been consecrated at Lisbon, and arrived at court A.D. 1626. The reconciliation of the emperor to Rome and his vow of allegiance to the pope, Urban VIII., was publicly performed, and with—to the Abyssinian—offensive acts of public humiliation. It was followed by proclamations commanding all, under pain of death, to become Roman Catholics. Circumcision and polygamy were abolished; existing churches, clergy, and converts were treated like heathen; re-consecration, re-ordination, re-baptism were insisted upon; the Roman calendar replaced the Ethiopic, and the Ethiopic liturgy was only allowed to retain its place after undergoing such alterations as Mendez considered necessary. It will be readily supposed that these and similar high-handed measures not only gave great offence, but irritated into open defiance all who could not or would not surrender their belief and customs. Socinius' lifetime was spent in checking or putting down rebellion after rebellion. On one dreadful day, when he stood surveying the carnage which the Portuguese beside him called a victory, his son Facilidas (or Basilides) spoke out the horror and distress which his soldiers felt. "This is not," he urged, "a success against Mahomedans or pagans, but against men of our own flesh and blood, fellow-subjects, fellow-Christians. By thus destroying ourselves we are putting a sword into the hands of our enemies. They will not want to slay us, they will leave the work of extermination to ourselves." Socinius, sick at heart, and conscious how miserable had been the failure of his test, "Be a Roman Catholic or die," a mere parody of the Mahomedan formula—issued an edict of toleration.

Men might hold, as they pleased, the old or new faith.

Facilidas became emperor in A.D. 1632. He took, if not cruel, yet fearful reprisals for the miseries he had been compelled to witness. An angry correspondence passed between the patriarch and the king. Mendez and the Jesuit Fathers were banished from the kingdom; an Abuna was asked for, and sent by, the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria; a treaty was made between the emperor and the Turks, which prevented the missionaries passing into the country; and Ethiopia celebrated the expulsion of the Jesuits by an epigram given in Ludolf:

"The sheep of Ethiopia have been delivered from the hyenas of the West by the doctrine of the Apostles St. Mark and St. Cyril, the pillars of the Alexandrian Church. Sing, rejoice, and be glad, ye sheep of Ethiopia."

The history of the church in Abyssinia is from that day the history of a church which has, to all intents and purposes, resisted foreign missions. Efforts have been made, men have been forthcoming, but the results have not been and are not very encouraging. They may be found recorded in the pages of Pichler, Marshall (Roman Catholic), Stern, and Flad.

At this distance of time, and in the absence of definite information, it is impossible to tell how far, if at all, the Coptic Church was affected by the Calvinism which attached itself to the teaching of the orthodox patriarch, Cyril Luciv. The councils of Constantinople (A.D. 1638), of Jassy (A.D. 1642), and of Bethlehem (A.D. 1672), dealt exhaustively with the innovating doctrines, and the Catholic patriarchs of Alexandria were directly concerned with them; but it is more than probable that the Coptic Church, as a whole, disregarded altogether movements emanating solely from religious bodies which they despised. One Coptic patriarch, Matthew IV. (A.D. 1660), wrote on the real presence in the Holy Eucharist, and his work was probably suggested by a personal interest in one of the most frequently discussed points of his day. It would, almost unquestionably, adopt such essentially Oriental language, as would preserve it from Roman scholasticism on the one hand, or Calvinistic terminology on the other; but any facts connected with Matthew's predecessors and successors are so scanty that it is unadvisable to deduce any but the most general deductions as to the condition and learning of these men and the Church over which they presided. Facts, such as the restoration of the office of the consecration of Christ by John XVI. (A.D. 1675), attempts at re-union with Rome, or the propagation of the Roman faith in Abyssinia, intimate that the old questions of restoration of discipline, purer doctrine, and missionary enterprise, were revived from time to time, and pushed with more or less vigour. It would be interesting to know how the Coptic patriarchs, John XVI. and Peter V. (A.D. 1718), viewed the attitude of the English Nonjurors whose wish to be admitted into the Oriental church was negatived by the orthodox patriarch Samuel (A.D. 1710); or what effect was produced upon them by the gift of Syriac testaments to Samuel by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. That a kindly feeling existed in the minds of the Copts towards the English is proved by the fact that the patriarch Peter VI. furnished the traveller Bruce with letters of introduction to the Abuna of Abyssinia.

The French invasion of Egypt took place when Mark VIII. (c. A.D. 1791) was patriarch of the Copts. Bonaparte's magnificent language to the population of Egypt; "I am not come to destroy your religion; Frenchmen are true Mussulmans," must have been more satisfactory to the Copts than to the orthodox. The latter would only count such a proclamation as increasing instead of diminishing their enemies. It was, however, Bonaparte's policy to conciliate all; and questions of a theological and abstruse kind can hardly have been discussed when war, sorrow, and misery were at the gates. Orthodox and Copt alike must have been glad to see the last French soldier leave Egypt, and the three years' (A.D. 1798-1801) anxiety and suffering come to an end.

In 1856 the Copts made application to the Roman apostolic delegate resident in Egypt to choose a patriarch. He was willing to do so on the understanding that it might lead to a reconciliation between Alexandria and Rome. But the negotiations fell through, possibly, as has been affirmed, through the interference of the English Methodists, but more probably through the unwillingness of the Viceroy of Egypt to allow the nomination to such a post to pass out of his hands.

Under the present (A.D. 1876) patriarch, Demetrius, the Coptic Church retains its normal condition. It is still the most remarkable monument of Christian antiquity, as it is also "the only living representative of the most venerable tradition of all antiquity" (Stanley).

Roman Catholic writers (e. g. Marshall—Waziers) affirm the number of Monophysite Copts to be diminishing, the priests to be very ignorant, and all inclining towards Islam. Whether this be strictly accurate or not, the field for work among the Copts is unquestionably open. The Roman Catholics are busy; and, according to their own accounts, successful. The Church of England has hardly yet taken that interest in the present of this "monumental" Church which has been shewn by English philologists and savants in the past of her history and literature.

II. The religious customs of the Copts are, in many respects, in keeping with the character of their Church. There is a mixture of Hebrew, Christian, and Muslim features, which mark "variations in doctrine" with as much significance as the social and political habits indicate the influence of Egyptian, Greek, and Arab masters. The number of genuine and Christian Copts is placed by Lane at about 150,000. To make up the larger number of 500,000 adopted by others, the Muslim, and (probably) the Greek and Roman Copts must be added. In this article the Jacobite Copts are alone considered. From their ranks, principally, the government draws secretaries, accountants, clerks, and even Beys; the Copt tradesmen of Cairo have attained a degree of skill and enterprise peculiar to themselves; the Copt villagers of the Feiyoum and Upper Egypt are more to be depended upon for agricultural purposes than their Muslim brothers; and among these classes are still to be witnessed those religious practices and ceremonies which are so suggestive of primitive times.

The "fence of religion" hedges in the Copt child from the day of its birth. That a child should die unbaptized is especially avoided; the parents believe that, if such should be the case, their little one will be blind in the next life. Hence the Coptic Church recommends that if new-born children are in danger they should be brought to the church and baptized at once; but, if strong and healthy, that male children should be brought to be baptized when forty days old, and females when eighty days old. Baptism is performed by triple immersion, by a priest, and in consecrated water; the child being kept fasting till after Communion; the exceptions to these rules mentioned by Denzinger serving to shew how reluctantly any infringement or omission of them is admitted, though the validity of the sacrament is rightly not made dependent upon absolute obedience to the letter. The baptismal formula used by the Copts, "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, Amen; I baptize thee in the name of the Son, Amen; I baptize thee in the name of the Holy Ghost, Amen," is peculiar to them and to the Armenians; but it is unjust to accuse it of Tritheism, or to condemn it as most dangerous. It has been sufficiently vindicated from such charges by Sollerius and Renaudot. The baptistery is placed on the left side of the church, and decorated with a picture of St. John baptizing the Lord Jesus Christ. The sign of the cross is made on the forehead of the child; three kinds of oils are used and poured into the baptismal water. The child is held by the god-parent, one for each sex, who in the name of the child renounces the devil and professes the Christian faith.

Confirmation and the Eucharist are both regarded by the Copts as necessary for infants, and are administered, in accordance with ancient usage, immediately after baptism, and by the priest. The Coptic ritual enjoins the anointing with the holy oil or chrism the forehead, eyes, nose, mouth, ears, hands (within and without), heart, knees, soles of the feet, back, arms, and shoulders of the baptized person, and in the order given. Imposition of hands follows, with a blessing. Then the priest breathes upon the forehead in the form of the cross, and says, "Receive the Holy Ghost, and be a pure vessel, through Jesus Christ our Lord," &c.; an act which is peculiar to the Coptic Church, and which would seem to indicate that the unction requires, to ensure efficacy, the insufflation of the priest; or, in other words, that "the proper matter of confirmation in the Coptic Church is the breath of the priest; and its form the words, Receive the Holy Ghost." (Neale.) The administration of the Eucharist follows; and inasmuch as infants are unable to consume the particles of the consecrated bread, the priest dips his finger in the chalice and drops the consecrated wine into the mouth.

Other customs connected with these events in the child's life are the giving to the baptized milk and honey, or wine and honey, as symbolical of their entrance into the spiritual land "flowing with milk and honey"—a practice still existing in the Alexandrian as well as Ethiopian Church; the putting tapers into the hands as significant of the lamp ready for the Bridegroom's coming, a custom, however, said to be confined to the Armenians; the divesting the child of its robes and ornaments before immersion, and the vesting it after confirmation with the white robe, girdle, and crown, acts symbolical of the putting off the old man and the putting on the new, the loins girdled to run the Christian race, and the crown of victory promised to those who have fought the fight of faith.

Iteration of baptism is not permitted among the Copts; but for many years a curious custom existed, and possibly still exists, among the Ethiopians, while something of the kind still lingers among the Copts (see below). On the great feast of the Epiphany, all the Ethiopians, from the king to his lowest subject, went down naked into the lake and were baptized by the attendant priests. This was done yearly; but the explanation given by Harris (see Denzinger, p. 46) would rather leave the impression that the imperfectly educated natives considered their act not so much one of re-baptism as one which removed from them the burden of any sins committed during the previous twelve months.

Circumcision, in spite of the canons, still prevails among the Abyssinians and Copts, especially in Upper Egypt; but it is regarded by the latter as a pious custom, to which our Lord submitted, rather than as a distinctly religious rite. Among the Copts it is always performed in private, and at ages varying from two to twenty.

Copt boys are taught to read the Psalms, Gospels and Epistles, in Arabic, the "vulgar tongue," and the Gospels and Epistles in Coptic. The latter language they do not now learn grammatically. Though one of the oldest languages in the world, the language which is written on the monumental walls of old Egypt, and which has furnished the key to the hieroglyphic inscriptions, Coptic is practically a "dead" language. Alexander's conquest of Egypt, the spread of the Greek language, the introduction of Christianity, the Mahomedan conquest and adoption of Muslim ways and words, all have had their share in bringing about this result. It appears to be a fact that though the prayers in public and private are said in Coptic, and the Scriptures read in that language, the priests and the people too often repeat their prayers as a mere matter of memory, and an explanation in Arabic is added to the reading of holy Scripture. Hence Coptic books are frequently written in Arabic characters. In the time of Cyril, the explanation was oral rather than from book.

The practice of private prayer is most strictly observed among the Copts. Like the Jews and Muslims they pray "seven times a day," and often repeat their prayers while walking, riding, or engaged in business. The more devout and literate Copts wash their hands, face, and feet, before prayer, and are said to repeat the whole book of Psalms during these "seven times;" the illiterate, while they observe the stated times, confine themselves to frequent repetitions of the Lord's Prayer and the Kyrie Eleison.

^c On the Coptic versions of the Scriptures and Church lessons, see Schvener's Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, p. 319, &c.; and Malan, The Holy Gospel and Versicles for every Sunday, &c., as used in the Coptic Church.

Allusion has been already made to the fasts ordered by the canons. These are most strictly observed. The churches are open daily during the season of Lent, which lasts now for fifty-five days; entire abstinence from animal food being enjoined. The fast of the Nativity, or the twenty-eight days before Christmas-day, a period corresponding to the Advent season of the Church of England; the fast of the Apostles, a period observed in commemoration of the fasting of the Apostles after the Ascension of Christ; and the fast of the Virgin, or the fifteen days before the festival of the Assumption (Aug. 9), are other seasons of penitential self-abasement observed with the same strict regard to the rules laid down. These fasts are followed by festivals, such as those of the Nativity, the Baptism of Christ (or Epiphany), the Annunciation, Palm Sunday, Easter-day (the great festival), the Ascension, and Whitsun-day; those of the Nativity, Epiphany, and Easter beginning on the eve preceding. On these occasions the Copts give alms, feast, and assume their most festive attire. Lane states that on the festival of the Baptism of Christ, the Copts, men and boys, still keep up the practice of plunging into water which has been previously blessed, whether it be the river near or the large tanks in the church; and at the same festival the priests wash or wet the feet of the congregation present in the church. The symbolism of this latter act recalls St. John xiii. 10; and the act itself is repeated on Maundy Thursday and on the festival of the Apostles. Bathing in the Jordan is also accounted a most meritorious act; but the pilgrimage there and to Jerusalem is performed by but comparatively few.

Penitential discipline is, theoretically, very strict in the Coptic Church; and confession to a priest, to be followed by penance and absolution, is required of all who propose receiving the Holy Eucharist. The efforts made by Mark ben-el-Konbar to stem the tide of lax and superstitious ideas which were current in his time (see above) brought forth their fruit in due season; and the result might be at the present time more real were not the practice clogged by curious customs. A baptized person is considered a minor, if he remain unmarried, until twenty-five. During minority, baptismal innocence is presumed, and confession is not required; hence even deacons, who are under that age, communicate without confession. When a marriage takes place, minority terminates and confession is required before the marriage is celebrated. The office generally used for the celebration of the Holy Eucharist is the liturgy of St. Basil of Caesarea in Cappadocia, though it has suffered severely at the hands of translators and compilers. The Coptic copies differ from each other and from the Greek liturgy of St. Basil given by Renaudot and Denzinger, while they have nothing whatever to do with the liturgy of St. Basil the Great, as used by the Greek Church. Two other liturgies—that of St. Gregory and that of St. Mark, also called the liturgy of St. Cyril, because he is said to have arranged and settled it—take their share, with that of St. Basil, in the religious services of the Coptic Church. The liturgy of St. Gregory is used on the feasts of the Saviour and on other solemn festivals; that of St. Mark during Lent and in the month Kihak (Nov.-Dec.). Fasting and continence are required of all who wish to receive the Eucharist; the laity receive in both kinds, the wafer being moistened from the mixed chalice; and the utmost care is taken to protect the elements from profanation. The transmutation of the elements into the Body and Blood of Christ is distinctly taught and held.

The liturgy, whether read in the pages of Renaudot in the longer form of St. Basil, or in the pages of Malan in the shorter form of St. Mark, is exceedingly beautiful. The prayers are marked by dignity and earnestness, "by a high theological view of the doctrine of the Trinity, combined with an absence of any precision of statement in regard to mediation or redemption" (Stanley). Direct addresses to Christ are the rule, instead of, as in the Western liturgies, the exception; yet the Western Christian will but rarely find in Eastern liturgies that close "through Jesus Christ" so familiar and so dear to him. In some instances—notably, the Confessio "Corpus Sanctum," or confession of faith before Communion, and the addition to the "Trisagion"—these prayers represent a position won after struggles or explanations which take their place in the history of the Coptic Church.

The celebrating priest is bound by the canons to prepare himself by special prayer and fasting for his holy office, and to vest himself in the proper vestments, which are seven, in accordance with the number of orders in the church, and pure white, as symbolically reproducing the "raiment white as light" of the transfigured Christ.

The altar is now usually of stone, and square in shape; in more perilous times when no church was safe from the sudden and fanatical intrusion of a Mahomedan mob, the altars were frequently of wood, and moveable. The preparation, vesting, adorning, &c., of the altar; the use of incense, now freed from the superstitious ignorance which had once attributed to it a divine power; the employment of crosses and lights, are matters defined by rules, and explained at length in the usual books.

Marriage among the Copts is invested with two distinctly religious ceremonies, the betrothal and the coronation, which may or may not take place at the same time. The betrothal often takes place at the house of the relation of one or other of the parties to be married; the presence of the priest and of witnesses being considered indispensable, except under very peculiar circumstances: the coronation ought to take place at the church. Care is taken to prevent or discountenance clandestine marriages and marriages within forbidden degrees; the Coptic canons including within those degrees spiritual and foster-relationships, such as those of god-parents and god-children, foster-parents and foster-brothers and sisters, as well as natural. The evening preceding Sunday is the usual time of celebrating a marriage; the previous days, varying from a week to one or two days, according as the contracting parties are wealthy or poor, being spent in festivities. These, however, are always omitted at the marriage of a widow, and some changes are made in the marriage-service.

At the betrothal two rings are blessed and exchanged: the bridegroom gives to his bride a little golden cross which she wears round her neck at the coronation, and which has, in her case, the same significance of attachment to Christ as the girdle in the case of the man.

At the coronation, the vestments are blessed, a white veil is held over the kneeling pair, they are anointed with oil, crowns are placed upon the head of each, and the cross laid upon both their heads: prayers and blessings accompany and follow each act. According to the canon, the celebration of the Eucharist should follow, and the married parties should receive: hence the custom, arising from reverence for the sacrament, that the newly-married pair should abstain from each other that night. The crowns are now taken off before the marriage-party leaves the church: formerly this used to be done after eight days or more, and the act was accompanied by a short religious service.

In theory, divorce is only to be obtained in the case of adultery on the part of the wife, but in practice the Mahomedan influence has sanctioned separation on much less strong grounds; and laxity, in this respect, is even more offensive among the Ethiopians than among the Copts.

When a Christian Copt is sick and desires unction he is, if able, brought to the church; if unable, he is represented by a friend. Of "extreme unction," as the phrase is understood by Roman Catholics, the Copts know nothing: they have a service which is framed upon the precept of St. James v. 14. In strict conformity with the instruction there given, not one priest but more ("elders") take part in this, when possible. Seven is the "orthodox" number, and the office is so divided that there are seven lessons from the Apostolic Epistles, seven from the Gospels, seven Psalms, and seven prayers. The Copts understand sickness in a very wide sense; and speak of the sickness of the body, the sickness of the soul, i. e. sins, and the sickness of the spirit, i. e. afflictions. They anoint in every case, not only the bodily sick but penitents, and even the dead. The sick man, either personally or by his representative, is supported before the altar by three priests on each side: the senior priest lays the Gospels on his head, the priests their hands on his, and he is anointed on the forehead.

The funeral ceremonies of the Copts are, in externals, very like those of the Muslims, and are described by Lane. In this, as in so much else, the clergy are obliged to overlook what they cannot remove from the habits of a people so deeply ingrained with Mahomedan customs.

The religious orders existing in the Coptic Church consist of monks, readers, subdeacons, deacons (presided over by an archdeacon), priests (presided over by an archpriest), bishops, and patriarch. The last named consecrates the bishops and the metropolitan of the Abyssinians. Orders below the diaconate are not conferred by imposition of hands; but the bishop touches with each hand the temples of the person before him as if calling him to his office. Symbols of office are not usually given in the Coptic Church to those ordained to the minor orders; though this practice prevails among other bodies. The curious practice, mentioned before, of placing the hand of the defunct patriarch on the head of his successor could only take place when an election was uncontested. Those who take monastic orders are subjected to the three rules of celibacy, poverty, and obedience; they are only admitted after specific probation, and their admission is celebrated by the recital over them of the Office of the dead in allusion to their death to the world. "It is this Oriental seclusion which, whether from character, or climate, or contagion, has to the Christian world been far more forcibly represented in the Oriental than in the Latin Church. The solitary and contemplative devotion of the Eastern monks, whether in Egypt or Greece, though broken by the manual labour necessary for their subsistence, has been very slightly modified either by literary or agricultural activity. Active life is, on the strict Eastern theory, an abuse of the system" (Stanley). The traveller and the student alike fail to discover among the homes and the pursuits of Coptic monks and nuns beneficence, learning, and preaching like to that of the Benedictines, Franciscans, and Dominicans, statecraft, energy, and policy, like to that of the Jesuits, or charitable orders, like the Sisters of Mercy, ready to carry light and peace into haunts darkened by sin and misery. Yet the monk's (Rihib) life is much sought after: from their ranks alone are the bishops and the patriarch elected. The monastery of St. Anthony, the spiritual father of the monastic brotherhood, near the Western Gulf of the Red Sea, has now (according to Lane⁴) the exclusive right of submitting candidates to the highest dignity of the Coptic Church; and to the monastery of St. Macarius in Alexandria, consecrated in the days of the patriarch Benjamin, does every newly-ordained patriarch go immediately after his ordination. The deacon (Shemmis) and the priest (Kasees) may, or may not, have been monks; if not a monk, a candidate must be, to obtain the orders of the diaconate, either unmarried, or one who has been only once married, and that to a virgin bride. He loses his office, should he marry when ordained. The priest is taken from the deacons, if he has reached the age of thirty-three, and is found to satisfy the conditions named as required of deacons. The bishops (Uskuf) are now chosen from the monks, though the canons only require that candidates should be widowers or unmarried men. The present stringent custom is an evidence of the preference for celibacy. The patriarch, when ordained, retains his monastic rules, and is compelled to add to them certain regulations calculated to preserve bodily purity. The mode of election of the patriarch is described at full length by Renandot, and with greater regard to brevity by Wansleb, Neale, and Lane; but the subject is of sufficient interest to permit here a brief summary of the proceedings.

Previously to the separation between Jacobite and Melchite, the election was in accordance with the recognised precedent. The patriarch was chosen from the "presbyters," elected by bishops, clergy and people, and consecrated by episcopal hands. But after that separation, and especially after the Mahomedan conquest of Egypt, the mode of election became affected by various party and political considerations. The place of election was originally Alexandria; but, from the time of Christodoulos (A.D. 1045), Cairo, and sometimes the monastery of St. Macarius, seem to have shared the honours with the greater city. Cairo has now, as the residence of the Coptic patriarch, superseded all other places. The electors were the bishops, clergy, and principal laity of Alexandria, and the clergy and chief laymen of Cairo, presided over by the senior bishop; there being no archbishop or metropolitan in the Egyptian section of the Coptic Church. The decease of the patriarch having been communicated by letters to all concerned, the assembled electors prepared for their responsible duty by prayer, fasting, and solemn celebrations of the Holy Communion; licence to elect having been obtained from the Mahomedan powers. The ecclesiastical court met in the church (now in the Moallaqah at Cairo): the bishops, each attended by a priest, seated themselves according to seniority of ordination; in the midst were the priests of Alexandria headed by their proto-pope, a position assigned to them in virtue of their ancient dignity. The senior bishop explained and defined the order of proceedings; and some name was proposed. If all were unanimous, the name was greeted with cries of "worthy." This was, unfortunately, not always the case. Unanimity was impossible when the Alexandrian or the Cairite insisted upon the election of their particular candidate, to the exclusion of all others; or when political influence—often secured by bribery—was obstinately used to obtain the post for an undeserving person, a mode of proceeding violently resisted by the electors; or when the bishops united against the rest in opposing an otherwise well-recommended brother. From these and similar causes elections were frequently deferred for months and even years.

Should the ordinary means for settling these differences fail, recourse was had to the ceremony of the Heikeliet, or casting lots. A hundred monks most fitted for the high dignity were, in the first place, selected; and these hundred were, by gradual elimination, reduced to three. At this stage, it sometimes happened that a sudden acclamation, as it were by inspiration, selected specially one of the three, and the votes of all were centred upon him; but if this did not occur, the casting of lots began. The Heikeliet took its name from the Heikel, the sanctuary or altar upon which the names were laid, in order that God Himself might decide the election, as He had vouchsafed to do in the election of St. Matthias. The names were written on slips of parchment, and a fourth was added inscribed with the name "Jesus Christ, the good shepherd." These were dropped into an urn, and the urn was placed under the altar. The liturgy was celebrated at that altar, sometimes once, sometimes for three days; prayer being offered night and day for divine help. A little child, of an age too tender to permit any collusion or knowledge of fraud, was then instructed to draw out one of the slips. If that slip bore the name of a candidate, that candidate was immediately elected; if however the slip bore the name of Jesus Christ, the electors considered this a proof that God chose no one of the three. The same process was then repeated with fresh names till a favourable result was attained. The 48th and 71st patriarchs, John and Chail, owed their election to the Heikeliet; and it is significant of Divine interposition at a time of comparative peace to the Church from within, that the first-named stands out conspicuous (like his great namesake John the Almoner) for his benevolence to his famine-struck fellow-countrymen; and the latter, though illiterate to a degree, devoted himself to that reformation of the discipline of the monastic body from which he sprang, which eventually proved fatal to him.

The elected patriarch had, in the next place, to satisfy certain canonical requirements. He was to be himself free, free-born, and of a virgin-mother; of good bodily health; and of less than fifty years of age; of good moral character, such as was described by St. Paul to St. Timothy and Titus; and not in episcopal orders, translation being inadmissible in the Coptic Church. He was not to owe his election to secular and political interference; he must have never married; and never, if a priest, have slaughtered an animal with his own hand, nor shed blood. He was bound to be familiar with the vernacular language of the country and people over whom he was called to preside; and he must be decidedly orthodox (i. e. Jacobite) in his belief and doctrine. There was not much learning, as the word is understood by moderns, required of the patriarch. Provided he could recite the sacred offices in Coptic, his ignorance of letters was not deemed an impediment. In fact, the consecration of the 71st patriarch, Chail, was deferred till he was able to repeat by heart that Coptic liturgy which he could not read. But if learning was dispensed with, the proposed patriarch's orthodoxy was to be unquestionable; and the refusal of Gabriel, the 57th patriarch, to write out and subscribe a public document declaratory of his faith, though grounded upon the plausible answer that he adhered to the creed established at the council of Nicaea, was resented as evasive and subversive of a well-established custom.

In former times, the refusal of the elected patriarch to accept a dignity which was encompassed by political difficulties and ecclesiastical jealousies was so frequent, that the custom arose of binding the elected person with chains to prevent his escape; and these chains were not loosed till the performance of the ordination service. And as time passed on, and the necessity for this compulsion ceased, the practice nevertheless remained in force as a pious and symbolical custom.

The assent to the election having been given by the people, the patriarch elect was introduced to the assembled multitude by the senior bishop. The Tazkiet or Psephisma, i. e. the document of election, was prepared and subscribed by the bishops according to seniority of consecration, by the clerical representatives of Alexandria, by the abbot of the monastery of St. Macarius, and by the laity of Alexandria and Cairo. There appears to be no mention of subscription on the part of the clergy of Cairo.

The patriarch-designate was then taken to Cairo, if the election was not held there, that his election might be confirmed, and the necessary permission for his ordination be obtained from the civil power.

The ordination was to take place on a Sunday, and the Sunday was fixed after the return of the procession from the palace of the caliph. In times of peace, this procession was made the occasion of great rejoicing and pomp. The sacred books, crosses, censers, and tapers were brought out; the singers sang the Psalms as they marched through the streets; deacons, priests, and bishops preceded the patriarch-elect, who rode upon an ass in imitation of the "meek and lowly king," and in order not to offend that Mahomedan law which forbade Christians to ride upon horses; the laity followed. Sometimes, in true Oriental fashion, the sultan presented his visitor with a robe of honour, and sent him back to the church with a body-guard of soldiers. If the new patriarch were a komos, or hegumen, i. e. of the rank of an archpresbyter, there was no delay in his consecration; if he were not in orders, but a monk, as in the case of Chail the 71st patriarch, he was ordained deacon one day, priest the second, and komos the third. The prayers given in the pontifical (see the service in Renaudot) are pregnant with devotion and dignity, and the ceremonies are of a kind suitable to the ancient Oriental Church.

The patriarch's abode was called "The Cell," and was near to the principal church. The name recalled to him his monastic life, the duties, and the high aims proposed to him in the prayer of Ordination: "Sit tibi, Deus, Pontifex fidelis super domum tuam quae est ecclesia, ut serviat tibi inculpate omnibus diebus vitae suae, in pontificali dignitate, nocte ac die incessanter per sacrificia sancta et orationes in corde puro et anima splendida; per jejunia et actiones pias, per caritatem et humilitatem, per fitem absque hypoerisi, per prophetias et elevationes spiritus: et offerat tibi sacrificium purum et sanctum diebus omnibus," &c.—duties and aims best attained, so far as externals were concerned, by the preservation of the simple rule of life learnt at the monastery of St. Macarius.

The patriarch's duties were not, however, all spiritual, or of a kind to be performed by himself alone. Hence he had usually in attendance certain Syncelli or Katibi, confidential secretaries, who helped him to write Paschal letters, and to settle questions of canonical law and ecclesiastical discipline; and who conducted his correspondence with the court or on points of business. These men were too often the cause of much of the misery and bitterness which marked the patriarch's relations with his own clergy, as well as with the Mahomedans.

The authority of the patriarch was, in ancient times, most extensive. It included, at one time, both Nubia and Ethiopia; and the patriarch still appoints the Ethiopian metropolitan of Axum. That authority has, indeed, become in some quarters little more than a shadow, and the geographical and local limits given in Renaudot and Neale are, of themselves, suggestive of great loss of power and territory; but the man in whom alone is vested the approval and consecration of the bishops, whose jurisdiction over the monasteries is unquestioned, and whose property is "very considerable" (see Lane), does and must always exercise over the clergy and laity of his communion that authority which is so readily conceded to a good man, and felt to be so galling when in the hands of a bad or avaricious one.

The churches are mostly situated in the "Days" or monasteries, fortress-like buildings, which often contain a small town within their walls. Internally they are usually divided into various compartments by wooden screens. In the most western is the well or tank for water, blessed at the Feast of the Epiphany. The other compartments are for women and men; and that within the screen (the Iconostasis of the Greek Church) is for the clergy when celebrating the liturgy. This compartment, called the "Heikel," occupies the central and chief portion of the east end of the church. The screen is usually of close wood-work, with a door, before which is suspended a curtain, embroidered with a cross. The Copt who enters the church takes off his shoes, walks up to the curtain, kisses the hem, and prostrates himself before the sanctuary. Standing during the service is usual; hence all are supplied with crutches of a height to enable the worshippers to lean upon them. There are no organs, but musical accompaniments are made by cymbals, triangles, and small brass bells struck with a little rod. There are no images permitted, but paintings adorn the walls on every side: the principal of which is one of Christ blessing His Church.

It is a painting suggestive of the thought which should linger last and longest in every Christian heart when the history and traditions of the Coptic Church have been studied. The very barbarism and degradation, from an artistic point of view, of the painting, is no unjust representation of the barbarism and degradation of the Church. But as the artist of Europe would not give up the one, so the Christian of Europe must not surrender what reminds him in every feature of the ancient customs of the East, and of the primitive age of Christianity, long after they have died out elsewhere. The denial of the title of "orthodox," not only to all the Churches of the West but also of the East, except to Monophysite bodies, may excite a smile, or raise feelings of scorn: yet it must not be forgotten that such an assumption was originally due not to arrogance but to the protest of a national Church against the innovations of Constantinople, not to presumption but to fidelity to the belief and customs of their forefathers.

The literature connected with this subject is to be found in the following works, the majority of which contain cross-references to other books interesting to the student. CORACION, chief of the Millenarians of Arsinoe, in Egypt, about the middle of the 3rd century. Dionysius, patriarch of Alexandria, held a conference with them which lasted for three days from morning till night, in which the Chiliasm work of bishop Nepos was carefully examined; the result being that Coracion declared himself convinced, and came over with his party (Euseb. *Hist. CORBANUS. [CERBAN.]

CORBICIUS. [MANES.]

CORBINIANUS, ST., the first bishop of Freysingen, in Bavaria, was the son of Waldenikus and Corbiniana, and was born at Chartres, near Paris, in the 7th century, Clotharius III. being king of the Franks, and Gregory II. pope of Rome. He lived at first in solitude, then had disciples, and founded a religious community, which he quitted to go to Rome under the pontificate of Gregory II. That pope forced him from the retreat which he had chosen, made him a bishop against his will, and sent him to convert Bavaria. Corbinianus took up his abode at Freysingen, but having brought upon himself the hatred of Duke Grimoald by his boldness in reproaching the prince for his vices, especially his incestuous marriage with Biltrude, he was forced to fly to the Tyrol, whence he returned, after the death of Grimoald, in 726. Corbinianus travelled through a large portion of Germany, preaching the gospel, and built a church at Freysingen. He died in the year 730, on the 8th of September, on which day he is commemorated. He was succeeded by his brother Erimbert. [CYRINUS (2).]

CORBMAC [CORMAC] is a common name in Irish hagiologies, and chiefly prevails from the 8th to the 10th century. In a long list of saints of the name Cormac, Colgan (Acta SS. 360, c. 1) gives the names and dates of 48, and the days of dedication of 12; the dates range from A.D. 496 to 1170, but there is none between A.D. 496 and 741.

(1) Priest in Achadh-finnich, May 11. He and Critan or Criotan are on this day venerated at Achadh-finnich or Achadh-finnmaigh, on the banks of the river Dodder, co. Dublin (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 125). Colgan (Acta SS. 354 n. 19) says he is perhaps Cormac, son of Diarmaid, who ruled for a long time over South Leinster, and abdicated in his old age, becoming a monk under St. Comgall (May 10) of Bangor, but it is scarcely likely that the old king would become a priest, and Colgan says in the Life of St. Finian (ibid. 352, c. 18) that he died in sanctity, and thus probably was merely a lay-monk. He gives, however, in his lists of Corbmacs, two of this name as belonging to May 11, namely, "St. Cormac, presbyter de Achadh-finnich juxta fluvium Dothra, in Lagenia 11 Mail," who, according to the Calendar of Cashel, lies in Inis-keel, near the mouth of Gweebarra Bay, co. Donegal; and again, "S. Cormacus Abbas cognomento Cruimther," venerated on the same day; but both probably refer to the same person. (Colgan, Acta SS. 360, col. 1; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. iii. 288.)

CORBMAC (2) Of Armagh, B. Feb. 17. There is much confusion caused by two Corbmacs being commemorated on Feb. 17, the one living in the 5th century, and the other in the 8th. The histories of the two are usually, but erroneously, mixed up together in the account of a Corbmac who is represented as bishop of Athtruim (Trim) and afterwards as of Armagh. St. Corbmac of Armagh was born near Mount Usneach, and baptized by St. Patrick. His father is said to have been Enna, Ennius, or Enda, youngest son of Niall the Great, and brother of Laeghaire, who resisted St. Patrick's preaching; but Lanigan doubts this paternity, as Corbmac is never called "son of Enna," though often "of Chrioch-in-Ernaidhe," from the district of Ernaidhe, to which probably he belonged. But whatever amount of truth there may be in the reputed paternity and the large endowments given by Enna, there seems less doubt or difficulty in accepting his succeeding St. Iarlath at Armagh, A.D. 482: he is called corb, or successor of St. Patrick at Armagh, and continued there till his death, A.D. 497. (Colgan, Acta SS. 358-361; Four Must. by O'Donov. i. 160 n. ^b 161; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 8; Ussher, Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 437, and Index Chron. A.D. 497.)

(3) Of Ath-truim (Trim), Feb. 17. As said regarding the last, there is great confusion in the lives of the bishops Corbmac, of Armagh and Trim, as they are often considered as one person, though in reality they lived at distant dates. Colgan gives first a memoir of the imaginary bishop of Ath-truim and Armagh, and then of the bishop of Ath-truim, calling the latter Corbmac Jun., but this Corbmac is in reality the only one of this name bishop of Ath-truim (now Trim, the county town of Meath). This St. Corbmac is said, like the preceding, to have been descended from Niall of the Nine Hostages, but by his son Conall. His mother was Funecta or Fuineacht, daughter of Moelfitriugh, as said by St. Aengus in his treatise on the mothers of the Irish saints, and his brothers were Boitallach or Baethallach, abbat or bishop of Ath-truim (Oct. 5), Ossan bishop of Rathossan (Feb. 17), and Rumondi, perhaps the Rumoldus (July 1) who was bishop of Dublin. His father was Colman Ua-Suibhne, descended from Suibhne king of Meath, who died A.D. 596. He died A.D. 742, and was buried at Trim (Colgan, Acta SS. 361-2; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 8, ii. c. 19; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 51).

(4) Ua Liathain, abbat of Dermagh (now Durrow), June 21. According to the pedigrees in the Book of Lecan, he was son of Dima, son of Conan, son of Cudumaig, of the race of Oillioll Flannbeg, who was descended from Oillioll Olum. He bore the clan name of Ua Liathain, as being descended from Eochaidh Liathain or Liathanach, who was sixth in descent from Oillioll Olum, and has given the name Olehan or Olethan to a district and deanery in the diocese of Lloyne and county of Cork. He is called abbat of Durrow, and probably on this account has the title of "successor of Columcille," but whether he was a disciple of St. Columba, or only a friend and contemporary, is uncertain. His best known designation is "Corbmac the Navigator," as he thrice sailed into the northern ocean in search of some desert island where he might devote himself to an eremitic life, and thrice failed through some inadvertence, as it was supposed, or breach of monastic rule. (An account of his voyages is given by St. Adamnan, Vit. St. Col. i. c. 6, ii. c. 42, and by O'Donnell, Vit. St. Col. ii. cc. 61-64.) It is probable that after failing in his search for the "desertum in eremo," he settled down in his own country and founded his monastery somewhere possibly in Mayo, near the Moy: at any rate he is named as one of the four founders of monasteries who came to St. Columba at Hinda, when St. Brendan saw the ball of fire above St. Columba's head (Adamnan, Vit. St. Col. iii. c. 17). There are two ancient Irish poems upon him ascribed to St. Columba: they are at least of an ancient date, and mentioned among St. Columba's writings. They are preserved in one of O'Clery's MSS. at Brussels, and are given in full by Dr. Reeves. O'Donnell (Vit. St. Col. ii. c. 64) mentions his death, but gives no clue to the year, which remains to this day unknown (Reeves, Adamnan, 166, 264 sq.; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 374 n. ³⁴, 472 n. ¹⁵⁻¹⁶, 489 n. ³⁷ et al.; Grub, Ecl. Hist. Scot. i. 55-6; Ussher, Ant. c. 17 (Works vi. 528-9), and Ind. Chron. A.D. 580; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 12; Bp. Forbes, Kel. Scott. Saints, 315-6). There is another "Corbmac Ua Liathain, bishop, abbat, and anchoret," whose obit is given by the Four Must. in A.D. 865, but nothing else is known of him.

CORBMAC (5) Mar. 26; Dec. 14. At the former date the Mart. Doneg. has "Corbmac," and at the latter "Cruimther Corbmac, of Telach Indenn." His true dedication seems to be Dec. 14; but Colgan, finding a Corbmac otherwise unaccounted for at March 26, has attached a memoir of this saint to it. He has taken it from an ancient Irish MS. (Codice Leccanensi), with some omissions and rearrangements. This Corbmac flourished in Munster, and was son of Eugenius, son of Murchad, son of Muredach, descended from Oillioll Olum. His brothers were Beacan (May 26), Culan (Mar. 13), Eminus, Evinus, or Eimhin (Dec. 22), Diarmaid (Jan. 15 or Oct. 12), and Baithen (Mar. 23). He was inferior to none of his brothers in self-discipline and contempt of the world, removing to the north of Ireland, away from all friends and acquaintances, except his brother Baithen, who alone followed and lived with him. He went first to the nearer, and then to the more remote parts of Connaught to meet the vicissitudes of fortune from the opposition of bad princes or the kindness of the good. His chief foundations at this time were one on Inishmaine in Lough Mask, co. Mayo, one at the mouth of the river Moy, and another attempted in the barony of Carra, near Raymunterdoney. From Connaught he turned eastward into Meath, and then returned to the Moy, where he appears to have remained, but was sadly tried to the end of his days by the jealousy of the neighbouring clerics. He must have lived about the middle of the 6th century, but the chronology in Colgan's memoir is far from being easily reconciled. There is a curious life of St. Corbmac in the Book of Lecan, fol. 63. (Colgan, Acta SS. 751-6; Petrie, Round Towers, 180; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. 215; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 89, 336-7; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 3 ser. i. 136; Hardiman's O'Flaherty, Iar-Con-naught, 185.) [J. G.]

CORCAN (CURCNEUS, CORCUNUTAN). There are three named Corean in the calendars, two being given at Jan. 7, and one at Sept. 30. Colgan suggests that one of the Corcans of Jan. 7 may be identified with the disciple of St. Patrick, called Curcneus, who was left with three companions at Killfeale ("the church of the tooth") in Muscraidhe Breoghain (now Killfeale parish, in the barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary). He would also identify him with "Corcunutan (Nov. 3), of Doire-Eidhneach, i.e. of Doire-na-flann, in Eoghanacht Chaisil" (now Derryniflyn or Derrynavlan, near Killenaule, co. Tipperary). But these suggestions and identifications must be received with great caution, and hesitancy (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 156, c. 32, 186 n. ⁸⁸⁻⁸⁹; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 404 n. ^b; Reeves, Ecc. Ant. 18; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 99.) [J. G.]

CORCARIA, CORCAIR. [CURCACH.]

CORCODEMUS, ST., deacon, of Auxerre; called also Corcodomus, Curcodemus, Curcodomus, Corcodonus, Corcodonius, Corcodinus, Cooordanus, Corobomus. He was ordained deacon (Archisubdiaconus et Levita) by Pope Sixtus, and sent by him, in the 3rd century, with St. Peregrinus when that bishop went on his mission into France. Corcodemus preached the gospel, and died after the martyrdom of St. Peregrinus. His relics were translated to the basilica of St. Amator, and he is commemorated on the 4th May. (AA. SS. Boll. May, i. 452.)

CORCUNUTAN. [CORCAN.]

CORDIUS, in the Latin version CONCORDIUS, a presbyter who buries the body of the martyr Sabinianus in the same tomb with CHRYSE. [G. S.]

CORENTINUS, ST., born in Brittany, is said to have been consecrated bishop for Cornwall by St. Martin of Tours (San Martin occurs in the Domesday account of Cornwall, and St. Martin was venerated in the Celtic churches, e.g., at Canterbury and at Whithern in Galloway), who died at the end of the 4th century. Corentinus therefore would be, perhaps, the first of the missionaries sent to Cornwall. Melorus, the son of a Cornish king, is said to have been educated "in Coenobio S. Corentini." The parish named after him is now called Cury, but Coraotin in the old documents, and is north of Mullion, in Mount's Bay. The parish feast is now on the nearest Sunday to All Souls' Day, Nov. 2; but the saint's feast day is on May 1, in the Additions to Bede's Martyrology and in the Exeter Martyrology; other days mentioned are Sept. 5 and Dec. 12. He is invoked in the Breton liturgy of the tenth century, and is also called bishop of Quimper, in Brittany (Haddan and Stubbs, C. unciv's, ii. 82, 87). The fact is that the Celtic churches were clustered round certain centres of missionary enterprise, and that the fixed dioceses are of later origin, and that the Celtic saints seldom confined their sphere of activity to one tribe. The intercommunion between the various branches of the Cymric race in South Wales, Cornwall, and Brittany, is clear from many instances. [C. W. B.]

CORINEUS, CORINIUS, CORINNIUS, supposed bishop of Anglesey. (Stubbs, Regist. 157.) [CYBL.] [C. H.]

CORIPPUS, FLAVIUS CRESCONIUS. A Latin poet who flourished in the 6th century; identical, if the evidence of a 10th century MS. in the Vallicellian Library at Rome may be trusted, with Cresconius an African bishop, the author of a Concordia Canonum, or collection of the laws of the church, to which is appended a summary of the same, entitled Canonum Brevariium. For 240 years the only known work of Corippus was his Panegyric in honour of the younger Justin, an hexameter poem in four books, prefaced by two shorter poems, the one a fragment in praise of the same emperor, the other an epistle dedicatory addressed to Anastasius his treasurer and chamberlain. This work was published at Antwerp in 1581 by Michael Ruiz, a Spaniard, from a MS. more than 700 years old, the genuineness of which however rests upon his bare statement, as he gives no account of it, nor is it known how it came into his possession, or what became of it.

Corippus speaks in the preface to his Panegyric of a work he had previously composed upon a war in Africa:—

"Quid Libycas gentes, quid Syrtica proelia dicam Jam libris completa meis?"

but although there was not wanting testimony to the existence of such a work, Cuspinianus having quoted in his History of the Caesars (p. 176, ed. Basil. 1562) from a poem in eight books entitled Johannis, by Flavius Cresconius Gorippus, which he professed to have seen in the royal library at Buda (destroyed by Soliman II. in 1527); it was not till the year 1814 that the lost poem of Corippus was discovered by Cardinal Mazzuchelli in the library of the Marquis Trivulzi at Milan.

The subject of the Johannis was found to be a war carried on against the Moors and Vandals in Africa in the reign of Justinian, about A.D. 550, by a certain Johannes, the hero of the lay, who is styled 'Magister Militiae.' The campaign in question, which is noticed by Procopius and Paulus Diaconus, has been erroneously confounded with another, mentioned by Cedrenus (Histor. Compend. 443 D.), which took place in A.D. 697, under the emperor Leontius; but the poet's address to Justinian (Johann. i. 15) fixes both the subject of the Johannis and his own date to the previous century.

With regard to the hero of the Johannis we know nothing but what we are told by Procopius and by the poet himself. He was the brother of Pappus (i. 400), and served along with him in Africa on two previous occasions, under Belisarius, A.D. 533 (Procop. B. V. ii. 3), and four years later under Germanus (ibid. ii. 17). His father's name was Evantus (Johann. vii. 576), his wife was the daughter of a king (i. 202), he had a son called Petrus (i. 197). He had been employed in the East against the Persians and the Parthians (i. 58), and was recalled by Jus-tinian to head the third expedition of his reign against the rebellious Moors in Africa. After defeating their leader Antálas in one battle, he seems to have suffered a reverse in the district of Byzacium, but finally crushed the rebels near Carthage, and drove them beyond the Roman borders (Procop. B. V. ii. 38; B. G. iv. 17; Paul. Diac. Gest. Lang. i. 85). Subsequently we find him sending a fleet from Africa to the defence of Sardinia against Totila and the Goths (Procop. B. G. iv. 24).

The poet seems to have taken Lucan and Claudian as his chief models in the Johannis, though his obligations to the Aeneid are at times considerable. His language is singularly pure for the 6th century, and his style, though vitiated by the declamation common to all writers of the Byzantine period, by no means wanting in spirit. The text of the poem is in a most unsatisfactory state, and the last of the eight books mentioned by Cuspinianus, as well as the closing lines of the seventh, have yet to be discovered. Corippus dedicates his Johannis in a short elegiac poem to the nobles (proceres) of Carthage.

With reference to the Panegyric, the work of the poet's declining years (Præf. 37), Baillet's censure that he was "grand flatteur et petit poète," is not altogether unjust, especially when the character of the younger Justin is taken into account; but when the critic proceeds to condemn "ses méchants vers, sa dureté, son obscurité, sa prosodie vicieuse et sa mauvaise Latinité," it becomes evident that he had not read his author. Barth, on the contrary, with more truth, designates his verses as "ultimæ eloquentiæ Romanæ conatus." Considerable light is thrown by Corippus upon a period of history for which the authorities are singularly imperfect and obscure, and the manners of the Byzantine court are illustrated by him with considerable vigour; witness the striking account of Justin's elevation (lib. i.), and of the embassy of the Avars (lib. iii.), which Gibbon has transferred to his pages (Decl. and Fall, ch. 45) "in simple and concise prose."

In the Editio Princeps of Ruiz Corippus is distinguished by the epithets 'Africanus' and 'Grammaticus.' His African extraction is clearly indicated by his use of African words (e.g. Gurzil = Jupiter, Mustinan = Pluto). The latter designation is no doubt a complimentary epithet, the equivalent of 'literatus' (Sueton. de Grammat. c. 4). There is no certain evidence to show that the poet and the bishop Cresconius are identical; neither, on the other hand, is there anything to set against the inscription of the Vallicellian MS. of the Canons above referred to, which is as follows:—"Concordia Canonum a Cresconio Africano Episcopo digesta sub capitulis trecentis: Iste nimirum Cresconius bella et victorias quas Johannes Des. Patricius apud Africam de Saracenis gessit hexametris versibus descripsit," &c. (Mabillon, Itin. Ital. p. 69.) The Cresconian collection of canons is prefaced by an epistle to a certain bishop Liberius, in which mention is made of the Breviarium of Ferrandus, who was the disciple of Fulgentius Ruspensis, and who wrote his life after his death, A.D. 534. Thus at any rate an identity of date is established. The author of the poems is manifestly animated by a Christian spirit; his phraseology seems occasionally to be suggested by the language of Scripture, and his orthodoxy is proved by his quotation of the Creed as determined by the Councils of Nice and Constantinople (De laud. Just. iv. 290). The canons are distributed under 300 titles, and arranged, not chronologically, according to the date of the several councils, but systematically according to the nature of the subjects. It is the earliest collection in which the decretals of the popes are reckoned among the laws of the church, those of all popes being included, from Siricius to Gelasius.

There have been five editions of the Panegyric since the Editio Princeps of Ruiz, which was published at Antwerp in 1581: that of Foggini, 4to, Rome, 1777, being the most complete. The Johannis was first published at Milan, 4to, 1820, with the preface and notes of Mazzuchelli. Both works are contained in the Corpus Scriptorum Historiæ Byzantinæ, published at Bonn, 1836. The Concordia Canonum and Canonum Breviarium were first edited by Pithou at Paris in 1588, from a MS. belonging to the church of Troyes. They are to be found in vol. lxxviii. of Migne's Patrologia. [E. M. Y.]

CORMAN. Boece is the only authority for giving the name of Corman to the austere cleric who about A.D. 635 endeavoured, before St. Aidan, to convert the Northumbrians. Burton calls him Paulinus. Dempster has the commemoration of bishop Corman, apostle of Anglia, on Mar. 12, and Camerarius on Mar. 20. On the strength of the Scotch authorities Colgan numbers him among the disciples of St. Columba. (Bellenden's Boece, b. ix. c. 20, vol. ii. 165; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 489 nn. 30³⁸; J. H. Burton, Hist. Scot. i. 295-6; Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 316.) [J. G.]

CORNELIA. Christian at Rome (Cyp. Ep. 20, 21). Pamelius conjecturally altered Collecta into Cornelia in Ep. 21. (See MACARIUS.) [G. S.]

CORNELIUS (1) the fourth patriarch of Antioch, who succeeded Heron on his martyrdom in A.D. 129, and occupied the episcopal chair fourteen years, being followed by Eros in 143. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 20; Chron. Armen. Hieron. sub ann. 2144; Clinton, Fast. Roman.) [E. V.]

(2) Bishop of Rome, successor of Fabianus, said to have been son of Castinus. After the martyrdom of Fabianus in January A.D. 250, in the Decian persecution, the see remained vacant for a year and a half, possibly because no one was willing to undertake a post of such perilous dignity. But in June, A.D. 251, Cornelius was elected to the vacant post; and it speaks well for his courage that, although very reluctantly, he accepted an election which was almost unanimously made by both orders, during the life of a tyrant who had declared that he would rather see a new pretender to the empire than a new bishop of Rome (Cyprian, Ep. lii.). It was perhaps well for him that Decius was at that time absent from Rome, prosecuting that Gothic war which ended in his defeat and death in the winter of the same year. With his death the persecution of the Christians came to an end; but then arose the difficult question of how to treat the libellatici, or wavering Christians who had bought their life by the acceptance of false certificates of having sacrificed to heathen gods.

Cornelius from the first took a decided line upon this point, but one which placed him at variance with Cyprian and the church of Carthage, which required rigorous penance as the price of re-admission to the Christian body, while Rome prescribed milder terms. The difference was not more than such as would surely arise from the independent action of the two churches: but it was kept alive by the discontent of the minority within both the churches. This was represented at Carthage by one Novatus, who separated from the church when he was unable to obtain less harsh terms: in Rome, by a man of strangely similar name, Novatian [NOVATIANUS], who headed the party which was in favour of greater rigour than the Roman church would allow. Stranger still, Novatus crossed the sea to aid Novatian in designs at Rome, which must have been directly opposed to his own at Carthage. It was mainly by his influence that Novatian was consecrated a bishop, and thus constituted himself the head of a schismatic body in Rome. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vi. 43) quotes from a letter of bishop Cornelius to bishop Fabius of Antioch, in which he gives an account of his rival, and in the course of which he gives statistics as to the number of the Roman clergy in his day. These were 46 priests, 7 deacons, 7 subdeacons, 42 acolytes, 52 exorcists, 52 readers and ostiarii; and 1500 widows and orphans were provided for by the church.

The Novatianist heresy gave rise to a correspondence between Cyprian and Cornelius, of which eight of Cyprian's letters are extant. But the persecution from which they had just escaped was revived in Rome by Gallus, and Cornelius, followed by almost the whole church (among whom were many restored libellatics), took refuge at Centumcellae in Etruria. There Cornelius died, and another bishop, Lucius, was at the head of the church when it returned. It is doubtful whether he died a violent death or not. Cyprian and Jerome both speak of him as a martyr, and an inscription found in the Catacombs likewise styles him sc. Anastasius gives an account of his decapitation, but discredits himself by adding that it was Decius who sent for him from Centumcellae. We may fairly question whether the word 'martyr' was always used in its modern sense; or whether the confession which Cornelius was undergoing at Centumcellae with the whole church was not regarded as itself a species of martyrdom. He died September 14, A.D. 252—the same month and the same day, it was observed, on which his great contemporary Cyprian suffered six years later.

His name has been found in the Catacombs at some little distance from those of other popes, and in a cemetery apparently devoted almost exclusively to the gens Cornelia, whence De Rossi argues with great likelihood that he probably belonged to that patrician gens. His grave was dug in a crypt, which was afterwards restored with an inscription to record the fact by Damasus: and two large figures of bishops, inscribed S. Cornelius and S. Cyprian, were painted on the wall by the side of the grave in the Byzantine style, probably by pope Leo III. A.D. 795–815. (Roma Sotterranea, by Northcote and Brownlow, pp 177–183.)

[G. H. M.]

CORNELIUS (3), head of a monastery called Mochanseo, to whom one of the letters of Pachomius, translated by St. Jerome (ii. 86, ed. Vall.), is addressed. [W. H. F.]

(4) To whom Augustine writes (Ep. 259 (126), vol. ii. 1073), had been a fellow-Manichean with Augustine, and as a Manichean had taught himself chastity; afterwards he joined the church, was baptized in seeming peril of death, married and lost his wife Cypriana, and wrote to Augustine to beg for a panegyric on her from the saint. [E. B. B.]

(5) Monk and bishop of Forum Corneli, in the 5th century. He educated at his episcopal court Petrus Chrysologus, archbishop of Ravenna, A.D. 433–449. Chrysologus describes Cornelius as having introduced him to the practices of a monastic life; and characterises him as a man illustrious for his conduct, in whom all the virtues shone, and who was everywhere famous for his great actions; his spiritual father, his instructor in the gospel, which he practised himself to perfection. Cornelius afterwards ordained his pupil. (Chrysologus, in Patrol. Lat. tom. lii. p. 31; Ceillier, x. 6.) [W. M. S.]

CORNUTUS, presbyter of Iconium, who when persecution arose and all others fled, alone faced the governor and confessed himself a Christian, and was beheaded by order of the governor, Sept. 12 (Mem. Basil.). No epoch is there assigned; the manner of the martyrdom would incline us to refer it to the Decian persecution. [E. B. B.]

COROTICUS, to whom St. Patrick addressed his epistle, is supposed to have been Caredig or Ceredig of Cardigan, son of Cunedda Wledig, and a chieftain or petty sovereign of Cardiganshire. In Colgan he is called Caradocus, Cereticus, Coritic, and Chairtic, and that writer upholds the silly story of Coroticus being changed into a fox or fox's cub by the malediction of St. Patrick. (For his genealogy, see Meyrick, Hist. and Ant. Co. Cardigan, introd. p. 18.) He was at least nominally a Christian, but having followed up his successes over the Irish from South Wales into Ireland, he acted there with the grossest barbarity, slaying some, and carrying others into captivity. A letter, which is now lost, St. Patrick sent to him by one of his priests and other clerics, asking him to give back some of the plunder and the Christian captives, but the messengers were only laughed at. St. Patrick then wrote his famous Epistola ad Coroticum, which is extremely rude in its Latinity, but full of righteous indignation against a Christian, who could murder the neophytes while yet they were in their white baptismal robes and the chrism was fresh on their brows, and could carry off the members of Christ's body, and sell them to the heathen as slaves. Coroticus was solemnly excommunicated for his flagrant outrages, and the letter directed to be read to all the people and before Coroticus himself. (For the editions of the epistle by Ware, the Bollandists, Villeneuve, and O'Connor, see Todd, St. Patrick, 311 n. 2; for general reference to Coroticus, see Todd, ib. cc. 1–2; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 6, §§ 9, 10; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 44 n.; Rees, Welsh Saints 135; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 27, c. 72, 34 n. 70, 59 c. 27, 98 c. 150.) [J. G.]

CORPIANUS, according to the majority of the MSS. of Optatus (De Schism. Don. iv. p. 74), the name of a heretic who opposed martyrdom. But it seems likely that the true reading is Scorpionianus, and that the name originated in a confused recollection of the Scorpiceae of Tertullian. [G. S.]

CORPREUS. [CAIRPRE.]

COSMAS (1) and DAMIANUS, brothers, physicians, "silverless" martyrs. These four facts are all that can be said to be known about them, and though they supply little to amuse the mind, they afforded much to feed the heart of Christendom. They became types of a class, the ἀνάργυροι, "silverless" martyrs, i.e. physicians who took no fees, but went about curing people gratis and claiming as their reward that those whom they benefited should believe in Christ. They were certainly not earlier than the last quarter of the third century, and the legendary martyrs of that time, those whose fame is known only by popular tradition, seem in many cases to succeed naturally to the place usurped by those heathen myths that were slowest to die out. For Hercules, Christopher; for Apollo, Sebastian; for Diana, Ursula; for Proserpine, Agnes; and Cosmas and Damian take the place of Aesculapius, in whose story heathenism made the nearest approach to Christianity.

The Greeks distinguish three pairs of these brothers. (1) July 1, in the time of Carinus; (2) Oct. 27, Arabs, with their brothers, Anthimus, Leontius, and Euprepus, martyred under Diocletian; (3) Nov. 1, sons of Theodote.

(1) For Carinus we should certainly substitute Carus. Not only does Abulpharagius put them under that emperor, but all who put them under Carinus make him lead his army into the East to avenge his father on the Persians. Now, he could not have done this with Diocletian in his rear. The error had arisen as early as the time of Synesius, who in his oration de Regno, A.D. 399, c. 18, tells a story of Carinus in the East that belongs to Carus; for in that story the emperor is bald, a peculiarity ascribed to Carinus by Malelas, but appearing on the coins of Carus.

To Carus, then, in Cyrrhestice, Cosmas and Damian were accused of magic arts. But they effected a cure of a twist in the emperor's own neck, which called from him an admiring cry and caused him to hold them in honour. When he had left the place, their old teacher, moved with envy, enticed them out as though to gather herbs, then stoned them or flung them down a precipice.

The story soon became overlaid with miracles, but this simple form of it may be extracted from comparison of the Menology and Malelas.

(2) It is possible that the fame of these two brothers caused their name to be given to a pair of twins, who followed their example, and were put to death between twenty and thirty years later under Lysias in Cilicia. It is only to this second pair and their brothers that distichs are given in the Menaea.

ἐκ τοῦ γένους Ἀράβας ἐκ δὲ τοῦ ξίφους θεῖους ἀριστεῖς οἶδα τοὺς ἀναργύρους.
Λεοντίου τμηθέντος ὠλετο πλάνος λεοντομύριμης, ὡς Ἰῶβ βίβλος λέγει.
Ἄνθιμος Εὐπρέπιος ἐκτεμνόμενος ἀιθοῦσι λαμπρὸν καὶ πανευπρέπες μάλα.

From these distichs it appears probable that Leontius, Anthemius, and Euprepus, or Eutropius, were punished with castration. Their kinship to the ἀνάργυροι cannot be regarded as certain.

(3) The third pair, if they ever existed, were not martyrs at all, but only doctors and veterinarians, of a much later date. A woman named Palladia once gave Damian three eggs, and Cosmas was so angry that he forbade them to bury his brother in the same tomb with him. But when the people were debating what to do with the corpse, a camel which the saints had healed spoke and told them it was all right, they might lay Damian with his brother, for he had been compelled by an oath to take the eggs.

We must observe that only the second pair are recognised by the Latins, though the first pair seem to be more widely celebrated in the East. The Latins assign the martyrdom to Sept. 27, on which day various acts, all miraculous and untrustworthy, and long lists of modern miracles are given in the Acta Sancta, Sept. vii. 400. The most curious trait in these acts is that the prefect when bidden to follow the saints in the name of the Lord, exclaims, "In the name of Adrian, my God, I follow," and two devils immediately come and box his ears. The worship of the saints belongs rather to archaeology than to biography. According to the Paris Breviary, Theodoret bears witness to the celebrity of their basilica at Cyrus in the 5th century, Procopius to the adornment of that city in their honour by Justinian, who recovered health at their intercession, and to the existence of a church of the saints at Constantinople from the days of Theodosius the younger, while Marcellinus tells of the restoration to health by their intercession of Lawrence, bishop of Lychinis. The names were early inserted in the Canon of the Mass. [E. B. B.]

COSMAS (2), bishop of Scythopolis and Metropolitan, succeeded Olympius in 466. He was a native of Cappadocia, but with his two brothers, Chrysippus and Gabriel, was brought up in Syria under the famous abbat St. Euthymius, who on their first application for admission to his convent rejected them on account of their youth, but afterwards being warned in a dream, admitted them. He was ordained deacon by Juvenal of Jerusalem about the time of the council of Ephesus, and afterwards raised by him to the presbyterate, and made Keeper of the Holy Cross. He was ordained bishop of Scythopolis by Anastasius, Juvenal's successor; he held the see for thirty years, and died in 496. The third brother Gabriel was ordained priest, and was twenty-four years abbat of the monastery of St. Stephen. He founded a small monastery in honour of the Ascension in a valley of Olivet, and died at the age of eighty years (Cyrill. Sevthop. Vit. S. Euthem. 40, 54, etc.; Le Quien. Oriens Christianus). [CHRYSIPPUS.] [E. V.]

COSMAS (3), surnamed INDICOPLEUSTES (Indian navigator) from his Indian voyages. A native of Egypt, probably of Alexandria (lib. ii. 114, vi. 264), originally a merchant (lib. ii. 132, iii. 178, xi. 336), and subsequently a monk, and a somewhat voluminous writer on cosmography and the exposition of Scripture, who flourished in the reign of Justinian, about the middle of the 6th century. In pursuit of his mercantile speculations he navigated the Mediterranean, Red Sea, and Persian Gulf, and made himself acquainted with the productions, inhabitants, and remarkable objects in the adjacent countries. He also visited the Indian peninsula, and the island of Ceylon. Gifted with an inquisitive mind, acute observation, and a retentive memory, his travels in the East enabled Cosmas to collect a large store of curious and valuable information, not only with respect to the countries he visited, but also concerning the more remote lands whose merchants he fell in with at the great centres of Oriental commerce. When at last, weary of the world and its gains and employments, he resigned his occupation as a merchant and embracing a monastic life devoted his leisure to authorship, he enriched his writings with vivid descriptions of the countries he had visited and the remarkable facts he had observed himself or had learned from others. These are characterised with all the evidence of truth that simplicity can afford. He was no retailer of travellers' wonders, and, although Photius characterises him as μυθιώτερος μάλλον ἢ ἀληθέστερος, later researches have confirmed the veracity of his statements, and have proved that his descriptions are as faithful as his philosophy is absurd.

The only one of his works which has survived to our times is that which is dignified by the name of Χριστιανικὴ Τοπογραφία παντὸς κόσμου, Christian Topography. This work consists of twelve books, of which the last is deficient in the Vatican MS., and is imperfect in the Medicean. It was not all published at one time, nor indeed originally planned by the author in its present extent; but it gradually grew under his hand, and book after book was added to gratify the requests of his friends, or to meet the objections and refute the arguments of the opponents of his theory. The first six books are dedicated to a friend named Pamphilus, whose importunity had induced him to undertake the task notwithstanding his consciousness of his serious literary deficiencies. The seventh book is dedicated to Anastasius; the eighth, to Peter; the remaining four are without dedication.

The proximate date, A.D. 547, for the earlier books is afforded by the statement (lib. ii. 140), that when he wrote twenty-five years had elapsed since the expedition of Elesbaan, king of the Axiomitæ, against the Homeritæ, which according to Pagi ad ann. occurred in A.D. 522. It appears that the later works were written about thirteen years subsequently. Near the end of lib. x. he speaks of the recent death of Timotheus, patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 536, and he mentions Theodosius his heretical successor, A.D. 537.

The chief design of the Christian Topography is "to confute the impious heresy of those who maintain that the earth is a globe, and not a flat oblong table, as is represented in the Scriptures." (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. xlvii. § i. note i.)

The old objections of the Epicureans are revived, and the earth once more becomes a plane surface. This is not circular as with Thales, but a parallelogram twice as long as it is broad, surrounded by the ocean. Its length from E. to W. is 12,000 miles; its breadth from N. to S. is 6000. The parallelogram is symmetrically divided by four gulfs; the Caspian (which joins the Ocean), the Arabian (Red Sea), the Persian, and that of the Romans (Mediterranean). Beyond the ocean, on each side of the interior continent, lies another land, in which the Paradise of our first parents is situated. Here men lived till the Deluge, when Noah and his family crossed the intervening flood in the Ark, and peopled the present world. The rivers of Paradise he supposes to run under the sea, Alpheus-like, and to reappear in our earth. The Nile is the Gihon of Eden. The whole area is surrounded by lofty perpendicular walls, from the summit of which the sky stretches from N. to S. in a cylindrical vault, meeting similar vaults at either extremity (lib. iv. 186-187). Like Noah's Ark, which he asserts to have been an image of the world, our author divides this huge vaulted chamber into lower, second and third stories. The dead occupy the nethermost division; the middle compartment is the home of the living; the uppermost, that of the blessed. Heaven is divided from the lower regions by a solid firmament, through which Christ penetrated—and that is the Kingdom of Heaven (lib. iv. 186-188). The vicissitudes of day and night he asserts to be caused by a mountain of enormous bulk, rising at the northern extremity of the oblong area. Behind this the sun passes in the evening, and reappears on the other side in the morning. The conical shape of the mountain produces the variation in the length of the night; as the sun rises higher above, or sinks down towards the level of the earth. Eclipses are due to the same cause. The round shadow on the moon's disk is cast by the domical summit of the mountain (lib. iv. 188).

The views on cosmography thus propounded by Cosmas, absurd and irrational as they appear to us, were those generally entertained by the fathers of the Church. Pinning their faith on the literal meaning of the words of Scripture according to its traditional interpretation, they deduced a system which had for them all the authority of a divine revelation, any departure from which was regarded as impious and heretical. The arguments by which Cosmas supports his theory are chiefly built on isolated passages of Scripture, as interpreted by the early fathers. Some however are drawn from reason and the nature of the case; e.g. the absurdity of the supposition of the existence of antipodean regions, inasmuch as the beings on the other side of the world must drop off, and the rain would fall upwards instead of downwards; while the supposed rotatory motion of the universe is disproved by the disturbance that would be caused to the repose of the blessed in heaven by their being perpetually whirled through space. It is not uninteresting to find Cosmas denouncing as heretics those who, following the false lights of science, venture to maintain the opposite views, and speaking in terms of strongest condemnation of "men who assume the name of Christians, and yet in contempt of Holy Scripture join with the pagans in asserting that the heavens are spherical. Such assertions are among the weapons hurled at the church. Inflamed by pride as if they were wiser than others, they profess to explain the movements of the heavens by geometrical and astronomical calculations" (lib. i. Prolog.) One of his strongest arguments in support of his plan of the universe is drawn from the form of the Tabernacle of Witness, which the words ἄγιον κοσμικόν (Heb. ix. 1) warrant him in considering to have been like Noah's Ark, expressly constructed as an image of the world.

The subjects of the twelve books into which his work is divided, are as follows:—I. Against those who claim to be Christians, and assert with pagans that the earth is spherical. II. The Christian hypothesis as to the figure and position of the universe proved from Scripture. III. The agreement on these points of the Old and New Testament. IV. A brief recapitulation, and a description of the figure of the universe according to Scripture, and a confutation of the sphere. V. A description of the Tabernacle and the agreement of the Prophets and Apostles. VI. The magnitude of the sun. VII. The duration of the heavens. VIII. Hezekiah's song, and the retrogression of the sun. IX. The course of the stars. X. Testimonies of the Fathers, including eleven citations from the Festal Epistles of Athanasius, and other important Patristic fragments. XI. A description of the animals of India, and of the island of Ceylon. XII. Testimonies of heathen writers to the antiquity of Holy Scripture.

Setting aside the absurdities of his cosmographical system, Cosmas is one of the most valuable geographical writers of antiquity. His errors were those of his age, and rest chiefly on his reverence for the traditional interpretation of the Bible. But he was an acute observer and vivid describer, and his good faith is unquestionable. He appears to have been well acquainted with the Indian peninsula, and names several places on its coast. He describes it as the chief seat of the pepper trade, of which he gives a very rational account, and mentions Mali, in which Montfaucon recognises the origin of Malabar, as much frequented by the traffickers in that spice. He furnishes us with a detailed account of the island of Taprobana (Ceylon), which he calls by the name Sihidda, which was then the principal centre of trade between China (he calls the Chinese Τσιναίται) and the Persian Gulf, and Red Sea, where the merchants exchanged their costly wares, and the nations of the east obtained the advantages of commercial intercourse, which rapidly increased and had in Cosmas's time assumed considerable importance. The connexion between Persia and India was at that time evidenced by the existence of a large number of Christian churches, both on the coast of India and the islands of Socotra and Ceylon, which were served by priests and deacons ordained by the Persian archbishop of Seleucia, and subject to his jurisdiction, and which had produced multitudes of faithful martyrs and monks (lib. iii. 179). These congregations appear to be identical with the Malabar Christians of St. Thomas. His eleventh book also contains a very graphic and faithful description of the more remarkable animal and vegetable productions of India and Ceylon, the rhinoceros, elephant, giraffe, hippopotamus, &c., the cocoa-nut tree, pepper tree, &c.

His remarks on Scripture manifest a not altogether uncommon mixture of credulity and good sense. He mentions that, to the discomfiture of unbelievers, the marks of the chariot wheels of the Egyptians were still visible at Clysma, where the Israelites crossed the Red Sea (v. 194); but he explains the supposed miraculous preservation of the garments of the Israelites (Deut. xxix. 5), as meaning nothing more than that they were in want of nothing, in consequence of the number of merchants who visited them with those commodities from adjacent countries, to whom also they were indebted for the wheat of which the shew-bread was made (v. p. 205). The catholic epistles he plainly relegates to the "Amphilegomena," making the erroneous statement that such was the universal ancient tradition, and that none of the early expositors comment upon them. The epistle to the Hebrews he ascribes to St. Paul, and asserts that it, as well as the gospel of St. Matthew, was rendered into Greek by St. Luke or St. Clement.

Cosmas preserves a monument of very considerable historical value, consisting of two inscriptions relating to Ptolemy Euergetes, B.C. 247–222, and an unnamed king of the Axumitæ, of later date. These were copied by him from the originals at the entrance of the city of Adule, an Aethiopian port on the Red Sea; the former from a wedge-shaped block of basanite or touch-stone, standing behind a white marble chair, dedicated to Mars and ornamented with the figures of Hercules and Mercury, on which the latter was engraved. Notwithstanding the different localities of the inscriptions, and the fact that the third person is used in the former, the first in the latter, the two have been carelessly printed continuously, and regarded as both relating to the conquests of Ptolemy, who has been thus accredited with fabulous Aethiopian conquests. They are thus printed by Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. lib. iii. 25 (cf. Vincent, Commerce, ii. 533–89). They were first distinguished from each other by Mr. Salt (Voyages and Travels to India, &c., 1809, vol. iii. 192; Travels in Abyssinia, 1814, p. 412), and are printed with full comments by Böckh (Corpus Inscript. Græc. 1848, vol. iii. fasc. ii. 508–514). The inscription relating to Ptolemy describes his conquest of nearly the whole of the empire of the Seleucidæ, in Asia, which, says dean Vincent (Ancient Commerce, ii. 531), "was scarcely discovered in history till this monument prompted the enquiry, and was then established on proofs undeniable." (Cf. Chishull, Antiq. Asiat. p. 76; Niebuhr, Vermischte Schriften, p. 401; Letronne, Matériaux pour l'histoire du Christianisme en Egypte, &c., 1832, p. 401; Buttmann, Mus. der Alterthumsk. ii. 1, p. 105.)

A full account of this work is given by Photius (cod. xxxvi.), under the inappropriate title Ἐρμηνεία εἰς Ὀκτάτευχον, but without the author's name. From this, Fabricius very needlessly questions whether the author was really named Cosmas, and whether that was not an appellation coined to suit the subject of the work, like that of Joannes Climacus. Photius censures the homeliness of the style, which he considers hardly to approach mediocrity. But elegance or refinement of diction is not to be expected from a writer, who in his own words (lib. ii. 124), destitute of literary training and entangled in business, had devoted his whole life to mercantile pursuits, and who had to contend against the disadvantages of very infirm health and weak eyesight, incapacitating him for lengthened study. We learn from his own writings that Cosmas was also the author of the following works:—

(1) A Cosmographia Universalis, dedicated to a certain Constantine (lib. i. 113), the loss of which is lamented with tears by Montfaucon.

(2) A work on the motions of the universe and the heavenly bodies, dedicated to the deacon Homologus (lib. i. 114, vii. 274).

(3) Ἕπιγράμματα on the Canticles, dedicated to Theophilus (lib. vii. 300).

(4) Exposition of the more difficult parts of the Psalms. (Du Cange, Gloss. Græc. s. v. Ἰνδικοπλευστής; Bibl. Coisl. p. 244.)

(Montfaucon, Collect. Nov. Pat. Græc. Paris, 1706, vol. ii. 113–346; Gallandi, Bibl. Vet. Patr. Ven. 1765, vol. ix.; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 515; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. lib. iii. 25; Vincent, Commerce, ii. 505–511, 533–537, 567; Bredow, Strabo, ii. 786–797; Thevenot, Coll. des Voyages, vol. i.; Gosselin, Géogr. Syst. des Grecs, iii. 274; Mannert, Einleit. in der Geogr. d. Alten, 188–192; Charton, Voyages, vol. ii.) [E. V.]

COSMAS (4), a deacon at Thebes, deposed A.D. 592 by his bishop, Adrian, for malversation of the goods of the church. Cosmas and another deacon accused Adrian, by way of revenge, to the emperor Maurice. Maurice, according to the canons, sent the case to John, bishop of Larissa, Adrian's metropolitan, who condemned him. Adrian appealed to Maurice, and was acquitted. The case finally came before Gregory the Great. (Gregory, Épp. lib. iii. 7, Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. p. 609, § 629; Ceillier, xi. 490.) [W. M. S.]

(5) Deacon at Alexandria. Maximus, abbat of Chrysolopolis (A.D. 662), mentions in a letter to a nobleman named Petrus, a treatise on the union and distinction of two natures in Jesus Christ, which he had addressed to Cosmas. Cosmas had been engaged in Severian opinions, but had returned to the Catholic church. In a second letter to Cosmas, Maximus professes his sorrow at the calumnies spread abroad against Gregory, prefect of Africa. (Patrol. Græc. xci., Maximus, §§ 307, 308, 309, 313, 334; Ceillier, xi. 768, 769.) [W. M. S.]

(6) THE ELDER, monk of St. Saba. After a youth devoted to the study of the liberal arts, philosophy, and theology, when already a presbyter, he was captured and enslaved by the Saracens in a journey from Italy to Damascus, but was redeemed by the father of Joannes Damascenus, who entrusted to his care the education of his son, with his companion Cosmas (the younger). After he had completed the instruction of his pupils he retired to the monastery of St. Saba, where he remained till his death, c. A.D. 750. (Joann. Hierosol. in vita Joann. Damasc.; Moschus, Prat. Spirit. c. 40.) The greater part of the hymns that pass under the name of Cosmas ὁ Μελαφδός are attributed to him, but in the confusion that exists between the elder and younger Cosmas, it is impossible to assign them to their respective authors with any accuracy. [E. V.]

COSMAS (7) THE YOUNGER, HAGIOPOLITES, or HIEROSOLYMITANUS, was born at Jerusalem, and having lost his father was brought up there, together with Joannes Damascenus, by Cosmas the elder. He became bishop of Maiuma, in Palestine, c. A.D. 743. A warm regard existed between him and Joannes Damascenus, who, as we learn from the dedication to Cosmas prefixed to his dialectics, composed several works at his friend's request. His name is chiefly known in connexion with the composition of hymns, canons, triodia, etc., still in use in the Greek church. But which of these were written by him and which by the elder Cosmas, is uncertain. Suidas speaks of him as ἀνὴρ εὐφρέστατος καὶ πνεῶν μουσικῆν ὅλας τῆς ἁρμονίου, and asserts that the canons composed by him and Joannes Damascenus surpass all that ever had been or ever could be written. The two friends and their tutor are considered the inventors of Greek sacred poetry. The majority of Cosmas's hymns are acrostical. Among them are hymns for Christmas Day, Palm Sunday, Whitsunday, the Exaltation of the Cross, and other festivals. The triodion used by the Greek church from Septuagesima to the octave of Pentecost is attributed to him. His hymns were first printed by Aldus, Ven. 1501, and they are to be found in La Bigne's Bibl. Patr. xii. 727 sq., and Migne, Patrol. xviii. According to Allatius (de Georgis, p. 418) they have been expounded by Joannes Zonaras, Theodorus Prodromus, George of Corinth and others.* (Suidas sub voc. Ἰωανν. Δαμασκ.; Joann. Hieros. in vita Joann. Dam. Oudin, i. 1785, Bibl. Patr. La Bigne, xii. 727; Gallandi, xiii. p. viii. Miræus, Auctar. de Scr. Eccl.; Vossius, de Poet. Græc. c. 9; Saxius in Onom. Lit. ii. 85; Fabr. Bibl. Græc. lib. v. c. 41; Le Quien, Vit. J. Dam. p. 20.) [E. V.]

(8) Patriarch of Alexandria. [COPTIC CHURCH.]

COSMOCRATOR; in the system of Valentinus, an appellation given to the Devil, who was represented as having his dwelling in this world, while the Demiurgus, whose creature he was, dwelt in the lowest of the regions above the world (Irenæus, i. 5, p. 26). The name Cosmoerator we may believe to have been derived from Eph. vi. 12, reference also being had to St. John xii. 31, whose phrase, "prince of this world," occurs instead of Cosmoerator in the parallel passage of Hippolytus (p. 192). Harvey (Iren. l. c.) gives proof that in the Rabbinical demonology this Greek word was employed written in Hebrew characters, and thence infers that the Gnostic use of this word was derived from a Jewish use of it. On the other hand Massuet (p. xliii.) refers to a use of the word by the later Platonists, who employed it to denote the rulers of the seven planetary orbs. But the occurrence of the word in the Epistle to the Ephesians renders any other explanation of the Gnostic use of it unnecessary.

In the system of Marcion (Irenæus, i. 27, p. 106), into which the name Cosmoerator probably passed from the Valentinian, it was applied to the God who made the world. [G. S.]

* A metrical version (ἐκφράσις) of the Psalms, attributed to Cosmas, exists in MS. in the Imperial Library at Vienna.

COTOPITAE, or COTHOPITHAE. [CUTZUPITAE.]

COTTA, abbat, attests a charter of Snaebraed, king of the East Saxons, June 13, 704 (Kemble, C. D. No. 52; Birch, Fasti Monast. 57). [C. H.]

COUNCILS. For a general account of Councils, see the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, edited by Dr. Smith and Professor Cheetham, s. v. For particular councils, see the same Dictionary under the names of the places where the councils were held: e. g. CONSTANTINOPLE, EPHEBUS, &c.

CRALLO, Welsh saint of the 6th century, patron of Llangrallo, otherwise Coychurch in Glamorganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 222). [C. H.]

CRATO, a probably imaginary "bishop of the Syrians," asserted by Prædestinatus (i. 33) to have been a successful antagonist of the heresy of Theodotus. [G. S.]

CREDA, CREDAN, abbat, witnessing a charter of Offa king of Mercia, dated A.D. 777 by Kemble, but A.D. 775 by Hickes (Thesaur. i. 171), and a charter of Aldred subregulus of the Wiccii between A.D. 778 and 781 (Kemble, C. D. Nos. 131, 146; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 435; Birch, Fasti Monast. 57). [C. H.]

CREDANUS (1) Abbat of Evesham, in a MS. list preserved by Dugdale (Monast. Anglic. ii. 2), standing between Almund, who was abbat in A.D. 783 or 787, and Tintferth, abbat in A.D. 803 (Birch, Fasti Monast. 57). [C. H.]

CREDULA. Mart. Carthag. A.D. 250. See ARISTO. [E. W. B.]

CREED, from the Latin credo; a summary of the chief tenets of the Christian faith. The word is generally limited in its application to the three great formulæ, the so-called Apostles' creed, the Nicene or Constantinopolitan, and the Athanasian creed, although it may be also used of any either of the older or more modern summaries which have been put forward from time to time as representing the beliefs either of any great portion or of any smaller section of the Christian church.

1. Leibnitz, in the preface to his Essais de Théodicée, remarks that the nations which filled the earth before the establishment of Christianity had ceremonies of devotion, sacrifices, libations and a priesthood, but they had no articles of faith, no dogmatic theology. They were not taught whether the beings whom they worshipped were personifications of the wondrous powers of nature, or true persons: and even their mysteries consisted in the performance of certain rites and practices, and not in the delivery and acceptance of any teaching or doctrine.

2. With the people of Israel it was different. They had a distinct creed, the fundamental articles of which were these: that Jehovah their God was one Jehovah: that He was the Creator of heaven and earth, and of all things therein: that He had given them the laws by which they were governed, and would protect their nation if it obeyed those laws, and would punish it if it neglected them. From this clear and definite teaching as to the being and nature of God, the duty of serving Him and Him only, in the way which He had appointed, necessarily ensued.

3. Christianity has inherited this peculiarity of the Jewish nation. It has a clear and definite teaching. More clearly than any of the Jewish Rabbis had done, did its Founder hold up to His followers our heavenly Father as our example and our guide: and, in addition, He declared that He had Himself come down from heaven to give His soul a ransom for many. After His Death and Resurrection and Ascension, we read that His apostles wandered about teaching men to turn from the vanities which they worshipped to serve the one true and living God; they spoke not only of the duties of righteousness and self-restraint, but also of a coming judgment of both just and unjust: they taught the necessity of repentance towards God and of faith towards their Lord Jesus Christ, and they proclaimed everywhere that Christ had (in some mysterious way) died for the sins of mankind, in accordance with the Scriptures of old: that He had been buried, and had risen again from the dead, and would come hereafter to render to every man according to his works. And what they taught, they charged their disciples to commit to faithful men, that they might be able to teach others also.

4. The substance of this teaching, either as delivered to him, or as passed on to his immediate followers, St. Paul called "a deposit" (παράθηκη or παρακαταθήκη); the MSS. vary both in 1 Tim. vi. 20, and 2 Tim. i. 14). Elsewhere, in speaking of his office as a teacher, the same apostle says, "I have been entrusted with a stewardship" (1 Cor. ix. 7), and describes himself as "a steward of God's mysteries." St. Peter represented the essence of his teaching as "the truth," "the present truth;" partly, no doubt, in contrast with "the cunningly devised myths" by which it was surrounded. Other titles and designations are applied to the teaching of the apostles, and amongst them we find a word with which we shall often meet in later centuries, the word πίστις, fides, faith; "a word, which, from faith as a subjective action, was passed on to comprehend the object of that action: the truths which the disciples were called upon to receive" (Gal. i. 23; iii. 23, 25; and elsewhere).

5. But the teaching of the first apostles was so extensive and covered so large a space, embracing (as it did) a narrative of all the events of our Redeemer's life, that at a very early period it was considered desirable to collect together statements of some of the chief facts which were either revealed or substantiated by Christ, and to regard them as essential parts of the teaching of the church, the fundamental doctrines of Christianity.* The administration of the rite in which the believer "was by the one Spirit baptized into the one body," furnished one occasion on which such a summary was required. For, as the convert was "baptized into the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," so the acceptance of this baptism implied on his part some belief as to the character of that Name into which he was baptized. Such baptisms took place after the great day of Pentecost, long before the writings of the New Testament were collected, indeed long before any of them were penned. What were the newly baptized, what were the candidates for baptism to be taught, as the essential points of Christianity? It became necessary to have some outline or summary to guide the evangelist or teacher in the instruction of his hearers, and some such outlines or summaries were speedily prepared. The words of St. Paul to Timothy which are found in his second letter—introducing the command “keep the deposit,” to which attention has already been drawn—seem most clearly to direct his pupil to prepare such a formula, if he had not one already in hand. “Have (or draw up) a sketch of the wholesome words which thou hearest from me in faith and love in Christ Jesus.” [The words are ὑποτύπωσιν ἔχει ὑγιαίνοντων λόγων, Formam habe sanorum verborum. See Mr. Wratislaw's Notes and Dissertations. No. LV.]

6. This direction appears so reasonable, that we may expect to find indications of such summaries in the writings of the apostles themselves. Without quoting at length the facts which St. Paul delivered to the Corinthians “among the first things” (1 Cor. xv. 3), we may appeal to an important notice in the same apostle's first letter to Timothy (1 Tim. iii. 16). He describes the church as “pillar and basis of the truth,” and then proceeds as follows: “and confessedly great is the mystery of religion, who was manifested in the flesh, was justified in the spirit, was seen by angels, was preached among the heathen, was believed in the world, was received up in glory.” In the letter to the Hebrews we read of “the foundation of repentance from dead works and of faith in God, of the resurrection of [the] dead and of the eternal doom.” Once more, in St. John's warning against the false prophets (“every spirit that acknowledgeth Jesus Christ as having come in the flesh is from God, and every spirit that confesseth not Jesus, is not from God”) we find distinct mention of fundamental articles of the Christian faith. Nor can we overlook the importance assigned by St. Paul to the outward confession of the heart's belief (Rom. x. 10), whilst in the partial commendation of the church of Pergamos (in Apoc. ii. 13), “thou didst not deny my faith,” we note that the commendation implies that there was “a faith” which might have been orally denied.

7. But when we read of the whirl which ensued when the belief of the gospel came into contact with the teachings of the oriental philosophies, the necessity of such outlines or formulæ as were commanded by St. Paul becomes most manifest. When the marvellous tenets (called heresies) of Valentinus and Marcion and the like became mixed up with the teachings of the gospels, these earlier summaries which we have noticed would serve not only as buoys to guide the voyager after truth, but as moorings too to prevent him from drifting away amidst the violence of the stream. The question then becomes important; “Have we in the writings of sub-apostolic times further notes on the character of the summaries in use?” and the answer must be given in the affirmative.

8. For summaries of this description may be seen in the Greek recensions of the Ignatian epistles to the churches at Tralles and at Smyrna. For if these recensions are not to be regarded as presenting the original forms of such epistles, they are still considered by competent judges to belong to the second century, and if so “will hold their place among the most important of early Christian documents.”^b In the letter to the Trallians, § 9, we find the writer urging his readers “to stop their ears if any one would talk to them without referring to Jesus Christ, who was of the family of David, who was of Mary, who was truly born, did eat and drink, was truly persecuted under Pontius Pilate, was truly crucified and died . . . who also was truly raised from the dead, His Father raising Him: and, after the same likeness, His Father will, in Him, raise us who believe in Christ Jesus—apart from whom we have not true life.” Another summary of the facts of our Saviour's life, not unlike this, may be seen in the letter to the Smyrncans, § 1, 2, 3. In a well-known passage in the Apology of Justin Martyr (§ 61, p. 93), the writer relates how they “who are persuaded and believe that the things are true which are taught by us . . . are taken to some place where there is water, and are there baptized (λουτρὸν ποιούνται), in the name of God the Father and Lord of all, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit;” the words implying some declaration of belief, in a longer or a shorter form. The writings of Irenæus, Tertullian and Origen, give us clearer indications of the character of the formulæ used in their days to embody the tenets of the faith.

9. The work of Irenæus first calls for our attention. This great bishop of Lyons in writing “against all heretics,” speaks again and again of the faith of the church as sufficient to protect her members against the wild extravagancies of the gnostic teachers. In five passages (i. 3, 6; i. 10, 1, &c.; iii. 4, 2; iii. 24, 1; iv. 23, 7) he seems to quote portions of this faith. In one he gives it substantially at length. In the first passage referred to, he speaks of the danger of those “who do not guard firmly (τοὺς μὴ διαφυλάσσοντας) the faith in one God the Father Almighty, and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God;” and having in iii. 21, &c., given many interesting notes as to the teaching of the church on important subjects, the bishop in § 24 calls this teaching “our faith which we have received from the church, and which it is our business to guard (quam custodimus).” But as the statement of Christian doctrine on which this passage follows is far too long to be quoted here, we must be content with drawing attention to another which is perhaps more to our point, the well-known summary of i. 10, 1.

10. Having shewn, with a certain amount of humour, the absurdity of those who, having heaped together a number of names and phrases collected out of every book of Scripture, fancied that on such a foundation as this, they might erect a superstructure of “Christian” teaching; Irenæus states that any one “who holds without wavering the canon of the truth which he received at his baptism,” will know at once whence these names and phrases are brought, and will reject the doctrine founded upon them. And, accordingly, he takes the opportunity to exhibit the truth as maintained in the church. “For the church” (he proceeds), “although now scattered over the face of the world, still guards the faith which it received from the apostles and their immediate disciples—the faith in one God, the Father Almighty, who made heaven and earth and the sea and all things in them: and in one Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who was incarnate for our salvation: and in the Holy Spirit, who by the prophets had proclaimed the dispensations and the advents and the birth from the Virgin, and the suffering and the resurrection from the dead, and the bodily assumption into the heavens of the beloved Christ Jesus our Lord, and His coming from the heavens in the glory of the Father to gather again together in one all things, and to raise up all flesh of all humanity, in order that to Christ Jesus our Lord and God and Saviour and King, by the good pleasure of the Father invisible, every knee should bow of things in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess to Him, and [He] should do right judgment in all things: that He should send the spiritual powers of darkness, and the angels who transgressed and remained in disobedience, and the impious of men, and the unjust and lawless and blasphemers to the eternal fire: whilst to the just and holy, and such as keep His commandments and abide in His love, whether from the first or after repentance, He would give life and then incorruptibility and eternal glory. This teaching and this faith the church having so received, although now dispersed over the whole world, guards as carefully as if she still occupied one house: and in the same degree she believes all these tenets, as having one soul and one heart, and as it were with one harmonious voice she proclaims and teaches them, and passes them on as if she had only one mouth. For the dialects throughout the world may be unlike, but the tradition is virtually one and the same: and neither do the churches settled in the Germanies believe differently or teach differently, nor those in the Iberias, nor those among the Celts, nor in the parts of the East, nor in Egypt, nor in Libya, nor those settled in the central parts of the inhabited world: but as the sun, the creation of God is in the whole world one and the same, so too the preaching of the truth (τὸ κήρυγμα τῆς ἀληθείας) shines everywhere, and enlightens all men who are willing to come to the knowledge of the truth. And neither will the most able of those who preside in the churches teach things alien from these (for the disciple is not above his master), nor will the weak in the word withdraw aught from the tradition. For as there is [but] one and the same faith, so neither does he who is able to say much have anything over, nor he who can say little have any lack.”

11. The question at once arises, does the passage which Irenaeus here gives contain the precise form of the creed of his day, the precise words of “the canon of the truth which he received at his baptism”? The last sentence which we have translated seems to imply that it does; but before we can give a decisive answer in the affirmative, we must look to other passages in the writings of this early bishop.

12. In iii. 4, 2, he speaks again of the belief of the orthodox “in one God, the Creator of heaven and earth and of all things in them by Jesus Christ,” of whose incarnation, sufferings, resurrection, ascension and future glorious coming to judgment, he speaks at length. In iii. 16, 6 he complains of the inconsistencies of heretics:—and his complaint is interesting because it shows that these confessions of belief were heard in the churches at other times besides the celebration of baptism. “The heretics” he says “acknowledge one Jesus Christ with their tongue but still expose themselves to ridicule, for they think one thing and state another:” and in order to contrast their belief with that of the church, he adds the church’s creed as to the work of the Saviour, and then repeats once more “there is one God the Father, and one Christ Jesus our Lord.” Again in iii. 24. 1, he writes of the “constant and continuous teaching of the church;” and in iv. 33. 7 “of the faith in one God Almighty of whom are all things; of the belief (πιστοῦν) in the Son of God Jesus Christ our Lord, by whom are all things, and in His dispensations by which the Son of God became man; and in the Spirit of God who revealed the dispensations of the Father and the Son.”

13. From these various quotations it seems to be proved beyond dispute, that, whilst we cannot adduce any one passage from his work as containing all that the bishop of Lyons regarded as fundamental in the teaching of the church, yet the Canon of the Truth which he had received at baptism and which was heard at times in the assemblies of the faithful, was founded on a belief in the three Persons into whose Name he had been baptized, and contained the following articles: that the one God the Father Almighty is Maker of heaven and earth and all things therein: that the one Lord Jesus Christ is the only Son of God, our Lord; that He submitted to be born of a virgin, so uniting God and man: that He suffered under Pontius Pilate, rose again from the dead, ascended up to heaven and from heaven will come again to judge mankind, and take His own to Himself. The Holy Spirit is spoken of once as having foretold these things of old (as having spoken by the prophets), once again as revealing to man these dispensations now. Nor must we omit to notice that “the forgiveness of sins” is included in the promise of life to those who repent: the κοινωνία and ἔνωσις in another passage (iii. 16. 6) may carry with them some intimation as to the communion of saints and the one church united in Christ its Head: we have again distinct mention of the resurrection of the body, and of eternal glory.

14. But the “Canon of the Truth” as Irenaeus laid it down in i. 10. 1 &c., must not be regarded as the symbolum or watchword, by the repeating of which the true believer was to be recognised; it can only be viewed as containing the teaching of the Christian minister, and as the rule by which the belief of the individual could be measured. Irenaeus says “the church believes”: he does not give us the form “I believe.” We may regard his various descriptions of the faith as equivalent to each other: we cannot regard them as identical. If we may use the figure, the various spaces marked out on the different canons might follow each other in different order whilst the sum or total length might be the same. But if a document was to answer either truly or figuratively the purpose of a password, not only must the order of the thoughts be fixed, but the expressions and phrases must be fixed also: and fixed the phrases certainly were not, in the time of Irenaeus, in any form which he has given us—at all events in the church of Lyons.

15. Tertullian, “the younger contemporary of Irenaeus,” furnishes us with corresponding evidence as to the church of Carthage. Three of this great writer’s treatises contain approximations to formal rules of faith, viz.: De praescript. c. 14: Adversus Praxeam c. 2: De Virgin. velandis c. 1. These summaries are easily accessible in the originals, and they may be found collected in Dr. August Hahn’s Bibliothek der Symbole und Glaubensregeln, or Dr. Heurtley’s Harmonia Symbolica or the same Professor’s volume of Fide et Symbolo. It were superfluous therefore to print them here. All three contain, although not in the language of the present “Apostles’ creed,” the substance of the first seven articles of that creed, i.e. up to the “return to judgment;” and the two former make specific mention of the Holy Spirit, although not (in this connexion) as an object of belief. But we must not leave the subject here: in the treatise against Praxeas Tertullian states that “Christ after His ascension sent from the Father according to His own promise, the Holy Spirit the Comforter, to sanctify the faith of those who believe in the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit.”

16. Thus the words of Tertullian lead us to the same conviction as do the expressions of Irenaeus, viz.: that the primary baptismal confession corresponded to the baptismal formula: that as the convert was baptized “into the Name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit,” so might he be described as one who “believed in the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit.” And the echo of such a baptismal confession survives this period by many years. It may be heard in the early and (as some think) genuine portion of “the faith” of the Apostolic Constitutions as given by Archdeacon Tattam from an Aethiopic manuscript.^c It may be heard in the treatise de Sacramentis ascribed though perhaps falsely to St. Ambrose.^d It may be heard in the formula for baptism found in an old Gallican missal.^e It may be heard in the ritual adopted by Boniface for use amongst his German converts.^f

^c Constitutiones Copticae, ed. H. Tattam, 1848, § 46: “I believe in the only true God the Father, the Almighty, and in His only begotten Son Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, and in the Holy Spirit the Giver of life.” The subsequent clauses (“the consubstantial Trinity, one Lordship, one kingdom, one faith, one baptism, in the Catholic Apostolic Church, and one life everlasting”) bear the marks of being a later addition.

^d Pseudo-Ambrose de Sacramentis, book ii. c. 7 (Migne, vol. xvi. p. 429): “Interrogatus es, Credis in Deum Patrem omnipotentem? Dixisti, Credo; et merisisti, hoc est sepultus es. Iterum interrogatus es, Credis et in Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum et in crucem ejus? Dixisti, Credo; et merisisti: ideo et Christo es consecutus. Tertio interrogatus es, Credis et in Spiritum Sanctum? Dixisti, Credo; tertio merisisti ut multiplicem lapsus superioris actus absolveret trina confessio.”

^f Migne, vol. 89, p. 820; Daniel, Codez Liturgiques, i. p. 186: “Gelobstu in got almehtigen fadaer? Ec gelobo in got almehtigen fadaer. Gelobstu in Crist godes suno? ec gelobo in Crist godes suno. Gelobstu in halogen gast? ec gelobo in halogen gast.” See too the old Roman ritual as given by Daniel, i. p. 173, from Assemani.

17. But this short creed was, even in the time of Tertullian, either confined to a narrow range of country or modified according to circumstances. From the tract de Corona Militis § 3 we find that the catechumen was thrice immersed “answering something more than the Lord commanded in his gospel,” and from the treatise de Baptismo § 11 we may surmise what this “something” was. It included certainly mention of the church; probably mention of repentance and remission of sins. Yea, more than this, the passages given in the note § contain evidence that the regula fidei in use made mention of the incarnation of Christ, His birth of the Virgin Mary, His crucifixion and resurrection and our resurrection also; and they are the more interesting, because, in the same treatise, Tertullian declares that in matters of teaching the church at Rome cum Africanis ecclesiis contesserat.

18. Thus as yet we have been unable to prove anything as to the confessions of faith used at this time in the church-services and in baptism, save that they contained an expression of belief in the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit: probably of belief in the resurrection, certainly of belief in the church, possibly also in the remission of sins. But that the words “Creator of heaven and earth” (which we have found in the creed of Irenaeus, and of which mention is made in two of the passages just quoted) was not as yet added to the baptismal creed of the churches of Africa, seems manifest after a careful examination of the writings of Cyprian, who followed Tertullian by a generation. He was bishop of Carthage from A.D. 248 to 258, and his correspondence contains several letters on the subject of rebaptizing those who had been baptized by heretical teachers. From these letters extracts will be found in the article CREEDS in the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES. We will give additional information here.^h

§ After referring to the dispute between St. Peter and St. Paul at Antioch, Tertullian proceeds: “Utique conversationalis fuit vitium non praedicationis. Non enim ex hoc alius Deus quam Creator: alius Christus quam ex Maria: et alia spes quam resurrectio adnuantiatur” (de Praescriptioe Haeret. § 23). “Etsi quaedam inter domesticos, ut ita dixerim, diserebant, non tamen ea fuisse credendum est, quae aliam fidel regulam superducerent diversam et contrariam illi quam catholice in medium proferrebant, ut alium Deum in ecclesia dicerent, alium in hospitio; et alium Christi substantiam designarent in aperto, aliam in secreto; et aliam spem resurrectionis apud omnes adnuantiarent, aliam apud paucos” (§ 26). Then of the Valentianus and others: “Si alium deum praedicant, quomodo ejus dei rebus et literis et nominibus utuntur adversus quem praedicant? Si eundem, quomodo aliter? Pro bent se novos apostolos esse: dicant Christum iterum descendisse, iterum Ipsum docuisse, iterum crucifixum, iterum resuscitatum” (§ 30). Of the church in Rome: “Unum Deum Dominum novit, creatorem universitatis, et Christum Jesum ex Virgine Maria filium Dei creatoris, et carnis resurrectionem” (§ 36). And in his irony Tertullian represents the Saviour as revoking part of His teaching to suit the spirit of the age: “Resurrectionem promiseram, etiam carnis, sed recogitavi, ne implere non possem: natum me ostenderam ex virgine, sed postea turpe mihi visum est: patrem dixeram qui solent et pluvias facit, sed alius me pater mellus adoptavi” (§ 44).

^h We have given (l. c.) a passage from Cyprian ad Magnon, Epist. 69, § vii. A similar passage is found in Cyprian’s letter to the bishops of Numidia (70, § ii.), except that the order of the two clauses is changed, and,

19. From the passages of Cyprian quoted here and in the note, the following facts may be inferred (i.) that the "law of Novatian's faith" was the same as that of the Church Catholic: the subjects on which he was in error had not as yet been specifically mentioned in any creed of the church, or in any rule of the faith: (ii.) that the form of interrogation at baptism was considered to be fixed and legalised: (iii.) that Novatian used this form; (iv.) and, if we consider that the "symbol" was different from this, he used the same symbol also: and we conclude that the accustomed form of interrogation contained at least the clauses "Dost thou believe in God the Father, in [His] Son Christ, in the Holy Spirit? dost thou believe remission of sins and eternal life through the church?" But we must add that there may have been, and probably was, an assertion that God was the Creator: and the baptismal creed may also have contained some mention of the birth and death and resurrection of the Saviour.

20. With this account of Cyprian's creed we should of course compare such fragments of the creed of Novatian himself as can be collected from his treatise de Trinitate (Migne, vol. iii. p. 886 &c., compare Hahn, Bibliothek, p. 74, and Dr. Heurtley, Harmonia, p. 21). Novatian says that the rule of faith requires us to believe "in Deum Patrem et Dominum omnipotentem, id est, rerum omnium perfectissimum conditorem" (c. i.); it requires us to believe "post Patrem in Filium Dei Christum Jesum, Dominum nostrum, sed Dei Filium" (cc. ix.-xxviii.): it requires us to believe "post haec in Spiritum Sanctum olim Ecclesiae repromissum sed statutis temporum opportunitatibus redditum." He says nothing (but his subject did not require him to say anything) of the latter articles of Cyprian's creed. But in c. xxx. Novatian notices one word which is interesting, for it forms a link of connexion with the creeds of the Eastern church. "Nos scimus et legimus et credimus et tenemus mun esse Deum qui fecit coelum pariter ac terram."

21. We have now collected the chief notices that have come down to us of the creeds and rules of faith of the churches of Rome, of Africa, and of Lyons, in the first two hundred and fifty years of the Christian era. Of the Oriental canons and symbols we have discovered little, instead of the simpler "credis," we have "credis in": thus, "credis in vitam aeternam et remissionem peccatorum per sanctam ecclesiam." Compare again Jubaiano, Ep. 73, § iv.: "Si fides una est nobis et haereticis, potest esse et gratia una. Si eundem Patrem, eundem Filium, eundem Spiritum Sanctum, eandem Ecclesiam, confitentur nobiscum Patripassiani, Anthropiani... Marcionitae, et caeterae haereticorum pestes et gladii et venena subvertendae veritatis, potest illic et baptisma unum esse, si est et fides una." In § v., after quoting the words of our Saviour on the institution of baptism, Cyprian remarks: "Insinuat Trinitatem cujus sacramento gentes baptizarentur. Numquid hanc Trinitatem Marcion tenet? Numquid eundem asserit quem et nos Patrem creatorem? Numquid eundem novit Filium Christum de Maria Virgine natum, qui sermo caro factus sit, qui peccata nostra portaverit, qui mortem moriendo vicerit, qui resurrectionem carnis per semet ipsum primus initiaverit et discipulis suis quod in eadem carne resurrexisset, ostenderit? Longe alia est apud Marcionem, sed et apud caeteros haereticos fides." And again, §§ xii. and xviii. In the letter of Firmilian to Cyprian (Ep. 75, § 10) we hear of the "usitata et legitima verba interrogationis" at baptism.

unless we connect the rule of the church of Lyons with that of some of the churches of the East. But of the church of Alexandria we have further knowledge. From the first book of Origen's work De Principiis (written between 212 and 215), we learn that that eminent thinker considered that by the apostolic preaching it was handed down that we must believe that "there is one God who created all things: and that this God did in these last days send our Lord Jesus Christ: that Jesus Christ who came was born of the Father before all creation: that by Him were all things made. Emptying Himself He became man, was incarnate. He took a body similar to our body, differing only in this, that it was born of a Virgin and the Holy Spirit. This Jesus Christ was born and suffered of a truth: He truly died, and He truly rose again from the dead, and having after His resurrection lived with His disciples was taken up. Then they delivered [that] the Holy Spirit [was] associated with the Father and the Son in honour and dignity." These clauses are found in Origen's work, not strung together as we have repeated them, but severed by long discussions: and after another interval we find him stating that "there will be a time of the resurrection of the dead," and once more that "by the Spirit of God the Scriptures were composed." This may be taken as Origen's account of the apostolic preaching: this as his summary of the points which the original disciples wished their converts to believe.

22. Of the creeds of the next century we have abundant evidence. Indeed the epoch from A.D. 313 to 451 may be called the age of creeds. But it will be more convenient now to divide the subject, and to examine separately the further history of what are called the Nicene and Apostles' creeds, i. e., the symbols of Eastern and Western Christendom; reserving for a later division the consideration of the so-called Athanasian creed, the hymn "Quicumque vult."

Nicene Creed.

23. From the earliest years of Christian history, the churches of Greece and of the East were more harassed by strange teachings than were those of the Latin races. It was the boast of Rufinus that no heresy took its rise within the church of Rome, and of Ambrose that the church of Rome had ever preserved undefiled the creed of the apostles. Tertullian's apostrophe to the "Felix Ecclesia" need not be quoted at length.¹ The key notes of the Eastern and the Western symbols (from the time when we can regard the Western symbol as that of a Latin church), may be learnt from the opening clauses. The former invariably begin, "I (or we) believe in one God;" the latter almost as invariably, "I believe in God." Of the growth of the latter form we must speak below, for the present we confine ourselves to the former. The creed in the seventh book of the Apostolic Constitutions is well-known, but other confessions of faith of scarcely less importance and interest have been collected and compared together. We may especially refer to one found amongst the few writings of Gregory of Neo-

Caesarea, who died about the year 270; and to another given by Sozomen, H. E. iii. 5, and Socrates, H. E. ii. 10, and ascribed to Lucian the martyr (†312). This latter (if genuine), can only be regarded as a declaration of personal belief; and thus whilst it would shew that the general line of such professions of the orthodox faith, the "regula fidei," was fixed, it would also shew that the words in which it was conveyed, the confessions in use in the churches at large, had not as yet assumed a defined and unchangeable form.^k

24. We are thus drawn onward to the creed which Eusebius of Caesarea laid before the council of Nicaea. After its last session he wrote to his flock an account of some of the incidents which had occurred at the synod, perhaps to defend himself for the part which he had taken in it. "He will give them" (he says), "first the writing concerning the faith which he had put forward, and next that which the fathers had published, making additions to the words which he had submitted." "His own faith he had claimed to have received from the bishops who had gone before him; it was used when he was a catechumen, and again when he was baptized; the truth of the articles contained in it he had learnt from the Holy Scriptures, and during the whole of his ministerial life, both when he had been presbyter, and also whilst he had been bishop, he had believed it and had taught it." It could scarcely have been very widely spread, if Eusebius's account of its production at Nicaea is strictly accurate. However, according to his narrative, it formed the basis of the proceedings of the council, it was the "rough draft;" and by introducing amendments and additions into it the fathers of the council produced the creed that has come down to us. Hence its interest and importance.

^k Gregory's confession may be seen in Migne, Græco-Latin Collection, vol. iii. p. 983, or in Mr. W. W. Harvey, Ecclesiae Anglicanae Vindex Catholicus. Both are printed in Dr. Hahn's collection, pp. 97, 100. Dr. Hahn has printed two other formulæ of interest; the one (p. 44) the declaration of the presbyters who assembled at Smyrna against Noetus (A.D. 220), terminating with the important words ταῦτα λέγομεν μεμαθηκίως ἀπὸ τῶν θεῶν γραφῶν, ἃ καὶ ἐπιστάμεθα: the other (pp. 44-46) extracted from the long letter of Alexander of Alexandria to his namesake of Constantinople (the letter itself is in Theodoret, H. E. i. 4). Walch had overlooked the former, which Dr. Hahn considers to be the oldest extant witness to the creed of the Oriental church. Noetus had asked, "What evil have I done? One God I glorify, one I know and none other but Him, begotten, suffered, died." The presbyters replied, "One God we too glorify, but as we know how rightly to glorify Him—and one Christ we have, but, as we know, one Christ Son of God, suffered as He suffered, died as He died, rose again, ascended into heaven, is on the right hand of the Father, is coming to judge the quick and the dead." The case before them did not require the presbyters to enter on any later articles of their creed. (Notice the "one God.") But the letter of Alexander embraces clauses on the Holy Spirit, on the one and only Catholic Apostolic Church, on the resurrection from the dead, and (it is mentioned in connexion with the first coming of our Lord) on the putting away of sin. He begins πιστεύομεν ὡς τῇ ἀποστολικῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ δοκεῖ, and towards the close (§ 13), he exclaims, ταῦτα διδάσκουμεν, ταῦτα κηρύττομεν, ταῦτα τῆς ἐκκλησίας τὰ ἀποστολικά δόγματα ὑπὲρ ὧν καὶ ἀποθνήσκουμεν. Thus both in its extent and language (although the order of the clauses is different) we see here a further progress towards the creed of Eusebius, and the creed of the council of Nicaea. We may note that this bishop also refers to the authority of Scripture as upholding the creed: "In addition to this pious opinion in regard to the Father and the Son, even as the Divine Scriptures teach us, we acknowledge one Holy Spirit."

25. The writing of Eusebius was this. "We believe in one God the Father Almighty, maker of all things both visible and invisible, and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the word of God, God of God, Light of Light, Life of Life, the only begotten Son, begotten before all creation, having been begotten of God the Father before all the ages: by whom too all things were made: who for our salvation was incarnate and lived among men, and suffered, and rose again the third day and ascended to the Father and will come again in glory to judge living and dead. We believe too in one Holy Spirit," and to this was added an expression of the belief of the church that each of these had a true subsistence: "the Father being truly Father, the Son truly Son, the Holy Spirit truly Holy Spirit, even as our Lord when He sent forth His disciples to preach said, 'Go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.'" Against this creed (he had urged on the assembled bishops), no one could bring objections; Constantine had pressed them to accept it. But it did not answer the purpose of the bishops assembled: "they were determined to introduce the word δμοούσιος, and under the pretext of the δμοούσιος they put forward this writing."^l

26. The Nicene creed proper may be taken from the letter of Eusebius referred to above. It is printed among the works of Athanasius, of Theodoret, Socrates, and Gelasius, as may be seen in Mansi, ii. 916, and Hahn, p. 105. Later versions, to which we must refer as we pass on, modified it to suit later difficulties. But because of its importance we will print a translation of it at length, as it is found in the letter of Eusebius, putting into italics the words in which it differs (except in order), from the creed of the bishop of Caesarea (the asterisks mark omissions). "We believe in one God the Father Almighty, maker of all things both visible and invisible: and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father, only begotten, that is of the essence (substance) of the Father, God of God, Light of Light,* very God of very God, begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made, both which are in heaven and which are on earth: who for us men and for our salvation came down and was incarnate and was made *man (ἐνανθρωπήσαντα) suffered, and rose again on the third day and ascended into the heavens and is coming to judge living and dead: and in the Holy Spirit": and the council added the further declaration, "those who say that there was when the Son of God was not, or that before He was begotten He was not, or that He came into existence out of things which were not, or that He was of a different essence or substance (ἐξ ἑτέρας ἰσποστάσεως ἢ οὐσίας), or was created, or was changed (ἡ κτιστὸν, τρεπτὸν ἢ ἀλλοιωτὸν) the Catholic church anathematizes."

27. We must refer to the article on the NICENE COUNCIL for a history of this assembly. Eusebius, in his letter, states that Constantine was easily persuaded to accept the words "begotten, not made:" against the phrase δμοούσιον he struggled longer. (With dean Stanley's Eastern Church, chapters ii. iii. iv. v., may be compared Professor Bright's History pp. 21-26: and the church historians generally.) The next fifty or sixty years furnished almost innumerable efforts on the part of Arian or Semi-arian bodies to evade or reject the word δμοούσιον. Many of the creeds suggested may be seen in Athanasius's tract de Synodis written in 359 (compare the histories of Theodoret and the others). At Sardica in Illyria a council was held in the year 347 which was attended by numerous bishops from the West (some say 94, others 300) as well as by 76 from the East. The encyclical letter of this council is reproduced by Athanasius (Apol. against Arians) and by Theodoret (H. E. ii. 6): but we have in addition a letter concerning it addressed by Hosius, who presided, to the pope, Julius, which states that the fathers assembled accepted the Nicene faith (Mansi, vi. 1209). Thus the creed became in a sense, in which no other document rivals it, the Symbol of the universal church.

28. Fifty-six years later than the Nicene assembly, another council was held to consider the dangers arising from the spread of the Macedonian and Apollinarian heresies. In the year 381 one hundred and fifty bishops met at Constantinople, with the sanction of the emperor Theodosius. Before they separated they addressed a letter to the emperor begging him to receive the canons they had agreed upon, and stating that their first work had been to exchange kind offices with each other, and their next to lay down concise definitions,^m confirming the faith of the fathers who had met at Nicaea and anathematizing the heresies which had arisen opposed to that faith. They had also entered on some points concerning the good order of the churches, on which they had made canons, which they attached to their letter, and begged the emperor who had convoked them to set his seal to the work they had effected. Their first canon was this: "that the faith of the 318 fathers who had met at Nicaea in Bithynia was not to be put on one side, but it remained valid: and every heresy was anathematized, and especially the heresy of the Eunomians or Anomoeans, that of the Arians or Eudoxians, that of the Semi-arians or Pneumatomachi, that of the Sabellians, that of the Marcellians, that of the Photinians, and that of the Apollinarians." The other canons related to questions of church order, except those numbered v. and vii. (if we may call either one or both of these canons of this council) of which the former was considered by Zonaras to refer to the action of the council of Sardica. But, if we must believe much later accounts, (of which more hereafter,) the assembled bishops did not separate before they had agreed to a formula, which resembled the Nicene creed, and was held to be in thorough accordance with it; the authorship of which was attributed by some to Gregory of Nyssa, by others to Gregory of Nazianzus (whose oration to the brethren assembled is printed in all collections of the councils): by others it is thought that the influence of Epiphanius of Constantia was such that he induced the fathers to accept his church's modification of the Nicene symbol. But this formula (if we may call it so) was neither mentioned in the canons of the council, nor connected with it by any contemporaneous writer. If it was ever seen by the assembly at all, it was read, and then simply deposited among the archives of the church at Constantinople.

29. We must therefore still follow the history of the Nicene symbol proper. Coming to the troubled gatherings at Ephesus (431) we remark that on the first day of the meeting of the more numerous party, (the oecumenical council as we designate it,) the Nicene creed was recited,ⁿ and then the letter of Cyril of Alexandria to Nestorius with its twelve anathemas—in reference to which the writer said that he considered that "he had not transgressed the correct word of the faith, nor the symbol which had been put forth at Nicaea." The fathers one and all took up the thought and repeated the sentiment in language slightly varying: and then they declared with the same unanimity that the letter of Nestorius to Cyril was not concordant (σύμφωνος) with the creed, and the cry arose "He that will not anathematize Nestorius, let him be anathema himself!"^o We need not proceed with the history of the rival gatherings under Cyril and John of Antioch: our interest now concentrates on this, that each party claimed that it alone stood by the Nicene creed: the Nestorian body excommunicating Cyril and Memnon and the rest until "recognising their offence they should repent, and receive the faith of the holy fathers who had assembled at Nicaea, without any new or strange additions," and declaring that Cyril's "anathemas" (or "chapters" as we shall find them now called) "were full of the wrong notions of Apollinarius and Eunomius, and Arius:"^p whilst the friends of Cyril denied the accusation, and maintained that his letter was consistent with the Holy Scriptures and with the faith which had been handed down by tradition and expounded in the great synod of Nicaea.^q

At the sixth session of the council another incident occurred. Charisius a presbyter from Philadelphia appeared, to complain that he had met with erroneous teaching amongst the Lydians, coming (as he alleged) from friends of Nestorius, who had reduced their sentiments to the form of a creed, and had led their adherents to subscribe to it. By way, I suppose, of proving his own orthodoxy, he seems to have recited the confession of his own faith (τὴν δμολογίαν τῆς πίστεως τοῦ Χριστοῦ)—which differed in some respects from the Nicene symbol, the reading of which had been once again repeated at the opening of the session.^r He then read out the copy of th-

^r The confession of Charisius may be seen in Mansi (iv. 1347), Labbe and Cossart (iii. 676 and iv. 293). Fleury calls it the Nicene creed erroneously (book xxv. ch. lvi.), for, although in accordance with that symbol, it is identical neither with it nor with any other symbol with which I am acquainted. It omits the following clauses: γεννηθέντα οὐ ποιηθέντα: δι' οὐ τὰ πάντα ἐγένετο, τὰ τε ἐν τῷ

"depraved creed" of which he had spoken, with the subscriptions of those who had acceded to it,* and this reading was immediately followed up by the adoption of the decree which in many accounts appears as the seventh canon of the Ephesine council. This decree therefore was expressly made with reference to the teaching of which Charisius had complained, the "impious creed," as it is called in some documents,¹ of Theodore of Mopsuestia.

30. Thus both the contending parties at Ephesus appealed to the Nicene creed: John of Antioch claiming that his friends alone were the followers of the 318, because they repudiated the anathemas of Cyril, and stating (Mansi, iv. 1415) that the Arians were now boasting that the advocates of the "homoousion" were coming round to their views by making a confusion of the natures; whilst the party of Cyril maintained that the twelve anathemas were legitimate deductions from the creed, being in no way dissonant from it. And this we must remember when we read that well-known decree, to which I have alluded as having been passed at the sixth session of the council. The decree was this: "The Holy Synod declares that no one is permitted to put forth or compose a faith different from that which has been settled by the holy fathers who with the Holy Spirit met together at Nicaea," and directs that those who dare either to compose a different creed (συντιθέναι πίστιν ἑτέραν ἢ γουον προκομίζειν ἢ προφέρειν . . .) or to offer or exhibit such a creed to any that may be willing to turn to the knowledge of the truth from Hellenism or Judaism, are, if bishops to be deposed from their bishoprics, if clerics from their office, if laics to be excommunicated. And "if any, whether bishops or clerics or laics, are detected as holding or teaching the things contained in the exposition that has been read by Charisius the presbyter, they are to be treated in the same way." Thus as yet we meet with no mention of the creed or exposition of Constantinople.²

οὐρανῷ καὶ τὰ ἐν τῇ γῆ; and the word ἀνθρώπων in the clause δι' ἡμᾶς ἀνθρώπων. Then it adds ἐκ τῶν οὐρανῶν; it adds γεννηθέντα ἐκ τῆς ἁγίας παρθένου, and σταυρωθέντα ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, ἀποθανόντα (omitting παθόντα), and concludes as follows, καὶ εἰς τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, τὸ παράκλητον, ὁμοούσιον πατρὶ καὶ υἱῷ, καὶ εἰς ἅγια καθολικὴν ἐκκλησίαν, εἰς ἀνάστασιν νεκρῶν, εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον. The existence of this confession of faith would shew that the Nicene symbol had not superseded all others even in Lydia in the year 431.

* Mansi, iv. 1347; Labbe and Cossart, lii. 678. There is no difficulty here in picking out the heretical teaching. The document is long, an exposition of a creed rather than a creed itself, and amongst other things it declares, "The Lord God, the Word, took perfect man, of reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting: which man, being like us in nature, having been formed by the power of the Holy Ghost in the womb of the Virgin, He in an inexplicable manner united to Himself." It is subscribed by about twenty persons (many of whom availed themselves of the pen of a senator or of the son of a deacon, either because they could not write at all, or because they wrote only slowly): all of them repudiate the heresy of the Quartodecimans, but none make mention of the creed either of Nicaea or of Constantinople.

² Mansi, iv. 1361. This decision has often been referred to as if it prevented all future councils from altering or adding to the Nicene creed. Expressions of Eutyches to this effect were quoted at the council of Chalcedon. It

31. A few years later we come to the so-called "robber synod," which was held at Ephesus in the year 449. The history of it, as well as of the earlier gathering at Constantinople in 448, is to be found mixed up in the acts of Chalcedon, on the first of whose sessions the proceedings at both synods were read out from the minutes of the notaries present. This reading was continually interrupted by the comments and remonstrances of those who maintained that the proceedings at the synod were incorrectly reported. The scenes at times were scarcely less tumultuous than the scenes at the robber synod (except that no soldiers were brought in to coerce the bishops) as the accounts in Fleury and the church historians only too plainly shew. A synod at Constantinople (448) had condemned Eutyches (EUTYCHES) although he had expressed himself as prepared "to agree with the expositions of the fathers assembled at Nicaea and Ephesus and to subscribe to their interpretation" (Labbe, iv. 191, 208; Mansi, v. p. 699, 715); although as he afterwards wrote to Leo, "he declared his assent to the very words of the creed propounded by the council of Nicaea and confirmed at Ephesus." Leo had been moved by his entreaties, and permitted his envoys to appear at this "robber synod" (A.D. 449), where (though now against the wishes of the pope) the sentence against Eutyches was reversed, and Flavian was so maltreated that he died in consequence.³ But before this Flavian had written to Theodosius, and in this letter we find this passage. He maintained that "he had followed the Divine scriptures and the expositions of the holy fathers was explained then that it was "a decision, not a canon," and the reference to Charisius (which I have quoted above) seems to make it of a temporary character. But surely a general or even an oecumenical council could not expect to bind all similar assemblies to the end of time. I am not aware that any claim had as yet been put forward, that in expositions of the faith the council had provided for every difficulty which might arise; whilst in points of ritual and discipline early canons have been generally superseded. In point of fact the canon that we should not kneel on the Lord's day, or between Easter and Pentecost, stood on the same authority, originally, as the canon that three bishops at least should join in the consecration of a newly elected brother. But if it is still deemed worthy of inquiry whether the council of Chalcedon, or any other, whether national or provincial synod has contravened the definition or canon of Ephesus in regard to a creed, the answer is twofold. First, that the council clearly prohibited bishops, clerics, or laymen from putting forth private creeds of their own composition, for it said nothing about synodical action; and next, that the creeds prohibited were ἑτέροι πιστεῖς, "creeds different in kind" (the fathers seem to have had in their minds the ἑτέρον εὐαγγέλιον of Gal. i. 6); and our explanation is confirmed by the fact, that we have no record that the fathers raised any objection to the confession of Charisius, although it varied in form from the Nicene symbol; and they had themselves adopted, though not as a symbol, the twelve capitula or anathemas of Cyril.

who had met at Nicaea, and of the 150 who had assembled here (at Constantinople) and of those who had gathered at Ephesus under Cyril of pious memory:” and he asserted that he preached the one our Lord Jesus Christ who was begotten of the Father before all ages as to His Deity, and in these last days, for us and for our salvation, of the Virgin Mary as to His humanity. Of course a question arises whether the “exposition of the 150,” here referred to, is identical with or additional to the exposition of the council of Nicaea.

32. For when at Chalcedon, in 451, the portion of the minutes of the “robber synod” was read which contained the confession of Eutyches: when it was stated that he had recited the genuine Nicene symbol, and declared that “in it he had been baptized and in it he hoped to be perfected,” and had reminded his hearers of the definition of the council under Cyril prohibiting either additions to or diminutions from it, Diogenes [DIOGENES] of Cyzicus (of the Asiatic party) cried out “He has adduced the synod falsely. The creed received additions from the holy fathers, because of the perversities of Apollinarius and Valentinus and Macedonius and men like them: and there have been added to the symbol of the holy fathers the words Who came down and was incarnate of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary. This (he proceeds) Eutyches has passed over as being an Apollinarian: for even Apollinarius receives the synod of Nicaea, understanding the letter of the creed in accordance with his own perversities. The holy fathers at Nicaea had only the words He was incarnate, but those that followed them explained (ἐσαφισαν) it by saying of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary.” This statement was immediately contradicted by the Egyptian bishops, who cried out “No one admits of any addition: no one admits of any diminution. Let the decree of Nicaea stand good: the orthodox emperor has ordered it.” (Labbe, iv. 134, 135; Mansi, vi. 632.) Thus of the two parties at the council, we find the Asiatic ready to accept some additions, the Egyptian anxious to exclude them: and as the latter became gradually weaker as the violence which Dioscorus had shewn at Ephesus became more and more exposed, we are prepared for the issue of the deliberations.

33. The first day’s session was of a prolonged duration. It seems almost incredible that the council could have listened to all that is reported to have taken place; nor could they have gone through the work they did if they had not been repeatedly called to order by the lay magistrates who presided. At the close of the day these magistrates advised that each bishop present should hasten to put in writing his belief on the points at issue, “knowing that our divine and pious sovereign believes in accordance with the exposition of the 318 fathers who met at Nicaea, and the exposition of the 150 who met at a later period, and the canonical epistles and expositions of the holy fathers Gregory, Basil, Athanasius, Hilary, and the two canonical epistles of Cyril, which were confirmed and published at the first synod of Ephesus.” The council adjourned two days for the purpose.

34. Thus prepared we read the proceedings of the second session. In their opening address the magistrates repeated the words with which they had dismissed the assembly two days before, referring again to the exposition of the 150. Their allusions to this exposition the bishops seem to have disliked, and they declined to give off hand any new account of the faith. It had “been well defined by the 318 and by the holy fathers, Athanasius,” and so on. “Let their writings be read.” The magistrates assented; and first EUNOMIUS, bishop of Nicomedia, read from a book the exposition of the synod which met at Nicaea; and then AETIUS, the deacon of Constantinople, read thus from a book, The holy faith which the holy fathers, in number 150 put forth, agreeing with the holy and great synod of Nicaea; and now at last we meet with a copy of this version of the Nicene creed. The two expositions were received by the bishops in a different manner. To both they cried, “This is the faith of the Catholics: this is the faith of all. We all believe like this.” In regard to the Nicene creed they added, “In this we have been baptized: in this we baptize. This is the true faith. This is the holy faith: this is the eternal faith: into this we were baptized; into this we baptize.” But there was no such cry of response when the exposition of the 150 was recited (Mansi, vi. 957; Labbe, iv. 342); of it they only asserted, “This is the faith of the orthodox: this we all believe.” It was not regarded as a symbol.

35. We may now note the points of difference. In the first clause we read now “maker of heaven and earth and of all things visible and invisible.” The next article runs, “and in one Lord Jesus Christ the only begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all worlds,” and the words, “God of God” are omitted. After the participle “came down,” are added the words from heaven: after “incarnate,” the words, of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary: the clause, crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate, was inserted before “He suffered,” and the word buried added: His resurrection was declared to be according to the Scriptures: the expression was inserted, He sitteth at the right hand of the Father, so the words, with glory, were applied to His return; and the important addition made, “of whose kingdom there shall be no end.” Of the true origin of all the earlier phrases,—whether they were really found amongst any documents of the council of the 150,—we may be permitted at first to feel some doubts. The character of Aetius, who seems to be the only channel through which they come to us, is not above suspicion: but we may have less hesitation in ascribing to the assembly at Constantinople the great additions made at the end of the document. After the words, “and in the Holy Spirit,” were introduced the well-known phrases: the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father, who with the Father and the Son is worshipped and glorified together: who spake by the prophets: in one Holy Catholic and apostolic church: we acknowledge one baptism for the remission of sins: we look for the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come. Amen. The subjects of these were not now in controversy; there was no motive now to modify the creed in respect to them.

36. I have expressed some doubt as to the confidence we may place in the character of Aetius, and as to the question whether this creed, in the phrases which refer to the Incarnation,— the two natures meeting in the one person of the Blessed Redeemer.—could truly have proceeded from the 150 who met at Constantinople in the year 381. We have seen how the friends both of Nestorius and Eutyches clung to the Nicene creed proper; and how the Egyptian bishops in 451 cried out that the words “of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary” were not to be accepted. Can we in any degree trace out the history of these additions, so as to assign them to their various authors? Of the clauses with which the creed concludes (“the Holy Catholic Church” to the end) many are found in the letter which Arius and Euzoius addressed to the emperor after the Nicene council, in which they stated the faith which they were willing to adopt (Sozomen, H. E. ii. 27; Soerat. H. E. i. 26). They are also found expounded in the catechetical lectures of Cyril of Jerusalem, to which we must assign a date not lower than 350. Again, the clauses referring to the Holy Spirit are clearly directed against the heresy of the Macedonians; they may therefore be safely assigned (without further evidence) to the era of the council of Constantinople. But we have other evidence: we find that not only these clauses, but those also which speak of the incarnation “of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary” are contained in the treatise of EPIPHANIUS (bishop of Constantia in Cyprus) called Ancoratus; a treatise which is stated by the author to have been written in a year corresponding to our 374, i. e. seven years before the council of Constantinople. It does not appear that Eriphanus was present at the council, but M. Caspari considers that his influence at the time was such that he was able to induce the fathers assembled there to accept the words which he had exhibited in his treatise.

37. The words of Eriphanus are these: *παρέλαβον οί ταύτης (τῆς ἐκκλησίας) παίδες παρά ἁγίων πατέρων, τούτεστιν τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων, πίστιν φυλάττειν . . . ταῦτα οὕτως λέγοντες καί τὰ τούτοις ὅμοια ἀπὸ τῶν θείων γραφῶν βεβαίωσαι αὐτοὺς τε καί τοὺς ἀκούοντας ἡμῶν . . . μὴ διαλείπητε ταύτην τὴν ἁγίαν πίστιν τῆς καθολικῆς ἐκκλησίας, ὡς παρέλαβεν ἡ ἁγία καὶ μονή πάρθενος τοῦ θεοῦ ἀπὸ τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων φυλάττειν, καὶ οὕτως ἑκάστον τῶν κατηχομένων τῶν μελλόντων τῷ ἁγίῳ λουτρῷ προσίεσαι οὐ μόνον ἀπαγγέλλειν ὀφείλετε τὸ πιστεύειν τοῖς ἑαυτῶν υἱοῖς ἐν κυρίῳ ἀλλὰ καὶ διδάσκειν βῆτως ὡς πάντων ἡ αὐτὴ μήτηρ, ἡμῶν τε καὶ ἡμῶν τὸ λέγειν, πιστεύομεν—*and he gives almost verbatim the creed of Constantinople, concluding with the anathemas of Nicaea. And then he proceeds to state how, “in our generation, that is, in the times of Valentinian and Valens, and the 90th year from the accession of Diocletian the tyrant (i. e. in the year 374) you and we and all the orthodox bishops and the whole Catholic church together make this address to those who come to baptism, in order that they may proclaim and say as follows.” Then, strangely enough, he gives another creed, or rather an exposition of a creed, which contains many interesting passages. We have here the phrase, γεννηθέντα ἐκ τῆς ἁγίας Μαρίας δει παρθένου διὰ πνεύματος ἁγίου, which (and not the more authentic document) suggested to Dionysius Exiguus (Mansi, iii. 567) the translation “incarnatus de Spiritu Sancto ex Maria Virgine,” since adopted by the church of Rome (as in the council of Trent, session iii.)

and by the church of England. Besides this we must note the words τὸ πνεῦμα ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς ἐκπορευόμενον καὶ ἐκ τοῦ υἱοῦ λαμβανόμενον. The Nicene anathema, extended to condemn errors regarding the Holy Spirit, was added to the form, and another anathema on those who deny the resurrection of the dead (Migne, Patrolog. xlii. 231, &c.) Archbishop Ussher was inclined to believe that, after the council of Nicaea had separated, the bishops who had been commissioned to edit its acts had of themselves circulated the creed with these additions. This explanation would satisfy the conditions of the problem so far as the words of Epiphanius are concerned, but the outcry of the Egyptians and the MSS. adduced by Eutyches and others are inconsistent with it.

38. But we must not pass over the notices of the creed of the church of Antioch which we find in the writings of JOHN CASSIAN, one of the early upholders of the monastic system in the West. About the year 430, when residing at Marseilles, he wrote at the request of Leo, then archdeacon, subsequently the great bishop of Rome, a work, De Incarnatione Christi. In book vi. c. 9 of this work (Migne, l. pp. 142-149) after claiming to have refuted Nestorius by arguments from Scripture, he appeals to the faith of the creed of Antioch (fides Antiocheni symboli) as alone sufficient to convict him, and he says, “textus ac fides Antiocheni symboli haec est.” (The text may be seen in Hahn, p. 34, or Nicolas, p. 345: it bears some similarity to the creed of Eusebins, but it contains the Nicene test word “homoussion Patri,” and it includes the phrase “qui natus est ex Maria Virgine.”) The object of Cassian did not lead him to quote the latter part of the creed. But M. Caspari (p. 83) conceives that he has discovered from the writings of Chrysostom, that this latter part embraced the clauses, “and in remission of sins, and in the resurrection of the dead, and in life everlasting” (Chrysostom, Hom. 40 in Epist. ad Corinth.). This creed must be considered as of earlier date than Cassian himself: he calls it the property of all the churches, but especially of the church and city of Antioch: he says, “collata est ab apostolis Domini:” yea God himself “symbolum constituit.” But all this shews that the creed of Nicaea had not superseded other symbols, even in the East, in the year 431.

39. Turning again to the “Credo in unum Deum,” we have seen that the assembled fathers at Chalcedon accepted the exposition which Aetius read out, as exhibiting their faith, although no one stated that into it he had been baptized. Our course is now simpler as the history unfolds itself. The emperor wished the fathers (there were 630 assembled) to issue a new creed, such as would exclude both Nestorians and Eutychians, but this they declined to do. So at their fifth session they “renewed and confirmed the faith of the fathers, and proclaimed to all the symbol of the 318: they acknowledged as friends and as of the same household all who had received this composition of religion (ταῦτο τὸ σύνθημα τῆς εὐσεβείας), and such were the 150 who had subsequently met in the great city of Constantine.” They quoted at length and adopted both summaries: "both the exposition of the 318" and "the things which had been defined by the 150 for the uprooting of the heresies which had then sprung up and for the confirming of the same our catholic and apostolic faith." They decreed that the faith of "the 318 should remain without being meddled with (ἀπαρχείηται)," and yet "confirmed the teaching in regard to the Holy Spirit which had been handed down by the 150;" and finally, after hearing once more the canon of the council of Ephesus under Cyril, "all the most religious bishops cried out, This is our faith: let our metropolitans subscribe; let them subscribe at once in the presence of the magistrates: things well defined admit of no delay: this is the faith of the apostles: by this we all walk: we all thus think."

40. With our modern notions of accuracy and precision in legal or deliberative proceedings, there is much in this which may cause us perplexity. It seems to be left in doubt, whether the exposition or teaching (as they called it) of the 150 was to be regarded as a creed, which might replace the Nicene symbol, or only as an authorised commentary or explanation of it. We must, however, note that the fathers of the council of Chalcedon in no synodical act called it a symbolum. Still, as in other cases, we may look to the subsequent history as giving to us the contemporary interpretation of their meaning, and most certainly the exposition of the 150, now sanctioned and adopted by the 630, was ere long largely substituted for the symbol of the 318, even though, in effecting the substitution, the church never lost sight of the definition of the council of Ephesus. Thus it becomes clear that the "catholics" did not regard the creed as the composition of a bishop, of a cleric, or of a layman, nor did they look upon it as being ἐρέπα πλάσις, a different faith from the faith of the Nicene council; they viewed it rather as having the sanction of the whole church, East and West, assembled at Chalcedon, and as a legitimate and concordant exposition of the original symbol.

41. The liturgical history of the Nicene or Constantinopolitan creed has been treated in the other department of this Dictionary. But there are two important additions to its language in the versions used over Western Europe, to which our attention must now be drawn. At some time or other the words "Deum de Deo" were added in the Latin to the Constantinopolitan creed (their equivalent had been in the original Nicene). More momentous has been the addition in the clause qui ex Patre Filioque (or et Filio) procedit. The former was probably added in error; a scribe's accuracy being affected by his memory of the Nicene formula: "with the latter a long history is connected, and as it comes partly within the limits of our Dictionary, we are required to say something on the interpolation.

42. The fifth and sixth general councils (as they are called) held at Constantinople, A.D. 533 and 681, adopted in their integrity the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople together with the canon of Ephesus, as they were all embodied in the acts of the council of Chalcedon (Mansi, ix. 186; xi. 295, 633). But in the year 589 (Mansi, ix. 977, etc.; see Hefele, Concilien-geschichte, vol. iii. p. 46, etc.) a synod was held at Toledo, called by Reccared, king of the Goths, and attended by 68 Spanish bishops. At this synod, in order to testify their renunciation of the Arian errors, Reccared and the bishops first recited the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople as containing the belief of the universal church, and then subscribed the definition of the council of Chalcedon.^a The Nicene creed is still the fides, the Constantinopolitan the doctrina. But in their copy of this doctrina we find one or two words (Filioque or et Filio, the copies vary) inserted in the clause relating to the procession of the Holy Spirit. Was this done intentionally, or in error? Mr. Ffoulkes (Christ. Divisions, ii. pp. 358, 431) conceives that we must answer, "in error." There is no evidence that the Spanish council proposed to make any addition: they seem to have thought that they were simply adopting the definition of the great council of Chalcedon, and using the creed after the form of the Oriental churches. The origin of the addition remains therefore in obscurity. Not so the reason for its continuance. It was the same national synod which directed that the creed should be recited at the time of the sacrifice, before the communion of the body and blood of Christ;^b

p. 536), but not in the Prisca Can Translatio (Mansi, vi. 1125; Hahn, p. 107); it is not found in the translation made by Dionysius Exiguus (Hahn, p. 113); nor in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Heurtley, p. 158; Muratori, i. 540); but it is found in the translators put forth by Isidorus Mercator (Mansi, iii. 574), and in the acts of the council of Toledo, A.D. 589 (Mansi, ix. 277). These data seem to warrant the conclusion that the words "Deum de Deo," as well as the addition "et Filio" or "Filioque," worked their way into the use of the Western church from the Spanish communion.

^a There are two subscriptions (Mansi, ix. 983 and 1000). The form of the latter may be noted. "I, king Flavius Reccared, in confirmation of these matters, which with the Holy Synod we have defined, have subscribed." The eight leading bishops sign thus: "I have subscribed, assenting to these constitutions." The rest simply subscribe. I am much indebted here to the labours of Mr. Edmund S. Ffoulkes (Christendom's Divisions, vol. ii.), although my results do not always agree with his.

^b The words of the order of Reccared to the bishops are interesting: "Ut propter corroborandam gentis nostre novellam conversionem omnes Hispaniarum et Galliae [Galliciae] ecclesiae hanc regulam servent, ut omni sacrificii tempore ante communicationem corporis Christi vel [or et] sanguinis, juxta orientalium patrum morem, unanimiter clara voce sanctissimum fidelitatem tenentem symbolum: ut primum populi quam credulitatem tenentem fateantur, et sic corda fide purificata ad Christi corpus et sanguinem percipiendum exhibeant" (Mansi, ix. 990). This is the position which the creed occupies in the Mozarabic liturgy (Daniel, Colex Liturg. p. 91) which once prevailed over all Spain, but is now confined to the chapel of Corpus Christi attached to the metropolitan church of Toledo. This same synod put forth some canons. The third is (Mansi, ix. 985): "Quicumque Spiritum Sanctum and thus the additional clause became the property of the laity as well as the clergy, and the natural result followed in an increasing unwillingness to resign the words. There were other councils at Toledo, in the years 653 and 681, and at these the creed was again recited with the words et Filio (Mansi, xi. 1027), "as we have received it, and (as the fathers said), sicut etiam in missarum solenniis patulis confessionum vocibus proclamamus."

^a Dr. Routh (Opusculi, i. p. 426) notes that the words "Deum de Deo" are not found in the old MS. translation edited by Pitheaeus, which he has printed on p. 399; nor does the interpolation appear in the version submitted to the sixth general council, A.D. 681; nor in a copy sent by Jeremias, patriarch of Constantinople, to Tübingen, in 1576; nor in a letter of Mark, bishop of Ephesus, a MS. of which was in the possession of Sir Thomas Phillipps in 1840. All the Latin MSS. of the acts of the council of Chalcedon omit the phrase (Steph. Baluzii Novae Collectio Canonum, 1256). It is, however, found in the second form given by Epiphanius: in the translation of the creed given by Hilary of Poitiers, de Synodis, § 84 (Migne, x. CHRIST. BIOGR.

43. From Spain the interpolated symbol spread into France: it seems to have reached even England in 680. In that year there was a synod at "Heathfield" (see Ussher, de Symbolo, p. 24), and the words ex Patre et Filio are found in one of the canons of the synod. Our authority is Bede, who wrote his history in 734 and died in 735; and we can scarcely deem them to be a modern interpolation, because they appear in their place in Alired's translation. After the death of Bede we find the clause warmly adopted by Charlemagne, who pressed the successive popes, Adrian and Leo III., to accept it. The second council of Nicaea (regarded by the Roman church as the seventh general council) was held in A.D. 787; and at this council TARASIVS, patriarch of Constantinople, delivered a long exposition of his belief, in which the words occurred, that he believed in "the Holy Spirit who proceedeth from the Father by the Son" (τὸ ἐκ τοῦ Πατρὸς δι' Ἰουῦ ἐκπορευόμενον, Mansi, xii. 1121). The papal legate accepted the account of the faith of Tarasius (ib. 1145), and then Charlemagne wrote to Adrian, objecting to the words. He said (Mansi, xiii. 760) that "Tarasius was wrong in that in the recitation of his belief he had professed not that the Holy Spirit proceedeth from the Father and the Son, according to the faith of the Nicene symbol, but that he proceedeth from the Father by the Son."^c Adrian did not object to the version of Charlemagne, nor did he inform him that in the true version of the creed neither et Filio nor per Filium occurred. He contented himself by shewing by quotations from Athanasius, Hilary, and others, that in his belief Tarasius was not heretical. Yet in the Latin version of the creed given by Mansi (xiii. 729) as having been recited or adopted by this "seventh council," the words are "qui ex Patre Filioque procedit." If these words were genuine, the argument of Mr. Ffonkes would fall to the ground, for the addition must then have been accepted at a general council of the church. But the subsequent history shews that this Latin version is incorrect, possibly intentionally so.

44. The motive for Charlemagne's remonstrance with Adrian may be learnt from the very brief record which we have of the synod at Gentilly A.D. 767 (Mansi, xii. 677). Almost all we know of it is found in the writings of Ado of Vienne. He says that there was "a question here between the Greeks and the Romans in regard to the Trinity, and whether the Spirit, as He proceeds from the Father, so proceeds from the Son, and also in regard to figures of the saints, whenon crediderit a Patre et Filio procedere, eumque non dixerit coaeternum esse Patri et Filio et coaequalem, anathema sit."

^c "Objectio—Quod Tarasius non recte sentiat qui Spiritum Sanctum non ex Patre et Filio secundum Nicæni symboli fidem, sed ex Patre per Filium procedentem in suae credulitatis lectione profiteatur."

ther they are to be fixed or painted in our churches." Then came the council of Frankfort, attended, it is said, by 300 bishops of Germany, Spain, France, and Britain, which declared its belief in the Spirit "a Patre et Filio procedentem" (Mansi, xiii. 905; Hefele, iii. p. 646; note). But still more important in this respect is the council of Friuli (Forum Julii) which met under PAULINUS patriarch of Aquileia, in the year 791 (Mansi, xiii. 827, gives the date as 791 in his text, but it is now generally believed that it was held five years later.) The subject of the creed again came under discussion, and the council adopted the interpolated form, directing that all should learn it by heart. More important still is it that the patriarch Paulinus confessed the truth as to the origin of the addition. "Just as (he writes) the 150 fathers who met at Constantinople by way of exposition supplemented the meaning of the 318, and confessed that they believed in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and Giver of life, so afterwards, because of those heretics who whispered about that the Holy Spirit is of the Father alone and proceedeth from the Father only, the word was added, who proceedeth from the Father and the Son. Yet are they not to be blamed who did this, as if they had added to or diminished aught of the creed of the 318; for they held no opinion differing from theirs, they sought only to fill up their meaning, which in other respects they left untouched" (Mansi, xiii. 856). But ere long the addition produced other troubles. Some monks of a Frank convent on Mount Olivet complained to Leo III. (who had succeeded Adrian in the papacy in December 795) that they had been accused of heresy, and partially excluded from the church of the Nativity on Christmas Day, because they held that the Holy Spirit proceedeth from the Father and the Son; yea, they were charged with reciting more than was held in the Roman church.^d But yet one of their number had so heard it sung in the West, in the chapel of the emperor. What were they to do? They requested the pope to give them instruction and direction. Leo had adopted the belief of the West, but he objected to the dogma being introduced into the creeds of the church universal; nor was his line of action altered by a synod which Charlemagne once more summoned to consider the matter. The question was becoming important, for the emperor would not give way. His bishops met at Aix-la-Chapelle in the winter of 809 (see Eginhard in Migne, Patrolog. civ. p. 472), and BERNHARD bishop of Worms, and ADELARD abbot of Corby, were dispatched to Rome to ask for the authorisation of the Roman see to the interpolation on which Charlemagne had resolved. An account of the interview has been preserved, and is translated at some length by Dr. Neale in his History of the Holy Eastern Church (General Introduction, part ii. pp. 1164-1166). It concluded by one of the deputies asking his Holiness whether he directed that the word in question should be expunged from the creed; and the pope replied that such was his wish: "there were other things equally true which were not contained in the creed; they were taught in another manner, so must be taught this truth of the Procession: if difficulty arose, let them give up the custom of singing the creed in the palace of the emperor: it was not sung in our holy church in Rome: thus the cause of contention would be removed, and peace would be restored." (The mention of singin) indicates that the laity would miss the word, if it were omitted.) And he begged again that the churches of Germany would say the symbolum in the mysteries in accordance with the Roman ritual (see Martene, p. 138; Binterim, p. 357). This was followed by a synod at Rome, A.D. 810, which protested against the addition (Hefele, Concilien-geschichte, iii. 702).

45. But neither the advice of Leo nor the protest of his council produced any effect. If the pope would not give way, neither would the emperor. The latter died in 814, the creed which he patronised being still sung in his chapel. The former suspended in the basilica of St. Peter two silver shields or tablets, "each weighing one hundred pounds," on which were engraved, in its uninterpolated form, the creed of the council of Constantinople in Greek and its Latin translation. The successors of Charlemagne were as obstinate as their ancestor, and whilst in the church of Rome (as we learn from Photius, de Spiritus Mystagogia; Migne, Graeco-L. vol. cii. p. 395) directions were given that the creed should be recited in Greek ἵνα μὴ τὸ στενὸν τῆς διαλέκτου βλασφημίας παρασχῆ πρόφασιν,^e the Spanish form was still spreading. It was of no avail that John VII. condemned the addition in 879 (Mr. Ffoulkes, u. s. pp. 74, 399, 413), or that in the spring of the succeeding year his legates approved the act of the synod of Constantinople which re-affirmed the creeds of the 318 and the 150, and rejected all interpolations (Mosheim, i. 150, ed. Stubbs). The custom introduced by Reccared still prevailed. The churches of the West maintained their independence. Aeneas, bishop of Paris, informs us (circ. 868) "that the whole Gallican church chanted the creed at the mass every Sunday," with the interpolated clause, and Walafrid Strabo states that the same custom prevailed wider and more frequently in the churches of Germany.^f At length these churches prevailed over the pope, and when the emperor Henry persuaded Benedict to use the creed of Constantinople at the mass, we can have little doubt that the pope accepted the Western form with the Western rite.^g The subsequent controversies on the subject (as that during the council of Florence) fall below our chronological limit; but the histories of the controversies and the council undoubtedly suggest to us what was the (unacknowledged) motive, why at the opening sessions of the council of Trent the Latin bishops there assembled put as the purport of their dogmatic statements not the Roman creed, not the hymn "Quicumque vult," but the symbol of Constantinople in its interpolated form.^h

^e These are said to be the words of Photius, although we have a various reading ῥαθυμίας for βλασφημίας. I am inclined to see here a satiric allusion on the part of the Greek patriarch to the ignorance of Greek now prevailing in the West. The order of the popes was afterwards executed by exhibiting the Greek creed in Latin letters, as we shall see below.

The Apostles' or Roman Creed.

46. We may now turn to the consideration of the further development of the Roman creed, "that which is commonly called the Apostles' creed." The history of this symbol differs essentially from the history of the creed of Constantinople: as a symbol, a doctrine, a teaching, an exposition of the faith of the church Catholic, that creed was (with the exceptions to which we have devoted so much attention) first framed and subsequently adopted by large synods of the bishops of the church universal; and the successive stages of its growth are so far distinctly recognisable. With the exception of the words referred to, it is even now acknowledged by almost all the churches throughout the world. But the so-called Apostles' creed has grown to its present dimensions almost as it were in the dark. The modes how and the authorities by whose influence the successive accretions were made are almost entirely unknown; and its use is confined to churches now or once belonging to the Roman patriarchate. We are told that, at the council of Florence, Ephesius, one of the legates of the Eastern churches, declared that this creed was not used in their services; moreover, that "they had it not, nor had they seen it before."ⁱ The Greek forms which now occasionally appear in print are comparatively modern translations from have been often quoted. (See Binterim, p. 339, or Daniel's Cod. x Liturg. i. 126.) "Si ideo, ut saepe dictum, illum angelicum hymnum (the Gloria in excelsis) prohiberem in festivis diebus cantare eo quod Romanorum presbyteri non solent eum canere, possumus simili modo post evangelium, symbolum reticere, quod Romani usque ad haec tempora divinae memoriae Henrici imperatoris nullo modo ceclerunt: sed ab eodem interrogati cur ita agerent; me coram assistente," they returned the answer quoted above, § 43: "At Dominus imperator non ante desiit, quam omnium consensu a Domino Benedicto apostolico persuastit ut ad publicum missam illud decantarent. Sed utrum hanc consuetudinem servent adhuc, affirmare non possumus, quia certum non tenemus." With reference to this concession Mr. Ffoulkes in his pamphlet Church's Creed or Crown's Creed (pp. 5, 6), states that before the 11th century the oath which the pope took at his election was, that he would preserve unmutated the decrees of the first five councils and of the sixth as well, usque ad unum apicem. This was now cancelled, and, nearly simultaneously, the addition, "and from the Son," was accepted through all the churches of the West.

^h This session, the third, was held on Feb. 4, 1546. "Following the example of the fathers in the early councils the oecumenical and general synod resolves, that the symbol of the faith which the Holy Roman church uses shall be expressed in the words in which it is recited in all the churches.

the Latin, and have no independent authority. The version published by archbishop Ussher, from a MS. in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and referred to as of value by bishop Pearson in his remarks on the word Almighty, is now considered to belong to the 15th century.^k

47. In regard to the name, "Apostles' Creed," we must note that it is only of late years that it has been confined to the symbol before us. Archbishop Ussher brings forward many proofs that the Nicene creed was at times so designated, and we know that as late as the 10th or 11th century the title was applied in the same MS. and within a few pages, to the Nicene and what we call the Apostles' creed. Thus, when we meet with this title in the first ten centuries we must be on our guard not to assume at once that the symbol meant is that to which we now confine the name.^l

48. We must refer to Dr. Heurtley's valuable collection of creeds of the Western church as superseding the necessity of any lengthened dissertation on our part. It has been supplemented by two "University Programmes" published by Dr. C. J. Caspari, professor of theology at the Norwegian university, which were published at Christiania in 1866 and 1869. Dr. Heurtley traces the growth of the creed (as far as it can be traced) through Tertullian and Cyprian: then we must take a leap from Novatian (A.D. 260) to Rufinus bishop of Aquileia (A.D. 390), the intermediate space of 130 years affording only one stepping-stone, furnished by the notes of the belief of Marcellus of Ancyra, which he delivered on his departure from Rome. The date of this is A.D. 341. We might have expected Marcellus to have exhibited his belief in the words of the creed of Nicaea; the fact that he used another symbol is interesting for more reasons than one.^m It comes to us in Greek and with the assurance that he had received it from the Scriptures, and been taught it by his forefathers in the Lord; by which he must have meant that he regarded it as in entire accordance with the Scriptures. The creed of Ancyra then must in substance have accorded nearly with the creed of Rome as we learn it from Rufinus, differing from it only in the following points, viz.: it omits the name Father in the first article: it reads "born of the Holy Ghost and of the Virgin Mary": and at the end there is added the clause "eternal life."

49. We are thus prepared to accept the general statement of Rufinus in regard to the creeds of his own church of Aquileia and the church of Rome, about the year 390, when it is considered that he wrote his interesting exposition de Symbolo. In this exposition we meet, for the first time, with the suggestion (not entirely adopted by the author) that σύμβολη: that the creed may have been called a symbol, as being a contribution, because the apostles, before they parted for their work, contributed the various clauses of which it is composed. It is more probable, historically, that the error as to the meaning of the word gave birth to the tale; if symbol meant collation, the apostles alone could have been the collators. But when Rufinus makes remarks on the difference between his and the Roman creed, it becomes evident that he cannot have attached any great value to the legend: it becomes clear that he was aware that the symbols had varied in some degree since the apostles' times.

50. We will put the two creeds in parallel columns, the better to exhibit their differences and their agreements; in the third column we will place the modern Roman creed.

in any one creed differs from both of the others,

^k Dr. Caspari has printed two such translations in the Theol. Zeitsch. of Johnson and Nissen, but I have not been able to see them. See his Ungedruckte Quellen, i. p. viii. and 237.

^l Thus the canon of Irenaeus claimed to be "apostolic:" the Apostolic Constitutions speak of the ἐξήγησις ἀποστολικῆς κηρύτματος; Lucian of ἡ εὐαγγελικὴ καὶ ἀποστολικὴ παραδοσις; Cyprian of the praedicatio apostolica.

^m The words of Marcellus, as recorded by Epiphanius and it will be seen that the two contemporary

than the two together from the modern form; the words or phrases of the modern form which appear in neither of the other two being:

creatorem caeli et terrae in art. i.
conceptus de Spiritu Sancto, natus } in art. iii.
ex Maria Virgine }

The additional words:

passus, mortuus in art. iv.
Dei omnipotentis in art. vi.
Catholicam sanctorum } in art. ix.
communione }

and vitam aeternam in the last clause.

It seems only to remain to us to trace these words to their origin.

51. But, before we do so, we may remark that Rufinus states that this creed had never been put into writing in a continuous form, and that it thus became probable that the church of Rome had preserved the purest type of it; because (i.) that church had been of all most free from heresy, and (ii.) because the practice had there prevailed of the catechumen reciting the creed in the hearing of the faithful. Jerome and Augustine refer to the same practice of keeping the creed unwritten. This custom gives strength to the opinion that the true meaning of the word symbolum is watchword; the watchword which the candidates for baptism repeated before they became "initiated" into the privileges of Christianity, before they were admitted fully to share in the "mysteries" of the Christian faith and Christian life.*

Rufinus thinks that in other churches additions may have been made to oppose the growth of heresies.

52. Ambrose, in his letter to pope Siricius on the Perpetual Virginity of the Mother of our Lord (Ep. 42, § 5; Migne, xvi. 1125) makes the same remark as to the Roman creed: "Sed si doctrinis non credatur sacerdotum, credatur oraculis Christi, credatur monitis angelorum, dicentium Quia non est impossibile Deo omne verbum: credatur symbolo apostolorum, quod ecclesia Romana intemeratum semper custodit et servat." This must have been written between 384 and 398, at least fifty years before the Egyptian bishops at the council of Chalcedon repudiated the words as belonging to the Nicene faith. [We must note also that Ambrose called the creed of the Roman church the Apostles' Creed.] We have referred elsewhere to the passage where Ambrose narrates that he was delivering the creed to some "competentes" when he was called out to rescue an Arian. The treatise of Jerome addressed to Pammachius (vol. ii. p. 435, ed. Vallar.; Migne, xxiii. 380) contains the following: "In symbolo fidei et spei nostrae, quod ab apostolis traditum non scribitur in charta et atramento sed in tabulis cordis carnalibus, post confessionem Trinitatis et unitatem ecclesiae omne Christiani dogmatis sacramentum carnis resurrectione concluditur." On the reserving of the creed see other instances in Dr. Heurtley, p. 52 n., and Caspari, ii. 57.

53. And thus we are brought to the treatises and sermons of St. Augustine which furnish us with full information as to the creed of the churches in his neighbourhood at the beginning of the 5th century. The treatises are De Fide et Symbolo (vol. 6), De Genesi ad Literam (vol. 3), Enchiridion ad Laurentium (vol. 6); and the sermons, Nos. 212 and 214, In Traditione Symboli (the sermons 2, 3, 4 De Symbolo are given up as spurious, 213 as of very dubious authority; 215 must also be rejected). Like others, Augustine does not place the articles of the creed together: "it was not to be committed to writing;" we are therefore compelled to cull it, as the creed of Aquileia was culled, from the body of his commentaries. But this process of gathering the creed from treatises on the creed has its difficulties; we cannot be always certain whether we must regard a phrase as text or as comment. For example, in sermon 212, we meet with the words: "Credo in Deum Patrem omnipotentem invisibilem immortalem, regem saeculorum, visibilium et invisibilium creatorem": how much of the sentence are we to consider as belonging to the creed? We met with the words invisible, immortal in the Aquileian symbol; and "maker of all things visible and invisible" occur in the Nicene creed: how much belonged to the creed of St. Augustine? His hearers knew, though we must continue in doubt on the subject. We are compelled, however, to notice that his words oscillate between "qui natus est de (or ex) S. S. et Maria Virgine" and "qui natus est per S. S. ex Maria Virgine": the phrase "passus est sub P. P. crucifixus et sepultus" is found in both the sermons. No. 212 has the clause "in vitam aeternam," and the Enchiridion may possibly be quoted by some as expounding it also. Thus it appears on the whole that the church of Hippo, about the year 400, differed from ours in this: that its creed did not contain the phrase "creatorem caeli et terrae," nor the clause "descendit in inferna," nor yet "sanctorum communionem." The language as to the incarnation was not settled; the words "omnipotentis" in art. vii., and "Catholicam" in art. ix. were not yet inserted, and our final article, "in vitam aeternam," was unnoticed in three of Augustine's treatises. (The various forms of Augustine's creeds may be seen in Dr. Heurtley's Harmonia Symbolica. But in M. Nicolas's Symbole des Apôtres the author has complicated the subject by treating, as genuine works of the great father, some of the questioned sermons.)

54. It will be sufficient to notice now the epochs at which the remaining clauses were introduced into the creed. It would go beyond the object of this article to discuss the motives for the various additions which M. Nicolas assigns; we may trace some of them doubtless to the influence of the Nicene creed in its remodelled condition; some to the wants of various times, when the Roman church could no longer claim its older privilege of being untouched with error, and when, in consequence, it felt compelled to modify its symbol slightly, just as the council of the 150 is said to have modified the symbol of the 318. The words creatorem caeli et terrae are found in two baptismal creeds of the ancient Gallican church, the one a symbolum traditum, delivered to the competentes, the other an interrogatory form used at baptism. Both creeds are printed by Mabillon in his Museum Italicum, and may be seen in Dr. Heurtley's Harmonia Symbolica, p. 110 and p. 68. (The same MS., a Codex Bobiensiis, supposed to date from the middle of the 7th century, contains a third creed in which the words do not occur.) The clause, no doubt, found its way from the Eastern creeds. The now accepted phrase, "qui conceptus est de Spiritu Sancto, natus ex Virgine Maria," appears in the creed ascribed by Dr. Heurtley to Eusebius Gallus (say about A.D. 600), by Oudin and Dr. Caspari to Faustus of Riez (A.D. 475). It is more accurately worded than the corresponding phrase in the creed of Constantinople; but we are not compelled by such internal evidence to give it a much lower date than the year assigned by Oudin. The motive for the insertion of the contemporaneous "communion of saints" may be more obscure, but the following is a probable account.

55. The clause is found, as we have said, in this creed of Faustus or of Eusebius Gallus. It is found also in the sermon 181, De Tempore, printed in the appendix to vol. vi. (p. 1733) of the works of Augustine, a sermon which we may assign to the school of the great father, although not to the father himself. The phrase is there explained to mean: "We are bound in fellowship and in the communion of hope, with those saints who have departed this life in the faith which we have received." M. Nicolas (p. 321) quotes the words of Magnus, archbishop of Sens in the 9th century, "communione omnium sanctorum, i. e. congregationem omnium fidelium in Christo" (Martene, de Riti-bus, etc. i. p. 61). Thus it would seem as if, the opinion of one age having limited the application of the clause "the Holy Catholic church" to the church militant, some teachers of eminence deemed it desirable to remind believers of their interest in the "spirits of just men made perfect;" and possibly to the same desire to realise our communion with the saints of old, "those who died in the faith not having received the promises," we must ascribe the introduction of the words "descendit in (or ad) inferna." They are found first in the exposition of Rufinus, and Rufinus explains them: "He descended into death, not that like mortals he should be detained by death, but that in rising again he should open the gates of death: just as if a king should proceed to a prison, and having entered it should throw the doors open, loose the fetters, destroy the chains, the locks, the bars: should bring out those that were bound, and those who were sitting in the darkness and the shadow of death should restore to light and life. So is the King said indeed to have been in the prison, not however in the condition in which the others had been who were confined in the prison: they were there to suffer punishment, He to remit the punishment." Still many years elapsed before the words worked their way into the generally accepted professions of faith. Few appear to have agreed with Rufinus that the thought was contained in the "buried" of the Roman creed. The clause is not in the exposition of Magnus to which we have just referred: it is not in the Mozarabic liturgy (Tractatio Symboli, Caspari, ii. 291), although it is found in another Spanish creed which Dr. Caspari assigns to Justinian, bishop of Valentia, circ. 550. In the form descendit ad inferna, it is in an old creed which came from the north of Ireland, and is dated before 690: it is contained in all the three creeds of the Colex Bobiensis; and it is contained in the Spanish creed which Etherius, bishop of Osma, and Beatus presbyter of Astorga, exhibited in 785, as sufficient protection against the errors of Elipandus, archbishop of Toledo.

56. We have now only to note the word "Catholicam." This cannot be assigned to any earlier formula than the creed ascribed (§ 56) to Eusebius Gallus or to Faustus. We must remember that it appeared at an earlier date in the exposition of Constantinople.

57. The first copy which has been found verbally identical with the Roman creed of the present day, is contained in a treatise published by Mabillon (Anecdota, tom. iv. 575) from a MS. entitled Libellus Pirminii de simplicibus libris canonicis scarapsus (sic, Heurtley, p. 71). The date of this is said to be about 750. In this Libellus it is repeated twice: once in the direct form in the baptismal service: once as distributed among the apostles, according to the late invention as to its authorship. But we must pass on to a much later date before we find that the words of the creed were considered as finally settled; indeed, in England, we meet with the phrase "holie cherehe" in the 14th century, and there are some differences still to be noted between the baptismal and declaratory creed.

58. We have spoken above, in § 47, of Greek copies of the Nicene creed being handed down in Latin letters for use at some of the services of the church; the same was done with Greek translations of the Apostles' creed. The St. Gall MS., from which Dr. Caspari published the Nicene creed, contained also a copy of the "Apostles'" creed in Greek, with Latin letters; and Dr. Heurtley (p. 76, &c.) reprints two similar copies which had been noticed in archbishop Ussher's tract, the earlier one in facsimile (p. 80). This last is found in a MS. in the British Museum, called King Athelstane's Psalter, which contains in one place the (present) Apostles' creed and the Athanasian creed: in another this Greek creed in Anglo-Saxon letters. The Greek agrees (almost verbatim) with the text of Marcellus of Ancyra, except that it omits the words, "life everlasting." The other creed is found in a MS. at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and is interesting because it affected the exposition of bishop Pearson, who formed an erroneous opinion of its authority. It really belongs to the 15th century. Martene (vol. i. p. 43) prints an order of the church of Vienna wherein the Apostles' creed in Greek was used at baptism.

The Athanasian Creed.

59. "The confession of our Christian faith, which is commonly called the creed of St. Athanasius," stands on ground very different from that occupied either by the Constantinopolitan or the so-called Apostles' creed; unlike both in this, that it has never been made a baptismal confession—and thus it is in no true sense a symbolum: unlike both again in this, that it never received the sanction either of any known father of the church, or of any general or even provincial synod before the epoch of the Reformation. Thus its origin is wrapped in mystery: there is little external evidence producible either as to the time or the place of its appearance, or as to the position or name of its composer. We must be content with examining it by the light of the internal evidence which it brings with it, and of the few and scanty notices which late accounts of it adduce.

60. When we bring then the history of the first five centuries in comparison with the statements of this "creed," it would appear that it must have been composed after the Arian controversy had arisen (the Son is God: God of the substance of the Father): and after the Macedonian and Apollinarian heresies (the Holy Ghost is God: almighty, eternal: the Son is perfect man: of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting). The Nestorian opinions seem to be hinted at in the phrase that the Lord Jesus Christ is one by unity of Person: the Eutychian, that He is Perfect God and perfect man: one altogether not by confusion of substance. The words in which the fathers at Chalcedon summed up the truth in regard to the nature of the Lord incarnate, all seem to be embodied in the exposition before us. "Following the holy fathers we acknowledge One and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ: and we all in accord teach that He was perfect in Godhead, perfect in manhood, truly God and truly man: of a reasonable soul and body, of the same substance with the Father as to His Deity, of the same substance with us as to His humanity: in all points like us without sin: begotten indeed before all worlds of the Father as to His Deity, but in these last days for the sake of us and our salvation of the Virgin Mary, the Mother of God, as to His humanity; being one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, only-begotten, in two natures, without confusion, without change, without division, without separation."⁹ On comparing the two formulæ together it is difficult to resist the conclusion from this internal evidence, that this exposition was in date posterior to the council of Chalcedon, and that it was the result of an attempt to put in a somewhat rhythmical form, so as to be better remembered by the people, the general teaching of the church on the subjects concerned, after it was settled at that council. But there is this further evidence to shew that we must place the creed below 451. The verse, "The Holy Ghost is of the Father and of the Son," could not have been put so boldly forward before the council of Toledo, 589,—possibly not much before the end of the 8th century, when the doctrine as to the double procession had spread from Spain into France and Britain; for the verse seems, in its present form, to be an integral part of the creed.

61. Turning now to external evidence, we find that, with the exception of a kind of treatise found in two forms (the one by Muratori at Milan, entitled Expositio Fidei Catholicæ Fortunati, the other at Oxford, Expositio in Fide Catholica), we have no satisfactory proof of its existence before the middle or end of the 8th century.

62. The following seems to be the origin of the creed. We meet with numerous instances of private expositions of the faith both in the acts of councils and in the early liturgies. We have had occasion to speak of the creed of Tarasius accepted at the second council of Nicaea; another exposition was submitted at the same time from the patriarch of Jerusalem. Dr. August Hahn's volume furnishes others, such as the formulæ of Antioch, pp. 148–158; of the synod of Philipopolis, p. 158; of Sirmium, p. 160; or, again, the creed of Athanasius himself, p. 174; of Basil, p. 176; of Adamantius, p. 178, in the earlier parts of the epoch we are considering; or of Caelestius, and Julian, a little later. Hilary of Arles is known to have composed an exposition; and the sermons addressed to the competentes by Augustine, and the sermons of the school which are ascribed to him, furnish almost parallel instances. So of the liturgies; Martene's first volume furnishes many examples: e.g. an old Gallican missal, pp. 32 and 35; and others, as at Liège, p. 43. Our Athanasian creed may have originated in such an exposition. For the words at the commencement, "Quicumque vult salvus esse, ante omnia," &c. refer not to the final salvation (that is the subject of verse 39; they that have done good shall go into life everlasting), but to the salvation, or state of salvation, into which we are admitted by baptism: so do the words in verse 26: "Qui vult ergo salvus esse," and verse 40: "salvus esse non poterit." The words "ante omnia," before all things (as Dr. Waterland, iii. 230, has noted), mean in the first place, first in order: and as ut nisi quis integram inviolatamque servaverit (as bishop Cotton of Calcutta has remarked), the idea comes from the words of St. Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 7, "I have kept the faith." We are thus led to suppose that this exposition may have been composed as a preparation for baptism, analogous to the other expositions of which I have spoken. It is called Sermo Athanasii de Fide in some of the earliest notices of it.

63. The exposition attributed in the MS. of the Ambrosian Library to FORTUNATUS suggests that we have not the creed in its original shape. The Oxford MS. gives this exposition in a somewhat curtailed form; but they both agree in omitting reference to the verses 11, 12, 14, 16, 18, 20, 21, 22, the last clause of 24, 25, 26, 27. With these omissions our creed would be more easy to commit to memory. But all the extant MSS. of the document itself contain the verses.

64. The question remains, who was its author? We need not say that, until the date of its appearance is decided, it is premature to discuss the question of its authorship. We will only add here, that the opinion of Gieseler that it originated in Spain seems to be inconsistent with the fact that the discourse of Beatus and Etherius, above referred to, has no verbal similarity with it; and the theory of Waterland, that Hilary of Arles was its author, is refuted by the fact that the council of Arles, in 817, preferred to it the rule of faith set forth at Toledo about 130 years before. But all the evidence points to France as its birthplace, and the period between 750 and 850 as its date. [See QUICUNQUE VULT.]

[†] For the arguments in favour of an earlier date being assigned to this creed, the reader may consult with advantage the Rev. G. D. W. Omanney's Athanasian Creed: An Examination of Recent Theories respecting its Date and Origin. London, 1875.—[EDD.]

Interrogatory Creeds.

65. Before we conclude we ought to make a few remarks on the interrogatory creeds of the early rituals; but we can add none to those which the care and diligence of Dr. Heurtley has collected. The questions are generally addressed to the person or child to be baptized, and the creed is broken into three or more divisions, to each of which the answer should be Credo. In some instances the words are much abbreviated: in some they pass away entirely from both Apostles' and Nicene creeds,—as in a form contained in an ancient Gallican missal (Heurtley, p. 11) in which there are three questions of a character similar to this: "Credis Patrem et Filium et Spiritum Sanctum unius esse virtutis? Credo." In one, the words are addressed to the sponsor on behalf of the child: "Credis in Deum Patrem omnipotentem, Creatorem caeli et terrae?" and the answer is in the future, "Credet"—the more interesting as indicating the hope of the composer that the child would thereafter believe the "articles of the Christian Faith."

66. Books.—Voss, de Tribus Symbolis; Ussher, de Symbolo Romano; Suicer, de Symbolo Nicaeno-Constantinopolitano; Martene, Tentzel, Waterland, and others. Of modern writers I am chiefly indebted to Drs. Hahn, Heurtley, and Caspari; M. Nicolas, Le Symbolisme des Apôtres. I did not see Mr. Lumby's work until after this article was written. The subject is further discussed in the writer's volume on the Creeds. [C. A. S.]

CREMENTIUS (v. l. Clementinus) (Cyp. Ep. viii. ix. xx.), subdeacon, took to Rome the announcement of Cyprian's retirement; and brought back to Carthage the news of the martyrdom of Fabianus, and the covert reproof (Ep. viii.) of the Roman clergy as to the retirement.

[E. W. B.]

(2) A canonised martyr of Saragossa, about A.D. 304, mentioned by Prudentius in connexion with the "eighteen martyrs of Saragossa," together with St. Encratis and St. Caius, in the persecution of Diocletian, at the time when Dacian was governor of Spain. Caius and Crementius fought twice in the arena, and retired without staining it by their blood. (Prudentius, Peristeph. Hymn v., Patrol. Lat. ix. 982; Ruinart, Act. Sincera Martyrum, p. 468; Ceillier, iii. 44.)

CRESCENS (1) The Cynic. [JUSTIN MARTYR]

(2) Bishop of Cirta in Numidia, now Constantine. It is a particularly common name on monuments of Cirta; 8th Suffrag. in Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. vii. A.D. 256.

[E. W. B.]

(3) PAULUS, and DIOSCORIDES, three boy martyrs of Rome, May 28 (Men. Basil.).

CRESCENTIA, ST., Virgin, Paris. The history of this saint is very obscure. Her tumulus was near Paris, in a place where a stone bears the inscription:

HIC REQUIESCIT CRESCENTIA SACRATA DEO
PUELLA.

She is commemorated on the 19th of August, but without any reason being assigned, as nothing is known of her for certain except her epitaph. All that is known of the tumulus, and of the wonders connected with it, is taken from Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Confess. cap. 105, Patrol. Lat. lxxi. p. 904).

[D. R. J.]

CRESCENTIUS, a controversialist of the 4th century, mentioned by Epiphanius. Alexander, canonised archbishop of Alexandria (A.D. circ. 312-326), had a great dispute and correspondence with him on the time of celebrating Easter. (Epiph. Haeres. 70, 9, Patrol. Graec. xlii. 555, § 821; Ceillier, iii. 105.)

[W. M. S.]

CRESCONIUS (1) Bishop of Villa Regia in Numidia, at the end of the 4th century. He deserted his see and seized on that of Tubia, or Tubuna. The third council of Carthage, A.D. 397, passed a decree ordering his return to his own see (Can. 38), which he entirely disregarded. The secular arm was called in with a little effect. At the council of Carthage A.D. 401, the primate of Numidia was ordered to summon Cresconius before the next general council, and to depose him if he failed to appear. (Cod. Canon. Eccl. Afric. can. 77.) But no mention is made of him at the council of Milevum, A.D. 402, and if he is the same who appears as bishop of Tubuna at the conference of Carthage in 411 (Prin. Comit. c. xxi.), he must have carried the day (Labbe, Concil. ii. 1072, 1096, 1172, 1377; Tillemont, xiii. 305).

[E. V.]

(2) Tribune, to whom Augustine writes (Ep. 213 [229]).

(3) Grammarian, Donatist, against whom Augustine writes four books. [DONATISM.]

(4) Monk of Adrumetum, with Felix, came to find Augustine at Hippo, and hastened back to Adrumetum by Easter, so that they gave him no time to get the pieces against Pelagianism he meant to send by them copied (Aug. Epp. 214, 215).

[E. B. B.]

(5) or CRISCONIUS, an African bishop, who about 690, at the request of the "pontifex" Liberinus or Liberius, published a systematised collection of the Ap. stolic Canons and those of the early councils, and the decretals of the popes from Siricius to Gelasius. A previous collection of this kind, under the title of Breviatio Canonum, had been drawn up by Fulgentius Ferrandus, a deacon of the church of Carthage, about 547, containing in 232 articles the heads and titles of the Greek canons, and of the decrees of the African councils down to 427. We learn from the letter of Cresconius prefixed to his Breviarium, that Liberinus, considering this index insufficient, desired Cresconius to compile a more complete collection. In obedience to this injunction he drew up a Concordia Canonum giving the canons in extenso, arranged according to subjects, sub titularum serie, in 300 articles. The so-called Breviarium, which stands as a distinct work in many MSS., is nothing more than a sort of index or table of contents, titulorum

* This is from the Codex Bobiensis; Heurtley, p. 110; Mabillon, Museum Italicum, i. p. 321. But Dr. Caspari has found a MS. in the library of the Academy of History at Madrid, where in the form of baptism in a Mozarabic office (generally similar to the above) the answers are distinctly "credet" (ii. pp. 294, 299). He adds that, in Africa the question was Credet and the answer Credit, (p. 30).

praenotatio, to the Concordia Canonum, which is printed by Migne (Patrol. vol. lxxxviii), preceded by the Breviatio Canonum of Ferrandus. Both works are found in the first volume of the Bibliotheca Juris Canonici, of Voellus and Justellus, Paris 1661, in the appendix to which the Concordia was printed for the first time from a MS. in the Vallicellian Library at Rome. The Breviarius was first published at Paris by Pithou in 1588.

The author of the Concordia Canonum has been usually identified on the insufficient evidence of the superscription of the MS. of the Johannis, with the poet Flavius Cresconius Corippus, the author of the "Laudes Justinii Minoris," and the "Johannis," recording the African campaigns of a certain Johannes "magister militum" in Justinian's reign, c. 550, published in the seventeenth volume of Niebuhr's collection of the Byzantine Historians (see Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biogr., s.v. Corippus). But there is absolutely nothing but the sameness of the name to support this identification, which may be regarded as the mere hypothesis of the scribe. The name Cresconius was one of the commonest in North Africa (as many as thirty-two bishops of that name are found in the index to Baluzius's Nov. Concil. Collect.), and there is little doubt that the bishop and the poet were different persons. Cresconius may probably be placed towards the end of the 6th century, a little later than Fulgentius Ferrandus. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 690; Migne, Patrolog. lxxxviii. 815; Mazzuchelli, Proefat. in Corippum.) [E. V.]

CREWENNA, ST., one of the companions of St. Breaca, who came from Ireland to Cornwall in the fifth century. The parish of Crowan is just east of St. Erth and Breage, both named from Irish founders. The parish feast is on the Sunday nearest to Feb. 1. Owing to the ravages of the Northmen, almost all the records of this part of the country have perished, the bishopric of Cornwall was itself destroyed, and a new see founded by the Confessor within the strongly-walled city of Exeter. Hence we have only the traditional names of the parishes to rely on, which are certainly old, and a few homilies for saints' days which were composed at a much later time, and can only be looked on as editing religious narratives, with very slight traces of real history in them, as the Bollandist editors often point out. They were, in fact, for religious people what the tales of chivalry were for the world in general. We have many such religious tales written now, with historical persons introduced into them, and worded as if they were real histories, but no one is deceived by them; nor should we apply a different test to the works of the celebrated writers of lives of early saints in the middle ages. St. Bernard gave a warning against the use of modern unauthenticated hagiologies (Ep. 312, al. 398), which was very little attended to (see Brewer's remarks in the preface to Giraldus Cambrensis, iii. p. xliii.): in fact the 12th century was the flourishing age of these biographies. Besides Anglo-Saxon writers and Giraldus (and Geoffrey of Monmouth), the Cotton MS. Vesp. A. 14, which contains lives of Celtic saints, is of this date, as well as the Liber Laudavensis, which is due to the revival of literature in Wales during this century. Similarly a certain number of the biographies were composed in the reign of Edward the Confessor in the previous age, to whose encouragement the revival of this kind of composition is partly due. The Irish Lives were composed or rewritten to a great extent after the conquest by Henry II. [C. W. B.]

CRIDA, ST., gives name to a Cornish parish on the river Fal, east of St. Probus and west of St. Mewan. It is mentioned in the curious will of Reginald Mertherderwa (given in Anstey, Munimenta Academica, p. 559), together with its subordinate chapel of St. Naunter or St. Nonna (the mother of St. David). Crida was probably one of the Welsh devotees who settled in Cornwall. Some however would refer the name to Credanus, one of the companions of St. Petrock (Leland, Script. 61), who was buried at Bodmin. A parish near the Land's End is called Sancreed, which perhaps contains the same name, as the names Sanguinas and Sanwinnee in Domesday are St. Gennys and St. Winnow. [C. W. B.]

CRISENIUS, in the legend of St. Andrews in Scotland, is said to have been from the island of Nola and one of the companions of St. Regulus, but his existence is purely legendary and probably a fiction. [REGULUS.] (Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, 187; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 316.) [J. G.]

CRISPINA of Thagara, martyr at Thebeste, Dec. 5, A.D. 304, under Anulinus, proconsul of Africa (whose examination of her, as officially registered, is given by Ruinart, p. 494), said by Augustine (in Psalm. cxx. 13; cxxxvii. 3, 7), to have been a rich, illustrious, delicate lady, put to the torture and rejoicing in it, and unmoved by the tears of her sons. The same father twice cites her as an example that matrons may be as glorious as virgins (Serm. 354, ad Continentes, c. 5; de Virginitate, c. 44). The acts are not quite perfect. [E. B. B.]

CRISPINUS (1), a presbyter of Lampsacus, which was his native city, who about A.D. 337 wrote a life of Parthenius, bishop of that see, under whom he had been brought up. This memoir is to be found in Surius and the Bollandists, under Feb. 7; Baronius gives some passages from it sub ann. 337, § 38. Tillemont commends the simplicity and serious character of the memoir, as in perfect harmony with its reputed date. The biography narrates a large number of miracles performed by Parthenius, but with such perfect good faith, that it is evident that the writer accepted them without the least question. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 204; Tillemont, vi. 288.) [E. V.]

(2) Donatist bishop of Calama, to whom Augustine wrote, Ep. 51 (172), c. A.D. 399, and Ep. 66 (173), c. A.D. 402. The purpose of the former letter is as follows: the Donatists, after using the civil power to persecute the Maximianists, received them again into communion, and admitted their baptism as valid. Augustine sought to have a public conference at Carthage, at which to urge this argument against them. They professed to be pleased, but put difficulties in the way. Therefore he requests Crispinus to conduct the controversy in writing. He points out that Korah was punished more terribly than the calf-worshippers. Possidius made a fresh attempt at public conference at Carthage, but Crispinus shirked it, requiring time for consultation with his own party, and afterwards putting it off with the bravado: "Thou shalt not fear the words of a man that is a sinner" (1 Mace. ii. 62). This was, perhaps, at the time of Augustine's letter, in which he finds fault with Crispinus for rebaptizing eighty Catholic slaves on an estate that he had bought. This was before A.D. 402. He demands that his own letter, which shows that Donatism is illegal and punishable, should be translated into Punic and read to them, with anything Crispinus might have to say; that they might not fear the words of man, but act of their own free will. Another Crispinus, presbyter under this bishop, made a riotous attack upon Possidius, broke into the villa where he took refuge, and beat him severely. Bishop Crispinus refused even to degrade his presbyter, and when the Catholics were compelled to appeal to the law courts, he denied that he was a heretic, but was convicted and fined; and though at Possidius's intercession he was excused from paying, he appealed to the emperors, and thus occasioned a new and severer rescript against the Donatists, which the Catholics still suffered to remain a dead letter. (Aug. contra Cresconium, iii. 46, 47; contra Litteras Petilianii, ii. 83; Possidius, Vita Augustini, 12.) [E. B. B.]

CRISPION, archdeacon to Epiphanius, canonised archbishop of Salamis, circ. A.D. 368-9—403. (Sozom. viii. 15; Patrol. Graec. lxxvii. § 345; Ceillier, vi. 380.) [W. M. S.]

CRISPUS. [CONSTANTINE THE GREAT.]

CRISTIOLUS, Welsh saint of the 6th century, reputed founder of Llangristlough in Anglesey, and Eglwys Wrw, and Penrydd in Pembrokeshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 220.) [C. H.]

CRITAN (1) Son of Illadhon, commemorated May 11. He and Cruimther Corbmac are on this day venerated at Achadh-finnich, on the river Dodder, co. Dublin [CORBMAC (1)], where they are probably interred. Colgan affirms that he was the Credan, Cridan, or Critan who was one of the many pupils whom St. Petroe had during his residence in Ireland. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 125; Colgan, Acta SS. 585, c. 4, 586 n. 11.)

(2) Of Aendruim (Nendrum), bishop, commemorated May 17. The death of St. Critan, bishop of Aendruim or Nendrum (now called Mahee Island, in Strangford Lough), is given at A.D. 638 by the Irish Annalists (Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 256 n. a, 257; Reeves, Ecol. Ast. 148).

(3) Of Moin-Miolan, Feb. 7. Lonan, Critan, and Miolan or Mellan, the three sons of Daire, are placed together in the calendars on this day; they were buried at Cluain-feart-Molua (now Clonfertmulloe or Kyle, in the barony of Upper Ossory, Queen's County), and venerated on Feb. 7 (Colgan, Acta SS. 58 n. a; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 207 n. b).

(4) Certronnach, of Bennehar (Bangor), Sept. 16. In Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, p. 251) he is called Cellarer of St. Comgall of Bangor, and is said to have got the name Certronnach because he used to divide fairly. His mother was Eithine, daughter of Saran, son of

Colgan, and sister of Ronan. He died A.D. 669 (Ann. Tigh.; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 280, n. a, 281.) [J. G.]

CRITICISM, BIBLICAL. [INTERPRETATION, BIBLICAL.]

CROINE (CRONE). (1) Of Cill-croine, virgin, commemorated Jan. 27. She was of the race of Maine, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, and was venerated at Cill-croine (Kileron) in Ui-Maine, county of Galway; but beyond this we have no information. There were others of the same name, and the ruins of the church of St. Croine, virgin, of Kill-Crony or Kileroney, in the parish of Kilmacanogue, bar. Rathdown, co. Wicklow, still exist in the disused churchyard. At Jan. 27 the Mart. Talluht has the feast of "Croni Inne Locha Crone." (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 23; Colgan, Acta SS. 267 n. 13; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 455-6; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, p. xiii.)

(2) Beg (Little), of Tempull-Croine, V. July 7. She was daughter of Diarmaid, son of Garvan, of the race of Conall Gulban, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages. She is given as Cronia by Colgan, among the saints descended from Conall Gulban, the parent-stem of St. Columba, and her church was situated in Tyreconel. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 189; Colgan, Tr. Thwm. 480 n. 14.) [J. G.]

CROMACIUS, author of a Cursus Orientalis, according to an ancient authority printed in Haddan and Stubbs (Councils, i. 140); probably the same as CHROMATIUS. [C. H.]

CRONAN, CROMAN, CHRONAN. Cronan is a very frequent name in Irish hagiologies, and has several synonyms which make the work of identification more difficult and perplexing. It not only appears as Chronan, Croman, and Chronan, but also as Cuaran, Mochuaro, and frequently as Mochua. The account that Colgan suggests for the interchange of Cronan and Mochua is that Cron and Cua have in Irish the same meaning, so that to the one we may add the diminutive, and Cron becomes Cronan, or to the other the title of affection and reverence, and then Cua becomes Mochua. (Colgan, Acta SS. 302 n. 1, 303, c. 1, 304, nn. 1-2; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 134.)

(1) Son of Cummain, of Sliabh Eibhlinne, in Munster, May 4. He is sometimes called Cronan, sometimes Mochua, in the Irish Martyrologies, and Aengus associates him with Siollan the deacon. His church was among the Slieve-Phelim mountains, co. Tipperary (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 120 n., 121).

(2) Son of Nethseman, Feb. 9. [CUARAN.]

(3) Son of Sinell, Nov. 11. He probably was Cronan, son of Sinell, of the race of Coindri, son of Fergus, of the clanna Rudhraidhe. Colgan calls him the brother of St. Beodan, Baitan, or Mobaol (Dec. 13) [BAITHEN (8)], Carnan, &c., and says that St. Aengus, in his account of the mothers of the Irish saints, calls St. Cronan's mother Sina, and his father Sinell of Munster. He died of the Buidhe Connail or Yellow Plague in A.D. 664. (Colgan, Acta SS. 219 n. 26, 593, c. 3; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 277.)

(4) Son of Unlach, abbat of Clonmacnois, July 18. Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 197) calls him simply "Son of Ualach," and Mart. Tallaght (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. p. xxix.) has "mac h. Lugada." According to the Four Masters (by O'Donovan, i. 255) "S. Cronan Mac-Ua-Loegde, abbat of Clon-mic-Nois, died on the 18th of July, A.D. 637 (recte 638)." As abbat of Clonmacnois he was succeeded by St. Aedlugh, son of Coman. (Colgan, Acta SS. p. 417, in the Memoir of St. Aedlugh, and also p. 792, n. 20; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 60.)

CRONAN (5) Of Airdne (Aran Isles in Galway Bay), March 8. He is mentioned by Colgan (Acta SS. 715, col. 1) among those who had dedications or churches in Inishmore, which however Colgan misplaces and erroneously calls Inis Airthir, the true Inis Airthir being now Inisheer or South Island. Colgan (ibid. 564) gives a memoir on this day of St. Cronan, bishop and confessor, yet deems it best to consider him merely an abbat of some monastery in Aran, having perhaps his episcopal see elsewhere. But episcopal sees, at the early period when he must have lived, which however Colgan cannot accurately determine, were not in all likelihood regarded in Ireland, and his history is lost among the many saints of the same name.

In Dempster's Menol. Scotivum (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 194) there is a Scotie saint, "Cronan the Monk," on the same day, March 8.

(6) Abbat of Bennchar (Bangor), Nov. 6. He succeeded Colman in the abbacy of Bangor in A.D. 680 (Ann. Tigh.), and is called "filius Cucalnei," and "Mac Cuchualue." His obit is given in A.D. 691, and O'Connor is of opinion that it was during his rule the Antiphony of Bangor was written. This precious Irish document was carried by some Irish monk to the continent at the time, probably, of the incursions of the Danes: it long belonged to the library at Bobbio [COLUMBANUS], and was removed to the Ambrosian library at Milan by Federigo Borromeo, in the beginning of the 17th century: it was published by Muratori in his Anecl. Ambros. iv. 127-59, and again in his Opera, tom. xi. pt. iii. 217-51. (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 59, 60; Uist Journ. Arch. i. 168-79, ii. 55; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. Epist. Nuncup. p. 167.)

(7) Of Cluain-dolcain, Aug. 6. He is frequently called Mochua of Cluain-Dolcain (now Clondalkin, in the barony of Newcastle and county of Dublin), and he was descended from Cathaer Mór, monarch of Erin. His father was Lughaidh, and his mother Cainer of Cluain-dasaileach: his brothers were Lasrain, Baelán, Garbáin, Baoithén, Senchán and Rualdán (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 213). He probably lived in the 8th century [BAEDAN (1)].

(8) Of Glais-mór (Clashmore), Feb. 10. Colgan at Feb. 10 gives a memoir of St. Cronan, abbat and martyr, who was also called Mochua and Mochuan. Nothing more is known of his birthplace or parentage than that his father was Mellan, and that he lived among the Desii in Munster about the end of the 6th century: Lanigan calculates that his birth was probably about the year 570, and his profession as a monk in or about 590. He is said to have been the first who accepted the monastic garb at Rahen under St. Carthach the younger (May 14) at the foundation of Rahen in King's County, which took place about the year 590 or 591 [CARTHACH (2)], and he was so exemplary in his conduct, and proficient in learning and virtue, that St. Carthach placed him over another house in the neighbourhood, called Cluain-dachraun in the south of Meath, but St. Carthach at the same time prophesied that his resurrection would not be in that place. He then became abbat of Glais-mór (now Clashmore, in the barony of Decies-within-Drum, in the county of Waterford, and close to the river Blackwater, where the ruins of an abbey are still visible): to this place St. Carthach seems to have resorted with his monks, when driven from Rahen in A.D. 631, and before he founded Lismore. But Colgan, without definitely asserting it as the truth, yet prefers to think, though Lanigan is of a contrary opinion, that St. Cronan was abbat of another Glaismór near Swords, in the county of Dublin, to which the Northmen came up from the port of Inbear Dommann, near Dublin, pillaged the monastery, and martyred St. Cronan with his monks. In what year the saint died we do not know; but he probably outlived St. Carthach, who died in the year 636 or 637. Colgan puts his monastic profession in A.D. 570 or 571, and the time when he flourished A.D. 632. Lanigan considers the Cronan, who was abbat of Glais-mór, in the county of Dublin, as an entirely different person, and as living at a later period, on account of the reputed connexion with the Danes, whose infesting the Irish coasts began about the end of the 8th century: he also treats Colgan's supposition that St. Cronan (Feb. 10) of Glais-mór was the same as Cuanchair, disciple of St. Pulcherius, as a mere fancy built on a fabulous foundation. (Colgan, Acta SS. 303-4, 595, c. 35, 598 n. 40 and lud. Chron. A.D. 570, 632; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 357 sq.)

CRONAN (9) Of Lismore, June 1. This saint is of unknown parentage and descent, and has to be carefully distinguished from Cronan or Cuaran, the son of Nethsemon, who is venerated on Feb. 9th, and with whom he has been confounded. [CUARAN.] In the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 143) he is called "Abbat of Lismor-Mochuda," but by Colgan (Acta SS. 303 n. 11, and § 1), "Episcopus Lismorensis." Lanigan puts his death in the year 718, and the Irish Annals, about this year, called him Uá Eoan, h Ua Ecaín, and O'Hécan. (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 163 sq.; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 259, iv. 75; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 314 n. 4, 315.)

(10) Of Luachair, abbat of Farna (Ferns), June 22. He is called Mochua and Dachua or Dachua. He first appears as a youth in the Life of St. Maidoc (Jan. 31) of Ferns, which gives a pretty monastic legend regarding his introduction to St. Maidoc, whom he succeeded in the abbacy at Ferns; it gives another regarding the building of a church, which shews us, as many other legends do, the intense consciousness which the ancient or mediæval church had of the presence of the spiritual world; but for historical purposes, the Life gives little material, especially as it confounds St. Cronan with St. Moling Luachra (May 13), who was also connected with Ferns. St. Cronan was abbat, and may also have been a bishop: Ann. Tigh. give the obit of "Dachua abbas Fernensis," in A.D. 653. (Colgan, Acta SS.

212, c. 37, 214, c. 53, 219 n. ³⁶; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. iii. 33, 133-4.)

CRONAN (11) Of Maghbile (Moville, near Newtown Ards, in co. Down), Aug. 7. This is the one who is addressed first in the list of priests by John IV., when he was only pope-elect, in A.D. 640, in the famous letter upon the Paschal question and Pelagian heresy, which this pope sent to the bishops and clergy of the north of Ireland. He is there called Cromanus (see the letter preserved in Bede, Eccl. Hist. ii. c. 19, and copied into Ussher, Sylloge, Ep. ix.; and on the individuals there addressed see Colgan, Acta SS. 17 n. ¹¹; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 149 n.; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 409 sq.). St. Cronan, abbat of Moville, died in A.D. 650 (Ann. Tigh.).

(12) Of Roscrea, April 28. He was a native of Ely O'Carrol in Muuster, his father being Odrian of that sept, and his mother Coemri of the sept of Corcobaschin, a district in the west of the present county of Clare. Taking with him his maternal cousin St. Mobai, he spent some years traversing Connaught, and then, returning to his native province, built a cell near Loch Crea, at a place called Seanross, now Corbally (Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 412 n. ⁴). At Seanross he was visited by St. Molua of Clonfert-mulloe (Aug. 4), who asked of him the Holy Sacrifice to take away with him, probably as the token and ratification of love and unity between the saints; this St. Molua received with the charge to defend the church of Seanross. As this place was so secluded (desertus et avius) St. Cronan afterwards left it, and built his great church by the highway at Roscrea, in the county of Tipperary, where he had one of the most famous schools in Ireland. There, in piety and works that make for peace with God and man, he spent the remainder of his days, the honoured friend of Fingen king of Munster, and the willing advocate of the oppressed. It is said that on one occasion he asked St. Dimma Dubh (Jan. 6), or perhaps some other Dimma, a "scriptor peritus," to transcribe the Four Gospels for him; this was undertaken on the condition that it could be done in only one day, and the work was performed by the sun never setting upon St. Dimma, and by no food being required by him for forty days and forty nights, till the transcription was made, through the merits of St. Cronan. At last, on April 28, but in what year is not known, "post multa miracula senex Cronanus in Christo requiuit." Colgan says he flourished in A.D. 625; the Bollandists think he might have lived till A.D. 640, but Lanigan puts the date of his death not later than A.D. 619, or at the lowest, A.D. 626. (For an account of St. Cronan of Roscrea, see his Life "ex nostro MS. Salmanticensi" in the Bollandists, Acta SS. April 28, tom. iii. 585-9; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 6-10; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 541; Butler, Lives of the Saints, iv. 356; Colgan, Acta SS. 16. c. 4, 17 n. ⁹, 303 n. ¹¹, 565, col. 1; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. iii. 356 n.; O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. ii. 76; Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 164.)

(13) Of Tuaim-greine (now Tomgraney, in the barony of Upper Tulla, co. Clare), Oct. 19. This saint appears twice in the Mart. Doneg., first in the original hand at Oct. 19; and next in the second hand, on the authority of Mar.

O'Gorman, at Nov. 1. Among the saints of the family of St. Colman of Kilmacduach (Feb. 3), or house of the Hy-Fiachrach, Colgan gives "St. Cronan, son of Aengus, son of Corbinac, &c., Feb. 20 or Oct. 19;" and Mart. Doneg. at Feb. 20 also mentions that there is a Cronan with 'this pedigree (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 55, 279, 293; Colgan, Acta SS. 248, c. 2).

CRONAN (14) Beg of Aendrum (Neudrum), bishop. Jan. 7. His name appears third among the bishops of the Scots in the north of Ireland to whom, with priests and others, pope John IV., when yet but pope-elect, A.D. 640, addressed the famous letter on the Paschal question and Pelagian heresy [CRONAN (11)]. The Irish Annals generally place his death in A.D. 642, and the Ann. Tigh., perhaps more accurately, in A.D. 643; but Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 412) is mistaken in calling him "bishop of Antrim," as the Irish $\eta\lambda\epsilon\nu\sigma\rho\rho\mu\alpha$ or $\lambda\iota\eta\sigma\rho\rho\mu\mu$ is always Neudrum, now Mahee Island in Strangford Lough (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 10 n., 63 n., 148-50, 187-97; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 95-6) There is another Cronan Beg, who, however, is usually known as Cronbeg [CRONBEG].

(15) Clairenech, Jan. 29. In Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 31) he is simply Cronan, but under Seighin (eod. die) is, "The three Clairenechs were Cron in, Baethin, and Seighin." (On the name Clairenech, or "flat-faced," see an exhaustive note in Mart. Doneg. 354; Reeves, Admanan, p. lxxii. n.; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 503-4.) [CLAIRENECH.] [J. G.]

CRONANUS. (Acta SS. Jan. i. 47; Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 366.) [MOCHUA.] [C. H.]

CRONBEG, abbat of Cluain-mic-nois (Clonmacnoise), April 6. According to Tighernach he succeeded Foreran as "abbat of Clonmacnoise or the Seven Churches," in the barony of Garrycastle, King's County, in the year 686, and died A.D. 694, but the other Annals place the dates rather earlier. It is curious to find him designated also by the double diminutive Cron-an-beg (Cronan-beg). (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 97; O'Conor, Rer. Ilv. Script. ii. 214, 217, iv. 65; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 291, 297.) [J. G.]

CRONE. [CROINE.]

CRONIUS (1) accompanied Athanasius to Tyre, and signed his letter to the church of that place (Athan. ad Consant. i. 797). Perhaps the same as the bishop of Metole in the list given by Meletius to ALEXANDER (ibid. 789). [E. B. B.]

(2) Presbyter and solitary, visited by Palladius A.D. 394 (who was afterwards bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia). About the same time he was visited by Petronius (afterwards bishop of Boulogne, and canonised). He was disciple and interpreter to St. Anthony, and lived in the deserts of Egypt. He was canonised. (Pallad. Hist. Laus. cap. 7, § 713; De Vitis Patrum, vii. cap. 19, ap. Patrol. Lat. lxxiii. 1041, 1126, 1122; Ceillier, vii. 485; x. 161.) [W. M. S.]

CRUAIDH COS-FHADA (or Long-legs), of Balana (now probably Ballina, a village in the parish of Templechally, barony of Ownay and Arra, co. Tipperary), Oct. 26. He is represented by O'Clery as having been appealed to for help by

St. Moling, when danger threatened the latter on account of the remitting of the Borumha at his request (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 285). On the Borumha, see the Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 298, 299 n. 2. [MOLING-LUACHRA.] [J. G.]

CRUIMTHER. This is the Irish word for presbyter or priest, and often occurs in the calendars prefixed to proper names, and even as in the case of "Cruimther, mac Ua Nesse, June 9," seems at times to stand as a proper name itself. For such saints as Cruimther Cael of Kilmore, May 25, Cruimther Colum of Domnach-mor, June 4, &c., see CAEL, COLUM, &c. Cruimtheran is the diminutive, and probably does not appear as a separate name, though Cruimtheran (June 13) of Cluain-tioprat (Clontibret) stands in the calendars. [J. G.]

CRUIMTHERIS was a daughter of king Longobardus, and St. Patrick put her into a cell on Mount Kengobha, to the east of Armagh (the "Head or Hill of Grief," now Ballyboley Hill in the parish of Ballynure, co. Antrim), and there she was given in charge to St. Benen. She, Lupita, and Ligrida were the "textrices et sacrorum linteorum confectrices" of St. Patrick's household, as Evinus calls them in the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, or the "three embroiderers, not despicable," as they are referred to by the Four Mast. (by O'Donovan, i. 138 n. b, 139; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 163, c. 74, 167, c. 167; Reeves, Ecl. Ant. 266-9). [J. G.]

CRUIMMIN, son of Corbmac, of Lecain (Leckin), bishop, commemorated June 28. He was son of Corbmac, son of Baedan, of the race of Tadhg, son of Cian, son of Oilioll Olum, and Daraeca, the sister of St. Patrick, was his mother (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 181). When St. Patrick came to Lecain (now Leckin, an old church near Bunbrusna, in the barony of Corkaree, and county of Westmeath: for its position and history see Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 349 n. 8) he left some relics of the saints under the charge of his nephew, St. Crommanius or Cruimminus, whom he placed over the church there, and who lived "threescore years thrice over," according to the quatrain given in ancient Irish, by St. Aengus the Culdee (Opuscula, lib. iv. c. 6), and often quoted. He is sometimes identified with the Cruemus, who is said to have prophesied of St. Fechin's future greatness, as it is related in the Life of St. Fechin (Jan. 20); but this is more likely to have been done by Cruimther Nathi (Aug. 9), St. Fechin's institutor (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 181; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 132, c. 20, 175 n. 56, 231, col. 1, and Acta SS. 130, c. 3, 140 n. 5). [J. G.] CRUITHNECHAN. On March 7 in the calendars stands Caritan or Cariotan, of Drum-lara, with whom Colgan identifies this Cruithnechan, but, as Dr. Reeves says, their connexion extends no farther than their initials. Colgan gives a memoir of Cruithnechanus or Caritanus Presbyter chiefly from O'Donell's Life of St. Columba. The name is the diminutive of Cruithnech, Pict, and occurs in the Irish Nennius. He flourished about the beginning of the 6th century, and his father's name was Cellachan. After he was married and had children born to him, he renounced the world for a closer following of Christ, and was ordained to the presbyterate, "to which honour," says Colgan, "one was seldom promoted in that age and country, whose fitness for the office had not been pointed out beforehand by special signs and the popular applause." His three daughters also embraced the monastic life. His fame in the world arises from his connexion with St. Columcille, whom he baptized in the church of Tulach-Dubglaise (now Temple-Douglas in the parish of Cornwall, co. Donegall), and fostered in the church of Killmicenain (now Kilmacrenan, a neighbouring parish). In his connexion with St. Columba the legend is embellished with many wonders, and, as in others of the same class, real points of history find little place. The year of his death is unknown, and he has no day of commemoration. Colgan thinks he must have flourished about A.D. 520. (Colgan, Acta SS. 510-1, or, as paged, 600-1, and Tr. Thaum. 364, c. 2, 393-4, cc. 31-4; Reeves, Adumnan, lxxi. 191-2; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. ii. 106, 114.) Dr. Reeves says the parish of Kilmacrenan, in the barony of Loughinsholin, co. Derry, derives its name from a Cruithnechan. [J. G.]

CRUNNMAEL (1) Erbuilg, June 22. Crunnmael or Cruidmael Erbuilg, son of Ronan, of the sept of the Hy-Ceunsealach, ruled for three years as chief of the clan, and then became a monk at Clonard, co. Meath. He was a special friend of St. Lasrean, bishop of Leighlinn, and died A.D. 650 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 265, and notes.

(2) Of Drum-Inesglainn, abbat of Cluain-Iraird (Clonard), co. Meath. He succeeded Dubhdabhoireann at Clonard A.D. 787, and died A.D. 793; but the chief part of his designation is derived from a house he probably had at Drum-Inesglainn (now Dromiskin or Druminisklin, a village and parish near Castle Bellingham, in the barony and county of Louth). He has no special day of commemoration. (Colgan, Acta SS. 141, n. 17, 173 n. 8; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. iii. 52; Petrie, Loud Towers. 428; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 394 n. 7, 395.)

(3) Dec. 17. In the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 339) there is the dedication of "Crunnmael, abbat of la Coluimille," but as he is nowhere else mentioned, it is probably another festival of Conamhail (Sept. 11), who was abbat A.D. 704-710. [CONAMHAIL.] [J. G.]

CTESIPHON, a Roman (probably) to whom St. Jerome writes from Bethlehem (Ép. 133, ed. Vall.) on the question of Pelagianism, on which Ctesiphon had written to ask his opinion. [W. H. F.]

CTISTOLATRAE, κτιστολάτραι, called also from their founder, Gujanitae, a subdivision of the Aphthartodocetæ, themselves a sect of the Monophysites, who, in opposition to the Aktistetae, taught that the body of Christ was created. [APHTHARTODOCETAE.] (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctr. i. 281, Clark's translation; Dorner, Pers. of Christ, div. ii. vol. i. 131; Herzog, Real. Encycl. ix. 749.) [E. V.]

CUACH. [COCCA.]

CUAN. This name assumes various forms, which are more or less uniformly applied to individual saints, and thus must be treated as separate names. It is changed to Cuanus, Cuanna, Cuannache, Cuanan, and the word itself is the diminutive of Cu, a dog or hound. (For an account of the name and a list of those bearing it, see Colgan, Acta SS. 251 n. 2, 338 n. 2; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 370 n.)

CUAN (1) Of Airbhre, in Hy-Cennsealach, Leinster, July 10. He is supposed by Ware to have succeeded St. Brogan (July 8) in the abbacy at Mothel, co. Waterford [BROGAN (1)], and hence is called "Cuan of Maethail-Brogain." He has given his name to Kilquan, co. Wexford, but Airbhre is unidentified (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 192 n., 193; Colgan, Acta SS. 251 n. 2; Ware, Ir. Ant. c. 76). In the Kal. Drummond, he is styled "holy confessor" (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 18).

(2) Of Cluain-mór, Oct. 15. O'Clery thinks this is the Cuan of Cluain-mór, who went along with Moling to request the remission of the Borunha, and that his place was at Cluain-mór-Maedhog (now Clonmore, in the barony of Rathvilly, co. Carlow, see Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 277; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 298-9 n. 2, 379 n. 2; MOLING, surnamed Luachra). In the Four Masters, at A.D. 788 (recte 793), is given the obit of Cuan of Ath-easrach, which O'Donovan says is now Ahascragh in the east of the county of Galway, but he must be different from the preceding Cuan, though his commemoration is also celebrated on the 15th of October (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 395).

(3) Caein, March 2. He was son of Tighernach, son of Fergus, of the race of Conall Gulban, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages; his brothers were SS. Begbile (Oct. 12), Colman (Jan. 13), and Conna or Conandil (March 8). As he must have lived about the close of the 6th century, he is to be distinguished from Cuan Cam and Cuan the anchorite of Lileach (not identified), who both died A.D. 743 (Four Mast.), from Cuan of Imleach-Iubhair (Emly), who died A.D. 787, and from Cuana of Louth, who died A.D. 823. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 61; Colgan, Tr. Thom.; and Acta SS. 251 n. 2, 480 n. 16; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, 347, 389, 435; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 233, 266.) [J. G.]

CUANAN GLINNE, abbat of Maghbile (Moville), Feb. 3. Among the saints and illustrious men of Maghbile in Colgan's Appendix to the Memoir of St. Fridian (March 18), stands "St. Cuananus Glinne, abbas de Maghbile" (Moville in co. Down, near Newtown Ards), quoted from the Four Masters; but the latter and Colgan in another place refer the dedication of this saint to April 3, which is evidently a mistake of the Four Masters, accepted by Colgan in one place and not in another. Tighernach gives his death in the year 747 (Colgan, Acta SS. 338 n. 9, 650, cc. 8, 9; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 343; O'Conor, Rev. Hib. Script. ii. 247, iv. 91.) [J. G.]

CUANGHAS MAC DALL, March 13. Colgan gives a very short memoir of "St. Cuangussius, abb. Liet-mor." His father was Alillus (or as it appears in Mart. T. Layht Aililla), and he was called Mac Dall ("blind boy"), because he was born blind and afterwards received his sight. He succeeded St. Mochoemocus or Pulcherius (March 13) in the abbacy at Liathmore (now Liath-Mocheamhog, anglicè Leamokevoe, in the parish of Two-Mile-Burris, in the barony of Elyogarty, co. Tipperary). He died in the year 747 (Ann. Tiph.), and his feast was held on the same day as that of the founder of the church. Colgan quotes from the Metrical Festivity or Felire of St. Aengus: "S. Mochoemocus nos defendat ab hoc saeculo, et S. Cuangussius, vir candidus et doctrinā clarus, ambo in Monasterio Lethmorensi." (Colgan, Acta SS. 607; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 75; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 266 n. b, 343; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 191.) [J. G.]

CUANNA (CUANDA), (1) Abbat of Killchuanna and Lismore, Feb. 4. Of this saint Colgan (Acta SS. 249-52) gathers all the traditions into a memoir. At the close of the 6th century St. Cuanna was born. His mother was Meda, Finnmeda or Conmania, daughter of Fingen, of the sept and district of Corca-duibhne (now Corcaguiny, in Kerry), and his uterine brother was St. Carthach Mochuda (May 14), but Colgan seems to be mistaken in calling his father Midarnus, as Cuanna, son of Midarnus or Miodarn (April 10), seems to be a different person, and so allowed in another place even by Colgan. He probably was some time under his brother St. Carthach at Rahen before founding his church of Killchuanna (now Killoona, in the barony of Clare, co. Galway, on the east shore of Lough Corrib), and his holding rule at Lismore must have been after St. Carthach's death in A.D. 637; but of this we have no particular information (Hardiman's O'Flaherty, Ir.-Connaught, 370 n. 1). In the fragment of his life given by Colgan from the Codex Sabunticensis, he is represented as living on the banks of Loch-orbsen (now Lough Corrib, in the county of Galway), where many wonders were wrought, as the plucking out of his eyes lest he should be vain of his beauty, and the having them replaced, the prophesying regarding St. Fursey, who was then at Peronne, &c. At last, full of grace and Christian merit, he died about the year 650, and his feast is on Feb. 4. He is said to have written the Irish Annals up to A.D. 628, and is so quoted by Ware (De S. rip. Hib. lib. i. c. 3); but Lanigan considers this very uncertain, as also the thinking him abbat or bishop at Lismore, while he may have been called "of Lismore" or Lismorensis only from his having resided there. His other church of Killchuanna, somewhere in the Hy-briui country (Tir-briuin), likewise in Connaught, and mentioned in Cal. Cassel, was probably nothing more than a dedication (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 138, 357 sq.). In Kal. Drummond, he is commemorated as "sancta virgo Cuanna" (Bp. Forbes, K. l. S. ott. Sa nts, 4).

(2) Son of Miodharn of Ros-eo, and at Magh-lacha in the east of Magh Breagh, April 10. This is the designation in the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 99, and note), and the writer continues, "He was of the seed of Enna, son of Niall, and he was a noble virgin in body and soul, as the gloss in the Felire of Aenghus states." This idea of virginity the Kal. Drummond carries farther, calling him "sancta virgo Cuanda." Mart. T. Layht has "Cuanna, vir i Maigh locha i m Breghaib. i Rus Eo," and thus suggests that Ros-eo is "at Magh-lacha" and is now Rush in the county of Dublin. In Colgan's notes there is much confusion and difficulty, as his dates oscillate between the years 570 and 717, and his Cuanna, son of Miodharn, is reckoned as the brother of St. Carthach Mochuda or some other person. [CUANNA (1).] In the half-fabulous life of St. Forannan (Feb. 15), Cuanna was the contemporary of St. Columba; and if this be true, he flourished about A.D. 570. But if we accept O'Clery's entry in the Mart. Doneg. and identify the son of Miodharn with Cuanna of Ros-eo, then the Four Masters give the death of St. Cuanna of Ros-eo in A.D. 717, but the true year is probably 721 (Colgan, Acta SS. 251 n. 2, 336, c. 5, 338 n. 9; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 138, 359; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 315; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 10; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, xxi.).

CUANNA (3), the Blind, March 11. Among the wonders done by St. Patrick, "by his merits and benediction," was the teaching Cuana, and other two, "cymbala et campanas miraculosè ludere et fabricare." This Cuana Colgan thinks is the Cuanna or Cuanda Caecus, son of Tulanus, whose feast is on March 11 (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 167, c. 100, 188 n. 14, and Acta SS. 251 n. 2). [J. G.]

CUANUS LAEGSIENSIS. Acta SS. Jan. i. 45; Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 366. [MOCHUA.] [C. H.]

CUARAN (CURVINUS, KORAN), The Wise, son of Nethseman, commemorated Feb. 9. He appears in the calendars as Cronan, Cuaran, and, with the prefix of affection and reverence attached to the other form of the diminutive, as Mochuarocce, "my little Cuar." (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 42 n., 43; Mart. Tallaght, in Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xv. 71.) In the Felire of Aengus he is called meus parvulus corvinus, "my little humpy." According to Colgan, Cronan, Cuaran, Cuarnan, or Mochuaroc, "natus vel saltem denatus" in Munster in the region of the Decies in co. Waterford, and there venerated, was son of Nethseman or Nethus, from the old and noble family of Ferlacta, son of Fergus, son of Ross, son of Rudhraige, from whom St. Ailbhe (Sept. 12) and St. Sguithin or Scutinius (Jan. 2) were descended. He was so renowned for knowledge and piety as to be called "The Wise," and made a bishop; but where he exercised his office is unknown. Colgan, however, identifies him with the Cronan who came to Iona concealing his episcopal rank, and was discovered by St. Columba (Adamnan, St. Columba, i. c. 44, and O'Donnell's St. Columba, ii. c. 103; see Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 348, c. 44, 379 n. 84, 428, c. 103; Reeves, Adamnan, 85 n.; Lanigan Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 178-9; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. i. 289; Book of Obits C. C. Dublin, p. 1x.). He is called Mochuarocus de Noua on account of a reformation he enforced in the saying of the service at Nones, so as to secure its due completion before the commencement of the service of mass. The time when he flourished is uncertain, but Ware places his death in the year 717 (Harris's Ware, Lr. Bps. i. 559), which, however, on every account seems too late.

He flourished about A.D. 570, and is to be distinguished from such as Cronan of Lismore, with whom Ware, Harris, and others have confounded him. Colgan, Acta SS. 302-3; Lanigan, ut supra, ii. 179, iii. 164; Harris's Ware, i. 549; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. i. 289; Book of Obits, C.

C. Dublin, p. 1x.) The Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. 9, tom. ii. 339-40) give a memoir of St. Cronan, bishop in Ireland, and refer to his coming to Iona and concealing his episcopal rank. [J. G.]

CUBA, presbyter, attesting a charter of archbishop Ethelheard, A.D. 805 (Kemble, C. D. No. 189; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 555). [C. H.]

CUBERT (Brut y Tywysogion, ad an. 775), abbat. [CUDBERTH.] [C. H.]

CUBRICUS. [MANES.]

CUBOIRNE (CONBRAN, CUBRAN), Nov. 10. The Four Mast. (by O'Donov. i. 365) have at A.D. 762 the obit of "Cubran, abbat of Cillachaidh" (now Killeigh, near Geshill, in the King's County). According to the same Annals he had succeeded Maelfaith, A.D. 741, but the true dates are probably five years later. [J. G.]

CUCHUIMNE (CUCUIMNE), literally "the hound of memory," has no place in the Irish calendars, but is known as the author of a hymn in praise of the Virgin Mary, which has been published by Mone in his Hymni Latini Medii Aevi, from a collation of three MSS., and is given in the Book of Hymns (fasc. ii. 137 sq.), edited by Dr. Todd, who for the first time prints it with its scholium or preface, and adds also notes and various readings. Of Cuchuimne (called also by mistake Cucumine and Cumineus), little is known. In the Annals he is called "the Wise," and the "select scribe." If we may believe the stanzas attributed to St. Adamnan, he was allured from his studies into irregular habits, but during the latter part of his life repented. He lived in the reign of Loingseach, son of Aengus, and Tighearnach correctly places his obit in A.D. 747, but in the other Annals it is put rather earlier. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 218, col. 2; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 343-5; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 247, iv. 92; Harris's Ware, Lr. Writ. 46.) [J. G.]

CUCOJO, a heretic known only from some obscure references in the Syriac Hymns of Ephraim Against the Heretics (vol. ii. Assem.). After speaking of the completeness of Christian truth, suffering neither addition nor diminution, Ephraim mentions certain persons from whom it had received injury (xxii. p. 485 B): "Because Marcion added [to the truth] adulteration, the Church expelled and banished him; [as it did also] Valentinus, because he apostatised: Cucujo also lacerated [the truth]: Bardaisan decked out his adulteration [of it]: Mani raved wildly in everything." And a few lines further on he adds (485 C): "Valentinus stole a flock from the church, and named it after his own name; Cucujo named it after his own name; the crafty Bardaisan stole it; and they made it like one common flock." It may be reasonably inferred from these passages (which are given after Zingerle's translation [Kempten, 1850], p. 55 f., with corrections, kindly supplied by Mr. Bensly), that Cucujo was intermediate in date between Valentinus and Bardaisan, that is, belonged to the latter part of the second century; and that he was probably the head of a Syrian sect of Valentinians. In two other places (440 E, 493 F) Ephraim refers to a sect of 'Cucites.' His hymns contain so few names, and those well known, that the Cucites must have been more conspicuous in Syria than might be inferred from the silence of Greek and Latin writers. [H.]

CUCULUS, a pet name given by Alcuin, according to his wont, to one of his disciples, who has not been identified. He occurs in Alcuin's letter to archbishop Eanbald, circ. A.D. 796 (Ep. 171, ed. Froben.; 65 in Patrol. t. ci.). In another letter, Alcuin addresses him and Calvinus jointly (Ep. 175, Froben.; 116, Patrol. ed.). Alcuin also composed a poetical lament for him, beginning:—

Plangamus Cuculum, Daphnin dulcissime, nostrum.

(Opp. t. ii. 237, Carm. 277, ed. Froben.; Patrol. Lat. t. ci. 804.) [C. H.]

CUDAMAN, abbat, attesting a charter of Ethelheard, archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 805 (Kemble, C. D. No. 189; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 555; Birch, Fasti Monast. 58). [C. H.]

CUDARUS (Κούδαρος), a Saracen, to whom a letter of Manes is addressed, of which we have a fragment in Fabric. (Bibl. Graec. vii. 316), trying to prove that Christ's body was immaterial because he passed through the crowd unseen, μέσος αὐτῶν διελθὼν οὐχ ὥρατο. [E. B. C.]

CUDAS, error for BUDAS or BUDDAS. [MANES.]

CUDBERT, -TUS (Bede, edd. Smith, M. H. B., Stevenson, H. E. Praef.; iv. 26–32; v. 1; Vit. Cudberti passim); CUDBERT, -TUS (Nennius, in M. H. B. 76; Gaimar, Estorie, M. H. B. 780), bishop of Lindisfarne. [CUTHBERT.]

CUDBERTH (CUBERT), abbat, died A.D. 777 (Annal. Cambr. ad an.), or A.D. 775. (Brut y Tywysog. ad an.) [C. H.]

CUDBERTUS (Bede, H. E. Contin. ad an. 740, M. H. B.), archbishop of Canterbury. [CUTHBERT.] [C. H.]

CUDBRICHTUS (Henr. Hunt. Hist., M. H. B. 730), archbishop of Canterbury. [CUTHBERT.] [C. H.]

CUDBURG (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1668, M. H. B. 704); CUDBURH (Henr. Hunt. Hist., M. H. B. 724), foundress. [CUTHBURG.] [C. H.]

CUDD, abbat, attests a charter of Offa king of Mercia, A.D. 772, and another between 775 and 778 (Kemble, C. D. Nos. 120, 134; Birch, Fasti Monast. 57). [C. H.]

CUDDA (1) a nobleman at the court of Oswy king of Northumbria, "ex sodalibus regis valde sibi amabilis et fidelis" (Edd.), "senator et regis cubicularis" (Malm.). Being afflicted with paralysis, he sought to end his days in a monastic life at Lindisfarne. The queen commended to him for an attendant the youthful Wilfrid, whom she had begun to patronise, and who had discovered strong inclinations for the ecclesiastical vocation. Cudda accordingly received Wilfrid under his protection, and the youth conducted himself towards him and all the seniors of the monastery so dutifully that he became a general favourite (Eddius, Vit. Wilfrid. cap. 2; Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, 213). [C. H.]

(2) Abbat. When Cuthbert bishop of Lindisfarne felt his end approaching (A.D. 687), he expressed a desire to be buried in a certain sarcophagus which "the venerable abbat Cudda" had formerly given him (Bede, Vit. Cudb. c. 37). The name Cudda occurs, but without a date, in the list of abbats in the Liber Vitae of the church of Durham (ed. Surtees Soc. 1841, p. 8). Cudda is mentioned also in Birch's Fasti Monast. 57. Might he have been the same as the abbat Cotta who was then living? [C. H.]

CUDRADUS, presbyter of the church of Lindisfarne, addressed as "venerandus pater," by Alcuin in or after A.D. 793, when Lindisfarne had been attacked by pirates (Ale. Ep. 5, Patrol. tom. c. 144, fp. 63, ed. Froben.). [C. H.]

CUDRED (1) -DUS (Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, vol. i. 55; Henr. Hunt., Hist. in M. H. B. 727–735); CUDRETUS (Bede, H. E. Contin. ad an. 750), king of the West Saxons. [CUTHRED.] [C. H.]

(2) (Henr. Hunt. Hist. Angl. in M. H. B. 723, 734); CUDRET (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 223, M. H. B. 791), king of Kent. [CUTHRED.] [C. H.]

CUDSUIDA, abess. [CUTSUIDA.]

CUQUALD, abbat of the monastery of Oundle [Undalum], Northants, in A.D. 709, at the time of bishop Wilfrid's death (Bede, H. E. v. 19). Eddius does not mention him. [J. R.]

CUENBURH (CENBURG, CNEBURH, CWENBURH, QUENBURGA, QUINBURGA), sister of Ina king of Wessex and Cuthburga foundress of Wimburn Abbey. She is said by John of Tine-mouth (Historia Aurea, quoted in Monast. Angliæ) to have been co-foundress with her sister. A list of saints buried in England, extant in Anglo-Saxon (Hickes, Thesaur. iii. 120; see also Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 666) mentions both the sisters as interred in this monastery. She is, perhaps, the abess Cneburga, who, with the abess Coenburga and the abbat Althun addressed an interesting letter to the heads of other houses agreeing to a proposal of mutual intercessory prayer, and if so she was probably (Hadd. and St.) abess of Wimburn (A. S. C. and Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 718; Henr. Hunt. in M. H. B. 724; Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1677, in M. H. B. 784; Monast. Angliæ. ii. 88, 89; Hutchins, Hist. Dorset. 2nd ed. ii. 532; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 342; Birch, Fasti Monast. 58). [C. H.]

CUFA, one of four abbats of the diocese of Winchester who attested an act of the council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803, another of them being Cuthbert of Malmesbury (Kemble, C. D. No. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546, and notes; Birch, Fasti Monast. 58). [C. H.]

CUGANAEICH, abbat, is found in the Dunkeld Litany in the list of holy abbots, and is probably St. Congan (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, pp. lix. 241, 316). [J. G.]

CUI— See also QUI—

CUICHELM. Seventh bishop of Rochester. He was consecrated by archbishop Theodore, as successor to Putta, who had forsaken his see, when Kent was ravaged by the Mercians in 676; but shortly after, deterred by the poverty of his church, he followed the example of his predecessor, and deserted it; Gebmund was appointed by Theodore to succeed him (Bede, H. E. iv. 12). [S.]

CUICHELM, the son of Cynegils king of the West Saxons, shared his father's throne and successes from 614 to 636. He was baptized, like his father, by Birinus in 636, and died the year after. [CYNEGILS.] William of Malmesbury calls him the son of Ceolric and brother of Cynegils (G. R. i. § 18). Whether Cuichelmslea, or Cuckhamsley, in Berkshire, preserves the memory of his name is uncertain, but it is not improbable. [S.]

CUIRBIN. [CERBAN.]

CULAN (COLAN, DACHUALEN), B., has a memoir devoted to him by Colgan on Feb. 18, upon the authority of Ferrarius, Canisius, and others, yet it is undecided who he is or what is the proper form of his name. Colgan suggests that he may be Dachualen, son of Guaire, who is descended from Niall of the Nine Hostages, and is commemorated on March 12; or Culanus, one of the five brothers of St. Corbmac (March 26), who had his church at Gleanchaoin in Ieagh, co. Tipperary; or the Culenus, whom Tirechan mentions in his list of the disciples of St. Patrick. (Colgan, Acta SS. 368-9, 741, c. 3, and Tr. Thaum. 268, col. 1, 2, 488, col. 2; Ussher, Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 518.) [J. G.]

CULCIANUS, a prefect of the Thebais, who exercised severities on the Christians in the persecution under Maximin (Eusebius, H. E. ix. 11; Epiphanius, Haer. 68, p. 717). [G. S.]

CULDEES. [DICT. OF CHRIST. ANTT. s. v. COLIDEI.]

CUMAN, abbat of Glastonbury for two years (A.D. 800-802), after which he was succeeded by Muchan (Malm. de Antiq. Glust. Eccles. in Gale, xv. Script. 316). The text of Malmesbury gives the two years in Roman numerals "ii," which Dugdale read "eleven;" but Malmesbury's dates also being in numerals (DCCC. and DCCCLII.), the error is obvious (Monast. Anglic. i. 2; Birch, Fasti Monast. 58). [C. H.]

CUMANUS (CONANUS), second abbat of Abingdon, succeeding Heane the founder. Cumanor, i. e. "Cumani ora," is said to have taken its name from him. Manuscript authority for his death in A.D. 784 is adduced by White Kennett. (Monast. Anglic. i. 505; Chron. Monast. de Abingd. ed. Stevenson, ii. 272, 273; Birch, Fasti Monast. 58.) [CUMMA.] [C. H.]

CUMBERTUS (TUMBERTUS), abbat of Glastonbury, A.D. 744-753, next to Cengillus. He is said to have received lands from a certain Lulla or Hilla (Mon. Ang. i. 2, 47), but her charter of bestowal Kemble (C. D. No. 92) considers spurious or doubtful. He attests an undated charter of Coired, recited in another of Cynewulf A.D. 759 (C. D. No. 104), and probably he is the Cyneberhtus, abbat, attesting a charter between A.D. 755-757 (C. D. No. 100). See also Birch, Fasti Monast. 58, 60, 99. [C. H.]

CUMIN, CUMIAN, CUMEANUS, CUMENEUS, CUMMEIN, are some of the forms that this name assumes. In Mart. Doneg. the name is generally Cuimmein, and in Mart. Tallaght Cummine. Colgan (Acta SS. 59, n. 9) gives a list of twenty-one named Cuminius, Cumineus, or Cumianus, and Mart. Doneg. gives one of eighteen named Cuimin. Cuimmein, Cuimmin, but most of them are little more than names and days, as given by these authorities.

CUMIN (1) (Cummein), son of Dubh, of Druim-druith, Jan. 12. On this day Colgan (Acta SS. 58) gives a memoir of Cumian, who died at Bobbio (Aug. 19), but he has no connexion with the son of Dubh, and is merely placed there by Colgan because there is no one of the name in the Irish calendars at Aug. 19. [CUMIN (2).] According to Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 15) and Colgan (ib. 59, n. 6, 248, c. 2) Cummin or Cuimmein was son of Dima Dubh, son of Diarmaid, of the race of Fiachra, son of Eochaidh Muighmhedhoin (O'Hanlon, Jr. Saints, i. 181-2).

(2) (Cumian to Cumine) of Bobbio, Aug. 19. He appears to have been a bishop in Ireland for many years, and in his old age laid aside his episcopal charge and dignity to join the brotherhood of Columbanus at Bobbio. There for seventeen years he lived in piety, and died on the 19th of August, aged ninety-five years and four months; he was buried there during the thirty-one years of the Lombard king Luitprand's reign, which ended A.D. 744, and was so esteemed by that king that he adorned his tomb with a precious monument (pretioso lapide), on which was probably written the epitaph which is preserved by Colgan and Lanigan, and from which we learn all that is really known of the saint (Colgan, Acta SS. 58-9; Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. Ir. iii. 171, 174). Butler (Lives of the Saints, viii. 277) supposes that this St. Cumin is the same as St. Cumin Foda (Nov. 12), and the writer of the letter to St. Seghine on the Paschal controversy, but evidently he is mistaken. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Junii, tom. ii. 244) have a "Sylloge Historica, ex monumentis Bobiensibus apud Ughellum," which treats "De Sancto Cumiano Episcopo Scoto Bobii in Italia," at June 9.

(3) Cuimin or Cumin of Connor is frequently quoted by O'Clery in his Mart. Doneg. as the author of a poem in Irish verse upon the characteristic virtues of the Irish saints. He extols the merits of thirty-five saints in as many stanzas, closing with his own attestation and desire for prayerful remembrance. Of himself there appears to be nothing known: he is believed to have lived in the middle of the 7th century. His poem is given in Irish and English by Dr. Kelly (Cal. Ir. Saints, 160 sq.; see O'Hanlon, Tr. Saints, i. p. xi.; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. xix.; Colgan, Acta SS. 5, no. vii.)

(4) (Cuimmein), Cadhan, (June 1). O'Clery in Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 143) thinks the Cuimmein on that day in the calendars is the same as Cuimmen Cadhan, son of Cronchu, son of Ronan, . . . of the race of Corbmac Cas, son of Oiloll Olum. Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 509, c. 8) in treating of the church of Reachrainn (now Lambay, off the coast of Dublin), cites from the Four Mast. A.D. 738, and as venerated on June 1, "S. Cumineus Hua Kierain, Ab. Recranniensis."

(5) (Cumine, Cummene, Cumian) surnamed Finn, Ailbhe, Albus, the Fair, Feb. 24. It may be remarked at the outset that regarding this person and his history there is great scope for controversy, and probably no means of clearly ending the dispute. The chief point on which there is the difference of opinion is, as to whether he is the same person as Cumman, the author of the well-known Paschal epistle to Segineus, Segineus, or Seghine, abbat of Hy (A.D. 623-652). Colgan, with O'Conor, O'Donovan, and others, regards them as one and the same, but Lanigan, with Reeves, Grub, and others, is rather to be followed in looking upon them as different persons, living at the same time, but taking entirely different sides in ecclesiastical controversy. It seems incredible that the romanising Cumman could have been chosen abbat at that period in the principal Columbian monastery. [CUMMIAN.] At Feb. 24 Colgan has a memoir with most of the facts and traditions regarding the two persons, but runs into confusion by attaching them to a single individual, and in this Bp. Forbes (Kal. Scott. Saints, 316-17) follows him.

St. Cumineus or Cumine, surnamed Finn or Albus, the Fair, was son of Ernan, son of Fiachna, of the race of Conall Gulban, and district of Tyrconnel. Despising the pleasures of the world he retired into voluntary exile, and betook himself to the monastery of Hy. He probably went there to be under his uncle Segineus or Seghine, and on the death of Suibhne he succeeded in A.D. 657 as the seventh abbat. He died A.D. 669, and his name is famous as that of the earliest biographer of St. Columba. Colgan supposes that what he publishes as the Second Life in his Tr. Thaum. is the work of St. Cumineus, which is referred to and quoted by St. Adamnan (Vit. S. Col. iii. c. 5), but in this he errs: S. Cumineus's treatise is really the First Life in Colgan's collection (Tr. Thaum. 321-24), though he has given it as anonymous. It was afterwards published, with some minute differences, by Mabillon (Acta SS. Ben. Ord. i. 321-24), and again by Pinkerton (Vit. Ant. 27-45). It forms the basis of St. Adamnan's Life of St. Columba. (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 107 sq., iii. 36; Grub, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 45, 86, 98; Colgan, Acta SS. 408-11, and Tr. Thaum. 324 n.¹, 331 n.¹; Reeves, Adamnan, 199, 260, 375; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 57; Montalembert, Monks of the West, iv. 151; Four Mist. by O'Donov. i. 279; Ussher, Ant. c. 15, wks. vi. 229, 245.)

CUMIN (6) Foda or Fada, the Tall, of Cluainferta-Brenainn (now Clonfert, co. Longford), B. Nov. 12. He was son of Fiachna, son of Fiachre, king of West Munster, and of the race of Corc, son of Lughaidh, descended from Oilíoll Olum, king of Munster. Rímh, daughter of Fiachna, was his mother, and his preceptor was Colman Ua Chlusaigh. [COLMAN (36).] Guaire Aidne, son of Colman, king of Connaught, was a brother. O'Donovan says St. Cumin was of the tribe of Eoghanaecht Lochu Lein in Kerry. But in the Book of Leacan, Guaire becomes a distant relative, St. Cumin is represented as son of Conaing or Conall, son of Fergus, son of Amhalgaidh, son of Fiachra, son of Eochaidh Muightheadoin king of Ireland, and the saint founds Cill Chuimín, now Kileummin, in the ancestral barony of Tirawley on Killala Bay, co. Mayo (Gen. &c. of Hy-Fiachrach, by O'Donov. 9, 45, 61). He was born about A.D. 590, yet Colgan makes him a disciple of St. Ita or Mida, who died A.D. 570. Aedh was his first proper name, and Drum-dá-liter the name of his place. He appears to have been a man of great learning, and as such was recommended by one of the abbats of Hy to be the director and spiritual adviser of king Domhnall. Lanigan and Butler identify him with St. Cumman, who took such a prominent part in the Paschal controversy [CUMMIAN], but their suppositions appear to be groundless. He wrote a hymn in praise of the Apostles and Evangelists, which is published for the first time in the Book of Hymns (fasc. i. 72-80), edited with many learned notes by Dr. Todd, who also gives a critical summary of the accounts of his parentage and life. He died A.D. 662. (Todd, Book of Hymns, fasc. i. 81 sq.; Ussher, Ant. c. 17, works, vi. 544; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 398 sq.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, viii. 275-7 at Ang. 19; O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. iv. 52 n., 55 n.; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 305; Colgan, Acta SS. 59 n.⁶, 145, c. 3, 146 c. 7, 149 n.⁷; O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. iii. 33; Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 259.) [J. G.]

CUMMA, abbat of Abingdon, attesting a charter marked by Kemble doubtful or spurious (C. D. No. 81; Birch, Fasti Monast. 58). It bears the signatures of bishops Daniel, Wor, Walestod, Forthere, who sat between A.D. 705 and 737, and is dated by Kemble A.D. 725-737; but it is printed in the Chron. Monast. de Abingd. ed. Stevenson, i. 38, under the marginal date A.D. 857-860. [CUMANUS.] [C. H.]

CUMMAN (1), V. July 6. On this day Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 189) has Ethne and Cumman, and Dr. Todd adds in a note, "Ethne and Cumman were both virgins and sisters, daughters of Cormac, son of Ailill, of the race of Cathair Mór, king of Ireland, Sanct. Gen. B. of Lecan." It is related by Evinus in the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick (iii. c. 2), that St. Patrick came to a place afterwards called Tulach-mainne, where the chief man of the district, named Manius, received him and his teaching gladly: on this account he received a blessing, and twin-daughters were born to him. In his note on this, Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 149, c. 2, 184 n.⁸) says July 6 was the feast of the three daughters of Manius of Asriodh-bainne, according to Mar. O'Gorman, Maguire, Mart. Doneg. and Mart. Tallaght: the latter (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xxviii.) has "Tri ingena Maíne in Airíud Boinne 1 Dermor ocus Ethne ocus Cummán." And thus they stand in Colgan's list (ibid. 270, col. 1) of those whom St. Patrick veiled, as Dermoria, Ethnea, and Cumman. In his Index Chron. at A.D. 560 (Acta SS. 831) he says Ethnea, Pulcheria, and Cumania, virgins, daughters of Aidh, or, according to others, daughters or grand-daughters of Corpreus, king of Leinster, flourished (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 327). But in so many different notices of St. Cumman and her sisters there is evidently very much obscurity and confusion.

(2) Of Doire-inghen-aillen, in Ard Uladh (now the Ards, in co. Down); or in Dal-Buinne, V. May 29. Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 141) says further that she is of the race of Fiatach Finn, monarch of Erin. In his Felire, St. Aengus speaks of "Cumain of the Fair town—Dear daughter of Allen," and on this there is a gloss possibly, as Colgan imagines, by St. Aengus himself interpreting and applying it. At Daire-inghen-aillen (now Derry, in the Ards of Ulster there are the ruins of two very ancient chapels, which Dr. Reeves conjectures, from the Felire and its gloss, may have been built before the year 800 (Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 24 n., 234). [J. G.]

CUMMIAN has been identified with St. Cumine, abbat of Iona, to the historical injury of both [CUMIN (5)]. He has also been identified, to as little purpose, with St. Cumin Foda [CUMIN (6)]. There is no account of his parentage or race. He was probably educated at the Columbian monastery at Durrow, and had his church at Kil-cummin (now Kilcomin, in the barony of Clonlisk, King's County). In the Paschal controversy, in which his name has a very prominent place, he strongly espoused the Roman side as against the national or Scotie. In the synods which were held on the subject, as in those at Magh-Lena, near Tullamore, and at the White-Field, near Carlow, Cummián took a leading part, but the only result of the synods seems to have been a deepening of the lines of demarcation between the parties, and a closer attachment of St. Cummián to the usages of the south of Ireland and Rome. His zeal on the Paschal brought him into collision with his Columbian brethren at Hy, who rebuked him for becoming a schismatic and a forsaker of his country's traditions. His reply was given in a letter, A.D. 634. This letter is interesting and of great value, not only as shewing the position taken up by the advocates of the more modern and astronomically more correct calculation of Easter, but as proving the solid foundation of learning which Ireland could then lay in the minds of her priests (see the letter in Ussher, Sylogæ, Ep. xi. works, iv. 432-44). Besides this letter, he is also believed to have been the author of an abridgment of the penitential canons, called Liber de Penitentiarum mensurá, which is published by Fleming (Collect. Sacra. 197-210), and afterwards in the Bibliotheca Patrum, f. xii. There is no account of his death. Becan Ruim was probably "Becan the solitary," his brother [BECAN (3)]. (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. v. ii. c. 15; Reeves, Adamnan, 27, 260, 366; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 168, 202; Prim. Ch. Hist. v. ii. c. 4; Colgan, Acta SS. 408-11; Grub, Ecol. Hist. Scot. i. c. 6; Dubl. Penny Journ. i. 391, A.D. 1832-3; see COLMAN (23).) [J. G.]

CUN-. See also CUMN-.

CUNGALLUS (Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 191), abbat of Bangor. [COMGALL.] [C. H.]

CUNGAR, anchorite, said to have been the son of a prince at Constantinople, and to have come into Britain about A.D. 711 to live as a recluse. The story proceeds that he received from Ina king of Wessex a grant of land, afterwards named from him Congresbury, in Somersetshire; that here he built an oratory, and established a monastic society, and that he afterwards passed the Severn and founded a similar community in the north of Wales. Rees states him to have been patron of Badgworth and Congresbury in Somersetshire, of Hope in Flintshire, and of Llangefni in Anglesey. (Cressy, Church Hist. of Brit. iv. 11, xxi. 13; Ussher, Brit. Ecol. Antiq. wks. v. 87, 540; Capgrave, N. L. A. f. 80; Rees, Welsh Saints, 232; Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 764; Haddan and Stubbs, i. 150, 158.) Congresbury is in the north-west of Somersetshire, on the river Yeo, northward of the Mendip Hills. For the supposed bishopric there see DANIEL.

CUNIBERCT, bishop of Winchester. [CYNEBERT.]

CUNIBERT, bishop and confessor. April 25 He was given by his parents to be educated by the monks of Bammirini (Balmerino, Fifeshire), near the estuary of the Tay. There he so profited by their teaching that, against his will, he was carried off "ad sacras insulas." But he so loved solitude that, forsaking his episcopate, he betook himself to the desert, where, after evoking water from the stony rock, he died about the year 690. This is the account given by Camerarius (De Scot. Fort. 134-5) who adds "De eo agitur brevier in Theatro Vitæ humanæ, lib. i." The Bollandists refer to him among the praetermissi of this day, giving Camerarius as their authority, and adding, "ubi fuerit episcopus siletur" (Acta SS. April, tom. iii. 345; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 317). [J. G.]

CUNRED, abbat of the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul (afterwards called St. Augustine's) at Canterbury; he succeeded Gutard, A.D. 803, and died A.D. 823 (Monist. Anglic. i. 121). His name appears in a charter of Coenwulf king of Mercia, A.D. 804, which is considered spurious or doubtful (Kemble, C. D. No. 187; Birch, Fasti Monist. 58). [C. H.]

CUNUBERTHUS, abbat, attesting a charter of Aug. 26, 675, of Leutherius, bishop of the West Saxons, "actum publicè juxta flumen Bladon," but marked doubtful or spurious in Kemble (C. D. No. 11). The charter is also printed, but without the attestations by Malmesbury (G. R. ed. Hardy, vol. i. 43). On the identification of Bladon (which occurs again in C. D. No. 69), with the Lower Avon in Wiltshire, see Camden, ed. Gough, vol. i. 96. We can safely identify this abbat with the abbat and presbyter of Bede's touching story (H. E. iv. 16), Cyniberctus, having his monastery at "Hreutford, id est vadum arundinis." Camden's identification (i. 115) of this spot with Redbridge (the reedy ford having been succeeded by a bridge), in the neighbourhood of Southampton, especially when combined with his second identification of Ad Lapidem of the narrative with Stoneham, also near Southampton, is ingenious and convincing. It is adopted by Smith (Beda, l. c. note) and others (Monist. Anglic. vi. 1619; Leland, Collect. i. 76, ed. Hearne). See also Birch, Fasti Monist. 58, 60. [CYNIBERT (2).] [C. H.]

CUNUULFUS (Bede, H. E. Contin. ad an. 740, in M. H. B. 288), bishop of Lindisfarne. [CYNEWULF.] [C. H.]

CUENBURG, abbess, attests a charter of Kenulf, king of Mercia, at a Witenagemot in London, Aug. 1, 811. (Kemble, C. D. No. 196, Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 571, and note; Birch, Fasti Monist. 58.) [C. H.]

CUP, IN THE COMMUNION. [EUCARISTI.]

CURCACH. (CORCAIR, QUORRAIR.) Some female saints of these names occur, but their history is in no small degree conjectural.

(1) V., Mar. 8, Aug. 8. In his memoir of St. Corcaria or Cucagia, Colgan (Acta SS. 563-4) says Quorrait, or more properly Corcair or Curcach, was sister of St. Finnian (Sept. 10) of Maghbille (Moville), whom however he erroneously identifies with St. Frigidian of Lucca. Her father was Corpheus, of the princely house of Dalfiatach in Ulster, and her mother's name was Lassara. Won by the life and exhortations of her brother, she refused earthly marriage, and was living in virginity about the middle of the 6th century. But now comes in the chief confusion or difficulty. Maguire and Mart. Tallaght commemorate on March 8, Curcach of Cluain Luthair, and Mart. Doneg. has the same dedication on Aug. 8: hence these feasts may belong to the same person. But Colgan (ibid. 339 n. 32, 564 n. 6, and Tr. Thaum. 463, c. 55) thinks that Corcaria Keann and Corcaria Caoin, who are said to have been daughters of Eugenius, and sisters of St. Sgire or Schiria (March 24) of Killiskire in Meath, were, if not really only one person, yet perhaps the one Curcach of Greagraighe, Nov. 16, and the other Curcach of Cluain-luthair at Lea, in Ulster, March 8 and Aug. 8. O'Clery at March 8 (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 71) says there is a Curcach, daughter of Enna, son of Corbmac, of the race of Collá-da-chrioch, and Colgan (Acta SS. 713, c. 4) places her feast on July 21 or Aug. 8.

(2) V. July 21. This is the patron saint of Cill-curcaighe (now Kileorkey, a parish in the barony of Castlereagh, county Roscommon), but only her name appears to remain in the calendars (Kelly, Cat. Ir. SS. 89). [J. G.]

CURCNEUS. [CORCAN.]

CURIG (1), latinised Cyricius, is the name of a Welsh bishop, whose memory is to be distinguished from that of Curig, Cyrique, or Cyricus, the martyr of Tarsus, who is also much honoured in Wales. Giraldus tells of his baculus being preserved in the church of St. German or Harmon, in the province of Warthrenniau, and lent out for working cures at the charge of one penny (unius denarii oblatione); he is supposed to have been bishop of Llanbadarn (Girald. Cambr. vi. 18; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 146). [J. G.]

(2) (Rees, Welsh Saints, 307), infant martyr. [CYRICUS.] [C. H.]

CURITAN (1) Abbat and bishop of Rosmeinn, commemorated March 16. The Cain Adamnan states that Curitan the bishop was one of the saints who went security to free the women of Erin from the bondage in which they were (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 77). He is possibly mixed up with the life of St. Bonifacius of Rosemarkie [BONIFACIUS QUERETINUS]. Mart. Tallaght (Kelly, Cat. Ir. SS. p. xviii.) has the feast of "Curitani Eps. ocus Abb. Ruis mic Bairend," which seems to identify him with the Curitan of Ros-mec-baercon who attended St. Adamnan's synod of Birr.

CURITAN (2) Of Cill-mor-dithruibh, Aug. 9. He is numbered among the nineteen saints of Kilmore, who are venerated on this day. Cill-mor-dithruibh is now Kilmore, a parish in the barony of North Balintore, county Roscommon (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 214;

Reeves, Adamnan, 99 n.; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 381, n. 100). [J. G.]

CURNAN BEG, of Cill-Churnain (Kilcornan), Jan. 6. Of the particulars of his life we have nothing beyond his genealogy. He was son of Sinell, of the race of Coindri, descended from the Clanna-Rudhraighe, in Ulster. His church was at the present Kilcornan, in the barony of Caenraighe or Kenry, in the county and diocese of Limerick. There is another place called Kilcornan in the barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary; but there is no mention of Curnan Beg's having any connexion with it (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 9; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 81-3). [J. G.]

CURTCHEW (CUTCHOU) is probably a form of Constantine (the Saint), and thus a St. Cowslan or St. Cutchou is found at Garbost in the western islands of Scotland. (Martin, Western Isles, 27; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 314.) [J. G.]

CURVINUS. [CUARAN.]

CUSA, CUSAN, -ANUS, attests a charter of Eanbert of the Wiccii, A.D. 757, marked spurious or doubtful by Kemble; another of Uhtred, king of the Wiccii, belonging to the period A.D. 778-785 (C. D. Nos. 102, 148; Birch, Fasti Monast. 58); another by Offa and Aldred, dated by Kemble A.D. 777 (C. D. No. 131), and by Hicckes A.D. 775 (Thes. i. 171). Cusa, without the "abbat," attests a charter of Aldred, A.D. 775. (C. D. No. 125.) [C. H.]

CUTHBALD, monk, and afterwards abbat, of Medeshamstede (subsequently called Peterborough), succeeding Saxulf and preceding Egbald. He is described as a man of so great piety and wisdom that the monks of other houses desired to have superiors of his appointment. His name is attached to a charter of A.D. 680, marked doubtful or spurious by Kemble. He is mentioned in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, Thorpe's transl., 29, 33; Ingram's transl., 46, 50; Willis, Mit. Abb. i. 143; Monast. Anglic. i. 345; Kemble, C. D. No. 990; Birch, Fasti Monast. 58. [C. H.]

CUTHBALD (Wend. F. II., ed. Coxe, i. 187), abbat of Undalum. [CUDUALDUS.] [C. H.]

CUTHBERTHT, one of the five presbyters of the diocese of Lichfield who attest an act of the council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803 (Kemble, C. D. No. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 546). [C. H.]

CUTHBERT (1), the great northern saint and bishop, was born, in the first half of the 7th century, in that district of ancient Northumbria which lies beyond the Tweed. He seems to have been the child of humble parents. We hear of him first at the little monastery of Tiningham, near Dunbar; and subsequently he appears as a shepherd watching over his flocks in the hill country upon the banks of the Leader. In the year 651, Cuthbert, a religiously-disposed youth already, received, according to Beda, a call to a straiter walk, whilst he was shepherding his charge by night. (Vita Anonym. S. Cuthberti, ed. Stevenson, and Vita ejusdem, auctore Beda, the authorities used in this biography where no other reference is given.) He seemed to hear and see a vision of angels bearing heavenwards in triumph some newly-departed soul. He awoke his comrades, but they laughed at his tale; and so he deserted them when daylight came, and he had learned that bishop Aidan had passed away during the preceding night. He rode down the hills towards the monastery of Melrose, which was distant more than a day's journey from his sheepwalk. This is not the religious house which we know so well, but an earlier monastic settlement, a short distance below it, on the same bank of the Tweed. The site of it, still called Old Melrose, is on a green sheltered slope, a little below the point where the Tweed receives the scanty waters of the Leader, and then takes a bold semicircular sweep under the woods and rocks of Bemerside.

Melrose was an offshoot from Lindisfarne, and in the absence of Eata the abbat, the provost Boisil received Cuthbert into the brotherhood, in which he was soon conspicuous for his devotion and energy. After a few years' sojourn at Melrose, Cuthbert accompanied his abbat, and went to Ripon, to plant a monastery on a plot of ground which had been given to them by Alchfrith, son of the king of Deira. In this establishment Cuthbert was the hostillar. In 661 the party returned to Melrose. Alchfrith, their patron, had adopted the new views with regard to Easter, in opposition to those of the Columbitæ, which Eata and Cuthbert observed; and, refusing to change their practice, the little brotherhood was sent back to its old home. In the same year, a pestilential epidemic, a precursor of the great mortality of 664, attacked the monks of Melrose. Cuthbert recovered, but he lost his old friend, Boisil, into whose office of provost he was elevated. In this position he was for some years a most active worker. Outside the walls of the house he was a very successful missionary. He was frequently absent for weeks together, ministering to the spiritual wants of the rural population. He found the people addicted to magic, and sunk in ignorance and superstition. We hear of Cuthbert at Coldingham and in Pictland, and wherever the calls of duty led him, he was assiduous and welcome.

In 664 Eata, Cuthbert's abbat at Melrose, removed him to Lindisfarne, to be the prior or provost of that already famous house. Melrose was on the river, Lindisfarne on the sea; it might be called an island, as "it was twice a day insulated by the tide, and it was therefore twice a day protected by a broad moat of living water" (Raine's North Durham, p. 52). Thirty years before, Aidan had chosen this sequestered spot for his home, reminding him as it did of his old residence at Iona; and here guarded by the sea, and in the vicinity of the royal castle of Bamborough, the colony of monks had lived in peace. Up to this time they retained the tenets of the Scottish church (Irish school), but the victory which Wilfrid had won at Whitby was felt throughout the province. Eata, as well as Cuthbert, seems to have adopted the Catholic views on the Easter question, and it became Cuthbert's duty, as prior of Lindisfarne, to induce his brethren to desert the traditions of their fathers. He had a most difficult task, but he succeeded at last. It was impossible for the monks to withstand the patient pleading of their superior, and to be untroubled by the devout self-denial of his life. Twelve years seem to have passed away, and then the old Celtic spirit of asceticism grew upon Cuthbert. He had indulged it hitherto within the narrow compass of the island; now he retired to the mainland, and secluded himself in a place which Bede does not mention by name, but which we may probably identify with a little recess in the ridge near the village of Howburn, that is still known as Cuthbert's cave. (North Durham, p. 2, and Raine's S. Cuthbert, p. 21.) After a while he selected a wilder spot, one of the little islands of Farne, which lie in that dangerous sea, a few miles to the south of Lindisfarne. He chose the one that is nearest to the mainland, on which in after years the great monastery of Durham established a cell in commemoration of Cuthbert. The island "consists of a few acres of ground partially covered with grass, and hemmed around with an abrupt border of basaltic rock" (Raine's St. Cuthbert, p. 21). To the landward, this border rises eighty feet above the level of the water; to the seaward, there is a gentle slope, on which Cuthbert built his home. He upreared, first of all, with the aid of his brethren, a wall of turf and stone, so high that he could see over it neither land nor sea. Within this enclosure he erected an oratory, and a residence of turf roofed with thatch and wreck from the beach. These were for himself. At the place of anchorage he set up another building, to shelter the brethren from Lindisfarne when they paid him a visit. To these visitors he seldom shewed himself. His cell had but one window, and this, after a while, he closed, never opening it except to give his blessing when it was urgently sought. In this religious solitude the ascetic passed nine long years.

In 684 Cuthbert was called for a while out of his retirement. In that year a synod was held at a place called Twyford, on the river Alne, at which Egfrith, king of Northumbria, and archbishop Theodore were present, and Cuthbert was selected by them to fill the vacant see of Hexham. The difficulty was to prevail upon him to accept the office. He was sent for in vain. At last the king himself, attended by bishop Trumwine and a large party, sailed to Farne, and only after the most earnest entreaties brought Cuthbert back with them to the synod. And there his old friend Eata made the proffered honour more welcome by surrendering to Cuthbert his own see of Lindisfarne in exchange for Hexham. Cuthbert was thus placed in charge of a district where he was known and beloved, and for two years he was an active and earnest bishop. He then resigned his post, and retired to his old hermitage, to die in peace. As he was getting into the boat which was to convey him from Lindisfarne to his cell, a monk asked him when they should see him again. "When you bring back my dead body," was Cuthbert's answer.

Cuthbert returned to Farne soon after Christmas, 686. On one of the last days in the following February, he was seized with his death-sickness. From his earliest years he had been subject to abscesses, a tendency which was aggravated by the attack of the plague which attacked him so severely in 661; but the disease which carried him off appears to have been dysentery. On the morning of the commencement of the seizure, Herefrith, abbat of Lindisfarne, paid Cuthbert a visit, and found him excessively weak. The dying man made the arrangements for his burial. On the north side of his oratory, concealed beneath the turf, was a stone coffin, the gift of abbat Cudda, in which his body was to be laid, wrapped in a shroud which Verca, abbess of Tynemouth, had bestowed on him. The coffin was to be re-interred near the oratory, to the east of the cross. Herefrith then went home at Cuthbert's bidding, to return, as he was desired, on some future day. A storm leapt up after his departure, and five days elapsed before the sea permitted the passage of a boat. All the while the monks at Lindisfarne were praying for their imprisoned bishop. On the sixth day Herefrith came back to Farne, and found Cuthbert sitting in the little guest-chamber at the landing place, with the glare of hunger in his eye. For five long days and nights he had never moved from that spot, longing and looking out for his return. Herefrith ministered to his wants, and when he went back to Lindisfarne, was allowed to leave several of his brethren behind. He came back to Farne immediately and prevailed upon Cuthbert to allow his remains to be taken to Lindisfarne for interment. Cuthbert, when he gave his assent, said that it was from fear of the evils which might result to Lindisfarne through the abuse of the privilege of sanctuary, that he had chosen at first a more retired resting-place. He now desired to lie within the monastery which he had ruled. After this, the monks carried the dying man into his oratory, where one of them watched with him for a while. Then Herefrith was called in to receive Cuthbert's last words, among which was the request, so dutifully and wonderfully obeyed, that should they ever be obliged to desert their home, his remains should accompany them wherever they went. Cuthbert lingered until midnight, and then died, having received the last office of religion at the hands of Herefrith. No sooner was he dead, than Herefrith lighted a couple of torches, and, holding one in either hand, waved them in the air, to carry to the monks at Lindisfarne in a preconcerted way the melancholy news. The brother who was looking out on the watch-tower at Lindisfarne marked the fire-signal across the dark sea, and ran into the church with the tidings, where the monks were soon upon their knees. In the morning the dead body of Cuthbert was brought over the sea, and was interred in a stone coffin on the right side of the altar.

Cuthbert died on the 20th of March, 687. He can scarcely have been sixty at the time of his decease, when we remember that he was a youth in 651. In stature he was somewhat above the middle size (Raine's St. Cuthbert, p. 218).

The life thus narrated was uneventful; but Cuthbert's posthumous fame was so great, that the record must be continued long after his decease by tracing the fortunes of his spiritual descendants. Cuthbert became the patron saint of the monks of Lindisfarne. During his life he was accredited with the power of working miracles; after his death, his fame, in this respect, spread far and wide. In 698, eleven years after his decease, the first translation of his remains was made by the monks of Lindisfarne. The body was raised from the earth for the purposes of reverence. A little preparation would give it the appearance of incorruptibility which it is said at that time to have manifested, and for which it was afterwards renowned. At the disinterment of the saint's remains in 1827, it was evident that such a preparation had been made. (St. Cuthbert, pp. 213-14.) In 793 and 794 the monastery of Lindisfarne was ravaged by the Danes. The monks were taken by surprise, and those who escaped were unable to fulfil Cuthbert's dying injunction by removing his body. On their return they found it untouched, but their brethren who remained behind had been slain by the marauders, and the church was plundered and destroyed. (Symeon, Historia Regum, i. 31-2; Hist. Eccl. Dunelm., ed. Bedford, 86-8; Alcuin, ed. 1777, i. 11, 19-20.)

In 875 there was another Danish inroad of a more serious and permanent kind. Bishop Eardulf and his clergy took with them the body of their saint and fled from Lindisfarne before the face of the foe. The wandering was of seven years' duration. Seven men were set apart to carry the bier on which the remains were laid, an office which was long remembered as an honour by their posterity and the northern church. (For the history of these wanderings, see the two works of Symeon, quoted above; the Historia de S. Cuthberto, and the Historia Translationum; see, also, Reginald.) The fugitives visited many places in Northumbria and Cumbria, and there was a mediaeval tradition that wherever a halt of any duration was made, a church was erected which bears St. Cuthbert's name. (Raine's St. Cuthbert, 44.) The times were so perilous, that at last in utter weariness and despair, the monks resolved to take up their abode in Ireland. They actually started from the Cumbrian coast, but were driven back to it by a storm. After this they went as far north as Whithorne, but their restlessness was such that in 882 we find the party at Crayke, near York, which had been given to Cuthbert in his lifetime by Ecgfrith, king of Northumbria. Whilst they were there the monks used the name and influence of their saint so adroitly in politics, that they were the happy means of placing Guthred on the throne of the northern kingdom. The new monarch was not slow to manifest his gratitude. The bishopric of Lindisfarne had wandered about with the party; Guthred, in 883, fixed it at Chester-le-Street. More than this, he gifted it with all the land between the Wear and Tyne, together with the right of sanctuary, thus originating those peculiar and noble franchises of the see which in after years were so largely developed. Chester is a village pleasantly situated on the banks of the Wear, and lying on the street, or Roman road, which leads to Newcastle. At Chester there was a peaceful succession of nine prelates coming down to 990, and there, perhaps, the monks would have remained, had not another Danish invasion, which occurred in that year, made their position unsafe. Bishop Aldhun this time took a southward direction with his companions and Cuthbert's body, and never paused until the whole party reached Ripon in Yorkshire. The place would be known to them by tradition as the temporary abode of Cuthbert in earlier life. They did not stay at Ripon more than three or four months. They set off for their old home at Chester-le-Street, and were within six miles of it, when a halt on the west side of Dunholme, or Durnam, revealed to them a situation, unequalled for beauty and many natural advantages by any other place in England. Here they took up their abode, led to it, so they told the tale, by the interposition of Providence. With the assistance of the official earl of the district and a willing populace, they cleared the summit of the hill of its native wood, and levelling the ground, began upon it the construction of a church of stone, the ancestor of the present stately cathedral of Durham. Three years elapsed before it was completed, during which time the body of Cuthbert was laid in a temporary church of wood, until a fitter resting-place was prepared. This was finished in 999. The wanderings of the faithful monks were at last over. With good cause they called Durham their Sion, a name which it has since borne; and they who have since become familiar with Jerusalem, have traced a resemblance, not in historical association only, but in situation and beauty, between Cuthbert's lasting home and the great city in the East.

In 1069 there was a short break in the peace which had reigned at Durham since 993. William the Conqueror came into the North to take vengeance on the people. The bishop of Durham and his clergy, true to their traditions, fled with the body of Cuthbert to its old home at Lindisfarne. After a short stay there, they found that their fears were unfounded, and returned quietly to Durham. (Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. ed. Bedford, 179-185; Reginald, 30-1.)

In 1093, bishop William of St. Carileph began to replace Aldhun's cathedral by a more massive and noble structure, and from that year until 1104, whilst the fabric was in a transitional state. Cuthbert's remains were deposited in a tomb which had been prepared for them on the south side of the church, in the present cloister quadrangle. William of St. Carileph's church contained, of course, a proper feretory or shrine, to which Cuthbert's body was translated in 1104 with extraordinary ceremony. The remains are said to have presented the same appearance of incorruptibility which had been observed in 698. Laid in the coffin with Cuthbert were relics of other persons of renown. The head of king Oswald, the great patron of early Christianity in the North, was resting upon the saint's breast; and in the same receptacle, deposited in linen bags, were the bones of bishops Aidan, Eadbert, Eadfrith and Ethelwold, and the head of "the most glorious Ceolwulf." The chest also contained the relics of the Venerable Bede, which were afterwards placed in the Galilee at the west end of the church. At the translation these bones were removed from the coffin and were arranged around the feretory in little caskets of ivory or crystal. The head of Oswald was restored to its old resting-place. (See Hist. Translationum S. Cuthberti, ed. Surtees Soc. 158-201; Reginald, pp. 84-92.)

The reverence which was paid to Cuthbert is evidenced by the magnificent gifts which were heaped upon his church. The names of the benefactors were entered in a volume, called the Liber Vitae Dunelmensis, which used to rest upon the high altar in the cathedral. It dates from Saxon times, and the names of many of the earliest and greatest donors are inscribed in it in gold and silver characters. (Published by the Surtees Society, vol. xi.) The church of Durham also possessed a privilege of sanctuary which was famous throughout the country. (See the Sanctuary Register, published by the Surtees Soc. vol. vi.) Of equal fame likewise was St. Cuthbert's banner, "the holie corporax cloth, which was within the corporax, wherewith Saint Cuthbert did cover the chalice." This was frequently carried as a talisman into battle, and had always the credit of securing the victory. (Rites of Durham, 20-1; Archæologia Aeliensis, n. s. part vi. 51-65.)

The shrine or feretory of St. Cuthbert was placed in the cathedral on a small platform behind and contiguous to the high altar. There is a full account of it in that very remarkable work which describes the ornaments and the customs of the church of Durham before the Reformation. (The Rites of Durham, Surtees Soc. publications, vol. xv.) The shrine was set off with a sumptuousness of decoration in the way of painting, jewelry and carving, which was deemed to be unrivalled. After the battle of Neville's Cross, the captured banners of the Scottish king and his nobles were suspended over the holy place, and the famous Black Rod of Scotland was added to its treasures. All these disappeared at the Dissolution, and at the present day nothing catches the eye on the vacant platform save a blue marble stone in its centre, under which the bones of Cuthbert were laid when his shrine was demolished. But there are still several grooved hollows in the pavement which are said to have been made in olden days by the knees of the worshippers.

At some unknown period, between the sixteenth and the eighteenth centuries, probably in the eighteenth, sprang up the tradition, which the author of Marmion has enshrined in his verse, that the body of Cuthbert is still preserved in the cathedral in a state of incorruptibility, and that the place is only known to three members of the Benedictine order, who regularly transmit the secret, so that there are always three who keep it. The truth of this story was practically dispelled in 1827 by an examination of the grave behind the present altar in which the body of the saint was said to have been deposited. The inquiry resulted in the discovery of relics, which, on the whole, may be distinctly identified with those which Reginald describes as being found in the grave in the year 1104. The subject has been fully investigated in the St. Cuthbert of the late Dr. Raine. The discovery, as may be imagined, excited much interest, and, naturally enough, some little controversy.

The bones of Cuthbert, with the skull of Oswald, were re-interred under their old blue stone, but the more interesting contents of the coffin were removed and are now exhibited to the public in the library of the Dean and Chapter of Durham. They consist of portions of the original coffin of oak, rudely carved, in which the body was laid immediately after death. There is also a pectoral cross of gold, of rare beauty, which probably belonged to Cuthbert himself; a small superaltar of wood overlaid with silver; a large comb of bone which is mentioned by Reginald; a burse and portions of many beautiful episcopal vestments of cloth of gold, and of most choice workmanship. Upon a stole is an inscription stating that the vestment was made for bishop Frithestan. This person was bishop of Winchester and died in 932. It is only within the last few years that the presence of this robe at Durham has been satisfactorily explained. The narrative of a monk of Winchester has been published, stating how he took some vestments with him from Winchester to Durham, and put them with his own hands on Cuthbert's body. (Thorpe, Diplomat. 321.)

When Cuthbert's grave was opened at the Reformation, there were found in it, in addition to most of the articles already described, a ring of gold, a chalice of gold and onyx stone, a paten, and what is called "a metwaud of gold." (Raine, St. Cuthbert, 216-217.) These, no doubt, would become the spoils of the royal commissioners. The ring is still in existence, and has been seen by the present writer. It came into the possession of Thomas Watson, Dean of Durham, and was afterwards given to the College of English Canonesses at Paris, whence in 1855 it was transferred to St. Cuthbert's College at Ushaw, near Durham. (See a notice and drawing of it in Arch. Aeliana, n. s. part vi. 66-8.) It is a plain massive thumb-ring, with a sapphire set in it. There are also several other relics of Cuthbert preserved. The MS. of St. John's Gospel, of mystic power, which was no doubt a personal relic, although it was taken out of the coffin as early as the year 1104, is now at St. John's College at Stonyhurst. (Raine, St. Cuthbert, 78.) It may be mentioned also that miracle of art, the precious volume known as the Lindisfarne Gospels, which has now passed away from Durham into the national Museum. It was this book which the monks of Lindisfarne had with them in their seven years' wandering, and which fell into the sea when they neared the Cumbrian shore, when the storm drove them back from Ireland. It is still marked with the stain caused by the sea-water. (Published in four volumes by the Surtees Soc. In the preface to the last volume is an account of the adventures of the MS.) Another companion of the monks in their wanderings from the eighth century to the close of the tenth, was the noble stone cross which bishop Ethelwold, Cuthbert's friend, caused to be wrought in cunning sculpture as a monument of both. In Simeon's day it was standing, "sublimis," in the cemetery at Durham. (Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. cap. xii.)

Cuthbert, according to Bale, was the author of a set of injunctions entitled "Ordinationes suae ecclesiae," and beginning Prima regula est de Domino. He also wrote, Praecepta vitae regularis. (Balaei Scriptt. Brit. Folio, Basileae, cent. i. p. 84.) These pieces do not now exist. The literature, however, of which Cuthbert is the subject is very considerable, both in prose and verse. The earliest life of the saint in prose is that written soon after Cuthbert's death by some nameless person who resided either at Lindisfarne or Melrose, at the desire of bishop Eadfrith, and between 698 and 705. It is, no doubt, this work which Bede incorporated with his own, describing it as the production of the brethren at Lindisfarne. This biography is valuable not only for its very early character, but for the information it contains. It is in four books, and is printed in the Acta Sanctorum (March 20), and in Beda's Opp. Minora, ed. Stevenson, pp. 259-284. Mr. Stevenson corrects some of the errors with which the first imprint abounds.

We now come to the two lives by Bede. That in verse, the earlier in date, was written prior to 705, as king Aldfrith is mentioned in it as alive. The work is addressed to John the Presbyter, who was starting on a pilgrimage to Rome. Excluding a preface and a final prayer, the work consists of forty-six chapters, descriptive chiefly of miracles. The poem has been printed more than once. (Acta Sanctorum, March 20; Canisii Lectt. Antiquae, ii. pars i. 1-24; Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Ben. ed. Venice, ii. 878-899; Beda, ed. Smith, pp. 267-291; Beda's Opp. Minora, ed. Stevenson, pp. 1-43.)

The prose life by Bede is a work of a higher stamp, and is one of the best pieces of mediaeval biography that we possess. It was compiled, (1) from the Anonymous Life already mentioned; (2) from the author's poem on the same theme; (3) from the traditions of the monks of Lindisfarne, to whom the work was formally submitted for correction before it was regarded as complete. Bede dedicated his work to bishop Eadfrith and his congregation, to whom he was so much indebted for information. He was assisted by several persons who were personally acquainted with Cuthbert, viz., Herefrith Presbyter, Inguald of Wearmouth, Balhelm and Cynemund of Lindisfarne, and others. It is difficult to appreciate too highly the tone in which this life is written and the facts with which it abounds. The work has gone through several editions. (Acta SS. March 20; Svii Vitae SS. pp. 214 et sqq.; Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Ben. ed. Venice, ii. pp. 841-878; Beda, ed. Smith, pp. 227-264; Beda's Opp. Minora, ed. Stevenson, pp. 45-137.)

Next in order comes a short but very valuable tract entitled, Historia de S. Cuthberto, et de commemoratione locorum regionumque ejus priscae possessionis a primordio usque nunc temporis. This is printed in Twysden's Decem Scriptt. coll. 67-76; and fully and more accurately, in Opp. Symeonis Dunelm. ed. Surtees Soc. i. pp. 138-152. The tract gives a very brief summary of Cuthbert's life, but we derive from it invaluable information as to the fortunes of his spiritual descendants, and the acquisition of the endowments of his church. It was written certainly not later than the eleventh century.

After this work follows the Historia Translationum S. Cuthberti, by an anonymous writer in the eleventh century, which is printed entire, for the first time, in Symeonis Dunelm. Opp. ed. Surtees Soc. i. pp. 158-201. It had been previously printed in part in the Acta SS. March 20; Acta SS. Ord. S. Ben. saec. iv. ii. 291, et sqq.; and in the Appendix to the Opera Minora of Bede, ed. Stevenson, pp. 285-317. The last three texts, however, are compilations, consisting of a part of the Historia Translationum; a short tract entitled, Brevis Relatio de S. Cuthberto, which will be noticed afterwards; and an interpolation of some chapters from Symeon's History of the Church of Durham (cf. Mr. Hinde's Preface to Symeon, pp. xxxix.-xlv.). The work contains twenty-one chapters, the most valuable part being an account of the translation of Cuthbert's body in 1104. The tract seems to have been written at Durham possibly by Symeon himself, perhaps by Prior Turgot.

The next chronicler of St. Cuthbert, or rather, of the fortunes of his church, is Symeon of Durham in his famous Libellus de exordio atque procursu Dunelmensis ecclesie, which is printed in Twysden's Decem Scriptores, coll. 1-58; and, separately, by Thomas Bedford, 8vo. Lond. 1732, an edition of rare excellency. It is unnecessary to dwell upon this most important work, as it is more a history of the church of Durham than of its patron saint. Founded upon this chronicle is the Brevis Relatio de S. Cuthberto (Symeonis Opp. ed. Surtees Soc. i. 223-233, and Preface lvi. lvii.). The tract is very brief and unimportant. In addition to Symeon, the compiler uses the Anonymous Life, that by Bede, and the Historia Translationum.

Reginaldi monachi Dunelmensis Libellus de Admirandis Beati Cuthberti Virtutibus quae novellis patratæ sunt temporibus. (Edited for the Surtees Soc.) This work is written in the 12th century, and is dedicated to that eminent hagiologist, Aelred, abbat of Rievaulx. It is in 141 chapters, and, with very few exceptions, consists of descriptions of miracles, and curious historical incidents in connexion with the church of Durham and its property during the 12th century. The author was evidently a most credulous person, but he gives us many invaluable glimpses into the manners and events of his day. There is at Castle Howard a Life of Cuthbert in English verse, in twenty books, founded upon this work of Reginald. It is unpublished.

We now come to a different class of the Cuthbertine literature, namely, what is called the Irish life, Libellus de ortu S. Cuthberti, de historiis Hybernensium excerptus, et translatus (printed by Surtees Soc., Biog. Misc. pp. 63-87). Although there is no MS. of this life extant, older than the 14th century, it seems probable, from internal evidence, that it was written towards the close of the 12th. The design of this biography is to give Cuthbert ancestry. He is said, therefore, to have been the son of Muriadach king of Ireland, and to have come into Northumbria to be educated by his mother's brethren, bishops Meldan and Eatan. Special reasons also are given why women were prevented from entering the church of Durham. The author in the preface speaks of the "libellus" which he has already written about Cuthbert. It is possible, therefore, that the writer may have been Reginald, especially as there is some similarity of style. As to the credibility of the Irish life, the weight of evidence is against it. Not only is the story itself full of glaring improbabilities, but it is in direct opposition to the statements of the monks of Lindisfarne, who knew Cuthbert, to Bede, and to all the early writers. Still, it was adopted by John Wessington, prior of Durham, in the 15th century, and was accepted, apparently, after his time in his church. (Rites of Durham, 64-5, 112.) It is true also that women were not allowed to come farther into the nave of Durham Cathedral than the "cross of marble blue," which runs across it. But this order is to be accounted for, not so much by any special incident in Cuthbert's life, as by the dislike which so many of the Celtic and English saints had to the society of women.

The prose Irish life was versified, but the poem is still unpublished (Hardy's Catalogue of MSS., i. part ii. 313). The same origin is ascribed to Cuthbert by John of Tynemouth in this life of that saint, which is printed by Capgrave (Nova Legenda Angliæ, 69-79). This life is merely a compilation.

The Cuthbertine literature is not yet exhausted. There is an unpublished metrical life in the library of Lincoln's Inn, derived apparently from Bede. A similar life has been printed by the Surtees Soc. (Biog. Misc. pp. 92-117). It is of no authority, seeing that it ascribes to Cuthbert several miracles which are borrowed from Wilfrid and John of Beverley.

A long and valuable account of the materials for the history of St. Cuthbert may be found in Hardy's Desc. Cat. i. 297-317.

In more recent times Cuthbert has evoked the following works, The Legend of St. Cuthbert; with the Antiquities of the church of Durham (by Robert Hegg), published by B. R. Esq. [Richard Baddeley], 12mo. Lond. 1663. (Reprinted in 4to. at the private press of George Allan, at Darlington, in 1777; and, again, by John Brough Taylor, 4to., Sunderland, 1816.) The opening of Cuthbert's tomb was described in Saint Cuthbert: with an account of the site in which his remains were found upon the opening of his tomb in Durham Cathedral, in the year 1827, by the Rev. James Raine, M.A., 4to., Durham, 1828. This work produced some criticism on the part of the Roman Catholics, which is gently and hesitatingly expressed in Remarks on the Saint Cuthbert of the Rev. James Raine, M.A., 12mo., Newcastle, 1828, ascribed to Dr. Lingard's pen, and more strongly in the Saint Cuthbert of the Rev. Charles (now archbishop) Eyre.

Lives of Cuthbert are to be found in nearly all the modern biographies of saints. There is much about him of great interest in Dr. Raine's North Durham, var. loc. [J. R.]

CUTHBERT (2) Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 740-758. He was a person of illustrious birth (Osbern, apud Angl. Sacr. ii. 75), and is first mentioned in a grant made by Ethelbert, king of Kent, to the monastery of Lyminge, in which he had been abbat (Codex Diplom. i. 103-4). In A.D. 736 he was consecrated bishop of Hereford, on the death of Wahlstod (Symeon, ed. Surtees, i. 13; Malmesbury, de Gestis Pontif. 8; Stubbs and Haddan, Councils, iii. 340, where the identity of the archbishop with the bishop of Hereford is shown). Whilst Cuthbert was at Hereford he completed the decoration of a rich cross which his predecessor had begun, and set up a monument to the prelates who had gone before him. He chronicled also his own good deeds in verse (Malmesbury, ut supra, 299). In A.D. 740 he was translated to Canterbury, and went to Rome to receive the pall. He obtained, at the same time, permission from the pope to have a cemetery within the walls of Canterbury, and to have himself and his successors interred within their own church, and not, as heretofore, in the church of SS. Peter and Paul, outside the city's wall (Gervase, apud Twysden, col. 1641).

The chief point in Cuthbert's archiepiscopate was the holding of the council of Clovesho, which was of vast importance to the English church (Wilkins, i. 86, etc.; and 2nd ed. iii. 362-376). This council, and the affairs of England in general, were matters of much interest to Geruany, and we find Boniface in correspondence with Ethelbald, king of Mercia, and Cuthbert, reproving the former for his vices, and holding friendly and respectful intercourse with the other (Bonifacii Epp. ed. Giles, i. 132-47). It has been generally thought that these letters of Boniface preceded and brought about the meeting at Clovesho, but it is evident from Mr. Stubbs's remarks that Boniface was the scholar instead of the teacher, and that the acts of the English synod were the guide and model of its counterpart in Germany (Councils, ed. Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 382-3).

It is plain that Cuthbert and Boniface were intimate friends. In A. D. 755, when Boniface was martyred, Cuthbert wrote a long letter to Lullus, archbishop of Mentz, on the glory that had accrued to the church by his death, and stating that the English church had resolved to keep his anniversary (Bonifacii Epp. ed. Giles, i. 218-223). Three years after this, on Oct. 26, 758, Cuthbert died. The circumstances of his interment were remarkable. It has been mentioned before that Cuthbert had obtained permission for the burial of the archbishops in their own cathedral church. This was certain to provoke much contention, and Cuthbert's design was to prevent it, and he succeeded. The bell tolled for the archbishop's decease, and the monks of St. Augustine's (SS. Peter and Paul) came in procession to the palace to carry off the body of the deceased prelate and inter it in their church. They now heard that Cuthbert had died three days before. A stone coffin had been carried into the palace, and the canons had quietly borne the corpse to its grave in Christ's church at midnight. The scene of triumph and rage may be easily imagined (Thorn, ed. Twysden, coll. 1772-3).

Cuthbert was a benefactor to Canterbury as well as to Hereford, building there a basilica, which was dedicated to St. John Baptist (Gervase, col. 1641). He had also some little claim to be considered a poet. Two short metrical pieces of his are preserved (Malmesbury, de Gestis Pontif. 299). Leland also says that he saw in the library of Malmesbury abbey a volume of Cuthbert's epigrams, which is now missing. It was probably from this very copy that William of Malmesbury extracted the specimens of his verse.

Wharton (Angl. Sacr. ii. 72) prints a few lines of a metrical life of Cuthbert by some nameless bard, the original of which is in the library at Lambeth (Hardy's Catalogue, i. pt. ii. 483). They are of little merit. (See also Hook's Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, and Wright, Biogr. Brit. 1st series, 305-8.) [J. R.]

CUTHBERT (3) Abbat of Malmesbury, appointed by his predecessor Ethelard, on his accession to the see of Winchester at some period between A. D. 766 and A. D. 778. William of Malmesbury in his Gesta Pontificum erased six lines immediately following the mention of Cuthbert and it is thought that the passage originally contained strictures upon this abbat. His name occurs in the body of a charter of king Egferth, granting land at Purton in Wiltshire to his abbey, and it is he probably (Hadd. and Stubbs), who first of the four abbats of the diocese of Winchester attests the act of the council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803. (Malm. G. P. lib. v. § 235; Kemble, C. D. Nos. 174, 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 546, and note; Willis, Mit.

Abbeys, i. 137; Monast. Anglic. i. 255; Birch, Fast. Monast. 59.) [C. H.]

CUTHBERT (4) Abbat of Jarrow and Wearmouth, sæc. viii. He was a disciple of Bede, and it is to his pathetic letter to Cuthwine that we owe our knowledge of the last days and hours of that great scholar (Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. i. cap. xv.; Hardy's Cat. i. pt. i. 455-6). Cuthbert is said to have succeeded Hwethberht as abbat. Among the letters of Boniface is one addressed by that saint to Cuthbert, asking for copies of some of the works of Bede (Epp. ed. Giles, p. 86). Cuthbert was also a correspondent of Lullus, archbishop of Mentz, to whom he gave a copy of Bede's treatise on the Building of the Temple (ibid. 241, 250). There is no letter addressed to Cuthbert among Alcuin's Epistles, although there are two to Aethelbald and Friduin, his successors. They were, no doubt, acquainted, as Alcuin says, that his name had been for some time inscribed in the Album or Liber Vitæ of Jarrow and Wearmouth (Epp. ed. Jaffé, 839, 841.) [J. R.]

CUTHBRITHA (Annales de Derleze, quoted in Monast. Anglic. ii. 89), foundress of Wimburn Abbey. [CUTHBURG.]

CUTHBURG (CUDBURG, CUDBURH, CUTHBRITHA, CUTHBURGA), sister of Ina king of Wessex, foundress and first abbess of Wimburn. She was first the wife of Aldfrid king of Northumbria (A. S. C. Flor. Wig., Gaimar; Egfrid, as Henr. Hunt. says), but they separated, and as Florence relates, "pro amore Dei." Before she became abbess of Wimburn, but after renouncing the married life, she was a nun at Barking under the abbess Hildelitha, according to William of Malmesbury (G. R. ed. Hardy, vol. i. p. 49). She must have erected her monastery at Wimburn (as to which various dates are assigned) before A. D. 705, since it is mentioned in a letter of that date by Aldhelm bishop of Sherborne, as a monastery near the river Wenburnia, presided over by Cuthburga the king's sister (Aldhelm. Opp. p. 355, ed. Giles, 1844, Pat. Eccles. Angl.; also in the Patrol., tom. lxxxix. p. 103). Her sister Cuenburh, or Quenburga, is said to have been co-foundress with her, and both were buried at Wimburn. [CUENBURI.] Her memory was observed Aug. 31. An account of "Cuthburga Regina et Abbatissa Wimburnensis" occurs in the Acta SS. (Aug. vi. 696), also in Capgrave (N. L. A. f. 79). Hardy remarks that all the trustworthy information that has reached us respecting her and her sisters Cuenburh, Eadburga, and Tetta, is to be found in the Acta SS. Ord. Sanct. Bened. iii. 42, ed. Venet. He also gives an account of a MS. (Vita S. Cuthburgae Reginae et Virginis), which consists almost wholly of a dialogue between herself and Aldfrid (whom she terms "supra modernos reges literarum eruditus scientiâ"), and an exhortation she addressed to her nuns shortly before her death. (A. S. C. and Flor. Wig. Chron., ad an. 718; Henr. Hunt. Hist. in M. II. B. 724; Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1668, M. H. B. 784; Higd. Polych., Gale, xv. Scriptt. 247; Hutchins, Hist. Dorset. 2nd ed. ii. 531; Monast. Anglic. ii. 88, 89; Birch, Fast. Monast. 59.) The Monast. Angl. (i. 436) notices that Lysons (Enrir. Lond. iv. 62, 63) enumerating Cuthburga among the abbesses of Barking "from Mr. Lethieullier's MS." has no warrant of William of Malmesbury. That "MS." was in fact a history of Barking drawn up by Mr. Lethieullier himself, and not any ancient document. The story of Cuthburg and her sister has a very suspicious resemblance in two or three particulars to that of Cyniburga and her sister.

CUTHBYRHT (A. S. C. p. 41, Thorpe), archbishop of Canterbury. [CUTHBERT.] [C. H.]

CUTHFRITH. The twelfth bishop of Lichfield, counted from Diuma (Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 623). The Northumbrian annals, preserved by Simeon of Durham, place his ordination in the year 765 (Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 663); and his name, "Cautfert episcopus" appears among the witnesses of a charter of Offa, dated 767 (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. No. 116). Berhtun, his successor, appears first in 774, but the Lichfield chronologist states the length of Cuthfrith's episcopate at three or four years; and one MS. of Florence of Worcester, dates his death in 769; (Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 544; Ang. Sac. i. 428.) [S.]

CUTHGISLUS, CUTHGILS, son of Ceolwulf, and brother of Cyneigils king of Wessex. (A. S. C. and Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 674; Flor. Wig. Genual. Reg. W. Sar. in M. H. B. 633; Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, i. 45.) [C. H.]

CUTHMANUS, ST., Cutmanus, or Cutmen, confessor, of Stenuinga or Steyning, in Sussex. The period at which he lived is uncertain, and has been supposed to have been as late in the 9th or 10th century. He was a native of England, the Bollandists say of the south of England, but others of Cornwall. In his youth he acted as his father's shepherd and herdsman. While tending his flocks he exercised unceasing prayer, which was prompted by his simplicity, humility and obedience. The accounts of him all speak of his wonderful spirituality. A somewhat quaint story is related of him. One day when he set free the oxen with which he was ploughing, so that they might go to the meadow, they were driven away and locked up by two boys, whose mother had heard the lowing. St. Cuthmanus, when he knew of it, seized the two boys, placed the yoke round their necks, and made them work instead of the oxen, so that the mark of the yoke remained on their necks till the day of their death. Their mother, it is said, died suddenly of fright.

After his father's death Cuthman and his mother were reduced to great poverty, and he went about begging with her.

He ultimately settled down at Stenuinga, Steyning, in Sussex, at the foot of Chanctonbury Ring, one of the highest of the South Downs. This parish, and that of Rye, were bestowed by Edward the Confessor to the abbey of Fécamp in Normandy, which had made the Bollandists suppose that the Stanninga or Estaninges of the martyrologists to be somewhere in Normandy, and that Cuthman died there. It is not likely that he ever left Sussex. Having made a vow to build a church, the site was there miraculously pointed out to him, and he built one, which rose to great honour. He is locally connected with the well-known legend of the Devil's Dyke, which is given at length in Ainsworth's Ovingdean Grange.

He is commemorated on the 8th of February. (AA. SS. Boll. Feb. ii. pp. 197-199; Butler's Lives of the Saints.) [D. R. J.]

CUTHRED (1) (ÆDREDUS in Henr. Hunt., in M. H. B. 716, GUDRET in Gaimar), son of Cuichelm certainly, and most probably grandson of Cyneigils king of Wessex, in which case he was nephew of kings Coinwalch and Centwine. But as authorities are not entirely in accord as to prince Cuthred's position in his family, the following details are offered. That he was the son of Cuichelm all agree (A. S. C. ad ann. 648, 661; Flor. Wig. ad ann. 648, 661, and Genual. in M. H. B. 633); but the doubt is whether Cuichelm was the son or the brother of Cyneigils. The Saxon Chronicle makes him son (A. S. C. ad an. 648); Florence, son in some passages unambiguously (Flor. Wig. ad ann. 614, 628, Genual. in M. H. B. 633); in one passage (M. H. B. 529 c.) he is filius in the received text, but frater by another reading; in another passage (ad an. 661) Cuthred is nepos of Cyneigils and fratruelis of Coinwalch and Centwine. But as fratruelis is certainly cousin, nepos must be nephew. Cuthred is fratruelis of Coinwalch in another passage of Florence likewise (ad an. 648). In Henry of Huntingdon, Cuichelm is the son of Cyneigils in the received text (M. H. B. 715 b), but brother by a second reading; and in another place he is brother in the text (M. H. B. 716 b). William of Malmesbury (G. R. ed. Hardy, vol. i. 28) makes them brothers.

Cuthred accepted Christian baptism A.D. 639, which was four years after Cyneigils, and three after Cuichelm, had set the example; and from the same bishop, Birinus the apostle of Wessex, who at the font "received him to son" (A. S. C.). On each occasion the important event took place at Dorchester (A. S. C. ad ann. 635, 636, 639), the old Roman town north of the Thames, the original seat of the Wessex bishopric. In A.D. 648 Cuthred received from Coinwalch, whom he had assisted in recovering the kingdom of Wessex (Hen. Hunt. in M. H. B. 716), 3000 hides (A. S. C.) or prædia (Ethelw.) of land near Aecesdune (Ashdown, A. S. C. tr. in M. H. B.). He died A.D. 661, while Coinwalch was still reigning. (A. S. C. and Flor. Wig. Chron. ad ann. 639, 648, 661; Ethelwerd, Chron. in M. H. B. 506; Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 1361, 1362, in M. H. B. 781.)

[C. H.]

(2) Abbat, attests three charters of Ethelbald king of Mercia; one between A.D. 723-37; another of A.D. 742, issuing from a council at Clovesho; a third between A.D. 716-743 (Kemble, C. D. Nos. 83, 87, 89; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils. iii. 342 n.; Birch, Fasti Monast. 59). [C. H.]

CUTHRED (3) King of the West Saxons; he succeeded Ethelheard in 741, and reigned until 754 according to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, until 755 according to the more trustworthy authority of Simeon of Durham. His whole reign was a struggle against the great power of Ethelbald, king of Mercia, on the one hand, and the Britons on the other. In 743 he obtained the assistance of Ethelbald against the Britons; in 750 he had a struggle with one of his ealdormen, named Ethelhun; but three years after, in conjunction with Ethelhun, won a great victory over Ethelbald at Burford, which marks the point at which the West-Saxon power began its continuous rise. He died childless, his son Cynric having been killed by his followers, about 748. Cuthred was a traditional benefactor of Glastonbury and Malmesbury, but the grants which bear his name are mostly spurious (Kemble, C. Dipl. Nos. 93, 94); two grants to Winchester (ibid. Nos. 1006 and 1007) are less questionable. [S.]

It is related in Camden that an annual festival was for many ages celebrated at Burford, at which were carried about the figures of a dragon and a giant in memory of the victory gained by Cuthred at Battle-edge, near the town, over Ethelbald king of Mercia, whose banner bearing the device of a golden dragon was captured (Camd. ed. Gough, i. 293). Henry of Huntingdon, however, assigns the golden dragon to Wessex. The event occurred in A.D. 752, near the borders of Gloucestershire. The battle with the Britons or "Welsh" is recorded in the Saxon Chronicle (ad an. 753) without remark, but Gaimar says the West Saxons were defeated (Estorie, v. 1803, M. H. B. 786). This reign still furnishes nothing of any interest for the church history of Wessex. Of the two sees into which the nation was now divided, Winchester was occupied by Daniel, Hunferth, Cyneheard; Sherborn by Hereward. Cuthbert was the archbishop of Canterbury. Cuthred was succeeded by Sigebert. Other varieties of the name are CUDRED and GUDRET. [C. H.]

(4) King of Kent, appointed on the fall of Eadbert Praen, by Cynewulf or Kenulf, king of Mercia, about 798; he died in 805, or more probably in 807. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 566.) [S.]

The archbishop of this reign was Ethelhard principally, and Wulfred after Aug. 3, 805; the bishops of Rochester, Weremund and Beormund, whose period somewhat corresponded (Stubbs, Regist.). The history of the reign, both secular and ecclesiastical, is to be studied in close connexion with Mercia, to which the Kentish crown was now subject. Kent was in fact fast verging to its fall. Cuthred reigned "solo nomine" (Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, i. 25), and after one more succession the kingdom ceased, absorbed however not by Mercia but by Wessex. The establishment of an archbishopric at Lichfield threatened to transfer Kent's spiritual honour likewise to Mercia, but Ethelhard lived to see that danger pass. The troubles of the reign elicited some interesting letters from Alcuin to Ethelhard, and though these illustrate for the most part the Church of England at large, as represented by the see of Canterbury, and would therefore be out of place to notice here, there are a few passages of more local application, and as they bear on the church in Kent we may refer to them. Thus in a letter of A.D. 797 to the nobles and clergy urging them to recall their archbishop, who had deserted his charge, and warning them of their dangers from the northern invaders, Alcuin especially presses upon the clergy the study of holy Scripture; to give over adorning themselves "vanitate vestimentorum," contrary to the custom of the church; to shew nobility and ornament in their character; to be equipped and ready in the preaching of God's word; by which means their laity and their men of war would be rendered strong, and their flock walk in the way of salvation (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 509, 510). In the following year, A.D. 798, returning to the same subject, Alcuin entreats the archbishop to expel both from himself his clergy "vanissimum vestimentorum cultum," and to which he likewise adds, "Conviviorum immoderatum usum;" and again he charges him to attend to a revival of the reading of the sacred Scriptures (ibid. 520). In A.D. 802 while saying "silentium in sacerdotibus pernicies est populi," he hints that they had been previously restrained from the liberty of preaching (ibid. 540); the fear of earthly power had kept them silent (ib. 553), and we may conclude that Mercian policy had kept a vigilant eye upon the clergy of Kent. Other public documents shew the see of Canterbury recovering its ground in temporalities (ib. 512), and the king himself endowing it (ib. 558). No monastic foundations in Kent are attributed to this reign (Birch, East. Monast. 7, 8); but we observe that the cathedral monastery receives a gift from the archbishop (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 555). On the chronology of the reign see ib. 559, note. Cuthred was the brother of Cynewulf or Kenulf king of Mercia according to Lappenberg (Hist. Anglo-Sax. stemma i. 191), who however gives no proof of it. Florence of Worcester's genealogy of the Mercian royal family (M. H. B. 630, 638) omits him where he appears in Lappenberg. He was succeeded by Baldred (Flor. Wig. Chron. App. M. H. B. 635; Henr. Hunt. M. H. B. 734; Gul. Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, i. 25). Other forms of his name are CUDRED and CUDRET. [C. H.]

CUTHRED (5) The only abbat from the diocese of Hereford attesting an act of the council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803. Of the monasteries of the period in that diocese nothing is known. (Kemble, C. D. No. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546, and note; Birch, Fasti Monast. 59.) [C. H.]

(6) Presbyter, attests a charter of Cuthred king of Kent, Aug. 805 (Kemble, C. D. 190.) [C. H.]

CUTHUINUS (Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, 148), bishop of Dunwich. [CUTHWIN.] [C. H.]

CUTHWIN (1) The first bishop of Leicester, who was appointed in 679 by archbishop Theodore when the Mercian dioceses were divided. He is not mentioned by Bede; and Florence of Worcester makes him bishop of Lichfield (M. H. B. 622), but the ancient lists of bishops place him at Leicester. Nothing else is known about him. (Councils, &c., Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 128.) [S.]

CUTHWIN (2) Monk at Jarrow, disciple of Bede, addressed by his fellow disciple Cuthbert on the death of their master. [CUTHBERT.] [C. H.]

(3) The eighth bishop of Dunwich, in the ancient lists (Mon. Hist. Brit. 618). His date falls about the middle of the 8th century, but is not exactly determined. [S.]

CUTSUIDA (CUDSUIDA), abess. A charter of Oshere king of the Wiccii, about A.D. 692, grants land "ad construendum monasterium Cutsuida abbatisa" (Kemble, C. D. No. 36; Hickes, Thesaur. i. 169). Another charter (A.D. 704-709) by Aethelheard and Aethelweard of the Wicell, grants her free possession of land of five "mansions" and named Ingin, which she had purchased of them for 600 solidi (C. D. No. 53; Hickes, l. c.; Monast. Anglic. i. 585). These charters having been preserved at Worcester (Hickes, Thes. ii. 300) among others having reference to the monastery there (Mon. Angl. l. c.), leads to the inference that Cutsuida was abbess of Worcester (Birch, Fasti Monast. 59), or at any rate that her monastery was one afterwards amalgamated with that house. [C. H.]

CUTULF, abbat of Evesham in a MS. list of abbats preserved by Dugdale. He succeeds Tyldbrith, who is undated, and precedes Aldmund, who held office A.D. 783 or 787 (Monast. Anglic. ii. 2; Birch, Fasti Monast. 59). [C. H.]

CUTZUPITAE, St. Augustine, Ep. 53 (165), describes the Donatists worshipping at Rome as known by the names Montenses or Cutzupitae; on which we have a various reading "Cutrupitae." Elsewhere (De Unitate Eccl. 6) he repeats this statement, but there we have the various reading "Rupitae," which would be intelligible, but would not account for the other forms. The name was probably derived from the place at Rome where these schismatics held their meetings, and "Cutrupitae" seems as good a guess as we can make as to its original form. It is probably the same name that is intended by "Cotopitae" (Isid. Hisp. Orig. VIII. vi. 54) and by "Gotispitae," (Pseud. Hieron. Haer. 32); these two writers describing the appellation as given to the Circumcelliones. We may dismiss the conjectures "Corrupitae" (Baronius) and Scototopici (Cotelier, Ecc. Graec. Monum. i. 789). The name does not appear to have any connexion with the "Campitae" of St. Jerome. (Adv. Lucifer. sub fin.) [G. S.]

CUUTFERT (Kemble, C. D. No. 116, A.D. 767), bishop. [CUTHFRITH.] [C. H.]

CWENBURH (A. S. C. ad an. 618), sister of Ina king of Wessex. [CUENBURH.] [C. H.]

CWICHELM (A. S. C. ad an. 626, edd. Ingram, M. H. B., Thorpe), king of Wessex. [CUTICHELM.] [C. H.]

CWYFEN, Welsh saint of the 7th century, founder of Llangwyfen in Denbighshire; patron of Tudweilig in Carnarvonshire and of Llangwyfen, a chapel under Treflraeth in Anglesey; commemorated on June 3 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 304). [C. H.]

CWYLLOG, wife of Mordred the nephew of Arthur, reputed founder of Llangwyllog in Anglesey (Rees, Welsh Saints, 228). [C. H.]

CYBAR (CIBAR, EPARCHIUS), anchorite near Angoulême. Butler thus spells the name, but the other works cited below, give Eparchius, Mabillon giving Cibar as a marginal note. He at first entered the monastery of Sedaciac in Perigord, under abbat Martin, but afterwards secluded himself in a cell near Angoulême, where he was patronised by Aptonius II. the bishop of Angoulême, who ordained him priest. As he became popular and disciples flocked to him for instruction, a monastery at length sprung up.

It was not an uncommon thing for the hermit thus to pioneer the way for a monastery. Having occupied his cell for thirty-nine years he died July 1, 581. He was commemorated July 1. (Butler, Lives of the Saints, July 1; Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Ben. i. 252, ed. Venet. 1733; Gallia Christ. ii. 978, 979.) [C. H.]

CYBI (CHEBIUS, KEBIUS), a cousin of St. David, but some years younger. The name is pronounced Kubby. He was present at the synod of Brefi, and his memory near Llanddewi Brefi, the place where it was held, is preserved in the name of the church of Llangybi. The churches of Llangybi near Caerleon and Llangybi in Carnarvonshire were founded by him. He is especially distinguished as founder of a society at Caerdybi or Holyhead in Anglesey. As presiding over this he was styled, according to the practice of the times, a bishop, though he never had authority over a diocese. The day of his commemoration is given as Nov. 6 by Professor Rice Rees (Welsh Saints, 266), but as Nov. 8 by Mr. W. J. Rees (Cambro-Brit. Saints, 495). See also Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 9, 143 n. 157 n. 159, 161; E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 500, 513; Ussher, Ant. Brit. wks. v. 116, vi. 339, Chron. Index. [C. H.]

CYFEILACH, bishop of Glamorgan, killed A.D. 756 (Brut y Twysog. as edited in Myvyr. Archaiol. of Wales, ii. 473; Haddan and Stubbs, i. 147). [C. H.]

CYFYW AB CWYNLLYW, Welsh saint of the 6th century, patron of Llangyfyw near Caerleon (Rees, Welsh Saints, 233). [C. H.]

CYHELYN, 9th metropolitan of Caerleon, according to the Iolo Manuscripts of E. Williams (Stubbs, Regist. 154). [C. H.]

CYLINNIUS, a Gallic bishop, addressed in conjunction with bishop Proculus by Augustine "and the other fathers of Africa." The letter begs them to receive back Leporius, who had been banished for Pelagian opinions, but had changed his mind. (St. August. Episc. Epistol. Classis iii. num. 219, Patrol. Lat. xxxiii. p. 991). [W. M. S.]

CYMATIUS, bishop of Gabala, or perhaps Paltus, in Syria Prima, A.D. 341-362. It is supposed that he was one of the bishops who assisted Lucifer, bishop of Cagliari, in his sudden consecration of Paulinus, presbyter of Antioch, chief of the Eustathian party. (Hieron. Chron. ad ann. 366, note i., Patrol. Lat. xxvii. p. 692; Ceillier, iv. 245.) [W. M. S.]

CYMUULFUS, king of the West Saxons, died A.D. 757 (Bede, H. E. Contin. ad an. ed. Moberly). See CYNEULFUS. [C. H.]

CYMWLF (Sim. Dun. ad an. 780, M. H. B. 665), bishop of Lindisfarne. [CYNEULF.] [C. H.]

CYN-. See also CUN-, KIN-, KYN-.

CYNAN, 6th metropolitan of Caerleon, according to Williams's Iolo Manuscripts (Stubbs, Regist. 154). [C. H.]

CYNBRYD, Welsh saint of the 5th century, founder of Llanddulas in Denbighshire, slain by the Saxons at Bwlch Cynbryd; commemorated March 19 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 144). [C. H.]

CYNDEYRN, son of Arthog ab Ceredig, Welsh saint of the 6th century, patron of Llan-gydeyrn, formerly subject to Llandyfaelog in Carmarthenshire; commemorated on July 25 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 211). [C. H.]

CYNDEYRN (Rees, Welsh Saints, 261; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 144, 150, 157; E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 498). [KENTIGERN.] [C. H.]

CYNDDILIG, Welsh saint of the 6th century, commemorated on Nov. 1 in the parish of Llanhystud in Cardiganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 281). [C. H.]

CYNE-. See also CYNI-.

CYNEBERHT (1), CYNIBERCT, the fourth bishop of the Lindisfari, in the see of Sidnacester. He is mentioned by Bede as bishop at the time at which the historian wrote his ecclesiastical history, that is, in 731. As his predecessor Eadgar attested the presumed genuine charter of Evesham in 706 (Cod. Dipl. No. 56) and his successor Alwig was consecrated by archbishop Tatwin in 733 (Sim. Dun.), the date of Cynebert must fall between these two limits. If the act of the council of Clovesho of 716 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 300), which is signed by Eadgar, be genuine, the date of Cynebert is still more nearly fixed. It was from him that Bede received his information on the ecclesiastical history of Lindsey. [S.]

(2), KINBERT, CUNIBERCT, the twelfth bishop of Winchester. He was present at the legatine synod of 787, in the record of which his name appears as Chaubrechus (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 461). His attestation appears in numerous charters from 787 onwards, the last in 801. In 799, according to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, he went to Rome with the archbishop; but the journey belongs to the year 801 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 533). As his successor Almund appears in 803, Cyneberht probably remained or died abroad. He was a friend of Alcuin, who addressed to him an extant letter (ed. Jaffé, No. 130), in which he mentions having met him in a synod, probably during his visit to England, 790-793. [S.]

CYNEBERHTUS (Kemble, C. D. No. 100, A. D. 755-757), abbat. [CUMBERTUS.] [C. H.]

CYNEBRYHT (A. S. C. ad an. 799, M. H. B. 340), bishop of Winchester. [CYNEBERT.] [C. H.]

CYNEBURH, -BURGA (A. S. C. ad an. 657, M. H. B. 315; Flor. Wig. Geneal. Reg. Merc. M. H. B. 630), daughter of Penda and queen of Northumbria. [CYNIBURGA.] [C. H.]

CYNEDRID, -DRYD, -DRYTHA, -DRITHA (Edd. Vit. Wulf. c. 63; Liber Vitae Eccles. Dunel. Surt. Soc. 1841, various entries; Birch, Fasti Monast. 59, 60), abess. [CYNETHRITH.] [C. H.]

CYNEDRITHA (Kemble, C. D. No. 151), queen of Mercia. [CYNETHRITHA.] [C. H.]

CYNEGILS (KINEGILS), the first Christian king of the West Saxons. He was the son of Ceol, or Ceolric, succeeded his uncle Ceolwulf in 611, and reigned until 643. The early years of his reign were occupied in the consolidation of the West-Saxon dominion. Having admitted his son Cuichelm to a share of sovereignty, he gained with his assistance a great victory over the Britons at Bampton (A. S. C. 614). In 626 the two kings seem to have engaged in a struggle for the supremacy in Britain, which brought them into collision with each of the other powers. After being defeated by Edwin, king of Northumbria, whom Cuichelm had attempted to poison (Bed. H. E. ii. 9), they won a great victory over the kings of the East Saxons, and in 628 fought a drawn battle with Penda at Cirencester. In 635, under the influence of Oswald of Northumbria, who was about to marry his daughter, he was converted and baptized by Birinus, to whom he gave the town of Dorchester, in Oxfordshire, as his episcopal see. He died in 643. (H. Hunt., M. H. B. 716; A. S. Chr.; Will. Malmesb. G. R. i. § 18.) [S.]

For Beandune or Beamdune the Monumenta hesitatingly suggests either Bampton in North-east Devon or Bindon in East Dorset near Wareham (M. H. B. 306, and Index Geogr. 977). That the Saxon arms could have got so far west as the former at that early date is difficult to think, when we remember that the Britons hotly engaged them in Wiltshire at Bradford on the Avon in A. D. 652 (A. S. C. ad an.), and that only in A. D. 658 did Coinwalch succeed in driving them into the middle of Somerset. Beandune differs but slightly (dun and tun being often interchanged) from Benetune, as Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. 730) writes for Benesington or Benson, and this spot would be somewhat tempting were it not so far east. Yet the Britons, dwelling as they long continued to do (cf. E. A. Freeman, Old Engl. Hist. 39, 40, 65, and map, p. 38) in the midst of the Saxon conquests, might have struck a blow for an ancient possession of some importance (cf. CUTRED of Wessex). Wherever the battle was fought it was a hotly-contested one, as "two thousand and sixty-five Welshmen" were slain (A. S. C. ad an.).

When Cynegils solemnly accepted the Christian religion at Dorchester in 635 he was giving his adherence to a growing cause. During his own reign he had seen the northern kingdoms submit to it, first under Edwin, and now again under Oswald; and the kings of the north were almost kings of England among the minor states of the heptarchy. He himself had been chastised by Edwin in 626 (A. S. C. ad an.). Oswald had just by a signal victory (A. D. 634) crushed Caedwalla and his Britons in the north, and kept the Mercian Penda in subjection. A marriage alliance with Northumbria was therefore something for a king of Wessex to be proud of. But Oswald's zeal for the continued advance of the Christian religion was no secret. The cross at Heavenfield in 634 must have been heard of everywhere, and in 635, the year when Cynegils was baptized, Aidan was established at Lindisfarne. It does not appear that Cynegils as a pagan had obstructed the mission of Birinus which was now in its early struggles; but neither had he done anything to originate or to support it. There was no Christian queen-consort in this case, and Birinus had to labour independently of the royal family. This circumstance distinguishes the West Saxon apostolate, and adds greatly to the interest of Oswald's appearance as a sponsor at Dorchester, now in the second year of Birinus's labours (A. S. C. ad an. 635). The court scene is not described, and must be left to imagination; but the simple fact of the two kings standing together in such a relation is unique among the royal conversions of the heptarchy. One little touch of colour, however, drops in from the phraseology of the period. Oswald, in answering for the faith of his fellow-king and future father-in-law, "received him to son" (Bede, H. E. iii. 7). If Drogo's Life of Oswald is of sufficient authority, and the probability of the thing is almost enough, we may imagine the zealous Bretwalda as actively assisting in the conversion of the West Saxons, commending to them by personal exhortations the royal converts' example. To complete the picture, there was the Roman town itself, then retaining much of its old importance and appearance, traces of which still survive (as does a fine old church) to dignify the cradle of Wessex Christianity.

On this occasion Dorchester was given to Birinus for the seat of his bishopric, which had hitherto been exercised among the people without any fixed centre. It was here as in all other kingdoms of the heptarchy, whencesoever the missionary bishop might have been invested with his spiritual authority as a messenger to souls, it was the king alone who fixed the see. But it is a noticeable circumstance that Oswald substantially participated with Cyneigils in the disposal of this Wessex town. Both kings, as Bede expressly words it, joined in the gift, and it illustrates the Bretwaldship, in this case the imperium, which the Northumbrian sovereign enjoyed (cf. Bede, H. E. iii. 6). The situation of Dorchester shews that Wessex under Cyneigils had made good its footing beyond the Thames, notwithstanding the event of A.D. 628 at Cirencester. The city remained the spiritual capital of Wessex for at least above forty years (see Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 127, and Smith's note at Bede, H. E. iii. 7), though it may not have been wholly lost to the Wessex nation until the capture of the neighbouring Benetune or Benson by the Mercians in A.D. 777 or 778. Its episcopal honours in the Mercian kingdom were continued, nor did they terminate before the Conquest.

Who shared the sacred rite at the first royal baptism of Wessex we are not told, and perhaps the silence is significant; but we know who did not; the king's crowned colleague Cuichelm declined, as did also prince Coinwalch. Nor are we even informed when and where it was that the princess gave herself to the church, nor when her marriage with Oswald took place.

The conversion of Cyneigils was an event of much importance in the progress of Christianity. It made the Christian crowns of the heptarchy now four to three, some thirty-eight years after Ethelbert had set the example to his brother kings. It brought much support to the little Christian kingdom of Kent, and diminished the isolation of the archiepiscopal see, which still remained cut off from the rest of Anglo-Saxon Christendom by the pagan East Saxons, South Saxons, and Mercians. Wessex, too, was isolated from the Christian states of its own blood; but the dominant nation of the island was in its alliance. A further importance of the Wessex conversion was in the new bearing it would produce towards the Christian Britons of the west, upon whom the Teutonic race was ever advancing still. The struggle for territorial predominance would at all events not now be further embittered by the wanton destruction of old native Christian foundations.

What may be called the ecclesiastical history of Wessex during the eight years that Cyneigils reigned as a Christian is soon told. Birinus retained the bishopric of the nation, and two more royal baptisms were celebrated at Dorchester, Cuichelm coming forward in 636 and Cuthred in 639, the last certainly, and both presumably, receiving the rite from Birinus himself, who received Cuthred to son. In this planting period of the Wessex church no synods are recorded, and no monastic foundations (see Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, for this period, iii. 90-93; and Birch, Fasti Monastici, 2, 3). In the archiepiscopal see was Honorius; but he was not likely to be brought into any sort of contact with Wessex. The archbishops of Canterbury, hemmed in by paganism all around, were scarcely more as yet than bishops of Kent. Birinus, moreover, did not receive his mission from the chair of Augustine, but came direct from abroad. Dorchester therefore is the one locality, the three royal baptisms all the definite events, that we associate with the name of Cyneigils as the first Christian king of Wessex. The Winchester annalist of the 13th century naturally allows us to see more of his own distinguished cathedral on this occasion. Cyneigils, he states, gave Dorchester to Birinus only until he had built a church worthy of so great a priest in the royal city, since it was there he designed to erect the chief church of the kingdom, for which he had collected vast materials at his death (Annal. Eccl. Wint. in Wharton, Anjl. Sac. i. 288). But if we are to believe Rudborne (Anjl. Sac. i. 190), Winchester Cathedral was finished in the sixth year of Cyneigils and furnished with monks, and Birinus dedicated it in honour of the Trinity in the twelfth year of his own apostolate. Milner (Hist. Winch. i. 92) says that Cyneigils was buried in the cathedral he had begun to erect; but the only authority he can give is that his name is inscribed as "founder" on one of the mortuary chests now in Winchester cathedral (ibid. ii. 47).

Of his children, Cuichelm died before him, Coinwalch and Centwine came to the crown. The daughter who was to become queen of Northumbria vanishes out of sight, and we do not even know her name. St. Egelwine or Eielwini was always maintained, says Malmesbury (G. P. ed. Hamilton, 199), to have been a son of Cyneigils. The family connexions are exhibited in Lappenberg's elaborate stemma (Anjl. Sac. Kings, transl. Thorpe, i. 286). The varieties of his name are CYNIGILS, CINEGILS, CINEGELS, CINEGILSUS, KINGILS, KINEGILSUS, KINEGILS, KENEGILZ. [C. H.]

CYNEGIUS (1) Prefect of the Praetorians at Rome, A.D. 384-390. In A.D. 384, the emperor Theodosius sent him a rescript at the request of Marcellinus and Faustinus, two presbyters of the Luciferian faction, enjoining that the Luciferians should have the same religious liberty as the Catholics, and highly praising some of their representatives. The 7th and 8th letters of

Gregory of Nyssa are addressed to this Cynegius, in behalf of Synesius and Alexander, two accused persons. (Rescript. Theod. ap. Sirmond, i. p. 262, Patrol. Graec. xlv.; Greg. Nyss. Epist. 7, 8, p. 1035; Ceillier, v. 154, vi. 219.) [W. M. S.]

CYNEGIUS (2) Son of a lady of great piety, named Flora, who had him buried in the church of St. Felix at Nola. Her inquiry of Paulinus, bishop of Nola, what benefit the dead would obtain by burial near a saint, was the occasion, in A. D. 421 or at latest 424, of St. Augustine's book, De Cura pro Mortuis. Paulinus had referred the question to Augustine (August. lib. de Cura pro Mort. and De Octo Dilecti Quæstionibus, ii. 2, Patrol. Lat. xl. 156, 591; Ceillier, x. 53).

[W. M. S.]

(3) A count of the 5th century, addressed by Firmus, archbishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, in his fourth letter. Firmus exhorts him to fulfil his promise of visiting his mother church of Caesarea, and, in spite of his great age, promises him his earlier health if he will come. (Patrol. Graec. lxxvii. p. 1483, Firm. Caes. Episc. Epist. 4; Ceillier, x. 150.)

[W. M. S.]

CYNEGYSLUS (Kemble, C. D. No. 1002), abbat. [CENGILLUS.] [C. H.]

CYNEHEARD, KINEHARD, the eighth bishop of Winchester in the ancient lists (Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 619). According to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle he was appointed in 754, and his name is found appended to charters from 755 to 759, and to one of questionable authenticity as late as 766 (Kemble, C. D. No. 115). Ethelheard, his successor, first appears in 778; but there is some reason to think that the list is confused owing to the identification of bishop Ethelheard with the archbishop of that name. [ETHELHEARD.] His death is placed by some MSS. of Florence in 788, but this is disproved by the appearance of his fourth successor, Cyneberht, at the Legatine Council of 787 (Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 543). [CYNEBERHT.] Two letters of Cyneheard to Lullus are preserved among the letters of Boniface (Mon. Mojuntina, ed. Jaffé, Nos. 110, 121). [S.]

CYNEHEARD, -HARD (CINEHARD, CHENEHART, KENEHARD, KENEHERT, KINEHARDUS, KINEARD, KYNHEARD), etheling, brother of SIGEBERT king of Wessex, by whose successor Cynewulf he was driven into exile. Cynewulf having gone to the vill of Merton on account of a certain woman, Cyneheard and his followers attacked him there, and in the fray which ensued, both the king and the etheling were slain. This tragedy, which is related in much detail, occurred A. D. 784, according to the Sax. Chron., but A. D. 786 according to Simeon of Durham. Cyneheard was buried at Axminster. (A. S. C. ad an. 755; Flor. Wig. Chron. n. ad an. 784; Ethelwerd, Chron. M. H. B. 508, 509; Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 1821 sq.; M. II. B. 786; Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. M. II. B. 731, 734; Sim. Dun. G. R. A. M. H. B. 666.) [C. II.]

CYNEHEARDUS, presbyter, attesting a donation by Dunuudal to the church of St. Peter and St. Paul (afterwards St. Augustine) at Canterbury (Kemble, C. D. No. 109). [C. H.]

CYNESWITH (Flor. Wig. Geneal. Regg. Merc., M. H. B. 630), queen of Mercia. [CYNWISE.] [C. H.]

CYNESWITHA, CYNESUITH, CYNESUITH, KINESWITHA, daughter of Penda the pagan king of Mercia and his queen Cyneswith or Cynwise. She and her sister Cyneburga were reckoned as saints, and of their five brothers, Peada, Wulfhere, Ethelred, Merewald, Merce-linus, all of whom were baptized, and all were kings, the three last were also reckoned saints. She had been betrothed to Offa king of the East Angles, a most attractive young man, but gave him up in order to follow the monastic life. It was at her persuasion that Offa went to Rome in A. D. 709. She became a nun in her sister's convent, "Kineburgae castrum," or "Castre." Both the sisters were present at the hallowing of Medeshamstede (afterwards called Peterborough) in the reign of their brother Wulfhere, and their names are attached to his charters. They were both buried in their own convent, and in the 11th century their remains were removed to Peterborough. (A. S. C. ad ann. 657; Flor. Wig. Chron. App., M. H. B. 637, 638, and Geneal. Reg. Merc. ibid. 630; Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, i. 108, 139; Matt. West. F. H. ad an. 705; Capgrave, N. L. A. f. 213; Acta SS. March, i. 441.) [C. H.]

CYNETHRITH, an abbess of some religious house belonging to bishop Wilfrid. In A. D. 709 she received the silk robe on which his dead body had been laid, and through which a miracle is said to have been wrought (Eddius, Vita S. Wilfridi, cap. lxx.). The name occurs more than once in the Liber Vitæ of Durham. [J. R.]

CYNETHRITHA, CYNETHRYTH (KYNETHRYTH, KINETHRITHA), wife of Offa king of Mercia, mother of Egferth, who succeeded his father, and of two daughters. Eadburga wife of Brihtric king of Wessex, and Alfritha unmarried. She and her son attest a charter of the regulus Uhtred, A. D. 770, and another of Offa, A. D. 772 (perhaps should be 762). At her persuasion, A. D. 792 (A. S. C.; or 793, Flor. Wig.) Offa caused Aegilbert, king of the East Angles, to be decapitated. (A. S. C. ad an. 792; Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 793, and Append. in M. H. B. 638; Kemble, C. D. Nos. 118, 119.) [C. H.]

CYNEUALC, -UUALC (Kemble, C. D. No. 985), king of Wessex. [COINWALCH.] [C. II.]

CYNEULFUS (Flor. Wig. Chron. in M. H. B. 541), CYNEWLFUS (ed. Thorpe, vol. i. 50), etheling. [CYNEWULF.] [C. H.]

CYNEULFUS (Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 739), bishop of Lindisfarne. [CYNEWULF.] [C. H.]

CYNEULF, CYNEWULF, -WLFUS (CYNEULFUS, CYNEULF, CYNWULF, CYMWLF, CONULFUS, CONULFUS, CONWULFUS, CINEWLFUS, CHENEWLF, KIMULF, KINEULFUS), bishop of Lindisfarne. Succeeded Ethelwold (A. D. 740, according to Sim. Dun., Bed. Contin.; A. D. 739, according to Flor. Wig.; A. D. 737, according to A. S. C.). Resigned A. D. 780 (Sim. Dun. A. D. 779 or 780, A. S. C.). Died A. D. 783 (Sim. Dun., adding in the 40th year of his episcopate;

A.D. 782, Bed. Contin.; A.D. 781, Flor. Wig.) He was succeeded by Higbald, and nothing further is recorded of him. (See also Henr. Hunt. in M. H. B. 727; Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 267; Stubbs, Registrum, 6, 181.) [C. H.]

CYNEUULF (Kemble, C. D. No. 104), king. [C. H.]

CYNEWEALH (Wend. F. H. ed. Cox, Index), king of Wessex. [COINWALCH.]

CYNEWULF, king of the West Saxons; succeeded in 755 or 756, and reigned according to the best authority until 786. His reign thus coincides with the greater part of that of Offa, whose glory has altogether overshadowed that of Cynewulf, and who, by the victory won over the West Saxons at Bensington, in 777, drove him finally south of the Thames, and placed the ancient settlement of Dorchester in the hands of Mercia. Cynewulf and his bishops wrote after the death of Boniface to renew with Lullus a league for mutual prayer, which they had made with his predecessor. He was traditionally a benefactor of the churches of Wells, Malmesbury, and Tisbury (Kemble, C. D., Nos. 103, 104, 115), and a genuine charter of Cynewulf to his gesith, Bica, is preserved (ibid. No. 133). Cynewulf lived long enough to receive the papal legates, George and Theophylact, in 786, and joined with Offa in welcoming them; but he was killed the same year by his ealdorman Cyneheard, who surprised him during a visit to his mistress (A. S. C. 784; H. Hunt. in Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 731). [S.]

The accession of Cynewulf, which followed the brief reign of Sigebert, synchronises with the commencement of the Northumbrian disorders after the abdication of Eadbert [CEOLWULF]. Interest thenceforth centres in the other two great powers, Mercia and Wessex, for the future of England lay in one of those. Benesington, Bensington, Benson, or Benetune, with its British name, called by Henry of Huntingdon a "castrum" (M. H. B. 730), was a strong frontier post south of the Thames, commanding a Roman road which there crossed the river; and Dorchester, with its Roman termination, occupied a corresponding position four miles up the stream on the opposite side. Wessex had won the former town from the Britons two centuries before (A. S. C. ad an. 571). A great struggle for the possession of it now ensued between the rival powers across the Thames, and Offa's ultimate triumph is recorded by the ancient writers in language of much emphasis. The event is dated A.D. 778 by Florence, but A.D. 777 in the Saxon Chronicle (see also Ethelwerd, Chron. in M. H. B. 509; Hen. Hunt. Hist. in M. H. B. 730. For the antiquities of Bensington see Camden, ed. Gough, 292, 308). Offa now had a footing south of the Thames similar to what Wessex had so long held by means of Dorchester on the north. But besides this formidable antagonist, Guthred had to maintain the standing contest with the West, respecting which we read strong general language, such as, "Britones saepissime roellis detrivit permaximis" (Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 755), but no definite events. Coming to ecclesiastical affairs, we find that the see of Winchester during this reign was occupied by Cyneheard, Ethelhard, Egbald, Dudda, Cynebert; CHRIST. BIOGR.

and Sherborn by Hereward and Ethelmod. The archbishops of Canterbury were Cuthbert, Bregwin, Jaenbert (Stubbs, Regist.). From the church matters recorded in Haddan and Stubbs for this period (Councils, iii. 396-443), we judge that the influence of Wessex does not equal that of Mercia. The points that concern Wessex are for the most part interesting rather than important. Wessex has its share in the vigorous correspondence going forward with bishop Lullus, and there is a possible Wessex synod at one of the numerous synodic camping grounds called "Acleah" or Acle, suggesting tented meadows (like Runnymede), and oak shades (like Augustine's Oak), grave councils, and perhaps cheerful relaxation. The royal letter on prayer-union occurs at p. 439 (and cf. COENGILS); and the papal mission at p. 443. Two Wessex monastic foundations are attributed to this reign, both in Wiltshire, at Ellandune or Wilton and Bitumaeum or Ad Tueoneam (Birch, Fusti Monast. 7). The tragic story of Cynewulf's death at Merton in Surrey, by the hand of the etheling Cynehard, brother of Sigebert whom Cynewulf had displaced, is narrated with unusual detail in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (ad an. 755). All we are told of the family of Cynewulf is that he was "kinsman" of the two brothers and that "their right paternal kin reaches to Cerdic" (A. S. C. ibid.). In Florence, Geneal. Regg. West. Sax. (M. H. B. 633) he stands in the pedigree unconnected between Sigeyrht and Brythric. He was buried at Winchester (A. S. C. l. c.). The varieties of his name are, CYNIUULFUS, CYNULF, CENULF, CYNEUULF, CHENEWOLF, CEOWLF, KINEULFUS, KINEUULFUS, KINUULF, KINEWLF, KENEWOLF, KINWLF. [C. H.]

CYNEWULF, bishop of Lindisfarne, consecrated A.D. 740 (Symeon, de Gestis Regum, ed. Surtees Soc. p. 13). In 750 he fell under the displeasure of Eadberht, king of Northumbria, for giving shelter to prince Offa, who had taken sanctuary at Lindisfarne. The monastery was besieged, and Cynewulf imprisoned at Bam-borough, the charge of his diocese having been delegated to Friothubert, bishop of Hexham (ibid. p. 19; and Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. ii. cap. 17). He was released, and in A.D. 780, worn out with years and labour, made Higbald his deputy in the bishopric with the assent of the congregation. He died after three years spent in retirement (ibid. cap. xix.). [J. R.]

CYNEWULF, king of the Mercians. [KENULF.]

CYNEWULF, CYNEWULFUS, CYNEULFUS (CINEULF, CHENEWLF), etheling, slain by Ina king of Wessex, A.D. 721. (A. S. C. and Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 721; Ethelw. Chron. in M. H. B. 507; Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1687, in M. H. B. 785.) [C. H.]

CYNFAB, early Welsh saint, patron of Capel Cynfab, formerly in the parish of Llanfair ar y Bryn in Carmarthenshire; commemorated on Nov. 15 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 307). [C. H.]

CYNFARCH OER, chieftain in North Britain, afterwards a saint in Wales, in the 5th century; reputed founder of Llangynfarch in Maelor, Flintshire, a church destroyed by the Saxons in the battle of Bangor, A.D. 603 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 168). [C. H.]

CYNFARWY, early Welsh saint, patron of Llechgyfarwy church in Anglesey: commemorated Nov. 7 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 307). [C. H.]

CYNFELYN AB BLEIDDYD, Welsh saint, of Bangor Deiniol, of the 6th century, founder of Llangynfelyn in Cardiganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 260; E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 498). [C. H.]

CYNFRAN, Welsh saint of the 5th century, founder of Llysfaen in Rhos, Denbighshire, and patron of the well there named Ffynnon Cynfran (Rees, Welsh Saints, 144). [C. H.]

CYNFYW. CYNYW, Welsh saint of the 6th century, possible founder of the church of Llangynyw in Montgomeryshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 233). [C. H.]

CYNGAR (CUNGAR). For the early Welsh saints of this name, and the difficulty of identifying them, see Rees, Welsh Saints, 183, 211, 232. [C. H.]

CYNGEN, son of Cadell, prince of Powys in the 6th century, distinguished for the patronage he afforded to the Welsh saints, and for his liberal endowments to the church. He bestowed lands upon the monastery of Bangor Iscoed in his territory, for which he was afterwards reckoned among the Welsh saints. There was once a church at Shrewsbury dedicated to him. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 161, 206, 207; E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 498, 531.) [C. H.]

CYNHAFAL, Welsh saint of the 7th century, founder of Llangynhafal in Denbighshire; commemorated on Oct. 5 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 295). [C. H.]

CYNHAIARN, Welsh saint of the 6th century, patron of Ynys Cynhaiarn, a chapel under Cruccaith in Carnarvonshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 275). [C. H.]

CYNI-. See also CYNE-.

CYNBALDUS, abbat, attests two charters of Cuthred, king of Wessex, A.D. 749 (Kemble, C. D. Nos. 1006, 1007; Birch, Fasti Monast. 61). [C. H.]

CYNIBERT (1) (CYNEBERT, KINBERT) fourth bishop of Lindsey, from A.D. 706 to 732 (Beda, H. E. iv. 12; Flr. Wigorn. i.; Symeon, de Gestis, ed. Surtees Soc. p. 11). He corresponded with Beda about the history of his diocese, and his help is acknowledged in the preface to the H. E.

(2) Abbat of Hreutford (? Redbridge), who baptized in A.D. 686 the two sons of Arvald, king of the Isle of Wight, before they were put to death by Caedwalla (Beda, H. E. iv. 16). [CUNBERTUS.]

(3) A deacon of Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, mentioned in a letter from Boniface to his master (Bonifacii Epp. ed. Giles, i. 139). [J. R.]

CYNIBILL, brother of bishops Cedda and Cealda, and of the presbyter Caelin. He himself was presbyter to Cedda, and Bede relates how the latter was devoting the whole of one Lent to the consecration of a site for his monastery of Lastingham, and how, being summoned away to the king when ten days of the period remained, Cynibill remained on the ground and completed for him the dedicatory devotions. This is all that is known of him (Bede, H. E. iii. 23). [C. H.]

CYNIBURGA (KINEBURGA, KINNEBURGA), one of the two daughters of Penda the pagan king of Mercia, the other being Cyniseu or Kineswitha, and both of them reputed as saints. According to Florence of Worcester (Chron. App. M. H. B. 638), she married Alfrid king of Northumbria, but left him pro amore Dei, and entered the monastery which her brothers Wulfhere and Ethelred, kings of Mercia, constructed for her, and which was called after her "Kineburgae Castrum," in which also her sister Kineswitha was a nun. William of Malmesbury makes a similar statement (G. R. i. 110, ed. Hardy). Bede also relates that she was the wife of Alechfrid, son of Oswy of Northumbria (H. E. iii. 21). In a charter of A.D. 664, considered by Kemble as doubtful or spurious (C. D. No. 984), she appears as presiding over a monastery called after her own name, "Monasterium Cyniburgense" (see also Birch, Fasti Monast. 60). Florence does not make her abbess, but only sanctimonialis. Capgrave, in his life of her, says that a monastery having been built at Caistor or Dormaneaster in Northamptonshire, on the Nene, Cyneburga retired from the world and became abbess of it. Camden (ed. Gough, ii. 155) states that at Caster "Kinneburga presided over this house of her own foundation as the mother of the holy virgins," borrowing the words of "an ancient writer," to whom no reference is given. The Monast. Anglic. (vi. 1621) gives a similar account. It is also stated (A. S. C. ad an. 657) that the two sisters were present at the consecration of Medehamstede in the reign of their brother Wulfhere, and signed the charter (M. H. B. 313, 315); and moreover that in the 11th century Aelfsi abbat of this monastery (then called Peterborough), removed the bodies of the sisters from Caestre to Peterborough (A. S. C. ad an. 963, M. H. B. 393). This account very much resembles that of the two saints Cuenburga and Cuthburga, sisters of Ina king of Wessex, and the foundation of the monastery of Wimburn. Cuenburga likewise was the wife of Alfrid king of Northumbria from whom she separated pro amore Dei. [CUNBURGA.] (See also Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 370, 384.) [C. H.]

CYNIDR, Welsh saint of the 5th century, possible founder of Llangynidr and Aberyscir, two churches in Brecknockshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 148, 149). [C. H.]

CYNIFRID, CYNIFRITH (1) Abbat of Gilling, co. York (in Gaetlingum), and brother of Ceolfrid, abbat of Jarrow and Wearmouth. He seems to have died in the pestilence of A.D. 664 (Hist. Abb. Gyrensiensium, Auct. anon.; apud Bedae Opp. Hist. Minora, ed. Stevenson, p. 319).

(2) A physician who attended the ex-queen, abbess Etheldreda (Aedilthryda) in her last illness at Ely, which he afterwards described, and was present at the disinterment of her remains in A.D. 695. (Bede, H. E. iv. 19; Vita S. Etheldritae, apud Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Ben. ed. 1733, ii. 726-7.) [J. R.]

CYNIMUND, CYNEMUND, a monk of Lindisfarne, and afterwards of Jarrow in the time of Bede who describes him as "fidelissimus mihi nostrae ecclesiae presbyter." He narrated to Bede a miracle of bishop Aidan which had been told him by Aidan's presbyter Utta (H. E. iii. 15), and another of Cuthbert, whom he had personally known (Beda, Vita S. Cuthberti, cap. xxxvi.). His name occurs in the Liber Vitae of the church of Durham (p. 10). [J. R.]

CYNIN, Welsh saint of the 5th century, founder of Llangynin near St. Clears in Carmarthenshire, and said to have been a bishop (Rees, Welsh Saints, 144, 145). [C. H.]

CYNLLO, Welsh saint of the 5th century, founder or patron of three churches in north Radnorshire, Nantmel, Llangynllo, and Llambister (Rees, Welsh Saints, 12, 133). [C. H.]

CYNMUR, Welsh saint of the 6th century, one of the companions of St. Teilo after his return from Armorica (Rees, Welsh Saints, 253). [C. H.]

CYNOG (CYNAWG), son of Brychan, Welsh saint in the 5th century of eminent sanctity, patron of several churches in Brecknockshire among which are Defynog, Merthyr Cynog, and Llangynog (Rees, Welsh Saints, 138, 139). [C. H.]

CYNOG (CYNOC, CINAUC, CINNAUC, KENAUC, KINOCHEUS), bishop of Llanbadarn, and afterwards successor of David at St. David's, according to one reading of Giraldus Cambrensis (Opp. vol. vi. ed. Dimock, p. 102), died A.D. 606 (Annal. Camb.). No particulars are recorded of him. Jones and Freeman (Hist. of St. David's, 248, 258) can come to no certain conclusion as to him. The following authors may be consulted: Stubbs, Regist. 154, 157; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 146; Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Antiq., works, v. 106; Rees, Welsh Saints, 174, 242. [C. H.]

CYNON, Welsh saint of the 6th century. He accompanied Cadfan to Bardsey, where he was made chancellor of the monastery. He is the reputed founder of the church of Tregynon in Montgomeryshire, and the patron of Capel Cynon, subject to Llandyssilio Gogo in Cardiganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 215). [C. H.]

CYNRED, -DUS (Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 704 708, 709), king of Mercia. [COENRED.] [C. H.]

CYNRIC (KYNRICUS, KINRIC, KINERICUS, KENRICUS, CHENRIZ), etheling, son of Cuthred king of the West Saxons, a valiant and impetuous youth, slain in a military tumult, A.D. 748, in the 9th year of his father's reign. (A. S. C. and Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 748; Hen. Hunt. Hist. in M. H. B. 728; Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1789; in M. H. B. 786; Matt. West. F. H. ad an. 749.) [C. H.]

CYNUDYN, Welsh saint of the 6th century, dean of the college of Padarn at Llanbadarn Fawr. It has been suggested that a stone in the churchyard of Llanwnws in Cardiganshire, inscribed "Canotinn" may have been a monument to his memory (Rees, Welsh Saints, 261.) [C. H.]

CYNULF (1) (Ethelwerd, Chron. in M. H. B. 507, 508; Kemble, C. D. No. 100, A.D.

CYNWULF (A. S. C. ad ann. 737, M. H. B.), bishop of Lindisfarne. [CYNWULF.] [C. H.]

CYNYW, Welsh saint. [CYNFYW.]

CYNWYD CYNWYDION, Welsh saint of the 6th century, a member of the congregation of Cattwg, and presumed founder of Llangynwyd Fawr in Glamorganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 208, 270). [C. H.]

CYNWYL, Welsh saint of the 6th century; one of the sons of Dunod, Dinothus, or Dinott, and co-founder with him of the monastery of Bangor Iscoed. He is himself deemed the founder of Cynwyl Gaiio, the church of a parish adjoining that of Llanddewi Brefi; of Cynwyl Elfed in Carmarthenshire; and of Aberporth in Cardiganshire. He is commemorated on April 30 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 206, 260). [C. H.]

CYPRIANUS (1) THASCIUS CAECILIUS. Name.—He is styled Thascius Cyprianus by the proconsul (Vit. Pontii), and styles himself Cyprianus qui et Thascius in the singular heading of Ep. 66. He took the name Caecilius, according to Jerome (Cat. Ill. Vir. v.), from the presbyter who converted him, and he is called Caecilius Cyprianus in the proscription (Ep. 66). In the only place, however, where this presbyter's name is given by Pontius (c. 4) all the MSS. and Manutius read Caecilian; and nothing is said of the adoption. The only recurrence I find of the praenomen is in the African calendar Sept. 1. "Tascius Martyr," and its rarity leads to the misnomer Tadius in a decree of Gelasius. The name Cyprianus is itself rare; not occurring in the Inscriptions of Muratori, or Orelli, but in Böckh (4, No. 9412) Κηπριανος, and occasionally in Augustine's time. Pape quotes it also from Proc. v. 11, Phot. Cod. 184, Lactant. 5, 1. Its origin is obscure. If it were derived from Κόπρις it would be more common, like similar derivatives from deities' names. But her votaries prefer the name Aphrodite. Pape properly calls it a late name, but derives it absurdly from "copper." The occurrence of the name Cyprius, and the connexion of Carthage with Cyprius, suggest this third derivation.

His Birthplace is not indicated by the quoted phrases of Prudentius, Hymn 13, "proprius patriae martyr," Suidas's Καρχηδων ἐξ ἧς ἀρμάτο, nor his own allusion to Carthage as the happiest place on earth to him "where God had willed that he should believe and grow up in the faith." Rather had it been his native place also, we might have here expected him to mention it.

He was an orator, and afterwards even a teacher of rhetoric ("in tantam gloriam venit eloquentiae ut oratoriam quoque doceret Carthagini," Hieron. Comm. Jon. c. 3, and cf. Aug. Serm. 312, § 4). It is not quite clear what is meant by Jerome's speaking of him as a former "adsertor idololatriae," and Augustine's as "having decorated the crumbling doctrines of demons." They may refer to some panegyric, or to some suits about temple property. Pontius speaks of his memoriosa mens, which is illustrated by his extraordinary copiousness and facility of quotation. His style is very polished, and, as Augustine points out, became more simple and beautiful with time, and (as his critic believed) with the purer taste of Christianity. He edited for Christians the phraseological dictionary of Cicero (see Hartel's praef. ad fin.). His systematic habits and powers of business contributed greatly to his success as the first of church organizers.

His address was dignified, conciliatory, affectionate. His looks attractive by their grave joyousness. His dress is remarked on as answering to his tone of mind. He never assumed the philosopher's pall, which Tertullian his "master" maintained to be the only dress for Christians; he thought its plainness pretentious. Augustine speaks of the tradition of his gentleness, and he never lost the friendship of heathens of high rank (Pont. 14). He was wealthy, his landed property considerable, and his house and gardens beautiful (Pont. Vit. ad Don. i. xv. xvi.).

His Conversion was then important in the series of men of letters and law who were at this time added to the church, and who so markedly surpass in style and culture their heathen contemporaries. Pearson rightly sets aside the inference of Baronius (from De Dei gratia) that Cyprian was old at his conversion, but that he was so seems to be stated, however obscurely, by Pontius (c. 2, "adhuc rudis fidei et cui nondum forsitan crederetur supergressus vetustatis aetatem"). Christian doctrines, especially that of regeneration, had previously excited his wonder, but not his derision (ad Don. iii. iv.). He was converted by an aged presbyter, Caecilian.

During his catechesis he analysed and conversed with the circle about him on scripture Lives; he devoted himself to chastity; he sold some estates, and distributed the proceeds to the poor. He also composed, in his Quod Idola dii non sint, a Christian assault on Polytheism, freely compiling the 1st and 2nd sections of his tract from Minucius, § 20-27, § 18, § 32, and his 3rd section from Tertullian's Apology, § 21-23, with some traces of Tertull. de Anima naturaliter Christiana. A comparison of this pamphlet with the originals is the best illustration of his ideal of style. He retains the very language to a great extent, but erases whatever seemed rugged, ambiguous, or strained. He maintains a historical kernel of mythology, points out the low character of idolatrous Roman worship; illustrates the activity of deluding daemons by the scenes which went on at exorcisms, of which, however, he scarcely seems (as Tertullian does) to have been an eyewitness. He contrasts this with the doctrine of Divine unity, which he describes nobly, but illustrates not felicitously. The History of Judaism, its rejection of its Messiah, and the effects which Christianity is producing in the individual, and commencing on society, bring him to his new standpoint. He is perhaps the first writer who puts the continuous sufferings of believers in evidence of the credibility of their statements.

The restatement and co-ordination of previous arguments was probably not ineffective in the hands of the famous Thascius, but as yet he exhibits no conception that Christianity is to be a world-regenerating power. He deliberately excludes providence from history (Quod Id. v.).

At the Easter following, the season most observed in Africa for this purpose, he was probably baptized, and to the autumn after we refer the ad Donatum, a monologue, a brief Tusculan held in his own villa, on The grace of God. It already exhibits Cyprian not as a spiritual analyst or subtle theologian, but irrefragable in his appeals to the distinctly New Life which has appeared in the world, amid the contemporary degradations—the repudiation of the responsibility of wealth, the disruption of the client-bond, the aspect of the criminal classes, the pauperisation of the mass, and the systematic corruption by theatre and arena. For the present, however, withdrawal from the world into Christian circles is the only remedy he hopes. "Divine Grace" is an ascertained psychological fact, and this is the subject of the treatise, though as yet narrow in application.

He soon after sold, for the benefit of the poor, his horti, which some wealthy friends bought up afterwards and presented to him again. Meantime he resided with Caecilian. We can only understand the expression of Pontius (who similarly lived as a deacon with Cyprian), "erat sane illi etiam de nobis contubernium . . . Caecilianii," to mean that he was at that time "of our body," the diaconal. We find other instances of the closeness of this bond. Baronius and Bishop Fell are equally inexcusable in understanding what is said of Caecilian's family and of Job's wife as having any bearing upon the question of Cyprian's celibacy. There is no indication of his having been married. Caecilian at his death commended his family to him, although not as officially curator or tutor, which would have contradicted both Christian and Roman usage.

His Ordination.—His activity while a member of the ordo or consensus of presbyters is noticed, but he was yet a neophyte when he became bishop. The step was justified on the ground of his exceptional character, but the opposition organised by five presbyters was now and always a serious difficulty to him. The Plebes would listen to no refusal, and frustrated an attempt to escape. He subsequently rests his title (Ep. 43, Ep. 66, Vit.) on their suffrages, and on the "judicium Dei," with the consensus of his fellow bishops. In ordinary cases he treats the election by neighbour bishops as necessary to a valid episcopate (Ep. 57, v.; Ep. 59, vii.; Ep. 66). From this time Cyprian is usually addressed both by others and by the Roman clergy as Papa, though the title is not attributed to the bishop of Rome until long after. An earlier instance of the use of the name occurs at Alexandria, but there is some reason to believe that the first application of the name is traceable to Carthage.

Some time between the July of A.D. 248 and the April following Cyprian thus became bishop, a few months before the close of the "thirty years' peace" of the church. His Theory of the Episcopal Office seems to have been his own already, and as it supplies the key to his conception of church government may be stated at once. The episcopate succeeded to the Jewish Priesthood* (Ep. 8, i.; Ep. 69, viii.; Epp. 65, 67, i.; Testim. iii. 85); the bishop was the instructor (Ep. 50, xi.; Unit. x.); and the judge (Ep. 17, ii.). In this later capacity he does nothing without the information and advice of presbyters, deacons, and laity. Again, he is the apostle of his flock (Ep. 3, iii.; 45, 66, iv.), by direct succession, and the diaconate is the creation of his predecessors. The usual parallel between the three orders of the Christian and Jewish ministry differs entirely from that drawn by Cyprian.

The stress laid on the responsibility of the laity is very great. Though the virtue of the office is transmitted by another channel, it is they who, by the "aspiration of God," address to each bishop his call to enter on that "priesthood" and its grace, and it is their duty to withdraw from his administration if he is a "sinner" (Ep. 67). The bishops do not coopt into or enlarge their own college. Each is elected by his own Plebes. Hence he is the embodiment of it. "The bishop is in the church and the church in the bishop." They have no other representatives in councils, he is naturally their "member." These views appear fully developed in his first epistle, and in the application of texts in his early Testimonia; it is incredible that they should have been borrowed from Paganism, and unhistorical to connect them with Judaizers. They are (although Cyprian does not dwell on this aspect) not incompatible with a recognition of the priesthood of the laity as full as that of Tertullian.

The African episcopate had declined in character during the long peace; many bishops were engaged in trade, agriculture, or usury, some were conspicuously fraudulent or immoral, or too ignorant to instruct catechumens and avoid using heretical compositions in public prayers. De Laps. 4; Ep. 65, iii.; Auct. de Rebapt. ix.; Aug. c. Don. vii. 45; Resp. ad Epp. (Sedatus). Similarly among the presbyters strange occupations were possible (Tert. de Idol. c. 7-9), and unmarried deacons shared their chambers with spiritual sisters who maintained their chastity to be unimpaired. The effect of the persecution was salutary on this state of things, and was felt to be so. To the eighteen months of "peace" which remained belong his Epp. 1-4, and the treatise on the dress of virgins, which answers to his description of his employment as "serving discipline" during that interval. In three of the letters his authority is invoked beyond his diocese, and wears something of a metropolitan aspect. Otherwise it is to be noticed that the African bishops rank by seniority.

To these letters Mr. Shepherd has taken objections, which, if valid, would be fatal to the genuineness of much of the Cyprianic correspondence, and the present writer may therefore be allowed to state (though without space here to exhibit the arguments) that a rigorous investigation of those objections is conclusive in favour of the epistles.

De Habitu Virginitum.—Many Christian women lived, as a "work of piety," the self-dedicated life of virgins though in their own homes. Tertullian had cured the fashion of going unveiled, which some had claimed as symbolic of childlike innocence, yet with the avowed object of rendering their order attractive. Vanity, sentiment, and the sense of security were still mischievous elements, and Cyprian writes mainly against the extravagant fashions, half Roman, half Tyrian, in which the wealthier sisters appeared. His book, though in language drawing largely from Tertullian's treatise of similar title, resembles much more in matter and aim his Cultus Feminarum. Cyprian is here so minute and fastidious in his reduction of the violent rhetoric of Tertullian, that this might almost pass for a masterly study of writing; and Augustine regards it as a very perfect work, drawing from it illustrations both of the "grand" and of the "temperate" style (Aug. de Doctrina Christiana, bk. iv. pp. 78, 86).

In estimating the probable influence of this booklet on ascetic life, it is not satisfactory to find that the incentives used are partly low and partly overstrained,—the escape from married troubles, espousals with Christ, higher rank in the resurrection; while efficiency in works of charity, the power of purity, self-sacrifice and intercession, are not dwelt on.

Testimonia ad Quirinum, lib. iii.—These though not certainly belonging to this time are more like his work now than afterwards. They are texts compiled for a layman (filius). I. in 24 heads on the succession of the Gentile to the Jewish church. II. 30 heads on the Deity, Messiahship and salvation of Christ. III. 120 on Christian duty. The skill and toil of such a selection are admirable. The importance of the text in elucidation of the Latin versions then afloat is immense, and Hartel is quite dissatisfied with what he has been able to contribute to this object. (Hartel, Praefat. Cyp. p. xxiii.)

Decian Persecution.—Cyprian's conviction of the need of external chastisements for the worldliness of the church was supported by intimations which he felt to be supernatural. The edict which began to fulfil them in the end of A.D. 249, aimed at effecting its work by the removal of leaders, and at first fixed capital penalties on the bishops only (Rettberg, p. 54; Ep. 66, vii.). Monotheism, even when licensed (like Judaism), had an anti-national aspect, and Christianity could not be a licita religio, simply because it was not the established worship of any locality or race. In this, and in the fact that torture was applied to procure not (as in other accusations) confession but denial of the charge (Apol. ii.; Cyp. ad Demet. xii. 11), in the encouragement of delation as to private meetings (Dig. xlviii. 4; Cod. ix. 8, iv. vi. vii.), and in the power given to magistrates under standing elicts to apply the test of sacrifice at any moment to a neighbourhood or a person, lay the various unfairnesses of which Tertullian and Cyprian complain. Dionysius of Alexandria, and with him Origen, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Maximus of Nola, Babylas of Antioch, Alexander of Jerusalem, Fabian of Rome, were all attacked, the last three martyred. There was no fanaticism of martyrdom as yet. It seemed wrong to expose a successor to instant death, and no bishop was elected for sixteen months at Rome. Like the three former, Cyprian placed himself (before the end of January; Lipsius, Röm. Bisch. Chronol. p. 200) out of reach, and, with the same determination with which he afterwards pronounced that his time was come, refused concealment. The grounds for his retirement, consistently stated by himself, are the necessity of continuing the administration (Ep. 12, i. v. vi.), the danger which at Carthage he would have attracted to others (Epp. 7, 14), the riots it would have aroused (Ep. 43), and the insistence of TERTULLUS (Epp. 12, 14). The Cyprianic epistles of this period, passing between the Roman presbyters, the Carthaginian bishop and certain imprisoned presbyters (see MOYSES, MAXIMUS), deacons (RUFINUS and NICOSTRATUS), laymen, and particularly an imperfectly educated Carthaginian confessor CELERINUS (whose ill-spelt letters Epp. 21 and 22 are extant), present, when worked out, a tessellated coherence with each other and with slight notices in Eusebius (vi. 43), which is absolutely convincing as to the originality and genuineness of the documents.

The Lapsi.—Five commissioners in each town and the proconsul on circuit (Ep. 43, iii. 10, 56) administered the Decian edict. The sufferings by torture, stifling imprisonments, and even fire (14, 21) (Ep. 22) were very severe. Women and boys were among the victims. Exile and confiscation were employed. In the first terror there was a large voluntary abjuration of Christianity, whether literally by "the majority of his flock" (Ep. 11) may be uncertain, but Cyprian felt himself "seated in the ruins of his house." Scenes of painful vividness are touched in, but these must be passed by. Many of the clergy fell or fled, leaving scarcely enough for the daily duty of the city (Ep. 34, iv. 40, 29), as did many provincial bishops (Ep. 11, 59). Different classes of those who conformed were the Thurificati, Sacrificati (the more heinous) (Ep. 59), and LIBELLATICI (q. v. as also LIBELLI), whose self-excision was less palpable. Of this class there were some thousands (Ep. 24). (Vid. MARTIALIS, l.p.)

Formation of a General Policy.—Cyprian from his retirement guided the policy of the whole West upon the tremendous questions of church communion which now arose. (1) Indifferentism offered the lapsed an easy return by means of indulgences from, or in the names of, martyrs. (2) Puritanism barred all return.

The Roman clergy first essayed to deal with the question in conjunction with the clergy of Carthage independently of Cyprian, whose absence they invidiously deplore (Ep. viii.). Their letter was returned to them by Cyprian himself, with some caustic remarks on its style (which is singularly incorrect, see Hartel's Praefatio, xl.iii.) as well as on the irregularity of the step.

After this an altered tone, and Novatian's marked style is discernible in their letters. (Ep. 30 and ? 36).

The granting of indulgences (not by that name) to lapsed persons, by confessors and martyrs, which had been first questioned and then sharply criticised by Tertullian (ad Mart. 1 de Pudic. 22), grew very quickly under the influence of some of those clergy who had been opposed to Cyprian's election. The veneration for sufferers who seemed actually to be the saviours of Christianity was intense, and many heads were turned by the adulatory language of their greatest chiefs (cf. Ep. x. 24). Their libelli would presently have superseded all other terms of communion (see LIBELLUS III.).

A strange document (Ep. 23) is extant in the form of an absolution to "all the lapsed" from "all the confessors," which the bishops are desired to promulge. Rioters in some of the provincial towns extorted communion from their presbyters (Ep. 27, iii.). At Rome itself, the influence of Novatian with the confessors created a tendency to strictness rather than indulgence, and there were no such disorders, but they prevailed elsewhere (Epp. 27, 31, 32; Ep. 30, iv. 4; 30, vii.) Cyprian at once proposed by separate letters to his clergy and laity (to whom he writes with warm confidence), to various bishops, and to the Roman confessors and clergy (Epp. 15, 16, 17, 26) one general course of action: To reserve all cases of lapsed, without regard to the confessors' libelli, until episcopal councils at Rome and Carthage should lay down terms of re-admission for the deserving (Ep. 20; 55, iv.); then the bishops, with clergy and laity (Ep. 17, iv.; Ep. 31) assisting, to investigate each case; public acknowledgment to be made, re-admission to be by imposition of hands by bishop and clergy. Meantime the acts of the confessors to be recognised (Ep. 20, iii.) so far as that persons in danger, who might hold a libellus, should be re-admitted by any presbyter, or in extremis by a deacon (Epp. 18, 19). All others to be exhorted to repentance, and commended with prayer to God at their deaths. The grounds he urged were—(1) the wideness of the question, which was too large for individual discretion (totius orbis, Ep. 19, iii. cf. 30, vi.) (2) That if restored at once the lapsed would have fared better than those who had borne the loss of all for Christ. These principles are developed also in the De Lapsis, which however is not quite as M. Freppel describes it, "a résumé of the letters," but a résumé of the modified views of Cyprian a little later. In M. Freppel's Sorbonne Lectures (St. Cyprien, pp. 195–221) may be studied with profit the Ultramontane representation of this scheme as equivalent to the modern indulgence system, backed by assertions that the Roman church "indicated to Carthage the only course," which Cyprian "fully adopted." All however that the Roman clergy had recommended was mere re-admission of sick penitents, without any conception of a policy, or of the method by which it could be worked. These are developed step by step in Epp. 17, 18, 19, and communicated to the Roman church (Ep. 20). In replying through Novatian (Ep. 30, see 55 v.) the Roman presbyters re-state and adopt them (compare also Ep. 31, vi. 41).

Temper in Carthage.—Through the earlier part of the above section of correspondence is perceptible a reliance on the laity. The clergy do not reply to his letters (Ep. 18), they defer to the libelli, or use them against him (Ep. 27). In Ep. 17 he entreats the aid of the laity as against them. When the concurrence of the African and Italian episcopate is obtained (Ep. 43, iii.), and that of Novatian and the Roman clergy and confessors (Epp. 30, 31), assuming a stronger tone (Ep. 32), with his own clergy he requires them to circulate the whole correspondence, which is done (Ep. 55, iv.), and excommunication is announced against any who should allow communion except on the terms agreed on.

About November, 250, persecution relaxed (possibly owing to the Gothic advance in Thrace), and though it was still unsafe for Cyprian to return, he endeavoured to deal with the distress of sufferers who had lost their all, and to recruit the ranks of the clergy, and allay the excitement still prevailing among the lapsed, by a commission (vicarii) of three bishops, CALDONIUS, HERCULANUS, VICTOR, and two presbyters, NUMIDIUS and ROGATIAN (Epp. 41, 26).

Declaration of Parties.—The excitement on the question of the lapsed is evinced by two classes of stories then afloat as to judgments following both on unreconciled offences, and on presumptuous communion (De Lapsis, 24, 25, 26). Cyprian employed both to urge delay, but they do not emanate from his party of moderation. At Carthage the party of laxity became prominent; at Rome, that of exclusiveness.

(1.) The party of laxity was composed of confessors, spoiled by flattery (De Laps. 20), fashionable lapsi, who declined all penance (Laps. 30), influential ones, who had forced certain clergy to receive them, but also some clergy who united against Cyprian's policy with the five presbyters who had from the first resisted him. Of these three were undoubtedly DONATUS, GORDIUS, FORTUNATUS (Maran. Vit. Cyp. § xvii.; Rettberg, pp. 97-112). That the fourth was GAUUS of DIDDA, or AUGENDUS, is but a guess. The principal in position and ability was the presbyter NOVATUS (Pearson's JOVINUS and MAXIMUS, and Pamelius' REPOSTUS and FELIX are impossible; see those names). That Cyprian's five original opponents still acted against him is shewn by "olim secundum vestra suffragia" (Ep. 43, v.), though in 43, ii. he seems only to conjecture their complicity with FELICISSIMUS. This man had been associated by NOVATUS with himself as deacon, in the management of a district called Mons (possibly the Bozra itself) (Epp. 52, 59, 36). Cyprian complains of not having been consulted in this appointment, which, owing to the then position of the deacons, gave the party the control of considerable funds. All the arrangements hitherto agreed on were disregarded by them, Cyprian's missives unanswered, and his commission of relief treated as an invasion of the diaconal office of Felicissimus, who announced, while other lapsi were at once received into communion, that whoever held communications with or accepted aid from the commission would be excluded from communion or relief from the Mons (Ep. 43, ii.; Ep. 41, where the conjecture in morte, or references to Monte in Numidia, or to the Montenses at Rome, who were Donatists, and were never (anciently) confused with the Novatianists or called Montanistæ, are absurd; though Hefele, Novatianischer Schisma, ap. Wetzler and Welte, K. Lexik. and Conciles, t. ii. p. 232, countenances these confusions). It is with the name of Felicissimus that the lax party is generally connected (Ep. 43, iii. v. vii.), and he with a fellow deacon AUGENDUS, a renegade bishop REPOSTUS, and certain others, the five presbyters not among them, was presently excommunicated. There is no evidence, nor any contemporary instance, to warrant the belief that Novatus ordained Felicissimus deacon (see the MSS. reading Ep. 52, "satellitum suum diaconum constituit," which Hartel has unwarrantably departed from), nor is there any such appearance of presbyterian principles in this party, as divines of anti-episcopal churches, Neander, Rettberg, D'Aubigné, Keyser, have freely assumed. The party were in episcopal communion, took part in the episcopal election at Carthage, presently elected a new bishop for themselves, and procured episcopal consecration for him. When Novatus visited Rome, he threw himself into the election then proceeding, and, after opposing the candidate who was chosen, procured episcopal consecration for his nominee there also. Felicissimus too must have been a deacon already, or he could not have involved himself and Novatus in the charge of defrauding the church (Ep. 52, i.; 50, i).

(2.) The Puritan Party.—The strength of the Puritans, on the other hand, was in Rome. A group of confessors there, of whom the presbyters MOYSES and MAXIMUS [see also RUFINUS, NICOSTRATUS, URBANUS, SIDONIUS, MACARIUS, CELERINUS] were the chief, united with Novatian and the clergy in approving Cyprian's proposals. The modification of discipline by martyrs' merits was never countenanced here (Ep. 28, ii.); nevertheless, Moyses, before his death (which probably happened on the last day of the year 250), had condemned the extreme tendencies of Novatian towards the non-reconciliation of penitents (see Valesius' correct interpretation of Euseb. vi. 43, and Routh, R. S. iii. p. 81). While Cornelius at Rome and Cyprian were moving towards greater leniency than their resolutions had embodied, Novatian, without questioning the hope of salvation for the lapsed, was now for making their exclusion perpetual, and teaching that the purity of the church could not otherwise be maintained.

The earthly conditions of the invisible and visible church had not yet been discussed as the Donatists compelled them to be, and Novatian's growing error, though in the present application it completely severed him from Cyprian and the church, was not in principle different from that which Cyprian (though without producing a schism) held in relation to baptism. Early in A.D. 251 the Roman confessors were liberated; they lost whatever influence Moyses had exercised on them; they had been drawn towards Novatian, and when Novatus, arriving from Carthage, attached himself to this party, because, though its puritanism was alien to his own practices at home, it was the only opposition existing in the capital which threatened to overthrow the Cyprianic side, they were at once organised into a party to secure the election of a bishop of Rome, who would break with Cyprian. The moment for election was given by the absence of Decius and his leading officers on the frontier or in Illyria on account of the base alliance of Priscus with Cniva, and the revolt of Valens. The party of moderation however prevailed in the church and secured the election of Cornelius, and consecrated him in spite of himself by sixteen bishops^b ("vim" Ep. 55, vii.).

First Council.—Cyprian returned to Carthage after Easter (23rd March) from his fourteen months' absence (biennium), which seems to have been prolonged by a fear of the "faction" (Ep. 43, i.) rekindling persecution (Ep. 55, v.) by some demonstration. The bishops of the province met in April for the first council, held in Carthage, for half a century (AGRIPPINUS), but the discussion on the lapsed was postponed by letters from Rome, which Cyprian laid before them, viz. Cornelius's announcement of his election (Ep. 45, ii.) and a temperate protest against it from Novatian (45, iv.) (Maran, p. lx. misinterprets this against the sense of Baluze, whom he edits). The protest was soon followed by a mass of charges, which Cyprian declined to submit to the council. This was excellent policy, but at the same time a curious exercise of personal authority in that earliest type of returning freedom—the church council. At the same time he made them despatch two of their number, CALDONIUS and FORTUNATUS, to Rome, to report.

Caldonius was instructed to procure attestations of the regularity of the ordination of Cornelius from bishops who had attended it (Ep. 44 and cf. 45, i.). Meantime, communications with the Roman church were to be addressed only to the clergy and not to Cornelius. (The statement of Lipsius, p. 204 on Ep. 45 v., is too strong.) He was also to lay before the clergy and laity, so as to guard them against clandestine influence, the whole correspondence about Felicissimus (Epp. 41, 43, 45, v.). The council, then reverting to its programme, is obliged to despatch first the question of Felicissimus, since, if he were justified in his reception of the lapsed, no terms of communion need be discussed; but if the main issue went against him they could not on such ex post facto ground deal with him disciplinarily. His offence consisted not in his theory, which might conceivably be correct, but in his re-admitting people whose cases had been by due notice reserved.

Cyprian, to his honour and like a good lawyer, was not present during the trial of his opponent, who was condemned. He does not employ the first person in relating it (Ep. xlv. 5) as he always does of councils which he attended, and from Ep. 48 we must conclude that he was at Hadrumetum at that very time.^c

^b Lipsius has shewn conclusively that the consecration of Cornelius was about March 5 (Chronol. d. römischen Bischöfe p. 18); a fact which must be borne in mind, as the usual statement that it was in June introduces endless contradictions into the common account, and has obliged even Pearson to resort to unmanageable hypotheses of long recesses in the first council of Carthage and of several journeys of Novatus to Rome.

^c This absence of Cyprian from the trial of his opponent solves difficulties otherwise insoluble. Pearson and Tillemont attribute to the council various adjournments, partly to dispose of the long period required by their false date for Cornelius's election, and partly to give room for the visit to Hadrumetum. Frequenter acto (Ep. 59, xvi.) means largely attended, not, as Pearson and Tillemont,

The programme of the council was again interrupted still more seriously. Two African bishops fresh from Rome, Stephanus and Pompeius, had brought evidence of the regularity of Cornelius's ordination (Ep. 55, vii.) as conclusive as the commissioners could have obtained, and the council had expressed itself as formally satisfied (Ep. 45, i.) when four new delegates from Rome (MAXIMUS, not the confessor, AUGENDUS, &c.) announced the consecration of Novatian to the Roman see.

This surprise (for fuller details of which see NOVATIAN) was prepared by the party of severity, who were disappointed by the election of Cornelius, stimulated by EVARISTUS, whom Cyprian regarded as the author of the movement (Ep. 50), and directed in their action by NOVATUS (q.v.), who, possibly without being a mere adventurer, nor on the other hand at all deserving Neander's characteristic exculpations, had no doctrine of his own to maintain, but came to Rome simply to endeavour to promote a supposed independence by frustrating the arrangements made by the bishops as to the reception or exclusion of the lapsed. At Carthage therefore he belonged to the broad party, at Rome to the narrow.^d

It is a mistake to suppose that his change of party was unnoted; compare Ep. 52, iii. (4), "damnarum nunc audet sacrificantium manus," with Ep. 43, iii., "nunc se ad perniciem lapsorum verterunt," i.e. by indulgence. It is also a mistake (though Lipsius falls into it, and it is universal with the earlier writers), and introduces confusion into the history, to assume that Novatus made several voyages to and fro. If his arrival be fixed soon after March 5, A.D. 251, it will be found to solve the various problems. Their embassy to Carthage, rejected by the council ("expulsi," Ep. 50, not from Africa, as Pearson), appealed to Cyprian (Ep. 44). They were not prepared to find that he had moved towards leniency as much as Novatian to severity from their late common standpoint; and they are told plainly that their position must now be considered as external to the church. Accepting this, they proceed to construct a schismatic episcopal body with wide alliances. Somewhere close to this point the treatise De Unitate, or the germ of it, was first delivered in the form of a speech, or a read pamphlet, to the council. We assembled again and again. Lipsius has ingeniously conjectured, to meet the second difficulty, that the council empowered Cyprian to recognise Cornelius after their dissolution, if he were satisfied. But the council, before breaking up, were abundantly satisfied on the point, and directed him to be acknowledged (Ep. 45). So that it is out of the question that afterwards Cyprian should have gone to Hadrumetum and suspended its correspondence with Cornelius.

^d It may here clear some difficulties in Cyprian's letters which Maran and others have confused, if we observe that Stephen and Pompey left Rome before Novatian's consecration. It is clear from the sensation they produced that the Novatianist embassy brought the first news of it. The council could "refute and repel" its charges, because, though they had not received (expectavimus) their own commissioners' report (as Maran, V. Cyp. lxi., erroneously), they had been satisfied by Stephen's. Hence supervenerunt, 44 i. (1), means "came on the top of our expectancy," not "came after Novatianist embassy." The council could not, as they did, have excommunicated the embassy at once, if ap till then they had only received Cornelius's letters, of which they were seeking ratification.

reserve an outline of it to a later point. Messengers to Cornelius (PRIMITIVUS, METTIUS, NICEPHORUS acolyte) then convey full accounts of the procedure, and inform him of his general recognition as bishop.*

Simultaneously appeals, which were ultimately successful, were addressed by Cyprian to the Roman confessors to detach themselves from the schism in which they found themselves involved (MOYSES, MAXIMUS). The original work before the council, the restoration of the lapsed, had been facilitated by the two episodes, which had cleared off the extreme parties on either side. They now listened to Cyprian's treatise on the schism; but they inclined to a course even milder than he suggested, while they were less disposed than he to give the "Martyres" any voice in the decisions.^f

Their encyclical is lost, but the particulars are extricable from his Letter to Antonian (Ep. 55), which, since it treats only of the restoration of the libellatici, not of the lapsed, must be earlier than the second council, A.D. 252, and from the verbal resemblance of Ep. 54 (3) to 55 (v.) must be very near the event. We thence gather that they resolved—I. On an individual examination of the libellatici; II. Episcopal restoration of non-sacrificers after penance (Ep. 55 v.); III. Of sacrificers if penitents at death (55, xiv.); IV. No restoration of those who deferred penance till death (55, xix.).

A Roman synod was held in June or July by 60 bishops of Italy, who accepted these decisions, and excommunicated Novatian. Cornelius announced the facts in four (so Tillemont correctly) Greek (so Valois correctly) letters to Antioch (Eus. vi. 43), with two (non-extant) of Cyprian.

Briefly to sum the constitutional results of this First Council of Carthage: 1. The views of the primate are submitted to those of the council; he admits the change (Ep. 55, iii.). 2. The intercession and merits of the martyrs, as affecting the conditions of restoration, are set aside entirely. 3. On the other hand (as against Novatian), no offences are considered to be beyond the regular power of the church to remit. 4 (against Felicissimus). No power except that of the authentic organisation can fix terms of communion. It will be at once seen that the free council of bishops had taken position as a Christian institution, exercising supreme governmental functions, and had laid clear lines as to where church authority resided. They further ruled that there could be no subsequent canvassing of the claims of a bishop once ordained. And the resolutions were issued in the name of the bishops only.

The Reconciliation of the Novatianist Confessors at Rome.—A second embassy of Novatianists followed the report of the first, in order to press Cyprian home; Primus, Dionysius, NICOSTRATUS, EVARISTUS, and above all, NOVATUS; to whose leaving Rome Cyprian does not hesitate partly to ascribe his own next success (Ep. 52 (2), ii.) Cyprian's letters to the Novatianist confessors are among the most beautiful and skilful in the collection; and Augustine cites no less than three times a passage from the letter on their return as embodying the absolute scriptural answer to puritan separations. It is the first exposition of the parable of the Tares, and St. Paul's image of the Great House. Prevailed on by the arguments used to them, and shocked by the consequences of their action, the whole party, with numerous adherents, returned to the Catholic side, and were publicly and magnanimously received, like the leaders of the same sect at Nicaea, and the Donatists at Carthage, and the Arians at Alexandria, without forfeit of dignity (Epp. 49, 52, 53, 46, 54, 51). To Cyprian this was more than an occasion of Christian joy. It was the triumph of his theory (Ep. 51 ad jin.). The Date of this event may be accurately determined as being after the Carthaginian Council, (since Cyprian does not mention this as sitting, in his letters on the confessors, and he read the account of their recantation to the church (Ep. 51), not to the bishops), but prior to the Roman council, or else they would have been excommunicated by it, which they evidently were not; and since Cyprian says they recanted on the departure of Novatus, it was after the second embassy had left Rome.

Treatise on Unity.—The principles of this treatise, read in the council, and sent to the Roman confessors (Ep. 54), so shape all Cyprian's policy, that it is best here to notice it. It indicates its date minutely by allusions to the severe party (Novatian's) (iii. ministros &c. viii. uno in loco &c. ix. feritas x. confessor xi. episcopi nomen xiii. aemuli), and by the absence of allusion to the lax party (Felicissimus), whose schism must have been noticed in such a paper if the question had not been concluded. In c. v. its original form as an address to bishops is traceable. The first appearance of Cyprian's characteristic error about baptism occurs in c. xi.

Its first problem is the existence of schism (as distinct from heresy), "altar against altar," with freedom from corrupt doctrines and lives. The sole security is the ascertainment of the seat of authority and bond of unity. This is indicated by Christ's commission given once to Peter alone, yet again to all the apostles in the same terms. The oneness of the commission and the equality of the commissioned were thus emphasised. The apostleship, continued for ever in the episcopate, is thus universal, yet one: each bishop's authority perfect and independent, yet not forming with the others a mere agglomerate, but being a full tenure on a totality, like that of a shareholder in a joint-stock property. "Episcopatus unus est cujus a singulis in solidum pars tenetur." It is in the above definition, ch. iv., that the famous interpolation has been made, which Roman authorities (Mgr. Freppel, late Professor at the Sorbonne, S. Cyprien et l'Égl. d'Afr. Lect. 12, Professor Hurter, of Innsbruck, SS. PP. Opuscula, v. i. p. 72) even now feel it important to retain. The loss of it suggested the endeavour to make up for it by weaving together other texts from Cyprian to prove that this one after all represented his doctrine; an attempt which would certainly never have been dreamed of if this spurious passage had not seemed to make him so strong a support. Such special pleading is performed with fullest ability by P. Ballerini (A.D. 1756, De vi ac primatu Romm. Pontiff. xiii. § iii. ed. Westhoff, 1845.) The MS. history is to be found fully in Hartel's preface, p. ix. p. xliii. It was rejected by Baluze (p. xiii. p. 397, p. 409, and Latini Bib. S. p. 179 and praef.), and inserted by authority in the editions by Manutius and the Benedictines published in their names. The actual origin of the interpolation is partly in marginal glosses (as Latini proved) and partly in an Epistle of Pelagius, ii. (A.D. 854; Pelag. ii. Ep. 6; Labbe, vol. vi. p. 627; ed. Ven. 1729), who produces as "terrible testimonies of the fathers," a passage of Augustine nowhere else to be found, as well as this one four centuries before it made its way into a manuscript. Its introduction of the primacy of Peter as the centre of unity is a clumsy interruption of the argument and an overthrow of Cyprian's universal principle of the "copiosum corpus Episcoporum" (Ep. 68 iii. 55 xx.) as the core of the visible unity of the church. The rest of the treatise is the development in beautiful language, and the illustration from nature and scripture, of his principle. Schism is a divine test and praedjudicial separation of unbelievers in principle. Lastly, unity in the visible church must mirror the unity of God and the faith, and separations are due, not so much to individual teachings as to a radical selfishness commonly sanctioned in religions, no less than in secular, life.

* There is no reason to suppose with Lipsius (p. 204 n.) that any correspondence is lost, except the synodic epistle about Felicissimus, for Ep. 44 says expressly that the details will be given vidi voce.

^f Ep. 54, iii. 55 v. 3. To postpone the appearance of the De Lapsis to November, as Pearson does, or to any moment after the council was over, is to attribute to Cyprian a publication quite out of date and recommendations already disposed of. Therefore, if 'ultio,' c. l. is to be pressed to mean the death of Declus (which is not necessary in spite of the consensus for it), it only shews that ours is a second edition.

§ The old date, October, is due to the mistake as to Cornelius's election. Jerome calls this synod "Romana Italica Africana," as if it were one with the Carthaginian Synod, (De Scr. Ecc. 66, Labbe, i. pp. 865-8.) and from this phrase Baronius has imagined three councils.

The working of the Legislation.—The legislation had been brought out by the clergy—naturally the austerer class; the one which had most inducements not to fall. It was too severe. The approach of the great plague evoked edicts for sacrifice and roused superstitions which renewed the popular feeling against Christians, and led to the magisterial and popular outbreak of A.D. 252, which is too formally called the Persecution of Gallus (Ep. 59, viii.), and which supernatural presages, not justified by the event, foreshewed as more cruel than that of Decius (Ep. 57, vi.; 58, i.). Of the libellatics some rigorously tried to follow, others openly defied the conciliar enactments (Ep. 57, 65 iii.; 68 ii.). Many palliations appeared on examination. A second council of forty-two bishops at Carthage, held on May 15, 252 (Ep. 59, xiii.), determined to re-admit without exception or postponement all who had continued penitent. Their synodic letter (Ep. 57), by Cyprian's hand, is a complete answer to his former sterner strain. The motive cause is the necessity of strengthening by communion those who will shortly be called to suffer.^h ^h Ep. 64. The synodic letter of the third council characterises the ground for re-admission accepted by the second council as necessitate cogente, and that of the first as infirmirate urgente, and blames bishop Therapius for having neglected both. Ep. 64, therefore, cannot, with Mr. Shepherd (Letter II. p. 10, following Lombert ap.

The Novatianists having attracted converts from heathenism and now given up hope of Cyprian, consecrated their legate Maximus to be (anti-)bishop of Carthage.¹ The lapsed of the lax party, not being penitents, were not admissible on the new conditions; the party had increased to a number reckoned scarcely smaller than the Catholics (Ep. 59, xxi. 17), but the milder terms now offered would diminish them. The leaders therefore needed a more positive basis (Ep. 59, xv. xvi. (14)), and being taunted as the only unepiscopal body among Christians (Ep. 43, v.), procured the adhesion of PRIVATUS (q. v.), a deposed bishop (Ep. 59 xiii.), and consecrated FORTUNATUS a second anti-bishop in Carthage^k by the hands of five bishops.¹ This fact was immensely exaggerated (59 xiv. 11), and Felicissimus sailed to Rome as legate of his new chief, hoping that a recognition might be procured for numbers which would be useful against Novatianism. They reported the unpopularity of Cyprian at Carthage, and threatened to appeal, if rejected, to the Roman laity (Ep. 59, ii. iii. xxv.). Cornelius was disconcerted. Cyprian's observations on this, which begin in a half-sarcastic tone (Ep. 59, ii.), rise to glowing indignation, as he narrates the overwhelming work at this moment entailed on him by the examination in presence of the plebes of the returning schismatics and libellatics. The demand for strictness in readmission comes (as usual after times of trial) from the mass.^m

The leniency of the bishop and council, the gross mistake of a rival episcopacy, and the popular claim for discipline, rapidly broke up the party (59, xxi.) and reduced its congregation to a handful.

Clerical Appeals under the same Regulations.—It is not safe to assert that the terms of readmis-

Pearson, Ann. Cyp. p. 456), be dated before Ep. 57, nor (as Maran) synchronise with it; for they could not censure the neglect of a rule they were in the act of making; and why should only 42 bishops have issued letter 57, out of 66 who issued Ep. 64? Add to which that 64 is written in a peaceful time, such as began with Aemilian Ap. 253. See further Pearson's arguments, of which one is good, one inadequate.

ⁱ Not earlier. Ep. 52 ii. Novatus has not yet made a bishop in Carthage. Ep. 59 xi. Maximus is spoken of as sent nuper (A.D. 251) consecrated nunc (the Ep. being subsequent to Id. Mai. A.D. 252). From Ep. 53 x., we find they had bishops in many places before Council II. The step, then, had been delayed in Carthage, and this must have been because they still had hopes of Cyprian, which, though misplaced, seem to me not unnatural.

^k Dean Milman (Lat. Chr. vol. i. p. 48) apparently missed the fact that there were two anti-bishops, one of each extreme; and also fell into the error of making Fortunatus a Novatianist.

^l These were Privatus of Lambaese, condemned by a council of 90 bishops, under Donatus, Cyprian's predecessor, Felix, a pseudo-bishop of Privatus's making; REPOSTUS, a lapsed bishop, Maximus and Jovinus, Sacrificati, whom from their having been condemned by nine bishops, and then by the first council, I conclude to have been bishops.

^m Socrates' (v. 19) statement that this was the occasion on which Penitentiaries were first appointed to hear private confession, seems counter to the whole spirit of the time. Sozomen (vii. 6) represents the Roman mode of penance much later, when the bishop is himself the fellow penitent and the absolver. This contradiction of his statement that Penitentiaries were an institution in the West as well as the East, shews how little was known of the origin or date of the office.

sion for clerics were considered separately at the second council, but immediately after it is accepted that lapsed bishops and clerks could never resume orders (Ep. 55, ix.). In Ep. 65 Cyprian rests this on the Levitical institution and on his own visions. In Ep. 67 vi. however he speaks of all bishops being agreed on this. In Ep. 72, iii., four years later, the principle extends to presbyters and deacons who had taken part in a heresy or schism. And at first sight it presents a singularly contradictory appearance of laxity that only Novatianists and Donatists held the indelibility of orders to be such that their recanting bishops resumed their functions (Optatus, i. p. 27).

There are three cases. 1. THERAPIUS, bishop of Bulla, admits Victor, a lapsed presbyter, without due penance. Fidus, bishop, reports this to the third council of sixty-seven bishops (A.D. 253), considering that Victor should be re-excommunicated. The council decline to rescind the boon of "God's Priest," but censure Therapius, apparently in his place (Ep. 64—objurgare et instruisse), for neglecting the terms of the second council without any consultation of the laity. The same letter (ad Fidum, 64) contains an important decision as to age of baptism. [v. FIDUS.]

2. Fortunatus, bishop of Assuræ, lapsed, and in his place was elected Epictetus; but the lapsed party (Ep. 65, v. iii.) on their return claimed for him the function and emoluments. The ground of order would have been sufficient; but Cyprian, with his characteristic error, urges the vitiation of any church function discharged by an unworthy minister, and recommends individual canvassing, if necessary, to unite the flock under Epictetus.

3. The most important case is that of BASILIDES and MARTIAL (q. v.), in A.D. 254, when the Spanish churches of Leon, Astorga, and Merida appeal to Cyprian against the negligent decision of Stephanus, now bishop of Rome, in favour of the restoration of their lapsed bishops. The letter of the Carthaginian council of thirty-seven bishops, A.D. 254 (Ep. 67), penned by Cyprian, declares the verdict of the bishop of Rome mistaken and to be disregarded. This letter also insists on the duty of a laity to withdraw from communion with a "sacrilegious" or "sinful" bishop, and marks the universal sense that there resided in a congregation no power to make valid the sacramental acts of a nominee who lacked the note of true orders (Ep. 67, iii.; compare Routh, vol. iii. p. 152).

Practical Organisations and Christian Culture.

(a) Captivity.—During the session of the council an extensive raid was executed by the Berbers, who, severely ruled as they were without any attempt to civilise them, were beginning that steady advance on Numidia which in a few years replaced the whole range of Ferratus in their possession. In 252 their front line reached from Thubunæ on the salt-marsh to the terebinth forests of Tuca, and they deported large numbers of the Christians of no less than eight sees. Several inscriptions relate to this invasion (see Revue Afric. vols. iv. vii. viii.). About 800 pounds was subscribed by the sixty bishops and Carthaginian community (Ep. 62), and sent to them.

(b) Plague.—But the great field on which the expanding powers of humanity were gathered up and animated by the church was opened by the great plague which reached Carthage in A.D. 252, having travelled two years from Ethiopia through Egypt. Great physical disturbances had preceded it (ad Dem. ii. 1, vii. 5). The eruption and the brain affection which marked the plague of Athens are not recorded of this; nor yet the pulmonary symptoms, which, perhaps, were not developed in the African climate. The other symptoms seem to be identical, and the devastation far more awful, extensive, and enduring. It lasted twenty years; reduced the population of Alexandria by half; destroyed the armies of Valerian before Sapor; kept the Goths off the Thracian border, and for some time killed five thousand persons daily in Rome (v. Eutrop. ix. v.; Hist. Aug. Galli, v. p. 177; Dionys. ap. Eus. vii. 22; Greg. Nyss. Vit. Greg. Thaum. § 12). The efforts of the emperors Gallus and Valerian in burying the dead were appreciated, otherwise their efforts were confined to supplications to Saturn and Apollo. (See three types of coins of Gallus in British Museum, and see Cohen, Méailles Impér. vol. iv. p. 270; Bandusi, vol. i. p. 58.)

Horrible scenes of desertion and spoliation ensued in Carthage as in Athens (Pontii Vit. Cyp. and Cyp. ad Dem. 10 (8) 11 (9)), when universal physical terror or audacity overpowered all other sentiments. As in Neo-Cæsarea and Alexandria so in Carthage, the Christian clergy stood out as the first champions of life, health, and feeling. Cyprian addressed his community in a speech, which it was wished could have been delivered to the city from the rostrum, on the duty and divineness of prayer and help to the persecutors (Respondere Natalibus was his watchword), and then proposed and carried a scheme for the systematic care of the city. Filled with his motives and under his influence rich and poor undertook the parts he assigned, raised a large fund, formed a nursing staff and burial staff, and allowed no religious distinction in their ministrations. But their abstinence from religious processions and sacrifices marked the Christians as enemies of God and man, and the "Overseer of the Christians" was demanded by name for a contest with a lion (Epp. 59, viii.; 66, 44). The terrible work lasted on till his exile five years later, as we must conclude from Pontius' juxtaposition of the events, with his remark that exile was the reward for "withdrawing from human sight a horror like hell."

(c) Ad Demetrianum.—Their chief foe was an aged magistrate (sub ipso exitu Dem. 25 (22)), not the pro-consul (Pearson), but perhaps one of the five primores, formerly an inquirer into the truth of Christianity, in Cyprian's own friendship (i.), now himself an inventor of accusations (c. 2) and tortures, xii. (10). The pamphlet in which Cyprian assails him is much wider in its aim than Tertullian's ad Scapulam; both have the remonstrance against the suppression of the one natural worship, the appeal to the demeanour of the now prevalent sect (pars paene major cujusque civitatis) to the effects of exorcism, and the influence through suffering of the Christians. But while Tertullian for once refrains from denunciation, and is almost gentle in his examples of warning, Cyprian's object is wider; he answers the question, "Whence all this political and this physical misery?" The heathen answer attributed it to the divine displeasure at toleration. Cyprian accepts also a certain theory of mundane decrepitude, but bases his real reply on the general dissolution of the bonds of society; an important passage, perhaps the very earliest on slavery (viii. (5)), marks the exact stage reached by the Christian consciousness on this subject.

So also the theory of Resentment is exhibited in a certain stage of purification, though some of the language would be intolerable now. The eternal conservation of beings for eternal suffering is laid down (xxiv. 21). The most original part of the essay is the development for the first time of the Theory of Probation (already struck out in his slightly earlier epistle 58 to Thibaris) as grouping the phenomena of humanity.

Jerome hastily (Ep. 83 ad Magn.; Lact. Inst. 5, 4) criticises Cyprian for advancing scriptural proofs to a heathen. 1. But Demetrian already knew something of Christianity. 2. Cyprian does not quote authors' names, as to one familiar; 3. quotes nothing but plainly fulfilled predictions. All which (as well as the classical tone and quotations) fits the case exactly, and answers Rettberg's incompetent conjecture that Demetrian is a fancy figure.

(d) On the Mortality.—This treatise, or epistle as Augustine calls it (he quotes it no less than six times), presents to the Christians the consolatory primitive view of the topics set threateningly before Demetrian. It is meant to elevate their view of both the persecution and the plague, from which some expected providential exemptions, while others hated it only as an interference with martyrdom; he explains his theory of probation and of predictions as evidencing a divine plan. He cannot reject, but he gives a Christian turn to the general belief in the world's decay; urges organisations for relief of suffering; treats moral causes in society as affecting general and even physical phenomena. In c. xxvi. occurs what seems more than a coincidence with phrases in the Te Deum. In c. xx. he condemns the use of black for mourners.

(e) On Work and Alms.—A pastoral, which may indeed be connected with the incidents of Ep. 62, but more probably has a wider reference to the demands made by the plague and coincident troubles on the exertions and liberality of the Christians. Among circumstances known to us directly it would be more natural to link it to the great speech which Pontius mentions as having been delivered at that time to the community. Here again we find Cyprian working out the new faith into a life-system; philosophically (as in a kind of Tusculan) adjusting moral feeling and practice to the newly gained higher facts about God and Man. See ch. ix. x. xi. practically developing that "loss is gain," and "gain is loss," to those who are within the care of Christ, xvi. Christ becomes a social element which uplifts the poor; their claims take precedence of family claims; the possession of a family only increases the obligation to his poor.—In xxii. a bold passage, almost Goethesque, in which Satan apostrophises Christ on the superior liberality of his own school.—The Doctrine of the first part i-vii. develops the unfortunate conception (which is roundly stated also Ep. 55, xviii. (14)), of Good Works acting on sins done after baptism, as baptism acts to remit former sin. Neander (Ch. Hist. vol. i. p. 391, Bohn) remarks that while this same thought appears in Tertullian (De Poenit.), yet no one person can be looked on as the author of it. It is a natural and popular materialistic germ of the doctrines of Rome on penance.

(f) The Exhortation to Confessorship is a practical manual of scripture passages, connected by brief remarks, under thirteen heads of reflection. It was compiled at the request of a layman, Fortunatus. Its existence sufficiently indicates the extent of suffering which a persecution developed. A more sober tone as to the perceptions of the martyrs is perceptible. The introduction of the seven Maccabees not only as examples, but as a type of unity (ad Fort. xi.) dates this as later than De Unitate, where every other possible type is accumulated but not this one. The teaching on probation also marks the stage of his thoughts. He computes the world to be near 6000 years old (ad Fort. ii. Compare Tert. de V. V. i.).

(g) On the Lord's Prayer.—To promote intelligent devotion was his next aim. This treatise is written with precision and with visible delight. The time is clearly shewn by his deductions on unity (xxiv. cf. De Unit. xiv. (12)); on the danger of withholding communion from penitents (De Or. xviii.), and on the confessor's temptations to arrogance (xxiv.).

Cyprian follows Tertullian freely, not transcribing as before; adopts the African 'ne nepatariis induci' without remark (cf. Aug. de Dono Persev. vi. 12), and 'fiat in caelo' (id. iii. 6) illustrates more fully from scripture, and uses a different version. His silence probably evinces Tertullian's success in remonstrating against superstitious observances in praying (Tert. Deor. xi. xvi.), and he does not, like his 'Master,' hail the 'confusion of nations' as a mark of the kingdom; but in his expansion of the symbolism of praying thrice a day we have the earliest use of Trinitas in Latin as a name of Deity (in Tert. adv. Prax. 3, it is not exactly this). In A.D. 427 Augustine (Ep. ccxv.) used the treatise successfully with the monks of Adrumetum to prove the Pelagian errors contrary to the Cyprianic doctrine. He quotes this short treatise of 'victoriosissimus Cyprianus' elsewhere thirteen times to the same effect. Yet not one term occurs in it which became technical in that controversy; a fact which would alone evince its early date. Mr. Shepherd, however (Fourth Letter to Dr. Maitland, 1853), has undertaken to prove that its writer was acquainted with the work of Chromatius (d. A.D. 406) and is more "sacramental" than that author, Gregory Nyssen, or Chrysostom; and than Augustine's doubt as to the application of the 'daily bread' allows, he observes that Venantius (6th cent.) does not use it, though his predecessor, Hilary, refers the readers of his commentary to it in preference to commenting himself; having thus satisfied himself of the lateness of the Cyprianic treatise, Mr. Shepherd therefore asperses the genuineness of the great Augustinian works which cite it.

The critical comparison with Chromatius requires for its statement a minuteness and space here inadmissible. But the result of such investigation has been to leave no doubt that Cyprian is the middle term between Tertullian and Chromatius. Briefly, Chromatius knows no argument or illustration of Tertullian's which Cyprian has not employed; almost every one of these has in Chromatius (though a most condensed prosaic writer) some additional Cyprianic touch or colour adhering to it. Observe too Chromatius' insertion of the negative in his qui nequam crediderunt (§ iv.) in mistaken elucidation of Cyprian's obscure in illis credentibus (§ xvii.) precisely as later MSS. and editors have altered it. As to the Eucharistic language about daily bread, it is admittedly not more strong than in other Cyprianic treatises, nor visibly stronger than Chromatius. The Antiochene fathers of course are not Eucharistic in this clause because they followed Origen's interpretation of ἐπιθόστος. Augustine will not strictly limit the petition to the Eucharist (though for singular reasons, Serm. 56, 57, 58), but his more analytical, yet more mystical treatment of it is distinctly in a later mood than the simply moral handling of Cyprian.

That Venantius does not mention Cyprian in his unfinished treatise surely demands no explanation. His aim is more theological and his language very compressed. But tinges of Cyprian are perceptible in the passages on Sonship; perseverance; reigning with Christ; resistance to God's will, and ourselves being made heavenly to do it; but we may add that Ambrose's omission to comment on verses 1-5 of chap. xi. is inexplicable except for the existence of some standard treatise, such as is mentioned by Hilary (Mt. V.). "De orationis Sacramento necessitate nos commendandi Cyprianus liberavit."

Interval.—Cornelius' exile, with others, to Civita Vecchia, his decease in June 253, as a martyr, in the then sense of the word, the short episcopate of Lucius, his exile, speedy return, and death, not later than 5th March, A.D. 254 (Cyp. Epp. 60, 61, 67, 68), find place in Cyprian's correspondence,^a not without some undue exaggerations, as when he compares the reappearance of Lucius to that of John Baptist, as heralding the advent. Not later than this we place the epistle (63) to bishop Caecilius, reproving the omission of wine in the chalice, and distinctly indicating the symbolical importance of a mixed cup; the necessity of a congregation to constitute a sacrament; the irregularity of evening communion.

To Sept. 253, and its council of 66 bishops, belongs the condemnation of the postponing for even a few days, on ritual grounds, the administration of the other sacrament to infants. To it belongs the affair of THERAPIUS, as above.

Changed Relations with Rome, and Cyprian's Error of Re-baptism.—In A.D. 254, Easter was on April 23, Stephanus was made bishop of Rome May 12, the Carthaginian Council met towards autumn (September?).

It had seemed to Cyprian a token of divine displeasure at the Novatianists, that they did not suffer with the church; and their prosperity might have seemed to form Stephen's policy in so anti-puritan a mould, except for his overindulgence to MARCION (q. v.), the Novatianist bishop of Arles (Ep. 68); but his was rather a policy of general resistance to the spiritual power compacted by Cyprian and Cornelius; a policy of the widest comprehension on the one basis of submissiveness to his see. The cases of BASILIDES and MARTIAL have been mentioned. Cyprian's tone to him is one of both compassion and dictation (Ep. 68), and from his letter to FLORENTIUS PUPPIENUS (66) it is plain that others besides Stephen felt, rightly or wrongly, more than aversion to the immense influence of Cyprian. And, although the whole church has decided that Stephen was right in the great controversy which arose, it was long before his character recovered the shock of his impetuous collision with Cyprian, and grew capable of his fictitious crown of martyrdom.

The next group of documents belongs to the years A.D. 255 and 256, and is occupied with the controversy on Re-baptism (Epp. 69-75, Sentt. Epp. lxxxvii.). For though Cyprian objects to that term (Ep. 73, i.) catholic doctrine insists on the assertion it involves.

Notwithstanding the council of AGRIPPINUS, and the reception of thousands of heretics by re-baptism in the African church (Ep. 73, iii.), numbers had been readmitted without it (Ep. 73, xxiii.; Aug. says the practice had fallen off). On the other hand, though Stephen appeals to the constant tradition of his church against re-baptizing, this is simply to ignore the action of Callistus (Hippolytus, p. 291, a passage which is against the idea of that author's Novatianism, but which Hefele monstrosly wants to apply to Agrippinus (Hist. des Conciles, vol. i. p. 87, Paris). An allusion to Stephen (Ep. 69, x.) seems to imply that Stephen stirred the question first. Rettberg considers after Maran that his Oriental dispute had already occurred (p. 170). So Hefele. But this is not necessary. Cyprian (de Un. xi.) early committed himself to language as strong as he ever used again.

The original inquiry is whether the non-heretical Novatianists, baptized as such, can be received to catholic communion. It extended itself (73, iv.), until the case of Marcionites and even Ophites was debated; Stephen would include, and Cyprian exclude, all. At first the difficulty was only "Is not the exclusive African practice itself a Novatianist mark—being otherwise used only in that sect?" Our briefest method will be first to enumerate the documents, and then to classify their often repeated arguments.

[1.] Magnus, a layman, makes the first application, and is replied to by Cyprian with affectionate respect (Ep. 69). [2.] The bishops of Numidia who, though without formal vote, had adopted the practice, apply next; the reply is from 33 bishops of Africa, with the presbyters of Carthage (Ep. 71). This is Cyprian's Fifth Council and First on Baptism. Ep. 70 is their conciliar declaration of the necessity of (re)baptism. [3.] A Mauritanian bishop, Quintus, is answered in Ep. 71, enclosing Ep. 70, now widely circulated (71, iv.), breathing an injured tone as towards Stephen, and indicating that the council had not been unanimous (Ep. 71, i., plurimi . . . nescio qua præsumptione quidam).

[4.] The De bono Patientiae was published about this time to be, without one word upon the subject matter of the controversy, a calming voice in the rising storm. The De Zelo et Litore is generally (and probably) thought to be a very little later in date, and similar in purpose. It is equally reticent on passing events, unless (in vi. 5) there may be an allusion to Novatian. There are a few close verbal resemblances between the two treatises, especially in De Pat. xix. (11) and De Zelo, iv. and v.

[5.] Next year, A.D. 256, the 6th Council under Cyprian and 2nd on Baptism, composed of 71 bishops, Numidian and African,^o unanimously reaffirm the opinion in an unconciliatory synodical epistle to Stephen, conscious of the offence they will give, and enclosing the 70th and 71st epistles. This epistle is mentioned by Jerome, adv. Lucif. But Augustine (Resp. ad Epp. 15) seems not to have seen it, which is strange.

[6.] Jubaian, a bishop of Mauritania, forwards to Cyprian a copy of a paper there circulating, with some authority, which recognises even Marcion's baptism (Ep. 73, iv.). It may have been issued by one of those native bishops who dissented (Sentt. Epp. 59, 38, and cf. Aug. Resp. ad Epp. 52, con. Donat. vii. 16, 6). Rettberg agrees with 'Constant. Ep. Pontif. p. 226,' that it was Stephen's letter to the East. Cyprian sent Jubaian a reply so elaborate, that, at the final council, he read it aloud as his own best exposition of his views, with Jubaian's convinced answer. Cyprian's letter went accompanied with all the documents sent to Stephen, and a copy of his Patience.

[7.] A deputation of bishops waited on Stephen but were not received (Ep. 75, xxv.); the letter which they bore was answered (74, i) in terms appreciative of the greatness of the question (75, xvii.), but not arguing it, charitable to the separatists, affirming the tradition, (75, v.; 73, xiii.) resting on the authority of the see (75, xvii.), and styling Cyprian "a pseudo-Christ, a pseudo-apostle and treacherous worker." It would be unfair not to recognise anxiety under the word "treacherous," while Fabian of Antioch, by dallying with Novatianism, was complicating Stephen's position; and Cyprian's own language as to "favourers of Antichrist" (69, x.) had exposed him to retaliation. Stephen had circulated in the East a paper which awakened "lites et dissensiones per ecclesias totius mundi" (75, xxiv.), declaring he would hold no communion with bishops who used second baptism (Ep. 75, xxiv.; 74, viii. Dionys. Al. ap. Eus. vii. 5).^p

The natural reply of the metropolitan of Cappadocia was "Thou hast excommunicated thyself."

The general history of re-baptism must be read elsewhere, but it was held in Cappadocia, Pamphylia, and other regions of Asia Minor as a practice received "from Christ and from the apostle" (75, xix.), and it had been confirmed by the councils of Synnada and Iconium.^q

^o A.D. 312. The relations of Numidia with Carthage seem unsettled (Hefele, Conciles, vol. i. p. 170).

^p H. Valois is right, I believe, in thinking this a threat. Routh thinks it was actual excommunication, and Lipsius that he excommunicated Cyprian. Observe that several bishops of the seventh council were very early in the Roman calendar for iv. 1d. Sep.

^q Lipsius's reasons (pp. 219, 20) for dating Iconium so late as A.D. 255 are surely quite insufficient. Eusebius (vii. 3) says Cyprian was πρώτος τῶν λόγων to hold re-baptism, which is a most accurate expression. He has already said that it had been held in very populous churches, and Dionysius the Great^r recommended forbearance to Stephen, and to the eminent Roman presbyters Dionysius and Philemon.

[8.] Pompey, bishop of Sabrata on the Syrtis, was the next inquirer, asking for Stephen's reply (Ep. 74). Cyprian sends it with the antidote, a fine letter, though not moderate, closing with an amendment on the canon of Stephen. Pompey was convinced if he had wavered, and his proxy at the council was presented by his neighbour the bishop of Oea.

[9.] The 7th council of Carthage, or 3rd on baptism, held September 1, A.D. 256. Eighty-seven bishops of all the three provinces, with presbyters and deacons, met in the presence of a vast laity.^s

The council opened with the reading of the Jubaian correspondence, and the letter to Stephen (Sent. 8), and with a brief speech from Cyprian, large and pacific (Aug. R. Epp.). Each bishop then by seniority delivered his opinion, of which we have a verbal report: from some a good argument, from some a text, an antithesis, an analogy, or a fancy: here a rhetorical sentence, there a solecism, or an unfinished clause; a simple restatement, a personality, a fanaticism; two of the juniors vote with the majority on the ground of inexperience. But on the whole we must admire the temper and the ability of so large a number of speakers. The council had a great moral effect. It kept Roman influence at bay for a long time.

Jerome is mistaken in asserting in his youthful contra Luciferianos, that these fathers recanted. The custom was not specifically repealed till the synod of Arles, nor for Asia Minor till the first of Constantinople. But, from peculiar circumstances, it was specially accepted in the East, and is the basis now of the rebaptism by the Jacobites, not only of heretics and Nestorians, but of orthodox Christians.^t has told us of the old council of Agrippinus which declared it. Asia had quietly continued, Africa had mostly dropped the practice, and Cyprian was the first τῶν λόγων to revive it. Lipsius is actually driven by his own special pleading to say there were two synods of Iconium "which must not be confounded," one named by Firmilian, and one by Dionysius—about the baptism of heretics—at the same place—at very considerable interval—both making exactly the same declaration.

^r Jerome (Script. Eccl.) says Dionysius took the strict view. Himself seems (Eus. vii. 9) to say the opposite, and cf. vii. 7.

^s I believe the above will be found a simple and sufficient account of the circumstances of the correspondence, and that there is no want of Moshelm's and Rettberg's little amusement of inventing lost documents. The letter of Stephanus shewn to Pompelius is the same which Firmilian saw. The legation of course presented the synodical letter, which was meant to be final: accordingly Cyprian (in Sent. Ep.) speaks of the question as resting henceforth with individual bishops.

^t Of the seventh council Mr. Shepherd says, "wonderful to say, it has a date." So has the second (Ep. 59, xlii.). Of another event he remarks, "It would have been far more natural to have said A.D. 180, or some such date." It would have been an excessively interesting use of the Christian era, and Mr. Shepherd has doubtless noted the careful dates of other documents, Tertullian's historical allusions, Augustine's letters. The paucity of dates is, however, singular. It may have some connexion with the African hostility, even to civil usages dependent on heathenism. The Donatists at Carthage, A.D. 411, treat the fact that the acts of the council

Before the winter of 256^a Cyprian's messengers to Firmilian returned with [10] his reply, the most enthusiastic letter of the series. We have it in Cyprian's translation from the Greek.^x

It has points of great interest; compares the bishop of Rome to Judas; shews the antiquity of rebaptism in Asia; touches on their annual synods; the fixed and extempore portions of the liturgy; the quasi-supremacy of Jerusalem; the unity under wide divisions. For arguments to the point it relies on Cyprian's letters.

We will now briefly classify Cyprian's arguments and the answers to them, avoiding the making him responsible for his partisans, whose judgment in council (vii.) differs much from his. Firmilian on the other hand summarises sensibly. Cyprian then urges for Rebaptism (A), OBJECTIVE grounds. (a) The unity of the church, viz. that in the critical point of "church and non-church," schism does not differ from heresy (69, iii.): the representation of sacred acts outside not equivalent to sacred acts within: "one Lord, one faith," there may be, but not "one baptism," for this implies "one church," which the schismatic renounces. (b) Unity of Belief. In its African form the creed ran, "Dost thou believe the remission of sins and life everlasting through holy church?" and was accordingly null at the moment of baptism away from the church. (c) Baptism is a function of holy orders on account of its remissory virtue in respect of sin (not Tertullian's doctrine (De Bap. xvii.)), and holy orders have no being outside the church (73, vii.), so that the whole question of episcopal authority as the bond of unity and divine organisation is involved^y (Ep. 72, i.), and if external baptism is true, the church has many centres; not one foundation rock, but several (75, xvii.). The separatist teacher surrenders (70, ii.) the animating, unifying Spirit, and cannot through his personal earnestness convey that Spirit to followers by baptizing them^z (Ep. 69). (d) The imposition of hands on the readmitted separatist expresses that he has not, but needs to receive, the Holy Ghost: Stephen's party use this rite, and quote the apostles at Samaria in instance. But without that Spirit how could the separatist consecrate even the water? or the unction of confirmation? (Ep. 70, i.; cf. Sentt. Epp. 18; on the significance of this "royal" oil, see Bunsen; and on the Novatianist misuse of it, Ruth, vol. iii. pp. 69, 70.) Above all, how give the New Birth which, as the essence of the sacrament, is essentially the Spirit's act (Ep. 74, v. vi. &c.)? (e) Baptism in the absence of the Spirit is a Judaic, a carnal rite; a defilement, more than a deceiving semblance, a material pollution (Ep. 75, xiii.; 72, i.; 73, xxi.; 69, xvi.; cf. Sedatus, Sentt. Epp. 18; Victor Gordub. Sentt., whom Augustine criticises as going to lengths beyond Cyprian; still the frightful expression of De Unit. xi. involves all this). The pretender can "neither justify nor sanctify" (69 x.), who but the holy can hallow (69, ii.)? who but the living give life (71, i.)? (f) Christ not present to make up for the unworthiness of the minister. For if so His Spirit could not be absent (75, xii.), and that he is absent is admitted by the necessity for imposition of hands (id. xiii.).

(B.) Subjective grounds. (a) Faith of recipient insufficient (Ep. 73, 75, ix.): to be effective must be true; but is deficient in cardinal point, viz. the remission of sins by the church, even if not false, and, as often, blasphemous (73, iv. v. 74); (b) not secured by the formula. In the Roman church there was still such absence of rigidity that it was argued that without the Trinal form baptism into Christ's name sufficed (Ep. 74, v.). Cyprian however points to the clear words of institution, and appeals to common reason to decide whether one is truly baptized into the Son who denies his Humanity (Ep. 73 v.),^a or treats the God of the Old Testament as evil (74, iii.): even if the genuine formula be used, still the rite is no question of words; the absent Christ and Spirit are not bound by them as a spell. (c) Incapable of definition. It is not the church's part to graduate departures from the faith. Even death in behalf of a heresy cannot restore to the church. If what is universally accepted as ipso facto baptism (in blood) is unavailing, how can ordinary extraneous baptism be more (Ep. 73, xxi.; De Unit. xiv. (12) xix.; or Dom. xxiv.?)

(C.) The historical argument is handled by Cyprian in the most masterly way. (a) Usage is not worth considering as more than an apology for ignorance; cannot be matched against reason (71, iii. 73); (b) is not universal on side of Stephen (Ep. 71); (c) cannot be inferred from the non-baptism of restored perverts: their case episcopis dedit" in the mouth of one of the bishops Sentt. Ep. 17.

^x "Qui non habet quomodo dat?" became a catchword of the Donatists. The reply of the Catholics was "Deum esse datorem" (Optat. p. 103).

^a The basis of this is Tert. de Bap. xv.

of Circa, A.D. 305, commence with the consular date as an evidence against their genuineness. The Catholics reply, that though the Donatists avoid dates, the Catholics use them. But it may be that the Donatists preserve the old puritanic tradition. Cf. Aug. Brev. Coll. c. Don. p. 569, 31. diel, cap. xv. § 26, 27. (Athanasius's objection to the date in the creed of Sirmio is of another colour.) For an account of the Romanist assaults on it, see Rettberg, pp. 189, 90. Augustine accepted it, when some wished to make it of Donatist origin, on the ground of its containing so much against Donatism.

^y Stephen died, and Cyprian was exiled before the winter of 257.

^z It is impossible not to recognise Cyprian's style in it; equally impossible not to see the Greek [A] in some of its compound phrases and coupled epithets (e.g. i. magnam voluntatis caritatem in unum convenire; iii. velociter currentes, iv. quoniam sermo . . . distribuatur, &c.) [B] In the literal (sometimes awkward) rendering of words; iv. seniores et praepositi (=presbyteri et episcopi) for πρεσβύτεροι καὶ προεπίστοτες; vii. praesident majores natu, where Cyprian could not have used presbyteri, and yet age is not to the point; fratribus tam longe positis (μακρὰν κεκείμενους); v. inexcusabilem: vi. eos qui Romae sunt; aequaliter quae; vii. possident potestatem; x. nec vexari in aliquo; quamvis ad imaginem veritatis tamen; xxiii. volentibus vivere; xii. Nos etiam illos quos hi qui. [C] Instances where the Greek is not thoroughly mastered; viii. nisi si his episcopis quibus nunc minor fuit Paulus (? τῶν ὄντων); xii. ut per eos qui cum ipsi, &c.; cum unmeaning—observe in ix. patrias of local persecutions in Asia Minor. The remarkable translation of Ep. 4, 3, in xxiv. is in the same words as in three other places of Cyprian, and differs from every other known rendering; even the African Nemesianus in this council uses curantes instead of satisfagentes.

differs from that of heathens, who had (to begin with) been made heretics, not Christians. (d) The practice of heretical bodies, which had always recognised any previous baptism, was no example to the church (74, iv.); nor could the Novatianist practice of rebaptism be a warning against it (73, ii.); it was either accidental coincidence, or imitation (simiarum more), and, if the latter, it was evidence. (e) Casuistic difficulties upon the necessity of "regeneration within the church" as to the position of unbaptized martyrs (73, xxii.), heretics hitherto readmitted and deceased (xxiv.), cases of rebaptism where baptism had been valid, baptism by a demoniac, are met by Cyprian with a breadth of which St. Augustine (contra Crescon. ii. 41) says, in the midst of his refutation, "such simplicity is enough for me."

(D.) Biblical arguments.—The familiar ones need no more than enumeration: the one loaf; one cup; the ark; the schismatic (not heretical) gainsaying of Korah; the apostles' baptism of men who had already received the Spirit, à fortiori needed for those who confessedly had not. We may admire the ingenuity with which he treats such passages as Acts ii. 38, in Ep. 73, xvii., or Phil. i. 18, in Ep. 74, 75, 73, xiv.; but about many Cyprian might fairly be addressed in the words which Optatus (b. iv. p. 96) uses to Parmenian: "You batter the law to such purpose that wherever you find the word Water there you conjure out of it some sense to our disadvantage." He probably originated the application of Ecclus. xxxiv. 25, "Qui baptizatur a mortuo quid profeit lavatio ejus," which the Donatists constantly quote against Augustine, and which Augustine answers only by referring mortuus to a heathen priest or vicious Christian instead of a heretic. He quotes several times the LXX* addition to Prov. ix. 19, "Drink not of the strange font," and Jer. xv. 18, ii. 13, "Deceiving waters," "broken cisterns." In some of these applications there is poetical force, as of his favourite "garden enclosed and fountain sealed," and of the doctrines of New Birth and Sonship (Ep. 74, v. vi.); in Heresy who was never the Spotless Spouse we can never find a mother (Ep. 75).

To this Stephen finely answers that she was an unnatural mother indeed (75, xiv.) who exposed her children so soon as they were born, but that the church's part was to seek them and bring them home and rear them for Christ.

Dispersed as this system of Cyprian's lies, through his correspondence and tracts, it will be seen that in his mind it was not fragmentary, but logical and coherent. Over the theory promulgated by one of his powers and character, backed by an army of bishops,^b moving as one man under him, yet independent enough each to find their own telling arguments (Conc. III.), Stephen's triumph without a council, against remonstrances from the East, and hindered by his own pretentiousness and ucharitableness,^c was great. It was deserved also, for Rome represented freedom, comprehensiveness, and safe latitude.

^b Some required exorcism (Senti. 7, 8, 31); some declared heretics worse than heathens; a painfully early development.

^c Animosus, iracundus; again, audacia, insolentia, inhumanitas are some of the sins charged to him.

She decided upon one grand principle, the same on which Jerome afterwards decided the analogous question of re-ordination (adv. Lucif.). Cyprian's principle was the same which blinded Tertullian (de Bapt. xv.); which was extended by the Donatists to make moral defects in the minister debar grace;^d which led Knox and Calvin to deny baptism to the infant children of "papists," and the Genevan divines to allow it, on the hope that "the grace which had adopted" the great-grandfathers might not yet be so "wholly extinct that the infants should have lost their right to the common seal" (Hooker, iii. 1, 12).

Augustine (Resp. ad Episcopos) developed the categorical answer to each separate argument of Cyprian and his bishops, but the true solution was applied at once by Stephen. The grace of baptism is of Christ, not of the human baptizer. He who baptizes does not "give being or add force" to the sacrament. Cyprian's language about "justifying and sanctifying" may well have shocked the Church of Rome, and makes Stephen's anger partly intelligible. The child or heathen who learns Christ through the teaching of the heretic cannot be charged with "defect or disorder," in the reception of a sacrament, to which he comes with purest faith, and which it is the will of God to impart to all. Though excluded "from fellowship in holy duties with the visible church," he is still a member of such visible church. (Ep. 73, xvi. We must take the fragmentary quotation, 75, i. "Si quis ergo a quacunq; haeresi venerit" with the other, "In nomine Christi baptizatus," and compare Routh, R. S. vol. iii. p. 183.)

The only real blot which Cyprian struck was the vulgar explanation of the laying on of hands at re-admission. Upon that hypothesis his own view was justifiable. But the act was not really understood by the intelligent to be the imparting of the Spirit for the first time to those who had it not; it was the renewing by the Spirit, and introducing to communion of a repentant and now enlightened child of God.^e "A son of God" in spite of any theological error, Stephen declares him in the fullest sense to be (Ep. 74, vi.; 75, xvii.). The expression seems to have been much cavilled at in Carthage, and is mentioned even in Ep. 72, after the second council.

And now it ought to be noticed that (as the Novatianists saw) Cyprian had a real point of contact with Novatianism. In the instance of Lapse he discovered its fallacy. In the instance of Heresy he fell into it. The visible church, according to him, included the worst moral sinner in expectation of his penitence; it excluded the most virtuous and orthodox baptized Christian

^d Of the use they made of Cyprian himself see Aug. contra Crescon. li. xxlii. 40: "Scripta Cypriani nobis tanquam firmamenta canonice auctoritatis opponitis." (Cf. Ep. 93, ad Vincent.; Epp. 104, 9, ad Acrob.)

^e Optatus, B. v. p. 99, well expresses it: "Has res unicuique non ejusdem rei operarius sed credentis fides et Trinitas praestat." By implication he answers many of the detailed difficulties, but the great name of Cyprian visibly restrains him. Again, p. 103: "Omnes qui baptizant operarios esse non dominos et sacramenta per se sancta esse non per homines."

^f Besides its use in ordination the imposition of hands had three intentions. 1. Confirmation. 2. Reception of penitents. 3. Exorcism. The 2nd is what Stephen applies here. The 3rd was desired by some extreme partisans.

who had not been baptized by a catholic minister.⁵

Nevertheless although the Roman church then took a wider view than Cyprian as to the sonship of man to God, Cyprian was much greater (and this is the true church-moral of this part of his history), upon the possibility and duty of union in diversity. Augustine well draws out the independence of thought and action which Cyprian wished to be maintained without exclusiveness, and tells us (Aug. v. de Bapt. 17) how he was never weary of reading the conclusion of the epistle to Quintus. Every bishop was free to judge for himself, none to be persecuted for his views, and therefore every one to be tender of the bonds of peace: "Salvo jure communionis diversa sentire."

The unanimity of such early councils and their erroneousness are a remarkable monition. Not packed, not pressed; the question broad; no attack on an individual; only a principle sought; the assembly representative; each bishop the elect of his flock; and all "men of the world," often christianised, generally ordained late in life; converted against their interests by conviction formed in an age of freest discussion; their Chief one in whom were rarely blended intellectual and political ability, with holiness, sweetness, and self-discipline. The conclusion reached by such an assembly uncharitable, unscriptural, uncatholic, and unanimous.

The consolation as strange as the disappointment. The mischief silently and perfectly healed by the simple working of the Christian society. Life corrected the error of thought. Augustine beautifully writes: "It is of no light moment that though the question was agitated among bishops of an age anterior to the faction of Donatus, and although opinions differed without the unity of the colleagues being marred, still this our present use has been settled to be observed throughout the whole Catholic church diffused throughout the world" (contra Crescon. i. xxxii. 38). The disappearance of the Cyprianic decisions has its hope for us when we look on bonds seemingly inextricable, and steps as yet irretrievable.

It may be noted, as affording some clue to the onesided decisions, that the laity were silent, though Cyprian seemed pledged to some consultation with them. (See esp. Ep. 31 and 19, ii.) It must have been among them that there were in existence and at work those very principles which so soon not only rose to the surface, but overpowered the voices of her bishops for the general good.

It was a parliament of officials, provincial governors. That it did not represent church opinion—that, namely, which we now accept as church doctrine, may be inferred—(1) from the absolute unanimity of the eighty-seven utterances; (2) from the strange avowal of two, that being incompetent to give an opinion they vote with the majority; (3) from the very important and powerful contemporary work of the "Auctor de Rebaptismate;" (4) from the silent reversal of the decision.

The last Persecution.—Of the thirty-one Numidian bishops who sat in the great council, the next glimpse of church offices shews nine as convicts^h in the mines metallum Sigunense (? Siga, where there were copper-mines in Mauritania, or Siguita in Numidia itself) and in two other places.^l A subdeacon and four acolytes were commissioned by the metropolitan (already himself an exile), and his friend Quirinus to visit them, and supply them with necessaries (Epp. 77-9). Cyprian had been apprehended, as perhaps the first African prisoner (Epp. 77-8), in August A.D. 257. Valerian's first edict (Acti Proconsulis, and Acta Praef. Augustalis) had then been issued on the suggestion of Maerianus, a principal patron of the Egyptian "Magi," after a long administration of fairness to the Christians. The "eighth" persecution lasted the Apocalyptic 42 months until his death in 260. (Dion. Al. ap. Pearson, Ann. Cyp. p. 59; Euseb. vii. 10, v. ii. 70.) On the 2nd of August, 257, before the exile of Cyprian, Stephen died. His reputation as a martyr, which dates from the 6th century, is due to a transference to him of incidents from the death of Xystus, of which the singular history is traced by De Rossi, Roma Sitt. Cr. vol. ii. p. 85, &c. He was succeeded on the 25th Aug. by Xystus,^k whom, not without a stroke at the dead lion, Pontius calls "a good pacific high-priest."

No "state enemy" could be treated with more consideration than Cyprian received. Aspasius Paternus, the proconsul, heard him in secretario, and without confiscation or personal restraint simply required his retirement to Curubis, a free town, near the sea (in deserto loco), lonely, but pleasant, and well supplied (Pontius, cf. Gibbon, vol. ii. 248, Smith's edition). It was at the same time that the withdrawal of Dionysius was ordered and performed (Eus. vii. 11). On the 14th September a dream, related at once to his friends, was found after his martyrdom to have foretold it for that day twelve months. Attended by his deacon, and allowed the presence of friends, and "offering," no doubt, as in his former banishment, "his daily sacrifice," he actively organised relief for more helpless sufferers and subsidised them largely himself.^l After eleven months spent thus, the new proconsul Galerius Maximus, already a dying man, recalled him to his home in Carthage (horti). When a rumour arrived that Marcianus "entrusted with the whole republic," by Valerian now on his last march to Persia, was determined to carry things to an extremity with Christians, Cyprian was probably the first African who procured a copy of the tremendous rescript, and of the letter which was about to ^h Morcelli, Africa Christiana, vol. i. p. 21. questions whether the separate Praeses Numidiae was continued long after Septimius, apparently not noticing (Cyp. Ep. 77, ii.) that these confessors were tried before the Praeses.

^l Pearson supposes a marble quarry to be their workplace—lenebrae and teter odor fumi indicate mining and smelting rather.

^k See these calculations in Lipsius, Chron. d. Röm. Bisch. p. 213.

^l Gibbon strangely seems to have understood the words documentum professionis dedit (i.e. taught how to hold fast our profession) to mean "an account of his behaviour was published for the edification of the Christian world." (Ep. 77.)

be issued to the Praesides (Ep. 80). The proconsul in Cyprian's trial mentions both the extension of capital penalties to presbyters, and the new prohibition of the use of cemeteries for worship. His messenger returned with the full intelligence of sweeping measures before their publication, and with news that Xystus had been beheaded (Pont. Vit. Cyp. xii.; Leon. Sacr. Muratori, vol. i. p. 391), on Sunday, the 5th of August, in the cemetery of Praetextatus^m when actually "teaching" in his episcopal chair, and with him four of the great Roman deacons.ⁿ

It may be taken as historical fact that on Wednesday, the 29th of the previous June, Xystus had translated the supposed remains of St. Peter to the cemetery known as Cata Cumbas, on the Appian Way, and those of St. Paul to the Ostian Way. It is possible that this increasing reverence to two malefactors executed two centuries before both shewed the magistrates that the spirit of the sect was becoming more dangerous, and determined them to withdraw from Christians the protection which the burial laws hitherto accorded to rites celebrated in connexion with places of sepulture; and further, that this occasioned a withdrawal from the better known cemetery of Callistus to the more obscure one of Praetextatus (see De Rossi, Rom. Sott. vol. ii. p. 41; and Lips. ll. cc.), and the death of Xystus in that place. The news of it had scarcely reached Carthage when Galerius, now in residence at Utica, summoned Cyprian thither in honourable form (Ep. 81). Having previously refused offers of a retreat, urged on him even by heathens, he now said he was resolved not to die, or utter the dying prophecy with which he apparently expected to be inspired, away from his people. Accordingly, informed of the despatch before it came, he went into hiding in Carthage, there to await the proconsul's return. On his return, he re-appeared and re-occupied his own house.^o The details of the trial are too numerous to repeat and too remarkable to abridge. They are found not only in the narrative of Pontius, but also in a "Passion of Cyprian," which we have in different forms, and which from its simplicity, provinciality, and minute topography, must be contemporary.^p ^m After 11 months and 12 (?) days' episcopate. Eusebius, by an error, in which he indulges in other instances, ascribes to him years for months both in chronicle and history; and Jerome repeats it from him. So in vii. 15 he seems to speak of him as alive after the edict of restoration. See Lipsius, l. c.

Cyprian was removed from his home on Aug.

ⁿ Sic lege "cum eo diacones quattuor."

^o Nothing is more self-consistent than the language of Ep. 83, or more inconsistent with Gibbon's "recovering that fortitude which his character required."

^p They are entitled Acta Proconsularia, and so accepted by Pearson and Gibbon. Aug. Serm. 309 seems to quote either this Passio or some earlier document which is now imbedded in it. Ep. 77 ll. refers to Cyprian's confession "Apud Acta proconsulis" just after it was made. Does Acta mean merely "Trial before?" (Compare Optat. B. lib. p. 68, apud acta locuti sunt.) If it means "official report," how could a Christian report be so styled, or how could a heathen one give the details with such advantage to the prisoners? Dionysius Alex. refers a carping adversary to the record of his own trial before Acemilian, then prefect of Egypt (Euseb. vol. i. p. 384, notes on ὑπεμνηματισθη).

13; the magistrate's broken health prolonged the examination; but the prisoner's rank shielded him from suffering or indignity. Though the language of the judge was stern, the Christians confessed the reluctance with which he gave sentence. In them sense of triumph in the possession of such a martyr is dwelt on with almost as much force as the sense of loss. With a strange mingled feeling, characteristic of the vividness with which in intense moments circumstances are apprehended which would at other times be trivial, they marked how little incidents combined to do him honour. The seat he rested on for the last time happened to be covered with a white cloth, the episcopal emblem. The trees were climbed, as he passed, by many a Zacchaeus. The eve and vigil of his martyrdom were kept by all his flock, watching through the night in the streets before his house, when as yet the only vigil of the Christian year was that which preceded the day of Christ's own Passion. The idea of this parallel took such hold that Augustine carries it to a painful pitch (Serm. 309). The two officers between whom Cyprian rode are compared to the two malefactors, between whom our Lord went to His Passion. Pontius compares the words of the sentence to the prophecy of Caiaphas. Cyprian received no dying prophecy, nor uttered any, though his time was ample. His words were very few, and no exhortation could have been so eloquent as the "Thanks be to God" with which he answered the judgment: "Our pleasure is that Thascius Cyprianus be executed by the sword."

Personal, Theological and Political Effectiveness.

—To sum the effect of Cyprian's thirteen years' episcopate in briefest terms. Over and above, 1. The social impressiveness for the time of a convert with such culture and such mental habits, and of that perfect ἐπιείκεια and πραότης to which Augustine constantly reverts with delight, comes 2. His Philosophy. It is usual to expand the fact that he was no philosopher. Nevertheless his writings on Resentment, Patience, Probation, Envy, Self-devotion are most able essays towards establishing a new Christian basis of Morals, and have a permanent place in the series. 2. Evidences. As against both contemporary Judaism and contemporary Paganism his collections have a distinct worth. 3. Interpretation. He has a free ideal scheme before him (Ep. 64), but in detail falls from it, and makes mere riddles of texts. 4. Organisation. This is the real epigraph of his career. The magnitude of the effect he produced is incomparably greater than that of any other person, not excepting Hildebrand. (a) The Church Council, a local and doubtful institution before, became through his management the necessary institute and the imperial power of the church, and, with its system of representation by a Life-Aristocracy popularly elected, and its free discussionary scheme, exercised an important function in the regeneration of liberty. (b) Episcopacy grew silently into an institution of the Roman Empire, strong with the lasting virtues of Roman institutions, and only biding its time for recognition.

5. The individual Independence, as he sketches it, of elected bishops preserved, while it remained, a grand democratic strength to what after a time sank to an oligarchic, and under the papacy to an administrative magistracy. This must again be the key of church government in states which have not that intimate union with the church which the ideal of a Christian nation requires. Since there has not been proper occasion before, we here give references on the subject of this Independence, which to the policy of Cyprian's time was so essential. (Ep. 55, xvii.; actum sum, &c., 72, iv.; quando habet, &c., 73, xxxvi.; nemini praescribentes, &c., 57, vi.; si de collegis, &c., 69, xvii.; statuat. Romt. Epp. Praef. 6.) As to the "resistance to Roman claims" there exists what may be so called; only with this qualification, that Cyprian is totally unconscious of any claims made by the see, and resists Stephen purely as an arrogant individual.

Cultus.—There were two famous basilicas erected, one on the place of his martyrdom (in agro sexti), where was the Mensa Cypriani, from which Augustine often preached; the other on the shore (Aug. Conf. v.; ad Mappalia, Aug. vol. vii. App. p. 37; ad Piscinas, Victor Vitens. i. v. iv.). In this Monica spent the night of her son's departure for Italy, praying and weeping. In Sulpicius Severus (Dial. i. 3) his friend comes hither to pray on his way from Narbonne to Egypt. The adoration reached such a height that Gibbon is charmed to call him "almost a local deity." His feast and the gales which blew then were called Cypriana (Procop. Vand. i. 20, 21; Greg. Naz. Or. 18, ap. Ducange, s.v.). There are still on the "brink of the shore" the massive ruins of a church which must be Saint Cyprian's. Davis (Carthage and her Remains, p. 389) describes them fully, and it is not hard to see how he has misled himself into not recognising what they are.

The relics of Cyprian were given (strange conjunction) by Haroun al Raschid to Charlemagne. The sequel may be seen in Ruinart (Acta Mn. Cypr. § 17, and in the epistle of J. de la Haye, prefixed to Pamelius' Cyprian, fo. b. 3.

Texts.—Of the MSS. and their connexions a new and good account is given by Hartel in his preface, as also an account of the editions; which are (after him):—

Princeps, Rome, A.D. 1471, repeated same year and in 1483 at Venice. One printed at Memmingen, 1477 (treatises and epistles first separated); Deventer, 1477; Paris, 1500; Rembolt's, 1512. The first critically constructed edition, with additional works, and discriminating spurious from genuine, was that of Erasmus, Bale, 1520, often reprinted, but in 1530 and 1544 only with mentionable improvement: the latter often called from H. Grave, whose annotations are given.

P. Manuzio, Rome, 1563. This was undertaken by the great critic Latino Latini, who worked with the famous Verona MS., and greatly improved on Erasmus, but withdrew because a higher power tampered with his text again and again while in the press.

Guill. Morel, Paris, 1564. Still better corrected by old codices.

J. de Pamele, Antwerp, 1568, attempted to place the epistles in order, but corrupted the text incredibly; relied mainly on the fullest MSS., especially the "codex cambronensis," which is "interpolatissimis interpolator," and had no critical judgment.

N. Rigault, 1648. A progressive textual critic with good manuscripts, and a good commentator.

J. Fell, Bishop of Oxford, 1682, in the main Rigault's text, but used additional English MSS.; unhappily neglects their "evident mistakes." The edition is preceded by Pearson's Annales Cypriani, a work of wonderful sagacity and patience, determining the order of many epistles and works, and correcting endless previous mistakes, though leaving some corrections still for Lipsius.

Etienne Baluze spent fifteen years on an edition of Cyprian, collected above thirty MSS., and died at the age of eighty-eight, having just printed the genuine works. The edition was completed for the Benedictines by Dom Prudent Maran and brought out at the royal press in 1726, with certain alterations of both text and notes to satisfy the Roman curia. The critical faculty of Baluze was inferior to his mighty erudition.

D. J. H. Goldhorn, Leipsic, 1838. A useful text-book, well emended.

J. Hartel, 3 vols. 8vo., 1868-71, in the Vienna Corpus Scriptt. Eccll. Latt. All the works attributed to Cyprian, with the Ad Novatianum, Auctor de Reptismate, Pontii Vita, &c., and Indices. A new recension, for which above forty MSS. have been studied, classified, valued, and reduced to a most clear apparatus criticus, with keen attention to orthography, and almost always a judicious discrimination of the preferable readings; a valuable preface on the principles and history of the text-formation. [E. W. B.]

CYPRIANUS (2) A magician of Antioch, who was hired by a man named Idas, to make a Christian virgin Justina enamoured of him, and was converted himself and martyred with her at Damascus under Decius, according to the Menology of Basil, Oct. 2; at Nicomedia under Diocletian in September according to others. The whole story is very probably a figment. He is the pretended author of the confession of St. Cyprian, found in some MSS. He has been confounded with the great St. Cyprian, not only by Prudentius (Peri Steph. 13), but by Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 18). (See Tillem. iv. 47, 601; Ruinart, p. 194; Ceillier, ii. 258, 347; and acts given by SURIUS and LIPOMANNUS, v. 394; Cologne, 1680.) [E. B. B.]

(3) Another Cyprian of Corinth is commemorated March 10, among the disciples of QUADRATUS, of whom a romantic story is told, which, as it stands, is absurd. His martyrdom, if there be any reality in it, must belong to the persecution of Diocletian. [E. B. B.]

(4) A learned presbyter, to whom St. Jerome writes from Bethlehem (Letter 140, ed. Vall.), expounding Psalm xc. [W. H. F.]

(5) A deacon, mentioned by St. Jerome (Lette. 112, ed. Vall.) as the bearer of three letters from Augustine to him at Bethlehem. [W. H. F.]

(6) ST., bishop of Bordeaux, was the sixth bishop of that diocese, and took part in the council of Agde (A.D. 506), held by permission of Alaric, king of the Visigoths, as well as in the celebrated synod of Orleans under Clovis I. (A.D. 511). He appears to have succeeded St. Gallinicus after the interregnum caused by the Arian troubles. The time of his death is uncertain. (Sammarth. Gallia Christiana, ii. 791; Lopes, Egl. de Bordeaux; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. vol. i. pp. 240, 288.) [D. R. J.]

CYPRIANUS (7), ST., third bishop of Toulon, and second patron of that city, flourished in the time of Anastasius, Justinus, and Justinianus, emperors, and of Clovis, king of the Franks, and of Childebert his son. He belonged to the principal family in Montelieu, Marseilles, and was a disciple of St. Caesarius of Arles, whose life he wrote in the year 530. The memoir was continued by Messianus, presbyter, and Stephanus the deacon, who had also been pupils of Caesarius, and was afterwards published by Vincentius Barralis in his Chronologia Lirinensis. It is also to be found in Surius, 22nd August. According to these and Mabillon, Cyprian was bishop of Toulon, and lived in the year 541, during the fourth council of Arles, but they say that the time of his death is uncertain. He was ordained deacon at the age of thirty by Caesarius, who did not ordain deacons before that age. He was therefore probably born in the year 475 or 476. His life of Caesarius gives an account of the war which was waged between Alaric, king of the Goths, and Clovis, and in which Alaric was killed, A.D. 509. "To-day," he says, "the state of Arles is under the rule of Childebert, king of the Franks, son of Clovis."

Cyprian was present at the fourth council of Arles, A.D. 524. In 527 he subscribed to the council of Carpentras, and the synodical letter to Agroccius bishop of Antipolis. In A.D. 529 he came to the third synod of Vaison. In the same year he took part in the second synod of Orange, and was sent by Caesarius to the council of the bishops beyond the Isar, at Valentia, where he outshone all in scriptural and patristic knowledge. In 541, after the conquest of the Arian Goths, Cyprian went to the fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541.

Cyprian was one day in the camp of king Alaric holding a public disputation, when two noblemen, officers of Saxony, named Mendrianus and Flavianus, entered, and were converted and baptized on the spot. They followed Cyprian to Toulon, and lived as hermits near the sea.

After the death of Caesarius, Cyprian remained in the bishopric in peace. But soon afterwards Alboin, king of the Goths, invaded Gaul with a large army, and devastated all the cities of Gallia Narbonensis with fire and sword. His soldiers butchered the people, and killed many bishops. They found Cyprian, together with his friends Mandrianus and Flavianus, in the church, cast them out, and killed them (Aug. 556). Such is the account of his death given by Guesnayus in Annal. Masil., but the Bollandists say that he was not martyred, but died a happy death, A.D. 549.

His body was found in 701 in the episcopal house, on the 3rd of October, but according to another account in 1301.

Cyprianus and two other bishops wrote a life of Caesarius of Arles, an epitome of which is given in the 67th vol. of the Patrol. Lat. p. 997.

The authorities for the life of Cyprianus are: Bouche, Chorograph. et Hist. Prov. tom. i. p. 337; the Councils of the 6th century; Gallia Christiana, i. 743; and Le Cointe, Annal. Ecclesiast. i. 454, etc.

He is commemorated on the 3rd of October (AA. SS. Boll. Oct. ii. pp. 164-178; Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. pp. 1001, 1253, Caesarii Arelat. Vita; Gallia Christiana, i. 741). [D. R. J.]

CYPRIANUS (8), ST., abbat, Périgneux. He was also called Subranus. He took the religious habit in a monastery of which the abbat's name was Savalon, towards the middle of the 6th century. Having been a model to the whole community, he retired to a solitude near the Dordogne, where he built a hermitage, which afterwards gave rise to the little town of St. Cyprien. He died towards the end of the 6th century, and Gregory of Tours recounts legends of several appropriate wonders, and calls him a man of magnificent piety. (Migne, Encycl. Théol. xl. 687; Greg. Turon. de Gloria Confess. cap. 100, Patrol. Lat. lxxi. 902.) He is commemorated on the 9th Dec. [D. R. J.]

(9) A monk of Monte Cassino in the time of the emperor Constantinus VI. and the empress Irene. He composed a Sapphic hymn on the miracles of St. Benedict, in 24 stanzas, to be sung on his festival (Patrol. Lat. lxxxix. p. 1050; cf. Petr. Diac. Lib. de Viris Illustr. cap. 7; Ceillier, xii. 105.) [W. M. S.]

(10) ST., martyr, lies buried in the church of St. Francis, Boulogne, and is commemorated on the 10th March. The Bollandists failed to obtain any information about him. (AA. SS. Bolland. Martius, tom. ii. ad diem x. p. 2.) [D. R. J.]

(11) ST., author of a poem on the resurrection, at the end of the works of Tertullian. (Moréri, Grand Dict. Historique, vol. iv. p. 342 (Paris, 1759); Amplissima Collectio, Martene and Durand, vol. ix. (Paris, 1733); Ceillier, Index.) [W. M. S.]

CYPRUS, one of the seventeen guards in the story of CHRYSE. [G. S.]

CYR (Butler, Lives of the Saints, June 16), infant martyr. [CYRICUS.] [C. H.]

CYRA. [CIAR.]

CYRENIUS, duke, and governor of Pelusium on the Nile in the 5th century. Isidore of Pelusium, presbyter and abbat, complains in a letter that Cyrenius had fixed a placard on the church of Pelusium taking away from the citizens the right of justification in case of accusations, and of refuge in the church. Pelusium is said to have suffered as much from its governor Cyrenius as from its bishop Eusebius. (Isid. Epist. i. 178; Patrol. Graec. lxxviii. 298; Ceillier, viii. 483.) [W. M. S.]

CYRIACUS (1), and THEODULUS, sons of HESPERUS and ZOE, slaves of a rich man named Catalus, of Italy, martyred in the time of Hadrian, commemorated May 2 (Menol. Basil.). [E. B. B.]

(2). [CHRYSE.] In the Latin versions the name is Quiriacus. [G. S.]

(3) A child, who with his mother JULITTA was martyred at Tarsus in the Diocletian persecution. (Menol. Basil. July 15. See also Ruinart, Actu Sinc. 477.) [CYRICUS.]

In the Decretal of Gelasius de libris, the acts of Quiricus and Julitta are said to pass for a piece of heretical composition, and therefore not to be read in the Church of Rome (De Smedt,

CYRIACUS (4), ST. His name occurs in the martyrologies, but little more can be ascertained. He is said to have been a deacon at Rome, and there to have suffered martyrdom very early in the 4th century. The Bollandists quote Anastasius, the Librarian of the Vatican in the 9th century, as speaking in his Vitae Romanorum Pontificum of a church in Rome, dedicated by Pope Honorius I., in the 7th century, in memory of St. Cyriacus (AA. SS. Aug 8); and the translation of his bones by Pope Marcellus, A.D. 308, from the Via Salaria in Rome, to a spot near the seventh milestone on the Via Ostiensis, is commemorated on Aug. 8th. They also relate from an anonymous MS. ("Palatinus s. Vaticanus") of uncertain date, how in the 10th century, that most prolific period of monkish marvels, a body was found on this spot with an inscription recording his name, was conveyed back to Rome in the 10th century by the pope Agapetus II. ("junior"), and there deposited with much pomp in the Via Lata, in the church "S^t Stephani," henceforward called "S^t Cyriaci," but, according to the writer in Moroni (Dizion. Eccles. s. v.) "S^tae Mariae di Via Lata." According to this story the emperor Otho (Otto), who was then in Rome, having gained the pope's consent or connivance, carried off by force one of the saint's arms, to the great dismay and grief of the abbess and her nuns to whom the church belonged, and presented it to the monastery of Bamberg, where the precious relic was welcomed with quite an ovation; the Roman abbess being consoled in some degree for its loss by the promise of the emperor to send his ambassador to the emperor Basilus, at Constantinople, to obtain certain relics of St. Nicolaus Myrensis for her nunnery (AA. SS. v. s.). The Bamberg Annales are silent, we are told (ib.), about this relic: but the story is at any rate characteristic of the passion for relic-worship in the age to which it belongs.

About Cyriacus himself there is yet greater uncertainty. By one account he suffered at Rome, by another at Augsburg ("Augusta Vindelicorum"), under Maximinus, Maximianus, or, as Baronius suggests, Maxentius; he was of a noble Tuscan family ("in Tuscia") according to one version, according to another a slave in Rome (ib.). Baronius allows that the "Acta Marcelli," with their circumstantial and very rhetorical narrative of the saint's fortunes and miracles, are not to be depended upon ("nonnullis corrigenda." Annal. Eccles. iii. A.D. 309). Tillemont rejects the authority of the Acta Marcelli yet more unequivocally; and avoids pledging himself for the truth of the story of St. Cyriacus ("on prétend," &c., Hist. Eccles. v. § xlvi.). According to him, the name of Cyriacus was inserted, with the names of his fellow-martyrs Largus and Snaraglus, "dans le calendrier du Bucherius"; March 16 being the festival of his martyrdom, Aug. 8, of the removal of his bones; he adds, that in one calendar his name occurs on July 15, probably in regard to a church dedicated in his name on that day (ib.).

Tillemont, however, in another passage, affirms confidently that the Cyriacus, whose remains were preserved in the Via Lata, was one of the martyrs in Rome (Hist. Eccles. vii. p. 640). He adds that some confusion has arisen, from the legend of a certain Jew, named Judas, who after being instrumental in finding the Cross in Jerusalem for the empress Helena, became a convert to Christianity, was baptized under the name of Cyriacus, subsequently was made bishop of Jerusalem, and eventually suffered martyrdom there in the reign of Julian. This legend, Tillemont says, was soon repudiated by the Greek historians, and, later, by the Latins (ib.).

In the 5th century a church and monastery were founded at Constantinople, outside the "Golden Gate," in memory of a St. Cyriacus by the Grand Chamberlain of the emperor Leo (Tillem. H. E. V. v. s.), and early in the next century mention is made of abbots of St. Cyriacus in the records of Constantinopolitan councils (ib.); but Tillemont thinks that this is probably another Cyriacus, the name being common among the saints of the Greek Church, and one of them in particular, of Nicomedia, whose festival occurs on April 7, being of considerable reputation (ib.). Cologne (Colon. Agripp.) claims to have the head of the Latin St. Cyriacus (AA. SS. v. s.); at Worms, in the collegiate church of "S^t Cyriacus zu Neuhausen," which dates its foundation in the 9th century, other of his reliques are said to be preserved (Rettberg, Kirchengesch. Deutschl. I. iii. p. 638).

CYRIACUS (5), a disciple of MARCELLUS of Ancyra (Epiphan. Haer. 72, pp. 842, 844).

[G. S.]

(6) Commemorated in the Menology of Basil as a man of Jerusalem, who discovered the true cross, and shewed it to Helena, and was thereby converted, and became patriarch of Jerusalem; and was martyred along with his mother by Julian the Apostate, his right hand being first cut off because his writings had made so many converts. He is unknown to history. [E. B. B.]

(7) Bishop of Adana in Cilicia. He was present at the council of Constantinople in 381, and by the permission of Diodorus of Tarsus, his metropolitan, remained behind on its separation to instruct Nectarius, on his unexpected elevation from the rank of a layman to the archiepiscopal see of Constantinople, in the duties of his office. (Soz. vii. 10.) Cyriacus was one of the three bishops commissioned by the council to convey their synodical letter to Damasus and the other bishops of the West. (Theod. H. E. v. 9.) [E. V.]

(8) Bishop of Synnada in Phrygia, friend and fellow-sufferer of Chrysostom, who together with Eulysius, bishop of Apamea, embarked with him when expelled from Constantinople, June, 404, and accompanied him on the first stages of his journey. The whole party was arrested at Nicaea on suspicion of complicity in the conflagration at Constantinople, and thrown into chains. After a few days, Cyriacus and Eulysius were separated from Chrysostom and brought back and imprisoned at Chalcedon (Pallad. p. 38; Soz. viii. 22). While they were in prison Chrysostom wrote them a consolatory and encouraging letter (Chrysost. Epist. 147). Being acquitted of the charge Cyriacus was sent back to Constantinople (Pallad. u. s.), but was driven from the city by the law enforcing communion with Arsacius, Theophilus, and Porphyry. He fled to Rome, where he arrived towards the beginning of 405. He laid the statement of his own and Chrysostom's troubles before Innocent, his oral account being confirmed by the letters brought a few days afterwards by Eulysius (Pallad. p. 11). He accompanied the unfortunate western deputation to Constantinople in 406, and shared in the ill-treatment to which they were subjected (Chrys. Epist. 156, Pallad. p. 13). He and his eastern colleagues were seized and put on board a vessel, and it was reported that they had been drowned. But they were purposely reserved by their enemies for insult and ill-usage. They were conveyed to places of exile in the most remote and desolate parts of the empire. Cyriacus was imprisoned in the Persian fortress of Palmyra, eighty miles beyond Emesa.* (Pallad. p. 77.) Among the letters of Chrysostom there is a long consolatory epistle addressed to Cyriacus from Cucusus in 404 (Chrys. Epist. 125), the genuineness of which has been called in question by Hales (ed. Savil. p. 856), but satisfactorily established by Montfaucon in a monitio prefixed to the epistle.

[E. V.]

CYRIACUS (9), presbyter of Antioch, addressed along with Castus and Valerius and Diophantes by Chrysostom (Ep. 22, 62, 66, 107, 130, 222), and alone by his exiled fellow-presbyter Constantius in a letter mis-ascribed to Chrysostom (Ep. 241).

[E. B. B.]

(10) A deacon, who together with Paul accompanied the deputation of bishops who conveyed to Rome Chrysostom's letter to Innocent, in 404 (Pallad. p. 11). He was unable to join his namesake, bishop Cyriacus and his companions in Rome in 405, his health not permitting him to take a long voyage (Ep. 148).

[E. V.]

(11) A bishop, apparently resident at Constantinople, a friend and correspondent of Chrysostom. From a letter to Olympias, written at Caesarea on his way to Cucusus in 404, it is evident that Cyriacus had sufficient influence at court to intercede in Chrysostom's behalf and to render it probable that he could procure a change in his place of exile (Ep. ad Olymp. 12). There are two letters of Chrysostom to Cyriacus, one indignantly reproaching him for not having written in reply to his many letters (Ep. 202); the other commending to his good offices the son of Sopater, the prefect of Armenia, who was residing at Constantinople for the purposes of study (Ep. 64). Chrysostom recommended Constantius to apply to Cyriacus for aid in carrying his plans into effect (Ep. 221).

[E. V.]

CYRIACUS (12), Quiragos or Shahag, bishop of Daik in Persarmenia, in the time of Chosroes III., A.D. 390-411 (Faustus Byzantinus, vi. 11 in Langlois, Coll. Hist. Arm. i. 309).

[E. B. B.]

(13) Sub-deacon of the church of Macedonia, A.D. 414. Pope Innocent I., writing to the bishops of Macedonia, complains that they have taken no notice of the good testimony which the Roman church had borne to Cyriacus and Dizonian; begging them to receive them with sincere good-will, and to put a stop to the quarrels in which their enemies involved them. (Ep. Innocent. i. num. 17; Patrol. Lat. xx. 537; Ceillier, vii. 516.)

[W. M. S.]

(14) Bishop in Thessaly in the time of pope Boniface I. In a letter to Rufus, bishop of Thessalonica, Boniface tells him that he has separated from his communion Cyriacus among other Thessalian bishops, unless they obtained pardon through Rufus. They had obtained a law from the emperor Theodosius II., which placed them beyond the special jurisdiction of Rome and Thessalonica. (Letters of Boniface I. num. 13, Patrol. Lat. xx. p. 776; Ceillier, viii. 10.)

[W. M. S.]

(15) Bishop of Lodi (A.D. 451-452). Bearer of the synodal letter of the Council of Milan in A.D. 451 to pope Leo the Great. (Leo Mag. Ep. 97, Patrol. Lat. liv. § 1081, 1083; Ceillier, x. 681.)

[W. M. S.]

(16) One of the two deacons appointed to summon the bishops to the sessions of the Council of Chalcedon. (Tom. iv. Council. p. 381; Ceillier, x. 684.)

[W. M. S.]

(17) Bishop of Tyana. He supported the demand of Julian and Severus for the condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon, and the Tome of Leo, but in 518 turned completely round and signed the "relatio" to John the patriarch of Constantinople, drawn up at the synod which met in that city, which asked for the restoration of the names of Leo of Rome, and Euphemius and Macedonius of Constantinople to the diptychs, and the condemnation of Severus and the other impugnors of the decrees of Chalcedon. In the Latin acts he appears as "Dominicus" (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1586, v. 167; Le Quien, i. 400.)

[E. V.]

(18) Abbot of St. Andrew at Rome, employed by Gregory the Great about A.D. 593 in the conversion of the Barbaricini in Sardinia. Zabarda, duke of Sardinia, helped the work by offering them peace if they would become Christians. Hospiton, their chief, was the first who submitted. The Sardinian bishops were themselves not sufficiently zealous to undertake the duty. (Greg. Mag. lib. iv., Epist. 23, 24, 25, Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. p. 692; Ceillier, xi. 436, 497.)

[W. M. S.]

(19) 30th Patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 595, or 606 (Art de Vér. les Dates). He was previously presbyter and steward, οικονόμος, of the great church at Constantinople (Chronicon Paschale, p. 378). Gregory the Great received the legates bearing the synodal letters which announced his consecration, partly from a desire not to disturb the peace of the church, and partly from the personal respect which he entertained for Cyriac, but in his reply he warned him against the sin of causing divisions in the church, clearly alluding to the use of the term oecumenical bishop (Gregorii Epistol. lib. vii. 4, Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 853). But the personal feelings of Gregory towards Cyriac appear to have been most friendly. There is a letter extant written in most affectionate terms, in which he recommends to his protection John, a presbyter of Chalcedon and Athanasius of Lycaonia, into whose faith he had examined, not necessarily in a judicial or official capacity, and found them correct and orthodox in their confessions (ibid. Epist. 4). In two letters also to the emperor Maurice he speaks as rejoicing in the appointment which had been made (ibid. Epist. 6, 7). In the latter of these, however, he mentions that at the ordination of Cyriac a verse had been chanted from the 117th Psalm, "This is the day which the Lord hath made." Gregory, although expressing the utmost sympathy with the fervour of their rejoicing, greatly blames this use of the text, as being too sacred to be applied to any man.

* Le Quien and others suppose that Cyriacus who was banished to Palmyra was a different person from the bishop of Synnada, and give him Emesa as his see. The mistake has been caused by an error of the scribe who wrote (Pallad. p. 77) Κυριακὸν τὸν Ἐμεσῆς ἐνδοτέρω ἰγδοῦκορτα σημειῶν εἰς Παλμύραν, instead of Κυρ. Ἐμεσῆς ἐνδοτέρω κ. τ. λ. "80 miles further up the country than Emesa" (see l'Illemont, xi. 608, note 88).

The legates sent by Cyriac to Rome with his synodal letters had declared that they held the opinion that at the descent of our Lord into Hades all spirits who would believe in Him as their Lord were at once released from prison. Gregory wrote to Constantinople to rebuke them for so doing, though in gentle terms, reminding them that such opinions had been held to be heretical by Philaster and St. Augustine (ibid. Ep. 15). Cyriac, however, does not appear to have been involved with his legates in this controversy. It appears that Cyriac did not attend to the entreaties of Gregory that he would abstain from using the title of Oecumenical Bishop, for Gregory wrote afterwards both to him and to the emperor Maurice, declaring that he could not allow his legates to remain in communion with Cyriac as long as he retained the title. In the latter of these letters he compares the assumption of the title to the sin of Antichrist, since they both exhibit a spirit of lawless pride. "Quisquis se universalem sacerdotem vocat, vel vocari desiderat, in elatione sua Antichristum praecurrit, quia superbiendo se ceteris praepoñit" (ibid. Epist. 28, 30). In a letter to Anastasius of Antioch, who had written to him to remonstrate against disturbing the peace of the church, Gregory defends his conduct on all other patriarchs by the assumption of the title, and reminds Anastasius that not only heretics but heresiarchs had before this been patriarchs of Constantinople. He also deprecates the use of the term on more general grounds—"si unus episcopus vocatur universalis universa ecclesia corrui, si unus universus, cadit" (ibid. Epist. 24). In spite of all this Cyriac was firm in his retention of the title, and appears to have summoned, or to have meditated summoning, a council to authorise its use. For in A.D. 599 Gregory wrote to Eusebius of Thessalonica and some other bishops, stating that he had heard they were about to be summoned to a council at Constantinople, and most urgently entreating them to yield neither to force nor to persuasion, but to be steadfast in their refusal to recognise the offensive title (ibid. lib. ix. 68 in Patrol. Lat.). Cyriac appears to have shared in that unpopularity of the emperor Maurice which caused his deposition and his death (Theophan. Chron. p. 242, A.M. 6094; Niceph. Callis. H. E. xviii. 40; Theophylact. Hist. viii. 9). He still, however, had influence enough to exact from Phocas at his coronation a confession of the orthodox faith and a pledge that he would in no way disturb the church (Theoph. Chron. p. 243, A.M. 6094). He also nobly resisted the attempt of Phocas to drag the empress Constantia and her daughter from their sanctuary in a church of Constantinople (ibid., p. 246, A.M. 6098). Perhaps some resentment at this opposition to his will may have induced Phocas to accede more readily to the claims of Boniface III. that Rome should be considered to be the head of all the church, in exclusion of the claims of Constantinople to the oecumenical bishopric (Vita Bonifacii III. apud Labbe, Acta Concil. t. v. 1615). Cyriac died A.D. 606, and was interred in the church of the Holy Apostles (Chronicon Paschale, p. 381).

Cyriac appears to have been a man of remarkable piety and earnestness, and able to conciliate the esteem of all parties. It is recorded of him that he built a church dedicated to the Θεοτόκος in a street of Constantinople called Diaconissa (Theoph. Chron. 233, A.M. 6090; Niceph. Callis. H. E., xviii. 42).

CYRICIUS, or Quiricius (Cave erroneously calls him Syricius) bishop of Barcino (Barcelona) in Spain, c. 662. He was the author of two letters to Ildefonsus of Toledo, first published, together with Ildefonsus's replies, by D'Achery (Spicileg. i. 308-311) and also by Migne (Patrolog. xvi. 1 sq.). In the former of these letters he thanks Ildefonsus in language almost blasphemous in the extravagance of its praise, for having sent him his work on the Virginity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, which had greatly comforted him on his return to his cell from a journey, so thoroughly fatigued that he was unable even to attend the divine offices. In the second he entreats Ildefonsus to devote his time to the elucidation of the obscurities of Holy Scripture. Taio of Saragossa dedicated his five books of Sententiae to him. Taio's letter and Cyricius's reply are given in Migne (Patrolog. lxxx. 729-731).

CYRICUS, martyr, commemorated June 16. At Ecclesgreig, in the parish of St. Cyrus, Kincardineshire, and at St. Ceres, Fifeshire, we find traces of St. Cyricus, whose veneration appears to have been introduced into Scotland at an early period. There seems to be little reason for doubt that this is the martyr Cyriacus who, with his mother Julitta, suffered in the Diocletian persecution; but we have no account of how the dedication came to the east of Scotland. He is to be distinguished from the Pictish king Cyric, Grig, or Gregorius, who had his chief residence at Duottar in that neighbourhood in the 9th century (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 319-20; Jervise, Epitaphs, 36, 52; Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, p. cxxvii. sq.).

[J. G.]

Other spellings of this infant martyr are CYR, QUIRICUS, CERICUS, CURIG. The place of martyrdom was Tarsus in Cilicia, and further accounts may be seen in Acta SS. June, iii. 17; Butler, Lives of the Saints, June 16; Rees, Welsh Saints, 307. Butler's date is A.D. 304.

CYRILLA, nurse of St. Benedict, patriarch of the monks of the West. Shocked when a boy by the corruption of his fellow-students at Rome, Benedict fled from school, and was followed unsuccessfully by his nurse. (Ann. Bened. cap. 1; Greg. Mag. Dialog., Patrol. Lat. lxxvi. 127; Ceillier, xi. 156.) [W. M. S.]

CYRILLUS (1) bishop of Antioch, who succeeded Timaeus A.D. 283, and held the see for 20 years, to A.D. 304, when he was succeeded by Tyrannus. Eusebius speaks of him as his contemporary. During his episcopate Dorotheus attained celebrity as an expounder of scripture (Euseb. H. E. lib. vii. c. 32; Chronicon ad ann. 4 Probi). According to an obscure tradition he suffered martyrdom at the commencement of Diocletian's persecution, and is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology July 22. [E. V.]

CYRILLUS (2), Κύριλλος, bishop of Jerusalem, was probably born in Jerusalem or its immediate neighbourhood, c. 315. We have no information as to the school in which he was brought up, but his writings prove that his education was liberal, and embraced a large variety of subjects. Toultée has laboriously collected evidences (c. ii.) of his acquaintance with physics, dialectics, physiology, mythology, &c. That he was a diligent student of Holy Scripture is certain, from the intimate knowledge, at least of the text, shewn in his Catecheses. But he was only acquainted with the LXX. His knowledge of Hebrew, we see from his attempts to interpret proper names (e.g. Samuel, Introd. Lect. 14; Bosor, xiii. 27; Judas, ib. 9, &c.), was only second-hand, and often incorrect. His commendation of the virtues of a monastic life (e.g. iv. 24, xii. 25-33, xv. 23) have been strained into a proof of his having at one time embraced it. Of this there is no evidence. Cyril had a sister who was the mother of Gelasius, bishop of Caesarea. He was ordained deacon probably by Macarius, c. 335 (Soz. H. E. iv. 20, where the text is doubtful), and priest by his successor Maximus, c. 345. Maximus, notwithstanding Cyril's youth, entrusted him with the responsible duty of instructing the catechumens, and preparing them for baptism. He also allowed him the exceptional privilege, sometimes granted by bishops to presbyters of eminent ability (e.g. to Chrysostom by Flavian of Antioch, and to Augustine by Valerius of Hippo), of preaching to the people in full church on the Lord's Day. In his office of catechist, c. 347, he delivered the catechetical lectures by which his name is chiefly known. (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. § 12.) These lectures were preached without book on the evenings of the weeks of Lent, in the basilica of the Holy Cross, or Martyrium, erected on Calvary by St. Helena. His references to the locality are numerous and interesting (e.g. iv. 10-14, x. 19, xiii. 4, 22, 39, xviii. 33). The five mystagogical lectures were addressed during Easter-week at noon to those who had been baptized on Easter-day in the Anastasis, or church of the Holy Sepulchre.

The episcopate of Maximus terminated at the close of 350 or the beginning of 351, and Cyril was chosen to fill the episcopal chair of Jerusalem. A cloud of doubt and difficulty hangs over his elevation to the episcopate, which at this distance of time it is hopeless to dispel. The almost contemporary authority of Jerome, supported by Rufinus, demands chief attention. He can hardly have been mistaken as to the main fact, though a theological prejudice and personal dislike may have warped his judgment and caused him to represent the case in the least favourable light. On some leading questions Cyril and Jerome were decidedly opposed to one another. In the great controversy of the day Cyril belonged to the Asiatic party, Jerome to that of Rome. In the Meletian schism also they took opposite sides; Cyril supporting Meletius, Jerome being a warm adherent of Paulinus. An atmosphere of fierce controversy is always most unfavourable to the habit of calm investigation and faithful statement. What wonder, therefore, if then as now the worst was only too readily believed, and too rashly published of a zealous adherent of the opposite party? Jerome asserts (Chronicon ad ann. 349) that on the death of Maximus the Arians invaded the church of Jerusalem and promised to appoint Cyril to the vacant throne if he would repudiate his ordination by Maximus; that Cyril consented to the humiliating terms, served some time in the church as a deacon, and was then rewarded with the episcopate by Acacius, the semi-Arian bishop of Caesarea, and according to the seventh Nicene canon, Metropolitan of Palestine; that he then dishonourably persecuted Heraclius, whom Maximus, on his death-bed, had nominated his successor, and degraded him to the presbytery. This account is supported by Rufinus (H. E. i. 23, "Sacerdotio, confusa jam ordinatione, suscepto"), and it is hardly possible to reject it altogether. Socrates and Sozomen, though they say nothing of Cyril's repudiation of his orders, are almost equally unfavourable to his orthodoxy, identifying him with the semi-Arian party of Acacius and Patrophilus. They also introduce a new element of confusion by the statement that the see of Jerusalem was vacant not by death, but by Maximus's deposition and expulsion by the semi-Arians (Socr. ii. 38; Soz. iv. 20; Theophan. Chronograph. p. 34). This may safely be rejected. In refutation of Jerome's account, Cyril's advocates triumphantly point to the synodical letter to pope Damasus of the bishops assembled at Constantinople, the year after the second Oecumenical Synod, A.D. 382 (Theodt. H. E. v. 9), which speaks of Cyril in terms of high eulogy, as a champion of the orthodox faith against Arian heresy, τὸν αἰδεσιμώτατον καὶ θεοφιλέστατον Κύριλλον πλείστα πρὸς τοὺς Ἀρειάνους ἐν διαφοροῖσι τόποις ἀλλήσαντα, and affirms his canonical election to the bishopric of Jerusalem, κανονικῶς παρὰ τῶν τῆς ἐπαρχίας χειροτονηθέντα πάλαι. (Theodt. H. E. v. 9.) But this does not touch the point at issue. Acacius was, as we have said, the metropolitan of Cyril's province. He and his fellow bishops were, notwithstanding their heretical bias, the legitimate authorities for conferring the episcopate. Cyril's election and consecration by them was therefore strictly canonical. Besides, the silence of the members of the synod as to facts occurring thirty years before does not disprove them. Whatever might have been Cyril's earlier heretical failings, he was on the orthodox side then. (Cf. Socr. v. 8, Κύριλλος τότε ἐκ μεταμελείας τῷ δημοσίῳ προσκείμενος, and Soz. vii. 7.) His adhesion was valuable, and it would have been as impolitic as it was needless to revive an ancient scandal now almost forgotten.

But while we are compelled to accept Jerome's account as containing a groundwork of truth, Cyril's own writings quite forbid us to follow his authority in classing him with the Arians, or charging him with heretical tenets. Circumstances might render his orthodoxy equivocal. His early patron, Maximus, was somewhat of a waverer. His friends and associates were semi-Arians, and he was chosen to the episcopate by them, with the hope of his supporting their cause. But no error of doctrine is to be discovered in his writings, though he seems to have been afraid of the test word "Homoousion," which nowhere occurs in his catecheses. He is well characterised by the Duc de Broglie (L'Église et l'Empire, iii. 402) as "formant l'extrémité de l'aile droite du Semiarianisme touchant à l'orthodoxie, ou de l'aile gauche de l'orthodoxie touchant au Semiarianisme," and he may be regarded, certainly in the later part of his life, as one of those of whom Athanasius speaks (de Synod. 41), as "brothers who mean what we mean, and only differ about the word."

The first year of Cyril's episcopate was rendered memorable by the appearance, May 7, 351, of a remarkable parhelion, or other atmospheric phenomenon, over the city of Jerusalem, which to minds excited by the struggle between the Christian faith and a fast-declining heathenism, appeared a miraculous manifestation of the symbol of redemption intended to establish the faith and to confute gainsayers. The spectacle produced great excitement in the city. The churches were thronged with worshippers, and many Jews and Gentiles, it is said, were converted to the faith. So important did the phenomenon appear to Cyril that he wrote a letter to the emperor Constantine describing it. This has been preserved to us. The authenticity of this letter has been called in question by Rivet, but the internal evidence from the similarity of style is strong, and it is accepted by Blondel. The occurrence of the word "homoousion" at the close of the letter is however suspicious, and leads us to question whether the prayer for the emperor in which it stands is not a later addition. (Soz. iv. 5; Philostorg. iii. 26; Chron. Alex. p. 678; Theophan. p. 35, a.)

If Acacius had reckoned on Cyril as a faithful adherent and ready instrument in carrying out his plans, the fallacy of his expectations was very soon shewn. Scarcely had Cyril established himself in his see when a distressing controversy, which became the source of much evil to the church, arose as to the claim to priority of their respective sees (περί πρωτείων, Theodt. ii. 25; περί μητροπολιτικῶν δικαίων, Soz. iv. 25). Cyril grounded his claim on the apostolical rank of his see, Acacius on the decision of the Council of Nice (Can. vii.), which placed the bishop of Aelia, i.e. Jerusalem, under the bishop of Caesarea as metropolitan. This contest for pre-eminence was speedily embittered by mutual accusations of heterodoxy (ἐντεῦθεν εἰς ἀπεχθείαν κατέστησαν καὶ ἀλλήλους διέβαλον ὡς οὐχ ὕγιως περί Θεοῦ φρονοῖεν, Soz. iv. 25). For two years Acacius continued vainly summoning Cyril to his tribunal, and at last cut the controversy short by deposing him from his see (φθάνει καθελών, Soz. u. s. 357 or 358) at a small packed synod of his own adherents. The ostensible grounds were very trivial: contumacy in refusing to appear; and the charge—afterwards brought against Ambrose by the Arians—of having sold some of the church ornaments during a prevailing scarcity to supply the wants of the poor (Socr. ii. 40; Soz. iv. 25; Theodt. ii. 26; Epiph. Hæres. lxxiii. § 23-27). An additional charge was that of having held communion with Eustathius and Elpidius after they had been deposed by the Synod of Melitina, in Lesser Armenia. (Soz. u. s.; Basil. Ej. 253 (74).) Cyril was forced to yield. He left his see, not however without an appeal to a larger council, the justice of which was allowed by Constantius. This is noted by Socrates (ii. 40) as the first instance of an appeal against the decision of an ecclesiastical synod.

On leaving Jerusalem Cyril first retired to Antioch, which he found destitute of a bishop, Leontius having just died (Theodt. ii. 26). From thence he proceeded to Tarsus, where he was hospitably received by the bishop Silvanus, one of the best of the semi-Arians, who availed himself of his powers as a preacher. We find him also here in communion and friendship with other leading members of the same party, Eustathius of Sebaste, Basil of Ancyra, and George of Laodicea (Soz. iv. 25; Philost. iv. 12). But the enmity of Acacius pursued his rival "even unto strange cities." Silvanus was warned against holding communion with one who had been deposed for contumacy and other crimes. But Cyril had gained great popularity at Tarsus by his sermons, the people would not hear of his leaving them, and Silvanus declined to attend to the admonition (Theodt. u. s.).

Nearly two years after his deposition, September, 359, Cyril laid his appeal before the Council of Seleucia, at which he took his place among the semi-Arians. Acacius vehemently protested against his admission to the council. "If Cyril did not leave the synod, he must." Some of the bishops, in the cause of peace, begged Cyril to yield, at least temporarily, till his appeal had been heard. Cyril refused, and Acacius quitted the council, but soon returned, and took a leading part in the subsequent stormy debates. The semi-Arian party, however, were in the ascendant, and the tables were turned on Acacius, who was himself deposed, and Cyril restored (Theodt. ii. 26; Socr. ii. 40; Soz. iv. 22; Philost. iv. 12). Acacius was not the man to yield without an effort. He and his friends at once started for the capital, where they anticipated their rivals, and had little difficulty in persuading the weak Constantius to summon a fresh council to settle the disturbed affairs of the church. At this council fresh accusations were added to those formerly adduced. The charge of sacrilegiously disposing of the church goods was revived, and the emperor's indignation was excited by hearing that a baptismal robe of gold brocade, presented by his father Constantine to Macarius, which had been sold, had unfortunately found its way into the wardrobe of a theatre, and had been recognised on the stage. Acacius's arts prevailed, and Cyril was a second time banished (Socr. ii. 42; Soz. iv. 25; Theodt. ii. 27).

On the accession of Julian, 361, Cyril was reinstated in his see, together with all the exiled bishops (Socr. iv. 1; Soz. u. s.: Theodt. iii. 4; Amm. Marcell. xxii. 5). On his way to Jerusalem he visited Meletius at Antioch, who commended to his protection the son of the high-priest of Daphne, who had become a convert to the faith, and feared the consequences of his father's wrath. He accepted the charge, and carried away the lad by night (Theodt. iii. 14). At Jerusalem he calmly watched the attempts of Julian to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem, and is said to have foretold that it must fail (Soer. iii. 20; Rufinus, i. 37). This is not the place to enter on the vexed question of the supernatural portents by which this impious attempt to give the lie to the express words of Christ was frustrated. It will be enough to remind the reader that though they are not mentioned by Jerome, are doubted by the candid Lardner, and, of course, scoffed at by Gibbon, the facts are confirmed to us, not only by the evidence of early Christian writers, who might be only too ready to give credence to them (Soer. iii. 20; Soz. v. 22; Theodt. iii. 20; Chrysost. c. Jud. et Gent. i. 709, 789, 790; Greg. Naz. Oratio adv. Julian. ii. 9-12; Ambros. Epist. xl. ii. 946, &c.), but "strange as it may seem," to quote Gibbon's words, c. xxiii., "by the unexceptionable testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus (xxiii. 1), the philosophic soldier," and a heathen. The statement that Julian had resolved to sacrifice Cyril, and other leading adherents of the faith to his hatred for Christianity, on his return from Persia, may probably be regarded as a calumny of the careless and untrustworthy Orosius (Oros. Hist. vii. 20).

During the reign of the orthodox Jovian Cyril's episcopate was undisturbed, and the accession of Valens and Valentinian found him in quiet possession of his see, 364. In 366 his old enemy Acacius died, and Cyril was not slow to assert the claim to priority for the see of Jerusalem, which had been the cause of such bitter strife between them. In apparent defiance of the canon of Nice he immediately claimed the nomination to the see of Caesarea, and appointed Philomenus. He was deposed by the Eutychian faction, and another Cyril substituted. He, in return, was deposed by Cyril, who consecrated his sister's son Gelasius in his room, A.D. 367 (Epiph. Haer. lxxiii. 37).

The year 367 saw Cyril for a third time deposed, and driven into exile by the edict of the Arian Valens, in company with all the prelates recalled by Julian (Soer. ii. 45; Soz. iv. 30; Epiph. Haer. lxxvi. 20). His banishment lasted till the death of Valens and the accession of Theodosius, Jan. 19, 379, when he once more, and for the last time, resumed the occupation of his see, which he retained quietly for the eight remaining years of his life (Hier. Vir. Ill. c. 112; Soer. v. 3; Soz. vii. 2). On his return he found Jerusalem rent with schisms, infested with almost every form of heresy, and polluted by the most flagrant crimes and other viciousness of life. To combat these evils he appealed to the council held at Antioch, 379, which despatched Gregory Nyssen to his aid. But the disease was too deeply seated to admit of an easy or speedy remedy. Gregory departed hopeless of a cure, and in his "Warning against Pilgrimages," drew a dark picture of the depravation of morals in the Holy City (De Euntibus Hieros. p. 656).

In 381 Cyril was present at the second Oecumenical council held at Constantinople, when he took rank with the chief metropolitans, the bishops of Alexandria and Antioch. On this occasion he declared his full adhesion to the Nicene faith, and his acceptance of the test word, Homousion (Soer. iv. 8; Soz. iv. 7). The following year the bishops who were present at the capita, in their letter declining Damasus's invitation to a council at Rome, vindicated the episcopal rank of Cyril, as canonically unquestionable, together with that of Nectarius and Flavian, and spoke of him in the terms of high respect already quoted (Theodt. v. 8).

Cyril's death is stated to have occurred March 18, 386 (Soer. v. 15; Soz. vii. 14; Bolland, March 18, p. 625 b). He was bishop of Jerusalem for thirty-five years, sixteen of which he passed in exile.

Cyril's works consist of eighteen "Catechetical lectures," addressed to catechumens (κατηχησεις φωτισομένων) and five "Mystagogical lectures," addressed to the newly baptized (μυσταγωγικαί κατηχησεις πρὸς τοὺς νεοφωτιστούς). These, as we have seen, were composed in his youth (ὅς ἐν τῇ νεότητι συνέταξεν, Hieron. de Vir. Ill. c. 112), about 347, while he was still a presbyter. The genuineness of these lectures, received by the whole Church as the work of Cyril, has been severely questioned by Rivet (Crit. Sac. lib. iii. c. 8; Oudin, Scr. Eccl. Ant. i. 461-464); Rössler (Bibl. der Kirchengesch. Th. 5, p. 441), and others. The internal grounds for suspicion are so feeble, that we may say with Mosheim, that they are such as could only have suggested themselves to minds anxious at all costs to get rid of evidence damaging to themselves. The external grounds are also worth little. They arise from the fact that in the Augsburg MS. the last five lectures bear the name of John, bishop of Jerusalem; and in a Roman MS., those of Cyril and John jointly; as well as that they, especially the five last, are not so often quoted or referred to by ancient writers as we might have expected. These arguments are well confuted by Tontée, and Schröckh (Kirchengesch. xii. 375-382). They are quite worthless against the Consensus Ecclesiae, confirmed by the large quotations made from them by Cyril's contemporary Rufinus, in his Expositio Symboli, and by the reference to the 4th lecture by Theodoret (Dialog. ii. 106). The homogeneous structure of the whole work, and the references contained in them to the preceding lectures equally forbid the severance of the five mystagogical lectures from the Catechetical. Vossius (de Tribus Symbol. Dissert. i. 35-36), though accepting their authenticity generally, holds that they have been very largely interpolated. But his arguments are feeble. Cyril's "Catechetical lectures" possess considerable interest, as being the earliest example extant of anything in the shape of a formal system of theology. Their value is also great from the testimony they bear to the canon of Scripture, the teaching of the church on the chief articles of the creed, and on the sacraments, and from the light they throw on the ritual of the church of the fourth century. The perfect agreement of his teaching, as Dr. Newman remarks (Library of the Fathers, vol. ii. part i. pp. ix.-x.), as regards the doctrine of the Trinity, with the divines of the Athanasian school, of whom he was suspicious, and suspected by them, is of great weight in determining the true doctrine of the early church on that fundamental question, and relieves Cyril from all suspicion of heterodoxy. But his Catecheses do not rank at all high as an argumentative or expository work, and few would care to read them for their own sake; nor has Cyril any claim to a place among the masters of Christian thought, whose writings form the permanent riches of the church.

Cyril's only other works preserved to us are a Homily on the sick man at the Pool of Bethesda, delivered while he was a presbyter, and his letter to Constantius on the luminous cross.

There are editions of his works in Greek, Paris, Morel, 1564; in Greek and Latin, Cologne, 1564; and in Latin, Paris, 1589; in Greek and Latin, by Prevot, Paris, 1604, 4to; and Petau, Paris 1622, fol. Prevot's edition was reprinted, together with the works of Synesius of Cyrene, Paris, 1631, fol. These editions were all surpassed by the English one of Thomas Milles, in Greek and Latin, Oxford, 1703, fol., and this was in its turn exceeded by the Benedictine edition of A. A. Touttée, Paris, 1720, fol.; and Venice, 1761, fol. The introduction contains very elaborate and exhaustive dissertations on the life, writings, and doctrines of Cyril. These are reprinted in Migne's Patrologia, vol. xxxiii. There is an edition by Reischl, Munich, 1848, 8vo, 2 vols. We may also mention Van Vollenhoven, Specimen Theolog. de Cyrilli Hieros. Catechesibus, Amstel. 1837, 8vo.

The chief modern authorities for Cyril's life and doctrines are Touttée, u. s.; Tillemont, Mémoires Ecclés. vol. viii.; Cave, Historia Literaria, i. 211, 212; Schröckh, Kirchengeschichte, xii. 343, sq.; Newman, preface to the Oxford translation, Library of the Fathers, ii. 1. [E.V.]

CYRILLUS (3) an intruding bishop of Jerusalem, who, according to Epiphanius (adv. Hær. lxi. p. 637), followed by Baronius and Touttée, was thrust into the see of his great namesake during his deposition, in succession to Herennius. The two Cyrils are identified by Tillemont (Mém. Ecclés. tom. viii. p. 783) and the Bollandists. There are not sufficient data to determine the point. [E. V.]

(4) A presbyter or bishop of Palestine, to whom Jerome had delivered a written confession of his faith, to which he refers the presbyter Marcus in a querulous letter, written A.D. 377 or 378, remonstrating against being so continually applied to for proof of his orthodoxy. (Hieron. Epist. lxxvii. (xvii.) § 4.) He is identified by Blondel with Cyril of Jerusalem, but the relations between Cyril and Jerome were not such as to render it possible that he would lodge such a document with him. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. tom. xii. pp. 49, 624; Fabr. Bibl. Græc. tom. ix. p. 450.) The Explicatio fidei ad Cyrillum sometimes attributed to Jerome, and found in some editions of his works, is supposititious. [E. V.]

(5) Martyr of Heliopolis in Syria, a deacon who suffered for the faith in the time of Julian, having previously displayed great zeal in the destruction of idols, in the reign of Constantine. (Theod. H. E. lib. iii. c. 7; Suidas, sub voc.) [E. V.]

CYRILLUS (6), a bishop in Armenia, reconciled by St. Basil to the church at Satala in 372. (Basil. Epist. xcix. § 4.) [E. V.]

(7) ST., archbishop of Alexandria. He was a native of Alexandria; he had been studious from early years, and had learned theology under monastic discipline in "the desert." During this period of his life he had been reproved by Isidore of Pelusium, who was for years his venerated monitor, for occupying himself, even in "solitude," with worldly thoughts and interests (Isid. Epist. i. 25); and it is evident from his whole career that so strong a will and so vehement a nature could never be thoroughly satisfied with a life of contemplation. "After five years' abode in Mount Nitria," his uncle, the then archbishop Theophilus, summoned him to Alexandria, where he was ordained, and where he expounded and preached with great reputation (Neale, Hist. Alex. i. 226).

Theophilus died on Oct. 15, A.D. 412. Cyril was put forward for the vacant chair; his rival, the archdeacon Timotheus, was strong in the support of the local government; but after a tumultuous contest, Cyril was enthroned, three days after his uncle's death. (See his first Paschal homily.)

His episcopate, thus begun in trouble and discord, seemed at first to forebode nothing better than a course of violent and untempered zeal, as if the fierce spirit of Theophilus were governing his conduct. He shut up the chamber of the Novatians, took away their "sacred treasure," and deprived their bishop Theopemptus, of all his property (Soc. vii. 7). This unsparring use of the great powers within his reach as archbishop was followed up by an attack upon the large body of Jewish residents. They had provoked him by an exhibition of implacable hostility. One Hierax, a schoolmaster, always foremost in applauding Cyril's sermons according to the fashion of the day, was denounced by the Jews as an encourager of sedition when he was present in the theatre at the promulgation of a prefectorial edict. Orestes, the prefect, who hated Cyril as a formidable rival potentate, took occasion to have Hierax publicly tortured in the theatre. Cyril thereupon tried the effect of menaces on the principal Jews of Alexandria. This only increased their bitterness; they began to organise plots against the Christians; and one night a cry rang through the streets, that "Alexander's church was on fire." The Christians rushed to save their sanctuary: the Jews, recognising each other, as had been pre-arranged, by rings made from the bark of palm branches, fell upon and slew the Christians whom they met. At day-break Cyril, at the head of an immense crowd, took forcible possession of the synagogues, expelled the Jews from the city, and abandoned their property to plunder. Orestes, naturally indignant, complained to the emperor, Theodosius II., then a boy of fourteen. Cyril, on his part, addressed to the court an account of the Jewish outrages, and, at the suggestion of the people, endeavoured to pacify the prefect. Orestes would not listen; Cyril extended to him, as a form of solemn appeal, the book of the Gospels; it might well have occurred to Orestes that the archbishop had forgotten some of its precepts when he in person led on a multitude of Christian zealots to revenge one violence by another. And many of the Nitrian monks, whose fierce zeal had been intensified by the monastic esprit de corps, hastened to Alexandria, encountered the prefect in his chariot, and denounced him as a pagan idolater. "I am a Christian," he replied; "I was baptized by the bishop of Constantinople." Thereupon a monk named Ammonius flung a stone, which wounded Orestes in the head. The people seized the monk, who was tortured with a severity which proved fatal; and Cyril so utterly forgot himself as to give the dead man a grand church funeral, to speak of him as Thaumasius, and to panegyrisse him as a martyr. The "sober minded" Christians would not recognise such a saint, and Cyril ere long allowed the whole affair to sink into oblivion. But a more famous tragedy followed. The gifted female philosopher, Hypatia, was the boast of Alexandrian paganism. Fired with the notion that she incensed Orestes against Cyril, a furious mob of so-called Christians, headed by a "reader" named Peter, one day dragged her from her carriage, bore her into the great Caesarean church, so often referred to in the Athanasian history, killed her with sharp shells, tore her body to pieces, and burned it at a place called Cinaron. This hideous crime, done in a sacred place and in a sacred season—it was the Lent of 415—brought, as Socrates expresses it (vii. 15) "no small reproach on Cyril and the church of the Alexandrians."

Here one question inevitably suggests itself. Was this foul murder indeed what Gibbon in one passage calls it, an "exploit of Cyril's? Did he take any part in it, or did he approve it ex post facto? It has been said that "Cyril was suspected, even by the orthodox, of complicity in the murder" (Stanley's Lect. on East. Ch. 293). Socrates, as sympathising with Novatians, has been considered to do Cyril less than justice: but in this case he does not intimate such a suspicion against the archbishop, any more than he does against the whole church of Alexandria. He says, and has a perfect right to say it, that this church and its chief pastor were to some extent disgraced by the occurrence of such a deed among its members. As for Damascius's assertion that Cyril really prompted the murder (Suidas, p. 1059), we cannot consider as evidence the statement of a pagan philosopher who lived about 130 years after the event, and was a thorough hater of Christianity. We are justified in regarding it, with Canon Robertson (Hist. Ch. i. 401) as "an unsupported calumny"; but with the same writer we will add that "the perpetrators were mostly officers of his church, and had unquestionably derived encouragement from his earlier proceedings; and his character deservedly suffered in consequence." His was the too common case of a man who stirs up a force of passions which frequently outrun his control. The turbulent and furious "parabolani" and others, who shed Hypatia's blood at the foot of the altar, were but "bettering the instruction" which had let them loose upon the synagogues. Their bishop had let his indignant zeal virtually persuade him that the wrath of man could work the righteousness of God; he was bent on making the kingdom of Christ assert itself, as a sovereign power, in the face of the world, and he would have argued that rough-handed means must not be declined in the cause of the church, amid her strife with Jewish fanaticism and a pagan society foul and rotten to the core. His name has paid dearly for the error, and the great doctrinal cause which he upheld so stoutly in after years has suffered for the faults of his earlier life.

It was but natural that the government should in the next year restrain the clergy from political action, and, in particular, by restrictions on the number and conduct of the parabolani.

Cyril had inherited his uncle's animosity against John Chrysostom, who, in his opinion, had been canonically deposed; he rejected with bitterness the advice of Atticus of Constantinople to place "John's" name on his church diptychs (Ep. p. 204); and it was not until after the memory of that persecuted saint had been rehabilitated at Constantinople as well as at Antioch, that the archbishop of Alexandria, urged by Isidore of Pelusium not to perpetuate a private feud under the pretext of piety (Isid. i. 370), consented in 417 to follow these precedents, and so to resume for his church communion with Rome and the West in general, which had held aloof from all who did injustice to "John's" memory—a memory which Cyril never learned to love. (See Tillemont, xiv. 281.)

We may pass over several uneventful years, during which Cyril must be supposed to have occupied himself in ordinary church affairs and in theological literature. He wrote his yearly Paschal addresses, and composed his work on Adoration in Spirit and in Truth, his treatise on the Holy Trinity, his commentaries on the Pentateuch, Isaiah, the minor prophets, and the Gospel of St. John, and his refutation of Julian's treatise against Christianity.

We now come to the great controversy with which Cyril's name is pre-eminently associated. In the end of the year 428 he became aware of the excitement caused in Constantinople by the preaching of the archbishop, Nestorius. The line of thought which Nestorius had entered upon, under the influence, as it seems, of Theodore of Mopsuestia, led him to explain away the mystery of the Incarnation by reducing it to a mere association between the Eternal Word and a human Christ. The Alexandrian see had agents at Constantinople, who would be careful to keep Cyril well informed of all events of ecclesiastical interest: and the denial, by Nestorius and his supporters, of the strict personal oneness between "God the Word" and the Son of Mary—a denial of which the formula was "Let no one call Mary Theotocos"—was an event which, as it ere long called forth an indignant protest against the archbishop's teaching on the part of a layman of Constantinople, Eusebius, afterwards bishop of Dorylaeum, was certain to excite the vigilant zeal of a prelate like Cyril, opposed, alike by temperament and antecedents, to all opinions which undermined the mysterious majesty of the Christian faith. Very early in January 429 Cyril entered on the subject in his Paschal letter or homily for that year, the seventeenth of the series; in which, while affirming with great vividness and emphasis the reality and permanence of Christ's manhood, he enforced the singleness of his Divine Personality, and even applied to His human mother, in two distinct passages, a phrase stronger than Theo-tocos.—μήτηρ Θεοῦ. Four months later, about the end of April, when the controversial sermons of Nestorius—exhibiting no little confusion of thought, but clearly indicating a disbelief in what is theologically termed the Personal Union—had come into the hands of Egyptian monks, Cyril wrote to all who within his jurisdiction were “practising the solitary life,” a long letter, upholding the term Theotocos in its true sense, as not meaning “mother of the Godhead,” but mother, as regarded the manhood, of Him who, being in the form of God, assumed the form of a servant, and, being the Lord of Glory, condescended to suffer the death of the cross. If it was true, Cyril argued, that Jesus Christ was God, it was by consequence not less true that His mother was Theotocos. If she was not rightly so called, her Son was a human individual external to the divine nature, and was not in a true sense Emmanuel. This letter, it may be added, cites at length the Nicene Creed in its original form, ignoring the alterations made by the Council of Constantinople, and insisting that the Creed identified Jesus Christ with the Divine Co-essential Son.

Nestorius was much displeased at the reception given to this letter by some official persons at Constantinople when it was transmitted thither from Egypt. He ordered one Photius to answer it, and encouraged some Alexandrians who were residing at the imperial city, and had been rebuked by Cyril for gross offences, to prefer complaints against him (Mansi, iv. 1003, 887). On the other hand, Cyril, having also been interrogated by Celestine of Rome as to the genuineness of Nestorius's sermons, wrote his first letter to Nestorius (Cyr. Ep. p. 19; Mansi, iv. 883), the point of which was that the prevailing excitement had been caused, not by the letter to the monks of Egypt, but by Nestorius's own refusal to allow to Christ's mother a title which was the symbol of her Son's real Divinity. Cyril also referred to a work “On the Holy and Co-essential Trinity,” which he himself had written in the lifetime of Nestorius's predecessor Atticus, and in which he had used language on the Incarnation which harmonised with his letter to the monks. Nestorius replied very briefly, and in a courteous tone; although he intimated dislike of what he deemed harsh in Cyril's letter (Cyr. Ep. p. 21; Mansi, iv. 885). He evidently did not wish to quarrel with the see of Alexandria, although he practised considerable severities on monks of his own city who withstood him to the face. Cyril, for his part, was not forward to press the controversy to extremes. During the latter part of 429, he was even blamed by some for inactivity. But he may have written at this period, as Garnier thinks, his “Scholia,” or “Notes,” on the Incarnation of the Only begotten (Mar. Merc. ii. 216), and in February 430 (probably after hearing how Nestorius had upheld a bishop named Dorotheus in his anathema against the word Theotocos), he wrote, in synod, a Second Epistle to Nestorius—the letter which became a symbolic treatise sanctioned by General Councils. (See it in Cyr. Ep. p. 22; Mansi, iv. 887; comp. Tillemont, xiv. 338.) Nothing can be more definite and luminous than his disclaimer of all Apollinarian notions, which had been imputed by Nestorius to those who confessed the “Theo-cos”; his explanation of the idea intended by that phrase; his peremptory exclusion of the theory of a mere association as distinct from a hypostatic or personal union, and his not less emphatic assertion of the distinctness of the natures thus brought together in the one Christ. “Not that the difference of the natures was annulled by the union, but rather that one Godhead and Manhood constituted the one Lord Jesus Christ, by their ineffable concurrence into unity. . . . Thus we confess one Christ and Lord.” The answer of Nestorius was characterised by ignoratio elenchi, and could not be regarded as a satisfactory statement of belief (Cyr. Ep. p. 25; Mansi, iv. 891). Cyril wrote another letter to some of his own clergy resident at Constantinople; the Nestorian argument from the impassibility of the Godhead, he put aside as not to the purpose; and he described Nestorianism as an attempt to constitute two Christs and two Sons (Cyr. Ep. p. 32; Mansi, iv. 1003). As a record of Cyril's personal feeling, this letter is in two points worthy of special notice; it recognises the proverbial eloquence of “John” Chrysostom, and it expresses the writer's desire for peace if peace could be had without a sacrifice of truth. He disapproved of a draft of a petition to the emperor which these clerics had sent him; it was too vehement. In a similar strain he wrote to a common friend of Nestorius and himself, declaring, with an evident earnestness which may remind us of his great predecessor Athanasius, that he cared for nothing so much as the faith, and that his desire, as regards Nestorius, was that his brother bishop might be preserved from the charge of heresy (Cyr. Ep. p. 31; Mansi, iv. 899). A long letter “On the Right Faith,” which he wrote about the same time to the emperor Theodosius, contained an elaborate survey of former heresies, and of the error now spreading in the church. It is to this treatise (Cyr. tom. v. par. 2; Mansi, iv. 617) that reference might specially be made in considering the charge so often brought against men like Cyril, that their keen-eyed speculative orthodoxy stands coldly apart from all care for practical religion. Cyril, at any rate, felt the vital importance of his cherished doctrine in its bearings on the Christian life: he urged that if the Word were not personally incarnate, i.e. if the human Teacher and Sufferer were not really one with the eternal Son of God, the faith of Christian men would be made void, the work of their salvation would be annihilated, and the cross would lose its virtue. For the very principle of Christian redemption lay in this, that it was one and the same “Ego” who, possessing, by virtue of His incarnation, at once a divine and a human sphere of existence, could be at once the God of mankind and the Saviour who died for them. In chapter 21 he dwells, in pursuance of this idea, on the death of Christ as being a full satisfaction (ἰσάρον ἀληθῶς ἀντάξιον). This treatise contains an argument on which Cyril was never weary of insisting: it was particularly congenial to the depth and awe, the richness and the tenderness, of his thoughts on the great mystery of incorporation into Christ. From the admitted truth that the flesh of Christ was received in the Eucharist as life-giving, he argued that it must be, in a real sense, the flesh of God. In the sixth chapter of the treatise, he says that Nestorians would not have erred by dwelling simply on the difference between the natures of "God" and "flesh": that difference was undeniable; but they went on to assert an individual and separate being for the man Jesus as apart from the Divine Word, and this was the very point of their heresy. In chapter 27 he rises to an almost Chrysostomic range of religious eloquence when he sets forth the super-angelic greatness involved in the idea of "the Lord of Glory." Another treatise, in two books, was addressed to the princesses, Pulcheria, the gifted sister of the feeble emperor, Arcadia, and Marina (Cyr. tom. v. par. 2; Mansi, iv. 679, sq.). In the first book he argued at length from Scripture for the oneness and Divinity of Christ, for His position as the true object of faith, and for His office as life-giver and atoner: and among the texts which he urged were Heb. i. 3, 6, xiii. 8; Titus ii. 13; 1 Cor. ii. 8; 2 Cor. viii. 9; Eph. iii. 17; Gal. i. 1; Phil. ii. 6; Matt. xi. 28, xvi. 16, 20; John i. 14, xvii. 3; 1 John v. 5 (without the words about the "heavenly witnesses"). He laid great stress on the vastness of the claim advanced by and for Christ in Scripture, and on the unreasonableness of demanding so absolute an obedience towards one who was not personally Divine. He asked how the death of a mere man could be of such importance for the race? Many a saint had lived and died, but not one by dying had become the saviour of his fellows. He quoted nine passages from earlier writers in support of the term Theotocos, or of the doctrine which it guarded. In the second book he professed specially to explain texts relied on by Nestorians, including parts of Heb. ii. and Matt. xxvii. 46, Luke ii. 40, 52, John iv. 22, Mark xii. 32; as to which last text he seems to recognise, as he does elsewhere (though sometimes favouring a different view), a limitation of knowledge in Christ's manhood, analogous to His submission, in His human sphere, to pain and want, and consistent with a perpetual omniscience in His Divine consciousness (Ad Regiu. ii. 17). In accordance with the emphatic assertion (ii. 7) of the value imparted to Christ's death by His Divinity, the work concludes with "for all our hope is in Christ, by whom and with whom," &c.

In these treatises, if some texts are strained beyond their natural meaning, there is yet a remarkable exhibition of acuteness and fertility of thought, pervaded and quickened by what Dorner calls Cyril's "warm interest" in Christianity as a religion. It was probably about April 430 that Cyril answered the letter of the Roman bishop, which he had received as far back as a year before (Ep. p. 26); he informed him that the main body of the faithful of Constantinople (acting on the principle fully recognised in the ancient church, that loyalty to the faith was a higher duty than ecclesiastical subordination) were holding off from the communion of Nestorius, but that they greatly needed support and countenance; and in very deferential terms he asked Celestine to say whether any fellowship could be maintained by orthodox bishops with one who in fact was disseminating heresy (Mansi, iv. 1011). With this letter he sent a series of passages illustrative of what Nestorius held and of what church-writers had taught, translated into Latin "as well as Alexandrians could" perform such a task, and to be shewn by his messenger Posidonius to Celestine, if the latter had received anything from Nestorius. One other letter of Cyril's belongs to the summer of 430: he addressed himself to the aged Acacius bishop of Berrhoen, who communicated the letter to John the patriarch of Antioch, but in his answer informed Cyril that many who had come to Syria, fresh from the preaching of Nestorius, were disposed to think him not committed to heresy. It is observable that Cyril tells Acacius that some had been led on by Nestorianism into an express denial that Christ was God (see Mansi, iv. 1053).

And now we reach a landmark in the story. On August 11, Celestine, having held a synod which pronounced Nestorius to be heretical, gave Cyril a commission of a stringent character (see this letter in Mansi, iv. 1017). He was to "join the authority of the Roman see to his own," and, on the part of Celestine as well as for himself, to warn Nestorius that unless a written retraction were executed within ten days, giving assurance of his accepting the faith as to "Christ our God," which was held by the churches of Rome and Alexandria, he would be excluded from the communion of those churches, and "provision" would be made by them for the church of Constantinople, i.e. by the appointment of an orthodox bishop. Had Cyril been as violent and imperious as he is often said to have been, he would not have deferred by a single day the carrying out of these instructions. But he took time to assemble, at Alexandria, a "Council of all Egypt," and then, probably on Monday Nov. 3, wrote his Third Letter to Nestorius (Ep. p. 57; Mansi, iv. 1067; Routh, Scr. Op. ii. 17), in which the bishop of Constantinople was required to anathematise the errors which he had maintained, and a long dogmatic exposition of the true sense of the Nicene Creed was given, with a careful disclaimer of all confusion between Godhead and manhood. To the end of the letter were appended twelve "articles," or "chapters," couched in the form of anathematisms against the various points of the Nestorian theory: e.g. that Emmanuel is not really God, and Mary not Theotocos; that the Word was not personally joined to flesh; that there was a "connexion" of two persons; that Christ is a "God bearing man;" that He was a separate individual acted on by the Word, and called "God" along with Him; that His Flesh was not the Word's own; that the Word did not suffer death in the flesh. These propositions were not well calculated to reclaim Nestorius; nor were they, indeed, so worded throughout as to approve themselves to all who essentially agreed with Cyril as to the Personal Deity of Christ. On the contrary, the abruptness of their tone, and a certain one-sidedness which made some of them open, primâ facie, to serious criticism from persons who, without being Nestorians, felt that in the attack on Nestorianism the truth of Christ's real and permanent manhood might be in danger of losing its due prominence, were obstacles to their acceptance; and as we shall see, he was afterwards obliged to put forth explanations of their meaning. Cyril wrote two other letters to the clergy and laity, and to the monks of Constantinople, urging them to contend, or praising them for having already contended, for that faith in Christ's true Godhead of which "Theotocos" was the recognised expression (Mansi, iv. 1094). Four bishops were sent from Alexandria, as bearers of the Synodal documents to Constantinople, and deliver the anathematizations to Nestorius in his palace, after the conclusion of the Eucharistic service, either on Sunday Nov. 30, or on Sunday Dec. 7. He met the denunciations of the Alexandrian Synod by enlisting several Eastern bishops in his cause, including John of Antioch, and Theodoret, who accused Cyril of Apollinarianism: by preaching in an orthodox strain to his own people, and by framing twelve anathematizations of his own, some of which betrayed confusion of thought, while some tended directly to confirm the imputations current against his teaching: for instance he would not allow Emmanuel to be called very God. Theodoret, whose views on the subject were not as yet clear or consistent, composed a reply to Cyril. Andrew of Samosata, in the name of the "Eastern" bishops properly so called, also entered the lists of controversy against the great theologian of Egypt, who answered both his new antagonists by composing an Apology for the twelve articles (Mansi, v. 19) and a Defence of them against Theodoret's objections. These treatises, the latter of which was addressed to a bishop named Euoipius (Mansi, v. 81), threw light on the state of mind to which Cyril's anathematizations had seemed so offensive. The Easterns, or Andrew speaking in their name, exhibit some remarkable misconceptions of Cyril's meaning, e.g. when they tax him with denying Christ's flesh to be of real human derivation; but they absolutely disclaim the view which would make Jesus merely a pre-eminent saint, and they speak of worship being due to the One Son. Theodoret uses a good deal of language which is primâ facie Nestorian; his objections are pervaded by an ignoratio elenchi, and his language is repeatedly illogical and inconsistent; but he and Cyril were essentially nearer to each other in belief than, at the time, they would have admitted (Hooker, v. 53. 4), for Theodoret virtually owns the personal oneness, and explains the phrase "God assumed man," by "He assumed manhood." Both writers speak severely of each other: Theodoret calls Cyril a wolf, and Cyril treats Theodoret as a calumniator. Cyril in his "Reply to the Easterns" and in his letter to Euoipius earnestly disclaims both forms of Apollinarianism—the notion of a mindless manhood in Christ, and the notion of a body formed out of Godhead. As to the latter, John i. 14, he says, excludes it. In the reply (on art. 4), he admits "the language appropriate to each nature." He points out the confusions of thought which had misled Theodoret as to "God" and "Godhead"; he insists that the eternal Son Himself, retaining His divine dignity and perfections, condescended to assume the limitations of manhood; and so (ad Euoip. 4, as in ad Rejin. ii. 17, &c.) he explains Mark xii. 32, and so says, with a touch of devotional tenderness which amid the clash of polemics is particularly refreshing, "He wept as man, that He might stop thee from weeping. He is said to have been weak as to His manhood, that he might put an end to thy weakness" (ad Euoip. 10). He adhered with characteristic definiteness to the point really involved—the question was, he felt, whether Jesus were a human individual (to be viewed ἰδικῶς, as he repeatedly says) or whether He were the Divine Son Himself appearing in human form and occupying, without prejudice to His inalienable and pre-existent majesty, a human sphere of existence. In the former case, the Son of Mary must be regarded simply as a very highly-favoured saint; in the latter case, as a Divine Redeemer. In the former case, Christianity appeared, to Cyril's mind, to lose its distinctive power and preciousness; in the latter case it shone forth in its Divine reality, as a Gospel worthy of the name. To quote from the last section of the long letter to Euoipius: "Let us all acknowledge as Saviour the Word of God, who remained impassible in the nature of the Godhead, but suffered, as Peter said, in the flesh. For, by a true union, that body which tasted death was His very own. Else, how was "Christ from the Jews according to the flesh," and "God over all, and blessed for ever, amen?" and into whose death we have been baptized, and by confessing whose resurrection are we justified? . . . The death of a mere man." &c. "or do we, as is indeed the case, proclaim the death of God who became man and suffered for us in flesh, and confessing His resurrection, put away the burden of sin?" To this same period may be assigned Cyril's five books "Against Nestorius," unless we place them in the preceding year. In these he comments on passages in Nestorius's sermons, and by all forms of argument and illustration sets forth the question really at stake—Had the Divine Son Himself become incarnate, or had He closely allied Himself to a man?

But we must now look back to that memorable November of 430. Before the Egyptian deputies could reach Constantinople, Theodosius issued letters to the metropolitans of his empire, summoning them to meet at Ephesus in the Pentecost of the following year, with such bishops as each might select, for the purpose of holding a General Council. This resolution, taken at the instance of Nestorius, had the effect of suspending all hostile action on the part of any individual bishop or provincial synod. Theodosius, who was prejudiced against Cyril, wrote sharply to him, censuring his "meddlesomeness" and "rashness," and complaining of his having written separately to the princesses. In compliance with the imperial order, Cyril arrived at Ephesus with fifty bishops, about June 2, 431. He had already written from Rhodes to his own clergy and laity (Ep. 81) as "present with them in spirit, though absent in body," entreating the aid of their prayers, and exhorting them during his absence to persevere in their religious duties. The details of the history of the Ephesine Council, or Third Oecumenical Synod, will be found elsewhere. [EPIHESUS, Councils of, in Dict. Chr. Ant.] Here it is enough to specify the occasions on which Cyril came prominently forward. A fortnight elapsed before the council was opened: Cyril, like other prelates, employed himself in strengthening the cause which he had at heart by earnest addresses: but the "encomium" on the Virgin, included among his works as delivered at this time, is perhaps spurious. Another discourse, evidently genuine, speaks of Nestorius with more moderation. Cyril wrote another letter to the Alexandrian Church, in which he spoke of "the evil one, the restless beast" (meaning obviously Satan) as "plotting against the glory" of the Divine Saviour (Ep. 82). After long waiting for the arrival of John of Antioch and his attendant bishops, Cyril received a cordial letter from his brother patriarch, announcing that he had been travelling incessantly for a month, and that he hoped to "embrace Cyril" in five or six days more (Ep. p. 83). There also arrived two metropolitans who bore from him a message to the bishops, to the effect that he requested them to proceed with the business in case he should be delayed. The question at once arose—"Should the bishops wait any longer?" It would have been clearly better, even as a matter of policy, to wait a few days for John's arrival. The cause of orthodoxy could never be aided by its being associated with, to say the least, the appearance of unfairness or impatience. But Cyril and his suffragans were, it may be surmised, not at all desirous of John's presence, for they knew he would be hostile to the Cyrilline articles: they encouraged the idea that he was purposely loitering from a reluctance to join in measures against Nestorius (an idea which appears to have been unfounded, Evagr. i. 3) and they took advantage of the fact that other bishops were weary of waiting, the rather that illness, and even death, had appeared amid their body. So it was that the Council was opened on June 22; and John's message, which evidently referred to a possible delay beyond the six days specified in his letter, was unjustifiably quoted in defence of a refusal to wait for him during that period. In this matter, it is impossible to acquit Cyril of blame; and it is evident that the fault "brought its own punishment in the confusions that ensued" (Neale, Hist. Alex. i. 259).

Cyril presided in the assembly: he did so, not in virtue of the commission from Celestine to act in his stead—which had been already acted upon in the Alexandrian Council of November—but as the prelate of highest dignity then present, and as holding the proxy and representing the mind of the Roman bishop, until the Roman legates should arrive. (See Tillemont, xiv. 393.) Cyril called on the Council to judge between himself and Nestorius: the main facts were stated by his secretary; when Nestorius refused to appear, Cyril's second letter to him was read, and at Cyril's request the bishops pronounced upon its orthodoxy: it was, they declared, in entire accordance with the faith. His third letter was received, not with any express approbation, but, as it appears, with a tacit assent, which might be held to extend to the "articles." (The Council professed, afterwards, that it had approved Cyril's epistles; Mansi, iv. 1237.) After all the evidence producible as to Nestorius's opinions, and as to the mind of orthodox fathers had been laid before the Council (and great stress was doubtless laid on Nestorius's recent avowal, "I never will admit that a child of two or three months old was God," Mansi, iv. 1181, 1239) the deposition and excommunication of Nestorius were resolved on by the assembled bishops: and Cyril signed the sentence before his brethren in these words: "I, Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, sign, giving my judgment together with the Council." He afterwards wrote in support of the act to two bishops and two priests, with the much revered Dalmatius, an abbat of Constantinople, and to the Alexandrians and to the monks of Egypt (Ep. p. 84 sq.)

When the patriarch of Antioch, with a few bishops, arrived on June 26 or 27, vexation at the course taken by the majority led him and his friends into violent and reckless conduct: they held a "council" of their own, and "deposed" Cyril, and Memnon bishop of Ephesus, imputing to the former not only Apollinarianism, which, however unjustly, had been already imputed to him by favourers of Nestorius, but the heresy of the ultra-Arian rationalist Euenomius. On the other hand, the Council of Ephesus, now reinforced by the Roman legates, treated Cyril and Celestine as one in faith, and proceeded to summon John—Cyril being disposed, had not the bishop of Jerusalem prevented it, to move for a sentence of deposition on the patriarch of Antioch, after the first summons (see Mansi, iv. 1311). It was of course easy for Cyril to repudiate and anathematise the heresies which had been imputed to him; and in doing so he coupled with them the Pelagian errors, together with those of Nestorius. John of Antioch, having disowned the Council's summons, was excommunicated, together with his adherents. Late in July Count John, the imperial high treasurer, was sent by Theodosius to Ephesus, with a letter in which Cyril, Memnon, and Nestorius were all three treated as deposed. Accordingly Cyril, like the two others, was put under arrest, and guards slept at the door of his chamber. Letters written by his opponents induced Isidore of Pelusium to write to him, exhorting him to avoid the bad precedents of his uncle's violent conduct, and not to give occasion for the rumour that he was swayed by personal animosity (Ep. i. 310). Cyril, for his part, spoke, in a letter to three of his suffragans then at Constantinople (Ep. p. 91), of infamous falsehoods as circulated against him, but as detected by Count John. He thanked God, he said, for having been counted worthy to suffer, for His Name's sake, not only bonds but other indignities. He received from a priest named Alypius a letter which in glowing terms described him as an imitator of the grand career of Athanasius. While the two rival assemblies of bishops, the council and the "conciliabulum," sent deputies to the court of Theodosius, Cyril employed himself in writing an "Explanation" of his "articles," and vindicating them against the charge of a confusion between the Godhead and the Manhood, or of any teaching inconsistent with the distinct existence of the latter, in the one Divine Person of the Incarnate Lord. Theodosius, in his final award, gave orders that Cyril and his friends should return home, but abstained from condemning the "Eastern" bishops, who on their side complained of his partiality to their opponents. On Oct. 30, Cyril returned to Alexandria: and shortly afterwards, Maximian, a pious and simple-hearted man, who by virtue of an imperial mandate had been consecrated to the see of Constantinople in the room of Nestorius, announced his accession to Cyril, who in his reply compared him to the faithful Eliakim, invested with the stewardship of Hezekiah's household on the deprivation of the unworthy Shebna. This letter contained a statement of orthodox doctrine, and a disclaimer of all ideas of "confusion" or "alteration" in the Divine nature of the Word. (Ep. p. 94 sq.; Mansi, v. 257 sq.)

Cyril was indeed conscious of the importance of defending himself against the charges of his opponents; and he began a vindication of his conduct, to be laid before the emperor (Mansi, v. 225). Theodosius, hoping that John and Cyril might be reconciled, endeavoured to arrange a meeting between them at Nicomedia. Cyril was disposed by this time to shew considerable moderation, and resolved to insist on nothing but the condemnation of Nestorius and the recognition of Maximian. The meeting, it was found, could not take place: but a council at Antioch framed six articles, expressly rejecting those of Cyril, but accepting Athanasius's 'Letter to Epictetus' as an exposition of Nicene orthodoxy. The reply of Cyril shewed that he had mastered his natural tendencies to vehement and unyielding self-assertion. He wrote to Acacius of Berrhoea, the oldest bishop of Syria, who had forwarded to him the six articles by the hands of the "tribune and notary" Aristolaus. The letter (preserved, in a Latin version, in the "Synodicon," Mansi, v. 831) is worthy of attention: Cyril represented the impossibility of withdrawing what he had written against Nestorius: it would be easy to come to a good understanding about the "articles" of the Alexandrian synod, if only the Easterns would accept the deposition of Nestorius. "Those who anathematise them will see that the meaning of the articles is directed solely against his blasphemies." For himself Cyril disavowed and condemned once more the heresies imputed to him, and asserted the impassibility of the Divine nature in Christ, while insisting that He, the Only-begotten Son, Himself "suffered for us in the flesh," according to the words of St. Peter.

This letter (which is referred to by Cyril in subsequent letters, Ep. pp. 110, 152, 155) opened the way to a reconciliation between Cyril and John of Antioch. The latter, although in his recent council he had bound himself to demand a recantation of the Cyrilline articles, now declared that Cyril had fully cleared himself from all heretical opinions. After a conference with Acacius, John sent to Alexandria Paul, bishop of Emesa, a man of experience whom they both could trust, in order to confer with Cyril. (See Cyril's letters to Acacius and Donatus, Ep. pp. 111, 156.) When Paul reached Alexandria, Cyril was for a time laid up with illness (Mansi, v. 987): but when he was able to see Paul, he received him, as Paul himself said, kindly and pacifically, and as became a bishop (Mansi, v. 288). They began their conference: Paul presented to Cyril a confession of faith as exhibiting the mind of John of Antioch (Ep. p. 103); it had been originally written at Ephesus by Theodoret (Tillemont, xiv. 531). "We confess," so ran this formulary, "our Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of God, to be perfect God and perfect Man, of a reasonable soul and a body, before the ages begotten of the Father according to Godhead, but in the last days Himself the self-same, for us and for our salvation, born of the Virgin Mary according to Manhood; of one essence with the Father as to Godhead, of one essence with us as to Manhood. For there took place an union of two natures;

CHRIST. BIOGR.

wherefore we confess one Christ, one Son, one Lord. According to this idea of an union without confusion, we confess the Holy Virgin to be Theotocos, because God the Word was incarnate and made Man, and from His very conception united to Himself the temple assumed from her." The formulary, although it dwelt more than Cyril had been wont to do on the double aspect of the Incarnation, was accepted by Cyril as representing Paul's own faith, and he placed a corresponding statement in the hands of Paul. The latter asked whether he would stand by Athanasius's letter to Epictetus. "Certainly; but is your copy of it free of corruption?" Paul produced his copy; Cyril compared it with the authentic text, and found that it had been tampered with (Mansi, v. 325). After further conversation the two bishops agreed to "forget" the troubles of Ephesus. Paul gave Cyril a letter from John, which, though gentle and dignified in tone, referred to the "articles" in language which annoyed Cyril; his temper gave way, and he spoke of the letter as "insulting." Paul soothed him with courteous assurances, but Cyril proceeded to the point which John had ignored—the recognition of the deposition of Nestorius, and the condemnation of his heresy. Paul offered to make such a declaration in John's name, but Cyril, promptly and keenly, insisted that John himself should put his hand to it (Mansi, v. 313). Just as little could he give way as to the case of four Nestorianising metropolitans, deposed by the new archbishop of Constantinople: that sentence, he insisted, must stand good (Mansi, v. 349). Paul then, in writing, satisfied Cyril as to his own orthodoxy, and Cyril thereupon allowed him to join in the church-service of Alexandria, and even invited him to preach on Christmas Day, 432, in the great church (Mansi, v. 293). The bishop of Emesa began his sermon with the angelic hymn, proceeded to the prophecy of Emmanuel, and then said, "Thus Mary, Mother of God, brings forth Emmanuel." A characteristic outbreak of orthodox joy interrupted the discourse. The people cried out, "This is the faith! 'Tis God's own gift, O orthodox Cyril! This is what we wanted to hear." Paul then went on to say that a combination of two perfect natures, the Godhead and Manhood, constituted "for us" the one Son, the one Christ, the one Lord. Again the cry arose, "Welcome, orthodox bishop!" Paul resumed his discourse, and explained St. Peter's confession as implying a duality of nature and an unity of person in Christ. On New Year's Day, after alluding to Cyril as a kind-hearted trainer who had smiled upon his performance, he preached at greater length on the unity of the Person and the distinctness of the natures, as being co-ordinate and harmonious truths: and his teaching was heartily endorsed by Cyril, who sent two of his own clergy to accompany him and Aristolaus, the emperor's secretary, who was very zealous for the reunion, to Antioch, with a paper for John to sign, and a letter of communion to be given him when he had signed it. But Cyril thought it necessary to exert himself for the same object in another direction: he considered Maximian languid in the cause, and he wrote many letters to persons connected with the imperial court, including the "Augusta" Pulcheria, in order to bring their influence to bear upon John, and to separate him definitely and finally from Nestorius (Mansi, v. 988). These letters were backed up by presents which were euphemistically called "blessings" (eulogiae) and which were employed by Cyril as a matter of course, for he knew but little of delicacy and scrupulosity as to the means to be used in gaining over a court to the church's interests. He also assured Theognostus, Chamosynus, and Leontius, his "apocrisarii" or church agents at Constantinople (Ep. p. 152) that this peace with John implied no retraction of his old principles.

It was in the spring of 433 that John of Antioch wrote to Cyril, reciting the formulary of re-union, abandoning Nestorius, and condemning Nestorianism (Mansi, v. 290). In another letter, written in a tone of warm friendship, John entreated Cyril to believe that he was "the same that he had known in former days" (Ep. p. 154). On April 23 (Pharmuthi 8) Cyril announced this reconciliation in a sermon (Mansi, v. 310, 289), and replied to John in a letter beginning, "Let the heavens rejoice and the earth be glad" (Ep. p. 104; Mansi, v. 301). In this letter (afterwards approved by the council of Chaleedon) he cited the text, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism," as expressing the happiness of the restored peace; and added his usual disclaimers of all opinions inconsistent with the reality of Christ's manhood. He commented on John iii. 13, 1 Cor. xv. 47, 1 Peter iv. 1. He also sent to John a copy of the genuine text of Athanasius's "Letter to Epictetus." John himself became an object of suspicion and animosity to the thoroughgoing Nestorianisers, and even Theodoret, though he admitted that Cyril's recent language was orthodox, would not abandon Nestorius's cause. In another direction, doubts and anxieties were excited by the language now sanctioned by Cyril. Isidore, to whom Cyril had always allowed great freedom of admortory speech, and who had blamed him heretofore for unyieldingness, now expressed a fear that he had made too great concessions (Ep. i. 324). Other friends of his were scandalised by his acceptance of the phrase "Two Natures." Was not this, they began to ask, equivalent to a sanction of Nestorianism? Cyril found himself once more obliged to vindicate himself on a point of orthodoxy. He wrote a long letter to Acacius of Melitene (Ep. p. 109; Mansi, v. 309), who had signified to him that some disquietude was felt. In this letter he narrated the recent transactions; and then, after insisting that the formulary was not (as some had represented it) a new creed, but simply a statement called forth by a special emergency (inasmuch as those who signed it had been accused of rejecting the Nicene faith, and were therefore constrained to clear themselves of such an imputation), he proceeded to exhibit the essential difference between the formulary and the Nestorian error. Nestorius, in fact, asserted two Christs: the formulary confessed one, both divine and human. And then Cyril added that the two natures which had been spoken of in the formulary were indeed separate in mental conception, i. e. considered apart from Christ, but that "after their union" in Christ "the nature of the Son was but one, as belonging to one, but to One as made man and incarnate:" again, "The nature of the Word is confessedly one, but has become incarnate," for "the Word took the form of a servant," and "in this sense only could a diversity of natures be recognised, for Godhead and Manhood are not the same in natural quality." Thus, in regard to the Incarnation, "the mind sees two things united without confusion, and nowise regards them, when thus united, as separable, but confesses Him who is from both, God, Son, and Christ, to be one." "Two natures," in Nestorius's mouth, meant two natures existing separately, in one who was God and in one who was Man; John of Antioch and his brethren, while admitting that Godhead and Manhood in Christ might be regarded as intrinsically different, yet unequivocally acknowledged His Person to be one.

The phrase, "one incarnate nature" of God the Word, or "one nature, but that incarnate," had been already (ad Regim. i. 9) quoted by Cyril as Athanasian: although there is, to say the least, great doubt whether the short tract 'On the Incarnation of God the Word,' in which it is found, was really written by Athanasius. But, as now used by Cyril in his vindication of the formulary from Nestorianism, it became in after days a stumblingblock, and was quoted in support of Monophysitism (Hooker, v. 52. 4). The question then arises, Did Cyril in fact hold what was condemned in 451 by the council of Chalcedon? Would he have denied the distinct co-existence of Godhead and Manhood in the one incarnate Saviour? and were the fathers of Chalcedon wrong when they proclaimed Cyril and Leo to be essentially one in faith? What has been already quoted from this letter to Acacius ought, it should seem, to warrant a negative answer to this question. What Cyril meant by "one nature incarnate" was simply, "Christ is one." He was referring to "nature" as existing in Christ's single Divine Personality (cf. Adv. Nest. ii.: compare note in Athan. Treatises, Lib. Fath. i. 155). When he denounced the idea of the separation of the natures after the union, he was in fact denouncing the idea of a mere connexion or association between a human individual Jesus and the Divine Word. Therefore, when he maintained the nature to be one, he was speaking in a sense quite distinct from the Eutychian heresy, and quite consistent with the theology of Chalcedon.

Other letters, written by Cyril under the same circumstances, throw light on his true meaning. Successus, an Isaurian bishop, had asked him whether the phrase "two natures" were admissible (Ep. p. 135; Mansi, v. 999). Cyril wrote two letters to him in reply: in the first, after strongly asserting the unity of the Son both before and since the Incarnation, he quoted the "one nature incarnate" as a phrase of the Fathers, and employed the illustration from soul and body, "two natures," being united in one man, in order to set forth the combination of Godhead and Manhood in one Christ (compare his Scholium de Inc. 8). There was, he added, neither a conversion of Godhead into flesh, nor a change of flesh into Godhead. In other words, Christ's body, though glorified, and existing as God's body, was not deprived of its human reality. In the second letter, written in express reply to objections taken by Successus to statements in the first, Cyril fully admitted that Christ "arrayed Himself with our nature," so that in Him both Godhead and Manhood, in Christ, retained their natural distinctness (cf. p. 143), and that the human nature was neither diminished nor subtracted. Further on he repeated the phrase, "one nature, but that incarnate," in the sense (as the context shews) of "one who in His original nature was God, by incarnation becoming man." In another letter, addressed to a priest named Eulogius, he gave a similar account of the phrase; it is obvious that he viewed it as guarding the truth of the Personal Union (Ep. p. 133). In another, which is addressed to a bishop named Valerian (and is remarkable, among other things, for the emphasis with which the Divinity of Christ is exhibited as bearing on His Atonement), the word "nature," in this connexion, is evidently used as synonymous with "person" or hypostasis: and as if he were specially anxious to exclude all possible misconception, he used such language as the following: "He, being by nature God, became flesh, that is, perfect man. . . . As man He was partaker of our nature." This language agrees with that of his 17th Paschal Homily (Cyr. v. ii. 226). We may also compare his words in Adv. Nest. ii. tom. vi. 50, to the effect that while the divine and the human natures are different things, as all right-thinking men must know, yet after the Incarnation they must not be divided, for there is but one Christ. Again, ib. p. 45, that Christ is not twofold is explained by the context to mean that Christ before and since the Incarnation is one and the same Person; and, ib. p. 48, the reason for calling Christ's Godhead the φύσις is explained by the consideration that He was originally God, while in the fifth book of the same treatise (ib. p. 139) He is said to have given up His body to the laws of its own nature (τῆς ἰδίας φύσεως). In the ninth book 'de S. Trinitate' (dial. quod unus est Christus) he denies all transmutation or confusion of the natures, admits or rather asserts the distinctness of Godhead and Manhood, and in reply to the objection, "If we say there is one nature of the Son, even though He be viewed as incarnate, there must needs be supposed an absorption of the human nature," he answers, "Nothing of the kind: οὐδὲ μία πρὸς ἡμῶν ὁμολόγητο φύσις, σεσαρκωμένον τε καὶ ἐνηθρωπηκότος;" adding that "the bush burning yet unconsumed was a type of the non-consumption of the Manhood of Christ in its contact with His Divinity" (cf. Schol., 2, 9).

To return to the history. Maximian dying in April 434, was succeeded by Proclus, whose glowing sermon on the Incarnation had been among the earliest expressions of orthodox zeal against the Nestorian theory, and who deserves to be remembered as a very signal example of the compatibility of orthodox zeal with charitable tenderness (Soc. vii. 41). Soon after his accession, the imperial court resolved to enforce on all Eastern bishops the acceptance of the concordat, so to call it, which had reconciled John with Cyril, upon pain of expulsion from their dioceses. The Nestorians, on their side, were indefatigable in circulating the works of Theodore of Mopsuestia, who had formed the theological mind of Nestorius: and Cyril, who was informed of this during a visit which he paid to Jerusalem, was stirred to new energy by the evident vitality of the theory which he so earnestly abhorred. He wrote to the "tribune" Aristolaus, and to John of Antioch, complaining that, as he was informed, some bishops were repudiating Nestorianism insincerely or inadequately, and were declaring that its author had been condemned merely for denying the "Theotocos" (Mansi, v. 996, cf. ib. 970). He urged that the bishops should be required to anathematise Nestorianism in detail. John interposed, requesting that no new test should be imposed; and Cyril found that he had gone too far (Mansi, v. 969, 972, 996). He was much annoyed at Theodore's pertinacious refusal to anathematise Nestorius—a refusal in which we may add, Theodore persisted until the eighth session of the council of Chalcedon (ib. v. 997). As the Nestorians professed entire adherence to the Nicene Creed, Cyril drew up an exposition of it (Ep. p. 174, Mansi, v. 383, cf. ib. 975) addressed to certain "fathers of monks," in which he urged the incompatibility of that "venerable and oecumenical symbol of faith" with the denial of the personal unity of the Saviour. In this tract, a copy of which he sent to Theodosius, he disclaimed, as usual, any "fusion, commixture, or so-called consubstantiation" (συνουσιώσιον) of the Godhead with the flesh. He drew up a short treatise in three books to prove that Mary was Theotocos, that Christ was one and not two, and that while He was impassible as God, He suffered for us in flesh that was His own. This he intended as an antidote to the Nestorian arguments which, as he learned, were rife in Syria (Mansi, v. 995).

The name of Theodore was at this time a watchword of eager controversy. Proclus of Constantinople, in his "Tome" addressed to the Armenian clergy, in which he spoke of "one incarnate person" (not "nature") of God the Word, had condemned Theodore's opinions without naming him (Mansi, v. 421): the messengers who carried this document to John of Antioch inserted Theodore's name, without authority from Proclus, as the author of certain passages selected for censure. John and his suffragans accepted the Tome, but declined to condemn Theodore by name. Proclus rejoined that he had never wished them to go beyond a condemnation of the extracts. Cyril was so far from feeling any tenderness towards Theodore, that he traced Nestorianism to his teaching, and to that of Diodore of Tarsus (Mansi, v. 974), and wrote vigorously in support of this thesis (ib. 992). A synodal letter from John and his suffragans, stating their objections to the proposal that Theodore's name should be anathematized on the score of some expressions which, as they urged, were capable of being taken in a sense accordant with the language of eminent fathers, drew forth from Cyril a somewhat indignant reply. Theodore, he said (Ep. p. 195), had "borne down full sail against the glory of Christ"; it was intolerable that any parallel should be drawn between his language and that of Athanasius or Basil: he insisted that no one should be allowed to preach Theodore's opinions; but at the same time, he did not urge any condemnation of his memory, and even dwelt on the duty of welcoming all converts from Nestorianism without a word of reproach as to the past. He saw that it would be imprudent to proceed publicly against the memory of a theologian so highly esteemed that the people cried out in some Eastern churches, "We believe as Theodore did," and would rather be "burnt" than disown him; and he wrote to Proclus advising that no further steps should be taken in the matter (Ep. p. 199).

The remaining events of Cyril's long episcopate may be very briefly told. He wrote to Domnus, the successor of John in the see of Antioch (and afterwards unhappily conspicuous in the Euty-chian controversy), in behalf of Athanasius sometime bishop of Perrha, who described himself, falsely it appears, as sorely wronged by some of his own clergy (Ep. p. 208). In another letter to Domnus, peremptory in style, he took up the cause of another aged bishop named Peter, who professed to have been expelled and plundered of his property on the pretext of a renunciation of his see, which after all had been extorted from him (Ep. p. 209). In both these cases Cyril shewed a somewhat impulsive readiness to believe the story of a petitioner, and a somewhat dictatorial temper in regard to the affairs of another patriarchate. He was informed by some abbots of the Thebaid, when they paid a visit to Alexandria, that some bishops had given scandal by ordaining men who had recently married, or who had for their insubordination been expelled from monasteries. On this subject he wrote to the bishop of Libya and Pentapolis (Ep. p. 211); compare the letter in which Isidore urged him to inflict fitting punishment on the worthless priest Martinian of Pelusium, who had gone to Alexandria with the professed expectation of bribing Cyril to give him a bishopric (Isid. Ep. ii. 127; Tillemont, xiv. 661). He wrote a work against the Anthropomorphites, whose wild fancies about the Divine nature (as being limited and corporeal) had given such trouble in the days of his predecessor; and in a letter on this subject to Calosirius, bishop of Arsinoe, he added a caution against the false mysticism which insisted on prayer to the exclusion of all labour, and on the "senseless" opinion that the Eucharistic consecration lost its efficacy if the sacrament was reserved until the following day. "Christ's holy Body," wrote Cyril, "is not changed; but the power of consecration and the life-giving grace still remain in it" (Op. vi. 365). In the last year of his life he wrote to Leo, then bishop of Rome (to whom, as archdeacon of Rome, he had written in 431 against the ambitious schemes, as he regarded them, of Juvenal bishop of Jerusalem (Leon. Ep. 119, 4) on the right calculation of Easter for the year 444, which according to the Alexandrian cycle of 19 years he fixed for April 23. In that same year, on the 9th or the 27th of June, he closed his eventful life.

It must be needless to add that Cyril's character is not to be estimated aright by ascribing any serious value to a coarse and ferocious invective against his memory, which was quoted as Theodoret's in the fifth General Council (Theodor. Ep. 180; see Tillemont, xiv. 784). If it were indeed the production of the pen of Theodoret, the reputation which would suffer from it would assuredly be his own. What Cyril was, in his strength and in his weakness—in his high-souled struggle for doctrines which were to him, as they must be to all thoughtful believers in Christ's Divinity, the expressions of essential Christian belief, or in the moments when his old faults of vehemence and impatience reappeared in his conduct—we have already seen. He started in public life, so to speak, with dangerous tendencies to vehemence and impetuosity which were fostered by the bad traditions of his uncle's episcopate, and by the ample powers of his see. It would be impossible to maintain that these evils were wholly exhausted by the grave errors which—exaggerations and false imputations set aside—distinguished his conduct in the feud with the Jews and with Orestes: when, although guiltless of the blood of Hypatia, he must have felt that his previous violence had been taken as an encouragement by her fanatical murderers. The old impatience and absolutism were all too prominent at certain points of the Nestorian struggle; although on other occasions, as it must be admitted by all fair judges of his conduct, influences of a softening and chastening character had abated the turbid impetus of his zeal, and had taught Cyril to be moderate and patient. "We may," says Dr. Newman (Hist. Sketches, iii. 342), "hold St. Cyril a great servant of God, without considering ourselves obliged to defend certain passages of his ecclesiastical career. . . . Cyril's faults were not inconsistent with great and heroic virtues, faith, firmness, intrepidity, fortitude, endurance, perseverance." Those who begin by condemning dogmatic zeal as a fierce and misplaced chivalry for a phantom, will find it most difficult to be just to a man like Cyril. But if his point of view, which was indeed the point of view taken by many great religious heroes, and eminently by Athanasius, be understood and appreciated in its full force, as supplying the general motive for his actions, it will not, at least it ought not, to be difficult to do justice to his memory, even where theological convictions like his are not professed or entertained. The issue raised by Nestorianism was to Cyril a very plain one, which involved the very essence of Apostolic Christianity. Whatever ambiguities might be raised by a Nestorian use of the word πρόσωπον, it was clear to Cyril that the new theory amounted to a denial of the Word Incarnate. And it was not a mere theory of the schools. Its promulgator held the great see of the Eastern capital, involving a central position and strong court influence; and he was in personal character no amiable dreamer or scholastic pedant, whose fancies might die away if left to themselves. He has in modern times been spoken of as "the blameless Nestorius": he was in his own times spoken of as "the incendiary," on account of a zeal against other forms of heresy which impelled him to take strong measures against opponents of his own. This was the enemy against whom Cyril made up his mind to do battle for the doctrine of a real Incarnation and a really Divine Christ. He had to reckon on opposition, not only from Nestorius himself, but from large numbers—a miscellaneous company including civil functionaries as well as prelates—who accepted the Nestorian theology, or who thought that strong language against it was uncalled for and offensive. He might have to encounter the displeasure of an absolute government: he certainly had for some time the prospect of that displeasure, and of all its consequences: he had the burden of ill-health, of ever-present intense anxiety, of roughly expressed censure, of reiterated imputations affecting his own orthodoxy, of misconceptions and suspicions which hardly left him a moment's rest. Whatever faults may be discerned in his conduct of the controversy, this at least not only may, but must be said—not by mere eulogists of a canonised saint, but by those who care for the truth of history—that the thought as well as the heart of Christendom has for ages pronounced judgment in the cause between Cyril and Nestorius; and that this judgment has accepted, as the expression of Christian truth, the principle upheld by the former against the latter. It has been seen that when the mist of words is cleared aside, a real and profound question divided the disputants; and (to take a familiar instance) that stanza of Charles Wesley's Christmas hymn which begins, conveys the Cyrilline or Ephesine answer to that question in a form which exhibits its close connexion with the deepest exigencies of spiritual life. Cyril, as a theological writer, has greater merits than have been sometimes allowed by writers who find it difficult, as it would seem, to approach the subject of his life in a spirit of equity. His style, as Cave admits, may be deficient in elegance and in eloquence: he may be often tedious, and sometimes obscure, although, as Photius says (Cod. 136), his “Thesaurus” is remarkable for its lucidity. His comments on Scripture may be charged with excessive mysticism, or with a perpetual tendency to bring forward his favourite theological idea. There may be found weak points in his argument; such, for instance, as undue pressing of texts, and fallacious inferences, several of which might be cited from the treatise “To the Princesses.” But any one who consults, e.g. the “Thesaurus,” will acknowledge the ability with which Cyril follows up the theological line of Athanasius (see pp. 12, 23, 27, 30, 50), and applies the Athanasian mode of thought to the treatment of Eunomian rationalism (p. 263), and the force and vividness with which in this treatise and in other works, he brings out the Catholic interpretation of cardinal texts in the New Testament. His acquaintance with Greek literature and philosophy is evident from the work against Julian: but he speaks quite in the tone of Hippolytus's “Little Labyrinth” (Euseb. v. 28) when he deprecates an undue reliance on Aristotelian dialectics and à priori assumption on mysteries transcending human thought (Thesaur. 87, de recta fide 16, 17).

Fragments of Cyrilline treatises, which have not been preserved entire are preserved in synodal acts and elsewhere, and other works, as his “Paschal Cycles” and “The Failure of the Synagogue,” are mentioned by Sigebert and Gennadius. The Monophysites used on festivals a “Liturgy of St. Cyril,” which is substantially identical with the Greek “Liturgy of St. Mark” (see Sir W. Palmer's Orig. Liturg. i. 86, and Neale's Introd. East. Ch. i. 324) and their traditional belief, expressed in a passage cited from Abu'lberkat by Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 171, is that Cyril “completed” St. Mark's Liturgy. “It seems highly probable,” says Dr. Neale, quoting this, “that the Liturgy of St. Mark came, as we have it now, from the hands of St. Cyril”: although, as Palmer says, the orthodox Alexandrians preferred to call it by the name of the Evangelist founder of their see. The Coptic Cyrilline Liturgy is of somewhat later date, and more diffuse in character. It seems not improbable that the majestic invocation of the Holy Spirit which is one of the distinctive ornaments of St. Mark's Liturgy, if it was not composed during the Macedonian controversy in the 4th century, represents to us the lively zeal of the great upholder of the Hypostatic Union for the essential Divinity of the Third Person in the Godhead.

Cyril's works have been thrice edited—(1) by George of Trebizond, at Basle, A.D. 1546, in four volumes; (2) by Gentianus Hervetus at Paris, 1573, 1605, in two volumes; and lastly (3) by John Aubert, canon of Laon, and master of Laon College in Paris, 1658, in six volumes, containing—1. “On Adoration in Spirit and Truth,” and the “Glyphyra,” or polished comments on the Pentateuch; 2. five books on Isaiah; 3. on the minor prophets; 4. on St. John's Gospel; 5. part i. the “Thesaurus”: nine Dialogues on the Trinity, Incarnation, and that Christ is one and the Lord; “Scholia” on the Incarnation; 5. part ii. the Paschal and other Homilies (the Greek bishops, according to Gennadius, de Vir. Ill. 57, used to recommend the Homilies to be learnt by heart), the 61 Epistles, the “De rectâ Fide,” the “Ad Reginas”; 6. five books against Nestorius: the explanation of the twelve articles; the defence of them, in reply to the Eastern bishops; a similar reply to Theodoret; ten books against Julian; a book against Anthropomorphites; a treatise on the Trinity, assigned, but without certainty, to Cyril; and some specimens of “anagogic” interpretation of Scripture. Aubert dedicated his work in a curious letter to Cardinal Richelieu. His edition has not yet been superseded; there is no Benedictine St. Cyril. In 1859 Dr. Payne Smith, afterwards Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, and now Dean of Canterbury, published in a complete form Cyril's Commentary on St. Luke's Gospel, translated from a Syriac version; and in 1868 appeared the first two volumes of an elaborate edition by Ph. E. Pusey, M.A., of Christ Church, containing the commentary on the Minor Prophets. Two other volumes, containing eleven books of the Commentary on St. John, appeared in 1872. [W. B.]

CYRILLUS (8) deacon to St. Hilary of Arles, by whom he was wonderfully cured, after having had his foot bruised by the fall of a large stone. (Ceillier, Hist. Gén. des Auteurs sacrés, tom. viii. 434, 435; Vita Hilarii Arelat. cap. xv., Patrol. Lat. 1.) [D. R. J.]

(9) Bishop of Adana in Cilicia Prima, one of the Oriental or Antiochene party at the council of Ephesus (A.D. 431). He signed the remonstrance against the opening of the council by Cyril of Alexandria, before the arrival of John of Antioch and his companions (Baluz. Concil. col. 698), as well as the sentence of deposition passed by them on Cyril and his adherents (Labbe, Concil. tom. iii. col. 598). His name is appended to several of the documents in the Trugaedia Irenaei, viz. to the letter to the clergy and people of Hierapolis, and that to the church of Constantinople, asserting that John's council was the legitimate one and that Cyril and his party were heretics (c. xiii. Baluz, col. 706, c. xxviii. ib. 725); and the letter of remonstrance, conjointly with Zenobius, bishop of Zephyrius, to Alexander of Hierapolis and his suffragans, for not openly acknowledging their claims (c. cxxx. ib. 833). We have also a letter of Theodoret's to him, urging him to labour for the peace of the church (c. clxi. ib. 859). He took part in the synod of Tarsus (A.D. 434), and gave his signature to the terms of reconciliation between the churches of Alexandria and Antioch (Baluz, col. 941). [E. V.]

CYRILLUS (10), bishop of Coela in Thrace, in the 5th century. In conjunction with Euprepus, bishop of Byzæ, he represented to the 7th session of the council of Ephesus (July 31, A.D. 431) that in the provinces of Europe there was an ancient custom that each bishop should hold two or three sees; Cyrillus being, for instance, bishop of Callipolis as well as Coela. Fritilas bishop of Heraclea, who had attached himself to Nestorius, would, they feared, send bishops to these towns which belonged inseparably to other sees. The council authorised the existing custom; but afterwards special bishops were given to Callipolis and other towns. (Labbe, Concil. iii. 805, 810; Ceillier, viii. 591.) [W. M. S.]

(11) ST., fourteenth bishop of Treves, succeeded St. Severus, and was followed by Jamblichus. He rebuilt the cell of St. Eucharius near Treves, which lay burnt and deserted; but on a different site (if we correctly understand the statements under various hands), and the restored structure was dedicated by pope Eugenius III. to St. Matthias the apostle. There he placed the bodies of the first three bishops of Treves, SS. Eucharius, Valerius, and Maternus. Some ancient Latin verses on their monuments are recorded, beginning—

“Quam bene concordis divina potentia Jungit.”

Cyrillus died about A.D. 458, and his remains were deposited near those of his predecessors just mentioned. He was commemorated on May 19. An old writer of Prague states that a considerable portion (pars insignis) of the bishop's relics were removed to that city by the emperor Charles IV. A.D. 1372. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 378; Bolland. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 431, 453; May, iv. 331.) [C. H.]

(12) Bishop of Gaza, one of the prelates who signed the synodical letter of John of Jerusalem to John of Constantinople, condemnatory of Severus of Antioch and his followers, A.D. 518. (Labbe, Concil. tom. v. col. 191.) [E. V.]

(13) Of Scythopolis (Bethshan), so called from his birthplace, a hagiologist, flourished c. 555. His father, John, was famous for his religious life. Cyril commenced an ascetic career at the age of 16. On leaving his monastery to visit Jerusalem and the other holy places, his mother charged him to put himself under the instruction of John the Silentiary, by whom he was commended to the care of Leontius the abbat of the monastery of St. Euthymius, who admitted him as a monk in 542. Thence Cyril passed to the Laura of St. Saba, where he commenced his sacred biographies with the lives of St. Euthymius and St. Saba, deriving his information from the elder monks who had seen and known those holy men. He also wrote the life of St. John the Silentiary and other biographies, affording a valuable picture of the inner life of the Easteru church in the sixth century. They have been unfortunately largely interpolated by Metaphrastes. The following biographies are attributed to Cyril by Fabricius. (Bibl. Græc. lib. v. c. 41, x. 155); (1) S. Joannes Silentiarius (ap. Surium, May 13); (2) S. Euthymius (Cotelarius, Eocl. Græc. Monum. ii. 200); (3) S. Sabas (ib. iii. 220); (4) Theodosius the Archimandrite (only found in Latin, of doubtful authenticity); (5) Cyriacus the Anchoret; (6) S. Theognus the Ascetic, bishop of Cyprus. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. u.s.; Cave, Hist. Lit. p. i. 529.) [E. V.]

CYRINUS (1) bishop of Chalcedon, an Egyptian by birth, and a relative of Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, one of the most bitter and uncompromising of the enemies of Chrysostom. We first meet with him in 401, associating with Chrysostom on friendly terms, and accompanying him together with the bishops Paul of Heraclea, and Palladius of Hellenopolis, in his visitation of Ephesus and the Asiatic churches (Pallad. p. 134). From some unexplained reason this visitation converted Cyrinus from a friend into a most virulent enemy, and when in 403 Theophilus and his partisans arrived at Constantinople they met to arrange their plan of proceedings at his see of Chalcedon. No one displayed more violence than Cyrinus. He accused Chrysostom of pride, tyranny, and heresy, and Theophilus reckoned upon him as a most valuable ally. But a clumsy Mesopotamian bishop, Maruthas, accidentally trod on his foot and caused a wound, which inflamed and gangrened and eventually produced his death, after three years of intense suffering. Though Cyrinus was prevented by this accident from taking a personal share in the opening proceedings against Chrysostom, he managed to be present at the synod of the Oak, where he sustained the part of accuser, witness and judge (Photius, c. 59). His enmity never relaxed, and after Chrysostom's recall in 404, he took a prominent part in all the plots for his destruction, and was one of the four bishops who took his condemnation on their own heads, and demanded his banishment of Arcadius, as the only means of restoring public peace. (Pallad. p. 35; Soz. viii. 22.) He joined in the letter conveyed by Paternus to pope Innocent (Pallad. 10). His miserable death towards the end of 405, after twice resorting to amputation and enduring extreme torture, was regarded by the friends of Chrysostom as a mark of the vengeance of heaven (Soer. vi. 15, 19; Soz. viii. 16). [E. V.]

(2), otherwise Aribio, a German monk of the order of St. Benedict, who became abbat of St. Dionysius at Schlechdorf, and subsequently, in 760, the fourth bishop of Freising in Bavaria. He died in 783. Cyrinus wrote the life of St. Corbinianus, the first bishop of Freising. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 631.) [E. V.]

CYRION, bishop of Doliche, one of the subscribers to the Semiarian council of Seleucia. (Epiphan. Haer. 73, p. 874.) [G. S.]

CYRUS (1) of Beroea, succeeded Eustathius as bishop of that city, on his translation to the see of Antioch in 325. He was persecuted on account of his orthodoxy by the Arian party, and deposed by Constantius. (Athanas. Ep. ad Solit. p. 812; Apolog. pro Greg. p. 702.) The Arian George of Laodicea attributes to Cyrus the charge of Sabellianism brought against Eustathius, at the packed council of Antioch, by which he was deposed in 331. But Socrates argues for the improbability of the story, inasmuch as Cyrus was himself degraded on the same charge. (Socr. H. E. i. 24; ii. 9.) [E. V.]

CYRUS (2), bishop of Tyre, was present at the council of Ephesus in 431. He was a leading member of the party of John of Antioch and the oriental bishops, against Cyril of Alexandria, and was chosen as one of the deputation to wait on Theodosius to lay a complaint of the illegality of his proceedings, but being indisposed, Macarius of Laodicea took his place. He was deposed by Cyril in the name of the council. (Baluz. Nov. Conc. Collect. 577, 705, 725; Traged. Iren. c. 13, 28.) [E. V.]

(3) Bishop of Aphrodisias, metropolitan of Cairo. He was born of Christian parents, and was a monk before he was a bishop. He attended the council of Ephesus in 431, where he was conspicuous for his vacillation. He was one of the 198 prelates who signed the act of Nestorius's deposition (Labbe, Concil. iii. 535), and expressed his approbation of Cyril's letter to Nestorius (ib. 465), and yet the next day, after the arrival of Candidian, his name is found with 15 others appended to the appeal of Nestorius to the emperors against the legality of the acts of the council, and for the convocation of another. (Baluz. Concil. 701.) His weakness of character was still more strikingly shewn, when at the "Robbers' Synod," in 449, he signed the act of condemnation of Flavian and Eusebius. (Labbe Concil. iv. 305.) The character of Cyrus, however, stood so high that in 456 he was specially exempted from the operation of a general law by the emperor Theodosius II., on account of his great merits. (Cod. Theod. vol. i., l. 37, p. 46; Tillemont, xiv. 378, 763.) [E. V.]

(4) Bishop of Phasis, near the mouth of the river of the same name among the Lazi, in Colchis, and afterwards patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 630-641, who took a prominent part in the measures of the emperor Heraclius for the union of the monophysite party with the Catholic Church. Heraclius on his return from his successful campaign against the Persians, met Cyrus at Phasis, and conversed with him on the scheme of union he had in view. The formula borrowed from the writings of Dionysius the Areopagite, ἐνέργεια θεανδρική, which he hoped would be the basis of this union, was at first unacceptable to Cyrus, who applied for counsel to Sergius, the monothelite patriarch of Constantinople. Letters passed between them (Labbe, Concil. vi. 916, 949, 952). Cyrus's difficulties were thus removed, and he gave his hearty support to the emperor's designs. His services were speedily rewarded by his elevation to the patriarchate of Alexandria, A.D. 630. His immediate predecessor was George, who, according to Eutychius (but the statement is deemed groundless by Dr. Neale), had deserted his bishopric either through fear or treachery, on the approach of the Saracen forces. As patriarch Cyrus set himself vigorously to effect the union of the Egyptian monophysites, known as Theodosians, with the catholic body. The basis of union was a formulary of agreement (πληρο- φορία) in nine articles, the object of which was to establish a compromise between the dogmatic definitions of Chalcedon, and those of monophysitism, employing each mutually to explain the other (Labbe, Concil. vi. 953 sq.). The seventh of these articles lays down that the "one and the same Christ, the Son, performed the works proper to God and to man by one theandric operation" (μὴ θεανδρική ἐνεργεία). The compromise was eagerly accepted by the Theodosians, who boasted that they had not come over to the church, but the church to them. It was in vain that Sophronius, a learned monk of Palestine then at Alexandria, protested with tears against such a sacrifice of truth to peace. A hollow union was effected, and Cyrus beheld with joy the Theodosians communicating in vast multitudes with the catholics. (See his letters, Labbe, vi. 921, 952.) But such an agreement however specious, being based on the suppression of real differences, could not be lasting. In an exceedingly short time it fell into such neglect that it was contemptuously termed "the washy union," ἐνωσις ὑδροβαφής, and was succeeded by new and more bitter schisms. Sergius of Constantinople alarmed at the growing influence of Sophronius, who had been appointed patriarch of Jerusalem, A.D. 634, appealed to pope Honorius I., who wrote both to Sergius and Cyrus, as well as to Sophronius, approving of the economy by which Cyrus had brought about the agreement, but deprecating the introduction of dogmatic definitions unsanctioned by the Catholic Church, and expressing his alarm at the pursuit of theological refinements inimical to true godliness (Labbe, Concil. vi. 917-933; Harduin, Concil. iii. 1315, 1319). The wise counsels of Honorius were unavailing. The distractions of the church continued, and the Ekthesis published by Heraclius, A.D. 639, though formally accepted by a council at Alexandria under Cyrus, met with no better success.

While the Egyptian church was thus rent asunder by intestine divisions, the conquest of Egypt itself by the Saracens was fast approaching. Egypt was invaded by Omar's general Amrou in June, A.D. 638. So high was Heraclius's estimate of the ability of Cyrus that he committed to him the prefecture of Egypt and the conduct of the war. Cyrus prevailed on Amrou to withdraw his forces by the promise of the payment of an annual tribute, and of the betrothal to him of the emperor's daughter Eudocia (Theophan. pp. 280-281; Niceph. Breviar. pp. 17, 18). On hearing of these degrading propositions Heraclius indignantly summoned Cyrus to Constantinople. The intelligence of the siege of Alexandria alone saved his life. He was sent back to negotiate terms with Amrou. But he arrived too late. Amrou was too sanguine of the reduction of Alexandria to be diverted from his purpose. After fourteen months' siege the city capitulated and fell into the hands of the Saracens, Dec. 22, A.D. 640. The chief actors did not long survive the catastrophe. Heraclius died in February, A.D. 641, and, though the date is uncertain, Cyrus's decease was not much after.

[E. V.]

CYRUS (5) 43rd patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 705 to 711 or 712. He had formerly been a recluse, ἑγκλειστός, at Amastris, and had predicted to Justinian II. his restoration to the imperial dignity (Niceph. Constan. Breviarium de rebus post Maurician gestis, p. 28; Theoph. Chron., p. 314, A.M. 6198). He is mentioned as taking part in the reception of Constantine, bishop of Rome, when that prelate paid a visit to Constantinople by order of Justinian II. (Vita Constantini Papae, apud Labbe, Acta Concil. t. vi. 1393). He was deposed by the monothelite emperor Bardanes, on his accession to the throne A.D. 711, and confined in the monastery of Chora, which he had founded (Theoph. Chron. p. 320, A.M. 620+).

(6). [JOHN and CYRUS.]

CYRUS-FLORUS. [PAULUS SILENTIARIUS.]

CYTHERIUS (1) a resident at Caesarea, from whom Chrysostom had received much kindness during his short stay in that city, on his way to Cucusus in A.D. 404, and to whom, on his arrival at his destination, he wrote a grateful letter (Epist. 82).

(2) A friend of Paulinus of Nola, who writes to him (Poem. 24) about A.D. 400 to tell him of the shipwreck of Martinianus, and to praise him for dedicating his son to the service of God under Severus (Patr. lxi. 615).

DABHEOG, of Lough Derg, commemorated Jan. 1. Regarding this saint there is much uncertainty, both as to name and identity. O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 3) is of opinion that Dabheog, of Loch Geirg, in Ulster, is the same person as Moheog, abbat of Termonn, or Gleann Geirg, of July 24, that his father was Bracan, son of Bracameoc, king (or chief) of Britain, and his mother Dina, a Saxon princess, and that he had also many brothers, who were saints, and have their names given in the martyrology. Colgan, in his memoir of St. Canoc or Conoc (Feb. 11), gives the same list of the children of Dina and Bracan, and adds that "St. Moheocus qui Dabheocus, et Beoanus," patron of Gleann-gearg, was regarded with the deepest veneration up to his day, and had three festivals observed, viz. Jan. 1, July 24, and Dec. 16. There seems to be but little doubt that the da and the mo of the names are moveable and interchangeable prefixes, and that the saint had his abode on Lough Derg, in Donegal, where he has left his name in the townland of Seadavog, on the south shore of the Lough, and in the castle of Termondavog, now more generally called Termonmagrath. But whether he was one of the many children attributed to the Welsh chieftain, Brychan of Brycheiniog, and that again through a Welsh or Irish connexion, we cannot conclusively affirm, though it is without doubt the most generally received opinion. Yet Lanigan (Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. c. viii. § 15) thinks the story of St. Dabheog, of Lough Geirg, and the counting him brother of St. Canoc, are without sufficient foundation, while the idea of his being contemporary with St. Patrick, and able to prophesy of St. Columba, he regards as a late invention, and inconsistent with what Colgan elsewhere (Tr. Thaum. 313, n. 4) feels bound to notice, namely, that (in the Sanctilog. Genealog. c. 19) St. Moheocus or Dabheocus, of Gleann-geirg, is called son of Luainim, son of Dibracha, of the posterity of Dichu, who was the first convert of St. Patrick, in Ulster [CANOC and DICHO]. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 3, 201; Colgan, Acta SS. 312, c. 5, and Tr. Thaum. 390, c. 10; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 11 sq.; Joyce, Ir. Names of Places, 300, 3rd ed.; Rees, Cambr. Brit. Saints, 602 sq.) [J. G.]

DABIUS [DAVIUS, DAVID], P. July 22. The account which Alban Butler gives (Lives of the Saints, vii. 374, ad diem) of this saint from Colgan in MSS., is that he was a zealous Irish priest, who preached with great success in his own country and in Alba, and was patron saint of Domnach Cluana, now Donach Cloney, in the county of Down, and of Kippen, in Scotland, where a famous church was dedicated under his invocation, by the name of Movean. We still have Kippendavie besides Dunblane. This saint is the same as Biteus, Mobiu, Dobi, Davius, and David, who was abbat of Inis Cumscraigh (or Inis Coscory, now Inch, county Donegal), and venerated on this day [BITEUS]. He was son of Congell, son of Erc, of the family of Maccarthennus (Mar. 24), and offspring of Eochaidh; as descended from the race of the Dal-Buan, in Ulster, he was related to St. Cronan or Mochua of Balla (Mar. 30), in whose life Colgan relates how he was born of one who was long barren. To him, probably more than to St. David or Dewi of Wales, are the Celtic dedications to St. David to be assigned (Colgan, Acta SS. 789, c. 4; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 320). [J. G.]

DABONNA is often given by Colgan and others in the list of nephews and nieces of St. Patrick: he stands as one of the seven sons whom Darerca bore to Restitutus or the Lombard, and is called bishop of Cluain-na-manach, in Artech, Connaught; but as much doubt rests on the whole kindred of St. Patrick, and specially on that which relates to his sisters and their families, nothing can be safely affirmed of Dabonna [DABERCA]. (Colgan, Acta SS. 718, cc. 6-9, and Tr. Thaum. 228; Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 167-8.) [J. G.]

DABRECOG, of Tuam-dreman, May 9. He appears in the Mart. Tall. under this name, and may be the saint whom Mar. O'Gorman commemorates on this day, and calls Dubricin or Dabreicin. In the catalogue of Irish saints from the Mart. Tall. (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 11, col. 2) he is called "Da-Breccoc," probably to suggest the etymology. [J. G.]

DACHIAROG has not preserved his place in history, though in the Four Masters (at A.D. 825) "Dachiarog, i.e. the saint of Aitrigul," is cited as a prophet. He may have been the Ulster saint Ciaroc, Ciarog, or Mochuaroc, who, with Breccan, was one of the "two heroes of purity who loved Christ faithfully," especially as Breccan or Berchan is also called a prophet [BERCHAN (1)]. The parish of Errigalkeeroge (Dachiarog's residence or church), in the barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, derives its name from him, and once had a very important monastery: there are still many relics of antiquity there. (Book of Rights, by O'Donovan, pp. lix. lx.; Joyce, Ir. Names of Places, 309, 3rd ed.; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 416 n. k, 439.) [J. G.]

DACHONNA. The name is a very common one, either simply as Conna and Connan, or, with the prefixes of veneration and affection, Da or Do, and Mo. It appears to have been the baptismal name of St. Machar [MACHAR]. (Colgan, Acta SS. 60, n. 1 and Tr. Thaum. 175 n. 51, 178 n. 115.)

The most famous Dachonna was bishop of Connor, May 15. He was of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall. The death of "St. Dachonna the pious, bishop of Condere," took place, according to the Irish Annals, in the year 726 (Ann. Tigh.), and when the Danes burned Inis Patrick, near Skerries, county Dublin, in 798, they are said to have carried off St. Dachonna's shrine. The barony of Tiaquin (Tigh-Dachonna) in Galway is so called from one named Dachonna who is unidentified. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 127; Reeves, Ecl. Ant. 240; Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 203; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 292, 3rd ed.)

[J. G.]

DACHUAILEN, son of Guaire, of the race of Niall of the Nine Hostages (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 75), Mar. 12. Colgan (Acta SS. 368, 369 n. 3) cites from the domestic festivities, Culan, Culen, or Dachualen, son of Guaire, whose genealogy he traces up to Niall, yet cannot decide as to whether he is this Dachuaile of Mar. 12, or another whom he calls Culan, and, with the honorific prefix, Dacualan of Feb. 18 [CULAN].

[J. G.]

DACIANUS (1) A persecuting praeses of Spain, A.D. 303 or 304, under Diocletian and Maximian. He was noted for the severity with which he carried out the orders of these princes, and his measures were especially directed against bishops, presbyters, and all ordained ministers. Among his numerous victims were Valerius bishop of Saragossa, and Vicentius archdeacon of Saragossa, whom he summoned to Valentia for examination. The bishop was only exiled, but the archdeacon was put to death. The account of Vicentius's martyrdom, which is drawn out in great detail, represents a perfect duel between the martyr and the governor. Dacianus was bent on winning a victory, but was discomfited at all points, by the sufferer's constancy in life and by his body in death, for Dacianus could neither cause the birds of prey to touch the corpse, nor the sea to swallow it (Ruinart, Acta Sinc. Mart. 366-373). It was also under him that the eighteen martyrs of Saragossa suffered (Ruinart, 468; Usuard, Mart. April 16). He planned the extermination of the entire body of the Christians of Saragossa, by feigning to grant them permission to go unmolested whithersoever they pleased, provided they quitted the city: but as soon as they had all left, the gates were closed behind and they were slaughtered by soldiers who lay in ambush (Ruinart, 469). The brothers Justus and Pastor at Complutum (Alcalá de Henares) were also martyred under him (Acta SS. Aug. ii. 143), as well as Fides and her companions at Agen in Aquitaine (Acta SS. Oct. iii. 264 b). [C. H.]

DACIANUS (2) One of the 49 martyrs of Carthage in A.D. 304, in the persecution of Diocletian, under the proconsul Anulinus. (Ruinart, Acta Sinc. Mart. p. 382; Ceillier, iii. 20, 21.) [SATURNINUS; DATIVUS.] [W. M. S.]

(3) Metropolitan of Byzacene in Africa, in the 6th century. To him is addressed a rescript in A.D. 541 by the emperor Justinian I., confirming the acts of his council. A second rescript came next year. (Labbe, Concil. v. p. 380; Ceillier, xi. 859; Baronius, anno 541, § 10.)

[W. M. S.]

DACRIANUS, a supposed Benedictine abbat, the reputed author of two works entitled Speculum Monachorum and Spiritualis Vitae Documenta, printed under his name in the Biblioth. Patrum, Colon. vol. viii. and elsewhere, and ascribed to the 8th century. But it is more probable the name is a feigned one, alluding to the tears (δάκρυα) of the writer at the dissoluteness of monastic life, and that the treatises were really composed by Ludovicus Blossius, an abbat of the middle of the 16th century. (Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 643; Fabric. Bibl. Lat. lib. iv. col. ii. p. 3.) [E. V.]

DACTYLORYNCHITAE [PASSALORYNCHITAE] (Praedestinatus, i. 63). [G. S.]

DACUNUS, ST., one of the anchorites said to have come with St. Petrock to Bodmin, one of the most sacred sites in Cornwall, in the 6th century (Leland, Collect. i. 10). [C. W. B.]

DADAS and QUINTILIAN, disciples of MAXIMUS the reader, at Dorostolus of Macedonia, martyred with him under Maximian, April 28 (Menol. Basil.). Mention is made of their relics and translation to the church of St. Mary in Vigilantia, Aug. 2 (ibid.). [E. B. B.]

DADES, in one of the Gnostic systems, the archon of the fourth heaven (Epiphanius, Haer. xxvi. 91). [DAVID.] [G. S.]

DADJAD. [DASHAD.]

DADO (1) or OUEN, ST., bishop of Rouen. [AUDENUS.]

(2) Bishop of Amiens, is placed after Deodatus, about the end of the 7th century. But the order is questionable, and Dado and Deodatus may be variations of the same name (Gams, Series Episc. p. 487; Gall. Christ. ix. 1156).

[D. R. J.]

(3) First abbat of Rodez, lived in the 8th century, and built with his own hands a cell, at a place called Conchae. His first disciple was Medraldus, who succeeded him as abbat and obtained the privilegium from Lewis the Pious. Dado then retired to a more remote place, Grandevabrum. (Gall. Christ. i. 237.) [D. R. J.]

DADOES. [MESSALIANI.]

DADOLENA, virgin, mentioned by St. Perpetuus, archbishop of Tours, in his will, dated 1st May, 475. He made two copies, which he signed equally; one he entrusted to Delmacius, whom he calls his son, the other to the virgin Dadolena. He ordered Delmacius to give his copy to the Count Agillon to open after his death in the presence of the priests, deacons, and clergy of his church. (Episc. Testamentum, Patrol. Lat. lviii. 754; Ceillier, x. 439.) [D. R. J.]

DADUB. [DAVID (1).]

DAEGHELM, one of the two presbyter abbats from the bishopric of Lindsey who signed the act of the council of Clovesho, October 12, 803. He is believed to have been abbat of Bardney. (Kemble, C. D. Nos. 179, 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 546, 547; Birch, Fasti Monast. 6.) [C. H.]

DAENE, abbat, attests a charter of Eadheric of Kent, A.D. 761, marked doubtful or spurious by Kemble (C. D. 106; Birch, Fasti Monast. 62.) [C. H.]

DAGÆUS. [DAIGH.]

DAGAMUNDUS, or DAGAMODUS, 9th abbat of the monastery of St. Claudius in Mount Jura, ruled in the 4th year of Childbert and in the 6th of Clotarius, kings of Burgundy, i. e. from the year 596 to 620, but according to Le Coiteur from 593 to 628 (Gall. Christ. iv. 244.) [D. R. J.]

DAGAMUS, bishop and confessor, is found in the Scotch calendars, and noticed by the Scotch hagiologists, as a strict maintainer of the traditional rites, as giving way with difficulty to the reasoning of St. Augustine, and as entirely refusing to adopt the new practice of the Roman, as against the British, Easter. He is said to have been educated at Bangor, and specially venerated in Galloway. But, however anxious the Scotch annalists, like Lesley, Dempster, and Camerarius, may be to attribute to him a derivation, education, and place in modern Scotland, he is rather to be assigned to ancient Scotia or Ireland, and is the bishop Daganus who is mentioned in the letter to the Scoti from Laurentius archbishop of Canterbury and Mellitus bishop of London, A.D. 609, as having "not only refused to eat with us, but even to take his repast in the same house where we were entertained" (Bede, H. E. ii. 4). Yet we are not told where he was bishop, and we can only make the probable assumption that he was Dagan, bishop of Ennereilly [DAGAN]. In Camerarius's calendar, his feast is May 29, and in Dempster's Men. Scot. March 22; the latter says he flourished in A.D. 555, or more probably 609. (Leslaeus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. lib. iv. 146; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. ii. 209; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 151; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 320-21.) [J. G.]

DAGAN, bishop of Inbher Daoile, now Ennereilly, in the barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, March 12 and Sept. 13. He was of the race of Labhraidh Lorc, son of Oilill Aine, and progenitor of the men of Leinster. The father of Dagan was Colman, or rather Colmad, son of Conall, of the Dal-Messincoirb in Leinster, and his mother Coeltigerna, sister of St. Coemgen or Kevin of Glendalough [COEMGEN], and others. Coeltigerna had four sons, who were saints, viz. Dagan, bishop of Inbher Daoile, Molibbeus, Molibba, or Libba, bishop of Glendalough (Jan. 8), Menoc or Enan (June 30), abbat of Glanealy, and Mohai, whom Colgan places on Dec. 13, though this last is doubtful. St. Dagan was educated at Liathmore, under St. Mochoemec or Puleherius (March 13), and, as some say, after visiting Rome he became abbat of Inbher Daoile, which is probably the same as Achadh-

Dagan, and is now marked out by the ruins of an old church, close to Mizen Head. He was one of the leaders in the Paschal controversy, and strongly espoused the native side against the Roman, and is probably the bishop Daganus mentioned by Laurentius and Mellitus as altogether intractable [DAGAMUS]. Notwithstanding this he is said to have been of a peculiarly mild disposition; he was a special friend of St. Molua (Aug. 4) of Clonfert, but the story of his presenting St. Molua's rule to St. Gregory at Rome, as told by Colgan, from Ussher, is entirely without foundation. Lanigan is of opinion that St. Dagan must have been born between the years 565 and 570, and his death took place on Sept. 13, A.D. 641 (Ann. Tigh.). Both March 12 and Sept. 13 are given as his festivals, and on the former Colgan gives his life. (Colgan, Acta SS. 43, 584-7, 594; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, n. 146, c. 12, n. 94, c. 14, § 16; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 247, 335; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. xvii., wks. vi. 484; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 256 n. d; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 443, 3rd ed.) [J. G.]

DAGILA, wife of a steward of Huneric, king of the Vandals. Under the persecution of Genseric, she several times confessed her faith. In A.D. 483, under Huneric, she was flogged with whips and staves till she was exhausted, and then exiled to a barren desert, whither she went with cheerfulness. They afterwards offered to send her to a less frightful place, but she preferred to remain where she was. (Victor, de Persec. Vandalic. lib. v. cap. 8, Patrol. Lat. lviii. 246; Ceillier, x. 460.) [W. M. S.]

DAGNUS, a corruption of the name DECUS in the acts of St. Christopher. [CHR. W.]

DAGO, eleventh bishop of Orleans. Nothing more is recorded of this bishop than of his predecessors in the Annals of Orleans, except that his name is given in the series as the successor of St. Flosculus. He lived about the end of the 5th century or the beginning of the 6th (Gall. Christ. viii. 1413.) [D. R. J.]

DAGOBERT, son of Chilperic I. He died about the end of the 6th century at the tomb of St. Médard, whither he had been taken to get cured of a disease, and his epitaph was written by St. Fortunatus. [Vide CLODOBERT.] (Patrol. Lat. lxxi. 243 n.) [D. R. J.]

DAGOBERT I., son of Clotaire II., was set up as king over the Austrasian Franks by his father in 622 (Fredegar, 47). His chief councillors and instructors were Arnulf, bishop of Metz, and Pippin the elder as mayor of the palace, the two founders of the Carolingian house. Fredegar (ib.) describes the great prosperity of the Austrasian kingdom under Dagobert's rule. In 625 Dagobert married Gomatrudis, and acquired a large accession of territory from his father Clotaire, territory north of the Loire, that had originally been Austrasian (Fred. 53). In 627 bishop Arnulf retired into a monastery, and was succeeded in the council by Cunibert, bishop of Cologne. In the following year (628), on the death of Clotaire, Dagobert became sole king of the Franks (Fred. 56). He proceeded to make a circuit of his kingdom, redressing grievances and examining into the administration of justice (Fred. 58). He made Paris his principal residence (Fred. 60), and in this he was followed by most of his successors.

A change appears about this time to have come over Dagobert and his administration, due perhaps to the influence of the Neustrian nobles and the women of the court. As the chronicler says, Dagobert forgot the justice which once he loved (cum omnis justitiae, quam prius dilexerat, esset oblitus, Fred. 60), and gave himself up to rapacity, avarice, and licentiousness. Pippin retired, or was driven from the court, to Orleans, and great discontent arose amongst the Austrasians.

The Frankish kingdom was at this time exposed to continual barbarian attacks on the eastern frontier, especially by the Wends. A great defeat was suffered in 630, and was followed by frequent invasions on the part of the Wends (Fred. 68). In the following year the Saxons offered to guard the frontier if their tribute was abated: the tribute was abated, but the frontier was not guarded (Fred. 74). In 632, as a more effective means of defence, Sigebert, Dagobert's son, was set up as subsidiary king of Austrasia, with Cunibert as his councillor, and Adalgisel, Pippin's son-in-law, as mayor of the palace (Fred. 75).

The general westward pressure of the barbarian tribes at this time is seen by the fact that 9000 Bulgarians sought refuge in the Bavarian territory. They were quartered throughout that district for the winter, and by Dagobert's orders cruelly massacred, together with their wives and children (Fred. 72).

In 633 Dagobert compelled the Austrasian chiefs to promise to allow Clovis, Dagobert's younger son, to succeed in Neustria and Burgundy after Dagobert's death, whilst Austrasia was to remain to Sigebert (Fred. 76). In 638 Dagobert died (ib. 79). To his reign is ascribed the redaction of the Bavarian code (Lex Baiuvariorum). Compare for his gifts to monasteries, &c., documents in Bréquigny, Pardessus' edition. See generally G. Richter, Annalen d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, vol. i. sub annis.

[T. R. B.]

DAGOBERT II., son of Sigebert III., king of the Austrasian Franks. On the death of his father in 656 Grimoald, the mayor of the palace, cut off Dagobert's long hair and banished him to Ireland. There he remained for upwards of eighteen years. During the anarchy which followed the death of Childeric II. Wulfoald, the mayor, sent to Wilfrid, bishop of York, asking him to fetch Dagobert over from Ireland and send him on to his native country. This Wilfrid did, and Dagobert was set up by Wulfoald's party as king in Austrasia (Vita Wilfridi, ap. Bouquet. iii. 601). That party was however overwhelmed by Ebroin, who in 678 caused Dagobert to be murdered (ibid.). Compare G. Richter, Annalen d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, vol. i. sub annis.

[T. R. B.]

DAGOBERT III., son of Childebert III., king of the Franks, succeeded his father in 711, but only survived him four years, dying in 715 (Gesta Reg. Fr. 50, 52). On the chronology, see G. Richter, Annalen d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, vol. i. sub annis.

[T. R. B.]

DAGOBERTUS or RADABERTUS, 20th archbishop of Tarentaise, lived about the end of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xii. 703.)

[D. R. J.]

DAIGH (DAGAEUS, DEGA), bishop, son of Cairrell, of Luis-caoin-Degha (now Inishkeen or Enniskeen, on the borders of Louth and Monaghan), Aug. 18. A life of Dega Mac Cayrill is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Aug. 18, tom. iii. 656-62) from an anonymous author, "ex cod. MS. antiquo membraneo Salmanticensi"). He was of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, and fourth in descent from him (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 212 n. k; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 223). His mother was Deidi, Deigha, or Dediva, daughter of Trian, son of Dubthach Ua Lughair; (for the husbands and children of Deidi, see Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Irel. 4 ser. iii. 56-7). The date of his birth is unknown, but he is said to have been a pupil of St. Finnian of Clonard (Feb. 23), and he must have been a priest when he gave the viaticum to St. Mochta (Aug. 19) of Louth, who died A.D. 535. But if so, he could not have been connected with Berach of Kilbarry [BERACH (2)] in the 8th century. His fame chiefly rests on his skill as an artificer, or, as the Calendar of Cushel calls him, "faber tam in ferro quam in aere, et scriba insignis." In the prophecy regarding him attributed to St. Mochta, it is said, "Plurimum de ferro et aere, de auro, atque argento utensilia ad usum ecclesiae pertinentia artificiosè manus ista operabitur." Montalembert says: "Dega or Dagan passed his nights in transcribing manuscripts, and his days in reading, and carving in iron and copper. He was so laborious, that the construction of 300 bells and 300 crosiers of bishops or abbats is attributed to him, and the transcription of 300 copies of the Gospels." He died A.D. 587 (Ann. Tigh.). His chief festival was probably Aug. 18, but Colgan gives at Feb. 19 a memoir of St. Dagaeus, bishop, and quotes in it what evidently belongs to St. Daigh, the artificer: he suggests that Feb. 19 may be a minor festival. (Colgan, Acta SS. 374, 405, c. 3, 731, cc. 20-1; Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 202; Reeves, S. Adannan, 115, 208; Montalembert, Monks of the West, iii. 89, Edinb. 1861; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 14; O'Conor, Epist. Nuncup. 178-79, and Prolegomena, ii. 144-45.)

[J. G.]

DAIRCHELL (DAIRCHOLLA), bishop of Glendalough, May 3. The Irish annals call him son of Curetai, and place his death in A.D. 678 (Ann. Tigh.), but give no particulars of his history, though he has obtained a place in the calendars (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 119).

[J. G.]

DAIRE (DARIA). In Irish calendars we find several saints of this name, but there is scarcely sufficient material preserved in history or legend to give them a well-defined individuality or place in history. In the third and fourth Lives of St. Brigida (in Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 541, c. 124, and 561, c. 89) an account is given of a virgin-saint named Daria, who was born blind and received sight from St. Brigida, but who no sooner saw than she closed her eyes again and asked the gift to be withdrawn, that the world might not seduce her mind from God. But who this contemporary of St. Brigida was we have no means of deciding. In Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 213) is, "Daire, Virgin. Aug. 8. Eighty years was her age." For her identification Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 545, n. 67) refers, among others, to St. Daria, who is said to have been sister of St. Ruadhan (Apr. 15), abbat of Lothera, and must have flourished in the middle of the 6th century: also to St. Daria "quae et Soidhealbh, seu Pulcheria," daughter of Cathirius, who lived in the time of St. Corbmac (Mar. 26), and had her monastery blessed by him, so that its exceeding fertility obtained for it the name of Magh-gannach, now Moygawnagh, in the barony of Tirawley, co. Mayo (Colgan, Acta SS. 248, c. 2, 775, n. 13, 752, c. 8); and also to that Daire or Daria, who is called mother of St. Ursula by Dempster, and is erroneously credited by him with the honour of giving the name to Kildare.

[J. G.]

DALBHACH (DALMACIUS), of Cuil-Collainge, Oct. 23. According to O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 281), he was of the race of Oilill Flanubeg, son of Fiacha Muilleathan, son of Eoghan Mór, son of Oilill Olum. If we accept the itinerary in St. Alban's Life (Colgan, Acta SS. 615, c. 20) as consecutive and genuine, the position of Cuil-Collainge was in the east of the county of Cork, as St. Alban came from Connaught by the west coast of Munster, and, reaching the country of the Ui-Liathain (that is, of the O'Lehans, in the fertile district round the present Castle-Lyons, on the Bride river, a branch of the Blackwater, a few miles to the south-east of Fermoy), built a cell at Ceallcrumthir (the priest's cell) near the town of Culcolling or Cilleulen, and then passed into the country of the Nandesi or Decies in the county of Waterford. Some miles distant, to the north of Fermoy, is the present parish of Kilgullane in the baronies of Condons-with-Clangibbon and Fermoy; and in the barony of Cork between Fermoy and Cork is Kilcully. Mart. Tall. (by Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. p. xxxvii.) has "Dalbach Cule Colla" on the same day, and Lanigan (Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 20) cites the place as Kilcully, in the North Liberty of Cork. Dalbach seems to have been a strict performer of penance, and it is said that "he never touched his hand to his side as long as he lived" (Mart. Doneg.). Some acts, or, more properly, encomiastic verses written in the Irish metre (patrio metro) on St. Caimin (Mar. 24) of Inisceltra are attributed by Colgan to St. Dalbhach (Acta SS. 746, c. 1, 747 n. 2). As a disciple of St. Abban (Mar. 16) and friend of St. Caiman, he must have lived about the first half of the 7th century.

[J. G.]

DALFINUS, bishop or archbishop of Lyon, mentioned only by Bede and Eddius in their accounts of Wilfrid, under the dates, as computed, A.D. 654 and 658. The account given by these writers, by Eddius especially, betrays much exaggeration; and this writer, it must be remembered, was not in personal attendance upon Wilfrid until many years after. Dalfinus is represented as having, in or about A.D. 654, hospitably entertained Wilfrid when a young man proceeding for the first time to Rome to make himself acquainted with Roman usages that he might propagate them among his countrymen. Dalfinus soon became warmly attached to him and offered, if he would remain, to place him in the government of a large district in Gaul, adopt him as his son, and give him his brother's maiden daughter for a wife. On learning the object of Wilfrid's mission, however, he ceased to press this point, equipped him for his journey, dismissed him with guides, and begged him to call again on his return. Wilfrid's homeward journey from Rome is computed to have been in A.D. 658. He once more took Lyon on his way and remained three years with the archbishop, who now conferred upon him St. Peter's tonsure, after the manner of the crown of thorns that encircled the head of Christ. Wilfrid also had here the advantage of learned doctors to assist him in his studies. Dalfinus had it in his heart to make Wilfrid his heir, but at that time an evil-minded queen, Balchild or Baldhild, was persecuting the church, and, like the impious Jezebel who slew the Lord's prophets, gave orders for the death of nine bishops. Dalfinus was one of these, and Wilfrid accompanied him both before the queen's ministers and to the place of execution, encountering great danger thereby, but he being a foreigner was dismissed unhurt. The probability of this story involves the character of the queen and some points of chronology. She is said to have been by birth a Saxon, to have been sold to a great Frankish noble, Erchinoald, to have fled from him, and to have become the wife of Clovis II. king of the Franks. Clovis died A.D. 656, and shortly afterwards died Erchinoald, who was his mayor of the palace, Ebroin succeeding to that office. Baldhild administered the kingdom as regent during the minority of her son Clothaire III., and when he came of age, A.D. 664, she retired into a monastery of her own foundation. She was afterwards one of the canonised saints of the church. Mabillon remarks that no one reading the acts of this queen would suppose her capable of inflicting death on pious bishops. The inconsistency between her character and the persecution attributed to her, in addition to the circumstance that Dalfinus is found in no list of the bishops of Lyon, and is known nowhere else in history, makes Dean Hook not scruple to consider the whole tale as a romance intended to embellish this period of Wilfrid's life. Other writers, however, take a different line, accepting the facts of the story, but substituting other names. Dalfinus, they say, must have been either another name of, or a mistake for, Annemund or Chane-mund, the authentic bishop of Lyon at that period; and the Baldhild difficulty is solved by attributing the persecution to her minister Ebroin. But if it was only at a later date, after the queen's retirement, that Ebroin exercised the authority of the state and behaved with so much cruelty, the story remains as suspicious as ever. DALHUNUS. [DEAL-UN.]

DALLAN FORGAILL, of Cluain Dallan, Jan. 29. His proper name was Eochaid, to which we find added "Eigeas, the learned," and "Righ Eigeas, the king of poets." But his popular name, and that by which he is now most familiarly known, is Dallan Forgaill, which is derived from the Irish Dall ("blind," and Forchella the name of his mother (Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 114). The Martyrologies of Donegal and Tallaght call him Dallan Forgaill of Maighin, and Colgan (Acta SS. 203-5) presents to us the most that is known of his life. His father was Colla, son of Ere, of the race of Colla Uais, monarch of Ireland (A.D. 323-6), and his mother was Forchella, from whom he got the name of Forgaill or Ua Forgaill, in Latin Forcellius. He was born on the borders of Connaught and Ulster, at a place which Colgan says was formerly called Masrige and Cathrige Sleacht, and in Colgan's day Teallach Eathach: by his father he was probably (Mart. Doneg.) cousin-german of St. Meadhog of Ferns (Jan. 31). He was early recognised as the royal poet and greatest scholar in Ireland, and is found recorded among the Milesian poets and historians in the Book of Ballinmote (O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Irish, ii. 52). In the end of the 6th century the bards had become a powerful and turbulent order in Ireland, countless in number, insatiable in their demands, and thinking themselves able to cope with the royal authority. (For an account of the state of education and learning at this period in Ireland, see O'Curry, ut supra, ii. Lect. iii.-viii.) Their greed and folly culminated when they demanded the royal brooch from king Aedh, son of Aiámiré (A.D. 568-594), and, on his refusal, threatened to satirise him in their bardic lays. At once he issued a decree of banishment against them. At that time Dallan Forgaill was the Ollamh or chief poet, but how far personally implicated in the quarrel with king Aedh we do not hear. When Aedh summoned the estates of the nation in A.D. 590 to meet him at Drumceatt (now Daisy Hill, near the river Roe, not far from Newtown Limavady, in the county of Londonderry), to settle some political questions, the case of the bards was taken up, and matters would have gone hard with them, but for the intervention of St. Columba in their favour [COLUMBA (1)]: he pleaded successfully for their retention as a useful body, yet willingly yielded to their reformation by a reduction of their numbers, by rules laid down for their conduct, and by the putting them under better supervision. In gratitude for the eloquence and zeal of St. Columba in averting the threatened danger, Dallan composed a panegyric, which is known as the "Amhra Choluimcille," or Praises of St. Columba, and, though largely glossed, is preserved to the present day. As it now stands, it is written in a very old and almost unintelligible form of Irish, and may be found in the Leabhar na Uidhre, fol. 8 sq.; the Leabhar Breac, fol. 109 sq.; the Liber Hymnorum, p. 21 sq. (See Reeves, Adamn, 17 n.; Colgan, Acta SS. 203-4, and Tr. Thuan. 432, cc. 8, 9; O'Curry, ut supra, iii. 245-56; Todd, St. Patrick, 138 n.) It was long used as a form of charm, and the reciting of it was believed to be a safeguard in danger, and a sure remedy in blindness, Dallan himself having, it is said, received his sight on the completion of his poem at St. Columba's death. He is also said by Colgan (Acta SS. 204) to have composed other panegyrics in praise of St. Senan of Iniscathey and St. Conall of Iniscail, which had the same wonderful effects: the former was extant in Colgan's day, while the other he could not find. But as to his history before or after the Convention of Drumceatt we know little. He is said to have been made chief Ollamh or Special Master of Education and Literature at the reformation then inaugurated in Ireland, and we read in the Leabhar na hUidhre (fol. 83, b. a. col. 2) an account of a historical dispute between him and Mongan, king of Ulster, which is at least characteristic of the tone of the bards before the meeting at Drumceatt, though it may have no other value. In or about the year 594 Dallan was killed by the pirates on the island of Inis-Cail (now Inishkeel, in Gweebarra Bay, co. Donegal), and was buried in the church of St. Conall (May 22) of Inis-Cail, where his memory was long held in great veneration. He is popularly connected with several churches, as with Maighin, a church in Westmeath, Killdallain, now Killadallan or Kildallan, in the diocese of Kilmore and co. Cavan, Disert-Dallain, Tullach-Dallain in the diocese of Raphoe, and Cluain-Dallain, now Clonallan, in the diocese of Down and co. Down. (Reeves, Ecol. Antiq. 114, 132-3, with references to writers on the "Amhra Choluimcille;" Todd, St. Patrick, 138-9; Montalembert, Mon's of the West, Edinb. 1861, iii. 191-8; Kelly, *Cal. Ir. DALMACIUS, Irish saint. See DALBHACH.

DALMATIUS (1), censor at Antioch, commissioned by the emperor Constantine the Great to inquire into a charge brought by the Arians against Athanasius of having murdered Arsenius. Dalmatius wrote to the archbishop to prepare his defence. (Athan. Ap. cont. Arian. 144, Pat. Gr. xxv. 366.) Socrates (H. E. i. 27) calls him the son of Constantine's brother; but it is shewn on other authority that he was the emperor's brother by a different mother, called also Hannibalianus, being the father of Dalmatius Caesar. (Valesii Annot. ad Socr. l. c., Pat. Gr. lxxvii. 157.) Baronius, calling the censor Dalmatius, places the inquiry under the year A.D. 332. (Annal. t. iv. p. 258, ed. Theiner, 1863.) [C. H.]

(2) CAESAR, son of Dalmatius the censor, and so a nephew of Constantine the Great. He is confounded by Socrates with his father; but it is shewn that in A.D. 332 the younger Dalmatius was a lad at Narbonne with his brother Hannibalianus attending the lectures of the rhetorician Exuperius; that he was summoned thence in 335, when still very young, by Constantine, who created him Caesar, invested with the purple, and sent him as king to Caesarea in Cappadocia. See authorities quoted in Valesii Annot. ad Soc., H. E. i. 27, Pat. Gr. lxxvii. 157. [C. H.]

(3) A tribune and notary who brought in A.D. 386 an order to St. Ambrose from the emperor Valentinian II. [W. M. S.]

(4) Monk and abbat, near Constantinople, a powerful influence at the time of the council of Ephesus (A.D. 431) against Chrysostes the chamberlain and the Nestorian party at the court of Theodosius II.

His influence arose from his eminent piety, his strength of character, and his fiery zeal. Under Theodosius the Great he had served in the second company of Guards, had married, had children, and led a virtuous life. Feeling a call to a monastic life, he left his wife and children, except a son Faustus, and went to receive instruction from the abbat Isaac, who had dwelt in the desert since his infancy. Isaac at his death made him Hegumenus, superior of the monastery, under the patriarch Atticus. Consulted by councils, patriarchs, and emperors, he remained in his cell forty-eight years without quitting it. He is sometimes addressed as chief of the monasteries of Constantinople; but it is not determined whether this was a complimentary or official title. He is not to be confounded with Dalmatius, monk at Constantinople, bishop of Cyzicus; because the latter was present at the council of Ephesus in that capacity.

During the disputes of the Syrians and Egyptians at the council of Ephesus, Dalmatius, who had always signalised his fervour against the patriarch Nestorius (Mercat. tom. ii. Praefatio, p. 735, Patrol. Lat. xlviii.) received, in conjunction with the bishops Macarius and Potamon, a letter from Cyril of Alexandria, warning him that the official account, by Count Candidian, of the deposition of Nestorius, was not complete. (Cyril, Epist. § 84, num. xxiii., Patrol. Graec. lxxvii. 131.)

During the supremacy of the Nestorian party at Ephesus, letters were conveyed by a beggar in the hollow of a cane from Cyril and the Athanasian or Catholic party to the emperor Theodosius, the clergy and people at Constantinople complaining that they had been imprisoned three months, that the Nestorians had deposed Cyril and Memnon bishop of Ephesus, and that they were all in the greatest distress. A short memorial was added to the letter of the bishops, probably for Dalmatius: "The hot and unhealthy air kills us, scarce a day passes without a funeral, and the servants are sent away sick." (Pope Paul V., Concil. Gen. Eccl. [Rome, 1628] tom. i. pp. 483-486.) By this appeal Dalmatius was greatly moved. As he was praying, he believed he heard a voice summoning him to go forth at length from his retreat in the interests of truth. Into the merits of the Nestorian controversy this is not the place to enter; but Dalmatius thought the crisis to be of the highest moment. Accompanied by the monks of all the monasteries, with their abbats at their head, he sallied forth in a long procession and made his way to the palace. Among the abbats was Eutyches, at that time a friend of Cyril; his excess of zeal afterwards led to his heresy. The procession was divided into two companies, singing alternately; a vast crowd of sympathisers followed. The abbats were admitted to the emperor's presence; and the monks remained outside chanting. Returning to the people, the abbats asked them to go to the church of St. Mocius to hear the letter of the council and the emperor's reply. They passed down one of the great streets to the other end of the city near the gilded gate where the church lay; the monks continued their chanting, and carried wax tapers. Great enthusiasm was excited against Nestorius.

Arrived at the church, the abbats read the letter of the bishops, which produced high excitement. Dalmatius, who was a presbyter, then mounted the pulpit, begged them to be patient, and in temperate and modest terms related his conversation with the emperor, and its satisfactory result. The outcome was that the emperor wrote to Ephesus, ordering a deputation of each party to arrive at Constantinople. In a letter to Dalmatius the council acknowledge that to him only is owing the emperor's information of the truth.

Proclus, archbishop of Constantinople, writing afterwards to John bishop of Antioch, mentions how very deeply scandalised the very holy archimandrite Dalmatius had been by the translation by Ibas bishop of Edessa of certain passages from Theodore of Mopsuestia (Proclus, Op. 651). (Cyril, Epist. numb. 23, etc., Patrol. Graec. lxxvii.; Concil. Gen. i.; Dalmatii Apologia, p. 477; St. Procl. CP. Episc. Epist. iii.; Patrol. Graec. lxxv. p. 876, lxxxv. col. 1797-1802; Ceillier, viii. 290, 395, 396, 407, 594; Fleury, book xxvi.) [W. M. S.]

DALMATIUS (5) A monk, chosen by the people of Cyzicum, according to the canons, to be their bishop. Sisinnius, archbishop of Constantinople, had nominated Proclus (who afterwards succeeded to the patriarchal see). Dalmatius remained bishop of Cyzicum, for he was present with that title at the council of Ephesus A.D. 431. (Socrat. vii. 28; Patrol. Graec. lxxvii. p. 802; Pope Paul, Concil. Gen. i. 372; Ceillier, viii. 403.) [W. M. S.]

DALMATIUS (6) ST., third bishop of Rodez, was ordained bishop in the year A.D. 524 or 525, held his bishopric 56 years, and died A.D. 580, in the fifth year of the reign of king Chilbert. He subscribed at the council of Orléans in 541, and on returning from that council visited the bones of St. Martin at Tours. He was also present at the council of Clermont in 525, and at the first council of Arvernium in 535. He had much to contend with on account of the Arian heresy, which was very prevalent in his time, also, about the year 533, on account of a fierce persecution of Christians by Amalarius, king of the Goths.

Dalmatius was once condemned to death for the faith at Brives la Gaillarde. St. Anstites interceded for him with the tribune who had condemned him, but his intercession was of no avail, and Dalmatius was actually led out to execution.

Anstites then prayed for him, and the execution was hindered by some extraordinary atmospheric phenomena, and the condemned man lived to a good old age.

Gregory of Tours mentions his controversy with Modericus, bishop of Arisitum, for the purpose of reclaiming for his diocese certain parishes which had been taken from it.

In describing his death, Gregory calls him "most exalted in all holiness, abstaining equally from food and the lusts of the flesh: a great giver of alms, and courteous to all: of no mean steadfastness in prayer and watching." He adds that he built a church, but often pulled it down to improve it, and so left it incomplete (Geg. Turon. Hist. 5. 5, and 47; Gall. Christ. i. 199).

Dalmatius is commemorated on the 2nd of November (Labbe, Bibl. Nova MSS. ii. Append.). [D. R. J.]

DALMATUS, a soldier of the time of Theodorus, with Faustus his son, became disciples of the monk Isaac, and founded a monastery at Constantinople, afterwards called the monastery of Dalmatus. Died Aug. 3. (Men. Basil.) [E. B. B.]

DALTA, Dalta-Christ, i. e. the foster-child or pupil of Christ, was used in Ireland as an honorific title of St. John the Evangelist: so also was Eoin na-bruinne, "John of the breast." "Eoin na-bruinne Dalta Dei" occurs in the Codex Maelbrigte. (See Dr. Reeves' paper thereon in the Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy, Jan. t. xiii. 1851, p. 9; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 321. See also DIARMAID (6)). [J. G.]

DAMAN, of Tigh Damain, in Ui-Criomhthannain (Mart. Doneg.) Feb. 12. He was brother of St. Abban (Mar. 16) and other saints, and nephew of St. Ibar (Apr. 23). His mother was Mella or Miolla, St. Ibar's sister, and his father Lagnenus or Laighech, son of Canechus, of the Dal Cormac, and belonging to Leinster. But of his history tradition is silent. His residence, Tigh Damain, is now Tidowan, in the barony of East Maryborough, Queen's County. (Colgan, Acta SS. 626, c. 3; Book of Rights, by O'Donovan, 216 n. 9; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Soc. Ir. 4 ser. ii. 558.) [J. G.]

DAMASCIUS, the last of the celebrated teachers of the Neo-Platonic school at Athens, born at the end of the 5th century at Damascus, from whence he derived his appellation, his personal name being lost. He studied under Theon and Isidorus at Alexandria, and subsequently under Marinus and Zenodotus at Athens. At Athens he presided over the school of rhetoric and Platonic philosophy till the heathen schools were closed by Justinian, A.D. 529, when, with the rest of the staff, he repaired to Persia to the court of king Chosroes. His philosophical works are enumerated and described elsewhere (Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography, vol. i. p. 932). Here we need only particularise his life of his tutor Isidorus, of which we have an account given by Photius (Cod. 181). Photius describes Damascius as "excessively impious" (εἰς ἄκρον δυσσεβής), availing himself of every opportunity of covertly attacking the Christian faith. He wrote in a very arrogant strain, dwelling with malicious pleasure on the mistakes and failings of those whom he mentions, not excepting the subject of his biography, Isidorus. From the abundance of personal information relative to the leading philosophers and Christian teachers of his time, this work, if it had been preserved, would have been of great value for the history of the epoch. (Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 552; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. lib. v. c. 38, § 9; Suidas, sub voc.; Photius, Cod. 181; Wolf, Anecdota Graeca, vol. iii. p. 195.) [E. V.]

DAMASUS, the successor of pope Liberius, said to have been a Spaniard and the son of Antouius. On the death of Liberius (Sept. A.D. 366) the factions which had disgraced his election [LIBERIUS] broke out with reloubed violence. The original root of bitterness had been Arianism; and Felix, the Arian antipope, had been expelled by Liberius. But his partisans lingered in the church; and seven days after the death of Liberius they met and proclaimed Damasus pope in the Lucina [qy. the crypt of St. Lucina in the catacomb of Callistus?]. Damasus had previously taken up a middle position between the contending parties, which may have specially recommended him to the electors, who could not hope to carry an extreme man. He had followed Liberius from Rome when he was exiled for opposing Felix; but had soon deserted him, and returned to be present at the election of Felix in his place. On the return of Liberius after three years, when the other adherents of Felix were disgraced, Damasus is said to have found both pardon and favour at the hands of the pope. Nevertheless, on the pope's death, about the same time apparently that the other election took place, the party of Liberius met in the Julian basilica and elected Ursicinus.

It is difficult to ascertain the truth with regard to the strife between the rival popes. A heathen writer, Ammianus Marcellinus (Amm. Marcell. xxvii.), speaks of the conflict as serious and bloody, but without imputing the exclusive blame to either side. Unfortunately, perhaps, for Damasus, the most detailed account we have of the struggle is that of personal enemies. This is in the form of a narrative preface to a petition (libellus precum) presented against him to the emperor by two aggrieved presbyters. From this source we hear of three distinct scenes of outrage, of each of which it is asserted that Damasus was the cause. First, he signalled the very day of his election (Oct. 1st) by breaking into the Julian basilica with a mob armed with clubs. Almost a month later (Oct. 26th) he attacked the Liberian basilica, to which seven of Ursicinus' priests had been carried by their own party, who had rescued them from captivity. He is said to have put a hundred and sixty of both sexes to the sword; and this appears to be the conflict meant by Ammianus, though he states both its place and the number of the slain differently; in consequence of which, he says, Juventius the prefect, finding himself unable to stem the tumult, withdrew from the city. Ursicinus was banished, but recalled the following year by Valentinian (Sept. 15th, A.D. 367); and this led to another sanguinary conflict in the church of St. Agnes in the December following, which was repressed by strong measures on the part of the prefect Maximinus.

A charge of adultery was brought against him by his enemies, seemingly shortly after; indeed he is taunted by the Preface to the Libellus Precum with being the favourite of the ladies of Rome. A form of trial seems to have been gone through, but Damasus was honourably acquitted, and his accusers excommunicated (Anast.).

What Damasus would have replied to all these accusations we have no means of knowing. But we can say that he used his success well, and that the chair of St. Peter, if acquired by violent means, was never more respected nor more vigorous than during his bishopric. He appears as a principal defender of the orthodoxy of the church against Arian and other heretics. Bishop Peter of Alexandria was his firm friend all along; and was associated with him in the condemnation of Apollinaris (Soz. vi. 25), and in the affixing the stigma of Arianism to Meletius of Antioch and Eusebius, who were upheld by Basil (Basil, Ep. cclxvi. iii. 597, ed. Bened.). On Meletius' death Damasus struggled hard to gain the chair of Antioch for Paulinus, and to exclude Flavianus; nor was he reconciled to the latter till some time later (Socr. v. 15).

His correspondence with Jerome [HIERONYMUS], his attached friend and secretary, begins A.D. 376, and closes only with his death A.D. 384. Six of Jerome's letters to him are preserved, of which two are expositions of difficult passages of Scripture elicited by letters of Damasus asking the aid of his learning. Jerome's desire to dedicate to him a translation of Didymus' work on the Holy Ghost was only stopped by his death. In later letters Jerome speaks in high terms of Damasus; calls him "that illustrious man, that virgin doctor of the virgin church"; asserts that he was "eager to catch the first sound of the preaching of continence"; and that he "wrote both verse and prose in favour of virginity" (Epp. Hieron. 22, 48). From this may be gathered the attitude of Damasus towards the chief controversy of the day; and this also may be a reason why a charge like that above mentioned, of adultery, would be peculiarly injurious to him. Upon this evidence Milman (Latin Christianity, i. 69) founds his conjecture that Damasus was the patron in his generation of the growing monastic party within the church; a conjecture not improbable in itself, and rendered more likely by the ardent attachment of Jerome, and the veneration in which the memory of pope Damasus was held by later times, when the principle of monasticism had taken firm root in the Roman church.

But the best known record of Damasus will always be his labour of love in the catacombs of Rome. Here he laboured ardently and devotedly in rediscovering the tombs of the martyrs, which had been blocked up and hidden by the Christians during the last persecution. He "removed the earth, widened the passages, so as to make them more serviceable for the crowd of pilgrims, constructed flights of stairs leading to the more illustrious shrines, and adorned the chambers with marbles, opening shafts to admit air and light where practicable, and supporting the friable tufa walls and galleries wherever it was necessary with arches of brick and stone work. Almost all the catacombs bear traces of his labours, and modern discovery is continually bringing to light fragments of the inscriptions which he composed in honour of the martyrs, and caused to be engraved on marble slabs, in a peculiarly beautiful character, by a very able artist, Furius Dionysius Filocalus. It is a singular fact that no original inscription of pope Damasus has ever yet been found executed by any other hand; nor have any inscriptions been found, excepting those of Damasus, in precisely the same form of letters. Hence the type is well known to students of Christian epigraphy as the 'Damasine character.'" (Roma Sotterranea, by Northcote and Brownlow, p. 97.)

Besides these inscriptions Damasus did other works which prove his care for the relics of martyrs. He laid down a marble pavement in the basilica of St. Sebastian, recording by an inscription the fact of the temporary burial in that church of St. Peter and St. Paul (ib. p. 114).

He built the baptistry at the Vatican in honour of the same St. Peter; where De Rossi thinks, from an inscription in the Damasine character, was an actual chair which went by the name of St. Peter's seat (ib. p. 393), and he drained the crypts of the Vatican, that the bodies which had been buried there might not be disturbed by the overflow of water (ib. p. 334).

If De Rossi is right in a rather bold conjecture, an inscription in memory of pope Cornelius records that Damasus was ill at the time he ordered its erection (ib. p. 180). He died in December, A.D. 384, after a pontificate of eighteen years. He had prepared his own tomb before his death in the ground above the catacomb of Callistus, giving his reason in an inscription in what is called the Papal crypt of that catacomb:—

"Hic fater Damasus volui mea condere membra, Sed timui sanctos cineres vexare priorum."

(ib. p. 102.)

DAMHNAT, virgin, of Sliabh Beatha, now Slieve Beagh, in Tyrone, commemorated June 13. Regarding this saint there is much difficulty, both as to her identity and the time when she lived. St. Aengus the Culdee calls Damhnat or Dimna the daughter of Bronachia, and sister of St. Fursej, but he is evidently in error (Colgan, Acta SS. 95, c. 4; Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. 190). Colgan (ib. 713) would wish to identify her with St. Dimpua, the martyr in Belgium, but not very successfully, though the name of "the fugitive" may be in so far applicable to both. On the whole, it seems better to treat them as different persons [DIMPNA], and the virgin of Slieve Beagh as identical with the following. Thus among the saints of the family of the Orgielli, or offspring of Colla Dachrioch, Colgan (ib. 713, c. 4, n. 10) gives "St. Damnoda, alias Dymna," surnamed Schene, i.e. the fugitive, daughter of Damen, &c., and venerated on June 13. With reference to the same person, Petrie (Round Towers of Ireland, pp. 323-4) presents two drawings of bosses on the crosier of the virgin and martyr, Damhnad Ochene, or "the Fugitive, whose memory," he says, "was venerated by the people of the extensive region of Oriel, as being their chief patroness," and who must have lived before the close of the 6th century. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 396; Butler, Lives of the Saints, vi. 218, ad diem.) [J. G.]

DAMIANUS (1), said to have been sent as a missionary by pope Eleutherius to Britain. [DUVIANUS.]

(2) Martyr. [COSMAS (1).]

(3) Bishop of Sidon, a member of the synod at Antioch which condemned Athanasius of Perra, A.D. 444, and also of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, when he gave his vote for the deposition of Dioscorus (Labbe, Concil. tom. iv. col. 443), and signed the acts (ib. col. 787, 800). The fortieth letter of Theodoret is addressed to him, thanking him for his undeserved good opinion. (Le Quien, Oriens Christian. ii. 813.) [E. V.]

(4) Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria. [See Coptic Church, p. 667.]

DAMIANUS (5) Commemorated June 1. There was one of this name who was a companion of St. Regulus, and one of the churches of St. Andrew's was dedicated to him (Skene, Chron. of Picts and Scots, 187). Dempster enters him on June 1, as having received the relics brought by St. Regulus, and as being honoured at Cumbernauld, Dumbartonshire (Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 151, at June 2; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 201, 321). But Leslaeus and Dempster also give a Damianus, who seems, from the association of names and dates, to be intended for one of those whom pope John IV. addressed in his Paschal letter [CROGAN (11)], (Leslaeus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. lib. iv. 152; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 210.) [J. G.]

(6) The fifth bishop of Rochester. He was a South Saxon, consecrated in the place of bishop Ithamar, by archbishop Deusdedit, no long time probably after his own consecration in 655. He had been long dead when archbishop Theodore in 659 arrived in Kent (Bed. H. E. iii. 20). He probably died soon after his patron the archbishop, as otherwise Deusdedit would have appointed a successor; or if he had long survived him, he might have consecrated Wighard and Ceadda (Ang. Sac. i. 330). Wilfrid's assertion in 664 that all the bishops in Britain were either Quartodecimans, or in communion with the Quartodecimans, seems to prove that Damian was dead at the time (edd. V. Wilfr. c. 12). [S.]

(7) ST., bishop of Ticinum, or Pavia. He is the same person as the Damianus, presbyter and bishop of Pavia of the Bollandists. (Paulus Diaconus, de Gest. Langobard. vi. 4, Patrol. Lat. xcv. 626; AA. SS. Boll. Apr. ii. 91-92.) [D. R. J.]

He succeeded Anastasius, A.D. 680, as bishop of Pavia, of which city he was a native. While still a presbyter he attended the synod held under Mansuetus, archbishop of Milan, against the Monothelites, A.D. 679, and was deputed to draw up an exposition of faith in the name of the synod, to be sent to the emperor Constantine V. This document was received with acclamation in the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680. Damianus died A.D. 710. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. p. 1082; Migne, Patrol. tom. lxxxvii. pp. 1259-1268.) [E. V.]

DAMOETAS (1), a name given in Alcuin's letters to Riculphus archbishop of Mayence (Alcuin, Epist. 45, 122, 123, Patrol. Lat. c.). [RICULFUS.] [C. H.]

DAMOETAS (2) FLAVIUS, a friend of Alcuin, who (A.D. 796) addressed two letters to him. He was a person of rank, serving in the army of Charlemagne against the Saxons, a man of parts and energy, both in war and peace. He had previously held a high juridical position. (Alc. E. p. 44, 46, Patrol. Lat. c. 210 sq.; Epp. 39, 41, ed. Froben.) [C. H.]

DANAX, the reader, of Aulon in Illyria, fled with the sacred vessels from a rustic riot against the Christians to a place by the sea five miles from the town, but they pursued him, let themselves down to him by ropes, bade him sacrifice to Dionysius, who made wine, and as he would not, cut him down with their swords and cast him into the sea, Jan. 16; year not specified. (M. mol. Basil.) [E. B. B.]

CHRIST. BIOGR.

DANIEL (1) Presbyter, said to have been martyred in Persia, February 21, in the 35th year of Sapor (A.D. 344), with a virgin, whose name in Chaldee meant Rose, after five days' torture and three months' interrogation, according to brief acts given from a Vatican MS. by Assemani. (Mart. Orient. p. 103.) [E. B. B.]

(2) One of the abbats of Scete in Egypt, in the 4-5th century. He was a disciple of Paphorutius, and served him in the capacity of deacon at the altar. He is the speaker in the fourth of the Collations of Johannes Cassianus. Cassianus had met him during a tour in Egypt. (Cassian, Collatio 4, Patrolog. Lat. xlix. 583; Ceillier, viii. 116.) [W. M. S.]

(3) In Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 135) there is the entry at May 20, "Daniel of Tulach," of whom we know nothing further. In the tripartite life of St. Patrick there is a Daniel who was surnamed "Abhac, i.e. Nanus," from the smallness of his stature, and "Angelus" from the angelic innocence and purity of his soul; to him is traced the origin of the name Glenavy, a parish in Antrim, the church of which was given him by St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 147, c. 132, 183 n. 219; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 236; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 312, 3rd ed.) [J. G.]

(4) Bishop at a council assembled by Cyril at Alexandria about A.D. 430, for the condemnation of Nestorius. He was one of the four bishops selected to carry to Constantinople the letter written by Cyril in the name of this council, together with the letter of pope Celestine in the name of a Roman council on the same subject. (Labbe and Cossart, Concil. ii. 1688; Ceillier, viii. 259.) [W. M. S.]

(5) A presbyter at Alexandria, sent in A.D. 438 to Acacius bishop of Meletina, Theodotus of Ancyra, and Firmus of Caesarea, with a credential letter by Cyril of Alexandria, to shew them the situation of affairs and the reply he proposed to send to the Oriental bishops at Antioch. (Baluzius, Concil. 917; Ceillier, viii. 302.) [W. M. S.]

(6) A bishop of the 5th century, addressed by Firmus archbishop of Caesarea; he is instructed to oblige a robber to return to his victims what he had taken from them. The man is to be punished at Caesarea when he is convicted; probably before the ecclesiastical tribunal. (Lupus, Epist. p. 318, Patrol. Graeca, lxxvii.; Ceillier, x. 152.) [W. M. S.]

(7) Disciple of the Egyptian solitary Arsenius (circ. A.D. 445), who performed for him the duties of hospitality to strangers arriving at his cell. (De Vitis Patrum, iii. ch. viii. and xcii., VII. ch. xxxiv., Patrol. Lat. lxxiii.; Ceillier, viii. 399.) [W. M. S.]

(8) Bishop of Charrae (Haran), in Mesopotamia, in the middle of the 5th century. He was nephew of the celebrated Nestorian bishop of Edessa, Ibas, by whom, though very young and of ill-repute (according to Ibas' enemies) for disorderly and licentious life, he was consecrated bishop. Daniel sat in the council held at Antioch in the matter of Athanasius of Perrha (ATHANASIVS [3]), and gave his vote against him (Labbe, Concil. vol. iv. col. 733). Very grave charges were brought against him by the presbyters of Edessa, at the synod held at Berytus, to investigate the charges against Ibas, among which were that he ordained men of unchaste life like himself, and caused public scandal by his immoral relations with a married woman named Challos, on whom and her children he lavished the church property, giving her timber for her buildings out of the ecclesiastical estates. (Labbe, u.s. col. 644, 648, 650, 651.) He was anathematised by Dioscorus at the "Latrocinium" of Ephesus. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. ii. p. 976.) [E. V.]

DANIEL (9) The Stylite, of the 5th century. Curiosity about these extraordinary persons has preserved us some details of his life. He was a Mesopotamian by birth. In his youth he had visited Symeon the Stylite; and had been afterwards fired by emulation. After having practised in convents for several years the exercises of monastic life, at the age of 47 he received as a legacy the cowl of Symeon, which had been coldly received by the emperor Leo, and established his pillar four miles north of Constantinople. The owner of the soil, who had not been consulted, appealed to the emperor and the patriarch Gennadius. Gennadius proposed to dislodge him, but was in some way deterred. Gennadius ordained him presbyter against his will, standing at the foot of his column. When the ceremony was over the patriarch administered the eucharist by means of a ladder, which Daniel had ordered to be brought, and received it in turn from the Stylite. He lived on his pillar for thirty-three years, and died at the age of eighty. The patriarch Euphemius assisted at his death, and gave him burial. By continually standing his feet were covered with sores and ulcers: the winds of Thrace sometimes stripped him of his scanty clothing; for days he was covered with snow and ice, till the emperor forcibly enclosed the top of his pillar with a shed. He was visited with reverence by kings and emperors as an oracle: but discouraged all who brought complaints against their bishops. Towards the end of his life, solicited eagerly by both sides, he took part in the dispute between Basiliscus (who usurped the throne of the East for two years from the emperor Zeno), a Monophysite and Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople. He descended his pillar, appeared in the city, denounced Basiliscus, and inflamed the people with such zeal, that Basiliscus published an orthodox edict. The following is his prayer before he began his life on the pillar: "I yield Thee glory, Jesus Christ my God, for all the blessings which Thou hast heaped upon me, and for the grace which Thou hast given me that I should embrace this manner of life. But Thou knowest that in ascending this pillar, I lean on Thee alone, and that to Thee alone I look for the happy issue of mine undertaking. Accept, then, my object: strengthen me that I finish this painful course: give me grace to end it in holiness." In his last will to his disciples, written as his end approached, after commending them to the common Father of all, and to the Saviour who died for them, he gives them the following special advice:—"Hold fast humility, practise obedience, exercise hospitality, keep the fasts, observe the vigils, love poverty, and above all maintain charity, which is the first and great commandment; keep closely bound to all that regards piety, avoid the tares of the heretics.

Separate never from the church your mother; if you do these things your righteousness shall be perfect." He was attended in his last moments by Euphemius patriarch of Constantinople, and Rais "fidelissima." By her he was magnificently buried at the foot of his column. Baronius places his death in A.D. 489. (Vita S. Daniel, ap. Surium, ad diem ii. decemb. cap. xli., xlii., xliii.; Robertson, Ch. Hist. ii. 41-3, 274; Ceillier, x. 344, 403, 485; Baronius, ed. Theiner vol. viii. ad an. 460, § 20; 464, § 2; 465, § 3, 12, 13; 476, § 48, 50, 51, 53; 489, § 4.)

[W. M. S.]

DANIEL (10), a deacon from whom St. Perpetuus, archbishop of Tours, bought a country seat with the estate appertaining thereto. He is mentioned in the saint's will. He lived about the end of the 5th century. (Spicileg. tom. v. p. 105; Ceillier, Hist. Gén. des Auteurs sacrés, x. 439, 440; Perpetuus Testamentum, Patrol. Lat. lviii. 754.)

[D. R. J.]

(11) Bishop of Bangor, commemorated Sept. 11. [DEINIOL WYN.]

(12) Bishop of Theodosiopolis (or Rhaesina) in Mesopotamia, c. A.D. 550, the author of works against the errors of "the Marcionites, Manichees, Chaldeans, and Astrologers." (Ebed Jesu Sobens. Catalog. c. 152; Assemani, Bibl. Orient. tom. iii. p. 223; Le Quien, Oriens Christian. tom. ii. col. 982.)

[E. V.]

(13) Abbat of the monastery afterwards known as St. Médard's at Soissons, on the west of the city near the right bank of the Aisne. The foundation of this house was begun by Clotaire I. king of the Franks, about the year A.D. 560, completed by his son Sigebert king of Austrasia, and dedicated about A.D. 562. Daniel, who is believed to have been a disciple of St. Maurus of Glanfeuille, was appointed the first abbat, and he is said to have obtained for the monastery the privilege of immunity from pope John III. He was succeeded by Gairaldus I. as second abbat (Gallia Christiana, ix. 410.)

[C. H.]

(14) Bishop of Cenn-Garadh, commemorated Feb. 18. This is the entry in the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 53), and the Irish Annals give his death about A.D. 660 (Ann. Tigh.). The church of Cenn-garadh is placed by the Felire of Aengus in the Scotch Gallgaedhela, or Galloway, but Lanigan (Ecol. Hist. ir. iii. 36) believes that the name should be read Killgaradh, now Oran, in the county of Roscommon, where St. Patrick is said to have founded a church. Its true identification is with Kingarth in the island of Bute, in the Firth of Clyde.

[J. G.]

(15) Monk of the monastery of Rhaitu in the 7th century, author of the Life of John Chincacus, abbat of Mount Sinai (A.D. 605). He wrote at Rhaitu when persons were still alive who had seen this abbat; he mentions Isaac, a solitary, and another abbat John. (La Bigne, Mar. Bib. Pat. t. x. p. 386.)

[W. M. S.]

(16) The sixth bishop of the West Saxons, who sat at Winchester from 705, when he was consecrated by archbishop Brihtwald, to his resignation in 744. Under him the West-Saxon diocese was divided, Aldhelm receiving the south-western portion, with his see at Sherborne, in 705, and Sussex, with its see at Selsey, being apportioned in 709 to bishop Eadbert. Daniel was probably the most learned and active bishop of his time in England; Bede mentions him as one of his assistants in the composition of his history, and as having established the church in the Isle of Wight (H. E. iv. 16). He is, however, best known from his connexion with St. Boniface, who received from him commendatory letters to Rome in 718, and some part of his correspondence with whom is preserved. In one of these letters (Mon. Moguntina, Ep. 15), Daniel instructs Boniface how to deal with the heathen, and in another (No. 56) he exhorts him to perseverance, and advises him how to deal with criminal priests, in answer to another letter of Boniface (No. 55), also extant. Besides these there are two other letters of Daniel on minor points, all however shewing piety, zeal, and prudence. Daniel visited Rome in 721; in 731 he assisted at the consecration of archbishop Tatwin; in 744 he resigned his see, and in 745 he died. His episcopate, which covers the reign of Ine, was the period of the great development and missionary exertion of the West-Saxon church. [S.]

Willis (Mit. Abb. i. 137), and the Monasticon Angl. (i. 255) insert a Daniel in the list of abbots of Malmesbury, between two Aldhelms, making him the second abbat, but their references do not bear them out, and he is certainly the bishop of Winchester, now retired from his see and living in that monastery, but not as abbat. William of Malmesbury (G. P. ed. Hamilton, i. 160) relates how after an episcopate of 43 years (sic) at Winchester, bishop Daniel withdrew to Malmesbury, where he ended his days as a monk, and where he was buried, though incorrectly supposed by some to have been buried at Winchester. Malmesbury says nothing about his being abbat. Rudborne also states that the bishop in his old age returned to Malmesbury, where he had formerly been a monk (Wharton, Angl. Sac. i. 195). The chronology of these writers agrees with the date of the supposed abbacy sufficiently to identify the ex-bishop with the Daniel of the list. But there is another list of abbats in a Cotton MS. lately published for the first time by Mr. W. de G. Birch, the first three being Aldhelm, Daniel, Megildulfus. Mr. Birch suggests that, without his being abbat, the bishop's rank may have given him a sort of precedence and authority that originated the tradition of his having presided. (Birch, Abbots of Malmesbury, 1871; text of the MS. at p. 27.) Florence of Worcester must be mistaken in saying that the bishop died at Winchester (Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 744). William of Malmesbury further mentions (357) that in his own day there was a fountain at Malmesbury called after bishop Daniel from his having been accustomed to pass his nights at it. [C. H.]

DANIEL (17), supposed bishop of Congressbury and afterwards of Wells. The Glastonbury Chronicle, in Wharton (Ang. Sac. i. 553), asserts that from A.D. 167 there was a series of bishops over Somersetshire seated at Congressbury, the last of whom was Daniel, who in the reign of Ina king of Wessex, and by his grant, transferred the see to Wells. Another chronicler, known as the Canon of Wells, repeats the statement of Daniel's transferring the see, adding that he celebrated the nuptials between Ina and Adelburga; that by the queen's mediation he received for the see the manor of Tyderton; and that having sat 43 years he was succeeded by Sigarius. (Hist. de Episc. Bath. et Well. Wharton, v.) Wharton regards this as entirely fabulous. The period of this Daniel was that of the real Daniel bishop of Winchester, whose name appears to have got mixed up with the Glastonbury traditions. More on this subject may be seen in Ussher, Brit. Ecol. Antiq., Works, v. 87, ed. 1847; Cressy, Church Hist. of Brit. iv. 11; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 150. For the Congressbury bishopric see CUNGAR. [C. H.]

DANIEL (18) Bishop of Salach, in Mesopotamia; placed in the 8th century. His Commentary on the Psalms is mentioned. (Biblioth. Oriental., Assemani, tom. i. Rome, 1719-28, fol.; Ceillier, xii. 102.) [W. M. S.]

(19) or DANIEL, succeeded Aribertus as 15th archbishop of Narbonne. He was one of twelve Gallic bishops present at the Roman council held in the Lateran basilica under pope Stephen IV., A.D. 769, concerning the election of the pope and the cultus of sacred images (Labbe, Concil. vi. 1721). In the 14th year of Charles the Great he is mentioned in a decree of the Missi Dominici as successful in a dispute with Milo count of Narbonne (Gall. Christ. vi. 15). The principal event recorded of his episcopate was his holding a synod in the basilica of SS. Justus and Pastor at Narbonne on June 27, 788 (Baluze, Petrus de Marca), or 791 (Gall. Christ.), attended by the bishops of the provinces of Narbonne and Tarragona, which were then united, and by those of the neighbouring provinces of Arles, Vienne, Aix, Eause. Three subjects were discussed. (1.) The heresy taught by Felix, bishop of Urgel, concerning the adoption of the Son of God, and this was in all probability condemned, though there is no distinct information on that point. (2.) The state of the church of Ausona (Vich), the capital of the province of Tarragona, which had formerly lost its episcopal see through the invasion of the Moors and been ecclesiastically annexed to Narbonne. It was decided that it should remain in this subjection until the pagans were expelled, after which it should have a bishop of its own. (3.) A dispute with Winedurus, bishop of Elne, as to jurisdiction over the Pagus Redensis, in the Pyrenees, and this was decided in Daniel's favour (Gall. Christ. u. s.; Petrus de Marca, de Concord. Sacerd. et Imper. lib. vi. c. 25, add. by Baluze, in Pet. de Marca, Marca Hispanica, lib. iv. p. 345). Archbishop Daniel was succeeded by Nebridus, but the exact period of his death is unknown. [C. H.]

DANIEL (Bede, H. E. Praef. iv. 16; v. 18, 23; Flor. Wig. Chron. App. M. H. B. 619), bishop of Winchester. [DANIEL (16).] [C. H.]

DAPHNUS, second bishop of Vaison, lived in the time of Constantine the Great, circ. 314. He came to the Council of Arles with Victor, an exorcist, at the order of the emperor. (Gall. Christ. i. 921.) [D. R. J.]

DARBELIN, virgin, commemorated Oct. 26. This saint is given as one of the four virgin-daughters of Mac Iaar, living at Cill-na-ninghen, now Killininy, near Tallaght, co. Dublin; they were Darinnill, Darbelin, Cael, and Coimgeall (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 285). [J. G.]

DARBILE (DERBHILEDH), Aug. 3 and Oct. 26. There seems little doubt but Darbile, of Achadh-chuilinn (Oct. 26), of the race of Fiachra, son of Eochaidh, is the same as Derbhiledh (Aug. 3), of the race of Fiachra, son of Eochaidh Muighmedhoín (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 211, 285). She was daughter of Cormac, son of Brechius, and numbered among the saints of the family of St. Colman, and house of the Hy-Fiachrach; she was specially venerated among the descendants of Amhalghaidh, son of Fiachra, who accepted her as their patron in place of St. Corlmac (Mar. 25) (Colgan, Acta SS. 248, c. 2, 753, c. 13, 756 n. 31). She is also known as Darbile and Derivla of Irras, and though she is named among the saints at some wonderful but most improbable meeting at Ballysadare, held to welcome St. Columba's return to Ireland at the time of the Convention at Drumceatt, in A.D. 590, as related in the Life of St. Farnan, yet that she lived in the 6th century there can be little question, and probably she flourished in the middle of it. The church, where she lived, died, and was buried, "is situated in the wild and hitherto little explored district within the Mullet, in the barony of Erris and co. Mayo," and is described by Mr. Petrie (Rond Towers of Ireland, 320-2; Colgan, Acta SS. 387, c. 7, 340 n. 48, and Tr. Thaum. 463, c. 55). [J. G.]

DARDANUS, CLAUDIANUS POSTUMUS, described as of illustrious birth and patrician rank, prefect of Gaul, in the years A.D. 409 and 413, to whom a law is addressed A.D. 413. It is probably to the same Dardanus that Jerome addressed a letter in A.D. 414. He calls him the most noble of Christians, and the most Christian of nobles, and says he had been twice prefect. Dardanus had written to ask what land it was that was so often promised to Israel; for he thought it could not be Palestine. Jerome follows his idea, and cites many passages from both Testaments which give a spiritual turn to the phrase. Amongst other books, he quotes the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Apocalypse; saying that the former was received as the work of St. Paul by all the Eastern churches and all the ancient Greek authors; the latter, although not generally accepted by the Greeks, was received by the Latins, because they found it quoted by the ancients. Another letter to Dardanus occurs in the two commentaries on the Psalms, which are falsely attributed to Jerome.

In A.D. 417, Augustine of Hippo wrote a letter to Dardanus, who is thought to be the same as the correspondent of Jerome. Dardanus had asked three questions:—(1) The meaning of the words, "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." (2) The import of Luke i. 44. (3) Whether the baptism of encestes would operate on unborn children. The answer of Augustine is seen in book ii. Retract. cap. xlix. Augustine answers that Christ, as God, was everywhere, wherever his human soul was after death. He affirms strongly the localisation of His ascended body in the heavens. He points out that no general inferences can be drawn from the single miraculous occurrence in the case of Elizabeth, and that the baptism of mothers does not include their infants, for birth must precede new birth.

Although so high a character is given to Dardanus by Jerome, Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. lib. v. 9, Patrol. Lat. viii. 540) in writing to his friend Aquilinus, says that their grandfathers had all kinds of charges to lay against him.

It was by the zeal of Dardanus chiefly that the tyrant Jovinus was overthrown, king Atolf being induced to withdraw from his alliance. This is related by Tiro Prosper in his Chronicon, and by Olympiodorus.

The law addressed to Dardanus is the 117th of Honorius in the Theodosian Codex.

There is also an old inscription on a rock near Sistaricum in the province Narbonensis Secunda; which gives the name of his wife Nevla Galla, and his brother Lepidus; and ascribing patrician and other dignities to Dardanus (Patrol. Lat. lviii. p. 540). (Jerome, Epp. § 966, Patrol. Lat. p. 1099; S. Aug. Episc. Epistol. clxxxvii.; Patrol. Lat. xxxiii. 832; Ceillier, vii. 560, 565; ix. 158, 159.) [W. M. S.]

DARERCA, widow, sister of St. Patrick, commemorated Mar. 22. At the outset we must distinguish between this Darerca, and another of the same name, who was otherwise called Modwenna or Monenna, and was abbess of Kill-Sleibhe, but whom Ussher (Eccl. Ant. c. xvii. wks. vi. 382), and partly Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 3, § 18, c. 8, § 9) confound with the sister of St. Patrick [MODWENNA]; she is also to be distinguished from Derbhraich or Darerca, of Druim Dubhain [DERBHRAICH]. Colgan (Acta SS. 716-9) gives a detailed account of Darerca Vidua, sister of St. Patrick, from many different sources. Her father was Calphurnius, a British nobleman, and her mother, Conchessa, sister, or more probably niece of St. Martin of Tours. Her brothers were St. Patrick "Occidentalis Europae sydus praefulgidum gentisque nostrae Apostolus," and Sannanus, father of St. Patrick the younger. She had two sisters, or perhaps four, namely, Lupita and Tigrida, and perhaps Liemania and Richella, or Richenna: of these Lupita and Richella were virgins, but the other two, with Darerca, were married, and had a great number of children, who were bishops and abbats. The number and names of these Colgan (both as above and in ib. 258-64, and also Tr. Thaum. 224-231, c. 4) fully discusses, and to Darerca is given a family of seventeen sons, who were bishops, and two daughters, virgins. These she bore to two husbands, Conis and Restitutus (called also Huabardus or the Lombard), the three most notable of her sons being St. Mel, St. Mioch or Rioch, and St. Munis, all sons of Conis. In her old age she devoted herself to God, and took charge of the altar vestings, along with her sisters Lupita and Tigrida. Ussher gives full particulars regarding her dates and visit to Armorica with her sisters and family. But later writers, and especially Lanigan, have thrown discredit upon the whole story, and regard it as a fabrication, or at least an attempt to construct a Patrician history out of materials which have no connexion with St. Patrick; thus Lanigan mentions Darerca or Moninna, of Kill-Sleibhe, as probably being the original of Darerca the sister of St. Patrick, and other characters may have been similarly employed. (See also Dr. Todd, St. Patrick, 354, 360-1, but in his Book of Hymns, 108, 116 n.,

Dr. Todd seems to regard Darerca as really the sister of St. Patrick, and the story of the husbands and numerous family as a later invention; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. xvii. wks. vi. 372 sq. and Ind. Chron.; Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 766. [J. G.]

DARIA, Irish saint. See DAIRE.

DARIA, wife of Nicander, martyr in Moesia, under Maximus, in the persecution of Galerius. She bravely encouraged her husband to martyrdom; and when the judge sneeringly said that she only wanted another husband, she offered to die first. She was sent to prison, but was released before her husband's death, and was present. (Ruinart, Act. Sinc. Mart. p. 551; Ceillier, iii. 90.) [W. M. S.]

DARINNILL, daughter of Mac Iaar. Virgin of Cill-na-nighen, Oct. 26. [DARBELIN.] [J. G.]

DARIUS, a count sent to restore peace in Africa, and as the Benedictine editors (Augustin. ii. 47, Migne) give reasons for believing, in A.D. 429. Augustine heard his praises from Urbanus and Novatus, and wrote to welcome him, and also greet his son Verimodus. Darius wrote back, almost worshipping Augustine, and hoping that he might live long to pray for him: Augustine answers, not attempting to conceal the pleasure Darius's letter had given him, and quoting a line from Ennius:

"Omnes mortales sese laudari exoptant."

Yet when good men are praised he says it does good not to those who get, but to those who give the praise. He sends Darius his Confessions, and begs his prayers. He also sends him his books On Faith of things unseen, On Patience, On Continency, On Providence, On Faith, Hope, and Charity. (Aug. Ep. 229-231.) [E. B. B.]

DARLUGDACHA (DARDULACHA, DERLUGHACH, DERLUGDACHA), abbess of Kildare, Feb. 1. This saint has a Scotch and Irish, and also perhaps a Continental, connexion. Colgan (Acta SS. 229-30) gives a memoir of her, taken mostly from St. Ultan's Life of St. Brigida; the Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. 1, tom. i. 186-7) chiefly follow Dempster in giving her acts. Under the name of Dardulacha, she is noticed by Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. lib. iv. vol. i. 214, Feb. 1) and by Camerarius (De Scot. Fort. 200, Dec. 1), but with no allusion to Kildare, or to any place but Frisengen, so that it seems doubtful whether they had the abbess of Kildare at all before their minds, though the names are similar, and Dempster places his saint on February 1, the feast of St. Darlugdacha. Of her birth and parentage we know nothing, except that she was not the sister of the martyrs Gunifort and Gunibald, as Dempster is usually interpreted as stating. She succeeded her mistress St. Brigida (February 1) in the abbacy of Kildare, and after a year in that office departed to the Lord, probably in the year 524. In the Pictish Chronicle, Irish Nennius, and like authorities, it is said that in the third year of Nectan Morbet, son of Erip, king of the Picts, she came to Britain as an exile from Ireland for Christ, and in the following year king Nectan presented Abernethy to God and to St. Brigida, Darlugdacha singing alleluia over the offering. But as to this legend we may safely follow Dr. Todd in saying that it is "false and out of chronology." (Challoner, Brit. Sanct. pt. i. 95; Skene, *Chron. DASHAD (or DADJAD), of the race of the Kenthunians, lieutenant of Vartan, slain in battle for the faith in Armenia, Whitsunday, June 2, A.D. 451. DASIUS (1), according to the Menology, was a soldier at Dorostolus, where it was the custom to offer a human sacrifice to Saturn on Nov. 20, a month before the Saturnalia, and he, being selected for the purpose, preferred to die a Christian, which meant dying by torture. The event is referred to the time of Diocletian and Maximian.

DATIUS, bishop of Milan, c. A.D. 527. Encouraged by the successes of Belisarius in southern Italy, he took a leading part in bringing about the revolt of Liguria from Vitiges the Gothic king of Italy, and thus, in the words of Gibbon (c. xii.), "seduced his countrymen to rebellion and ruin." Accompanied by the chief citizens of Milan he went on an embassy to Belisarius at Rome, A.D. 538, and obtained from him a thousand Thracian and Isaurian troops, with whose help he felt confident he could hold the province for the emperor (Procop. de Bell. Goth. lib. ii. c. 7). About the same time Cassiodorus addressed a letter to him, still extant, relating to the distribution of corn to the people during the severe famine then prevailing (Cassiodorus Variar. lib. xii. Epist. 27). The next year, A.D. 539, saw the fallaciousness of Datus' overweening confidence. Milan was taken and sacked by the Goths, and Datus fled to Constantinople. On his way thither he proved his power as an exorcist during a sojourn at Corinth, by driving from a haunted house, which afforded convenient quarters for his numerous retinue, the demons which had rendered it untenable (Gregor. Magn. Dial. lib. iii. c. 4). When Justinian published his edict condemnatory of the three articles, A.D. 546, Datus refused to sign it, and in A.D. 547, on Vigilus being compelled by the emperor to leave Rome and repair to Constantinople, he sailed to Sicily to meet him and fortify him in his opposition to the edict, and returned with him to Constantinople, where he supported him vigorously in his controversy with Justinian, joined in the condemnation of Theodorus of Caesarea (Labbe, v. 335), and with Vigilus took refuge in the church of St. Peter, Aug. A.D. 551, from which the imperial troops vainly endeavoured to drag the pope by force; and was again his companion when, in the month of December, he a second time sought sanctuary in the church of St. Euphemia at Chaleodon. Vigilus, afraid to leave his asylum, appointed Dativus, with others, his representative in the approaching discussions. (Vigil. Epist. xv.; Labbe, v. 328. 59.) Dativus's death is placed in A.D. 555. The Chronicon Mediolanense, preserved at Milan, bearing Dativus's name, has been proved by Mabillon (Analect. Vet. i. 3) to be wrongly ascribed to him (Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 511; Dupin, H. E. vol. v. p. 30; Baronius, Annal. sub ann. 538, 539, 540, 547; Procop. de Bell. Gall.). [E. V.]

DATIVUS (1) bishop of Badae, in Numidia, a frontier post toward the Gaetuli. There was a prepositus limitis Badensis. Sentt. Episc. 15 Syn. Carth. Cyp. vii.; Ep. 76, one of the eight with NEMESIAN; one of the four joint authors of Ep. 77. [E. W. B.]

(2) Seventh bishop of Limoges, in the latter part of the 3rd century. He succeeded Adelphius in the bishopric. After nineteen years however he was deposed in the time of the persecution by Diocletian; but whether by the ministers of the emperor, on account of his defence of the faith, or by the bishops, on account of some lapse, is not known. He was replaced by a second Adelphius, who is thought to have been a grandson of the former, and was the first to see peace restored to the church under the emperor Constantine. (Gall. Christ. ii. 501.) [D. R. J.]

(3) Celebrated senator, martyred under Diocletian in A.D. 304, on Feb. 11. In spite of orders to the contrary, a company of the faithful met in the town of Abitina, in the proconsulate of Africa, to celebrate Christian worship and communion, at the house of one Felix Octavius. Forty-nine men and women were surprised by the official and magistrates of the town. They marched cheerfully to their destination, chanting hymns and anticles, having at their head Dativus the senator and Saturninus the presbyter, accompanied by his children. They confessed Jesus Christ, were chained, and sent to Carthage.

The proconsul Anulinus examined them; and when Dativus refused to say who was the chief of their company, he was tortured. As he lay under the iron, at a second examination, Dativus was accused by Fortunatianus, advocate, brother of the martyr Victoria, one of the arrested, of enticing her and other young girls to Abitina. Victoria, however, indignantly denied that she had gone there but of her own accord. The executioners continued tormenting Dativus, till the interior of his breast could be seen. He went on praying and begging Jesus Christ for patience. The proconsul, stopping the torture, asked him again if he had been present? "I was in the assembly," he answered, "and celebrated the Lord's Supper with the brethren." They again thrust the irons into his side; and Dativus, repeating his prayer, continued to say, "O Christ, I pray thee let me not be confounded." And he added, "What have I done? Saturninus is our presbyter."

The attention of the proconsul was now turned to Saturninus and others; Dativus was taken from the rack, and again carried to gaol. Here he soon afterwards died. The others of the company were treated in much the same manner, and most of them were starved to death in prison. (Ruinart, Act. Sinc. Mart. p. 382; Ceillier, iii. 20, etc.; AA. SS. Holland. Febr., ii. p. 513, ex MS. Treverensi S. Maximini et Surio.)

DAUSAS, martyr in Persia, A.D. 361, was among the captives carried away by Sapor when he took Bezabde or Phoenicia (Fynyk), the capital of Zabdiene, in A.D. 360. Heliodorus, the bishop, fell ill on the journey into Persia, laid his hands on the head of Dausas, made over to him the portable altar, and gave him charge of all those who had escaped the rack. Ordination by a single bishop was in this case of necessity considered sufficient. Day by day the captives celebrated the holy eucharist. The magi were angry, and reported to the king these promiscuous meetings of both sexes as occasions for cursing his majesty. Sapor, who was at Dursae in Daren, gave orders that Dausas and all who assembled with him should be carried to one place and there questioned. He gave Adarphares 100 horse and 200 foot soldiers for the purpose. When Dausas, with Mariabus, the coadjutor bishop, and priests, deacons, and laity, men and women to the number of 300, were met for a sermon, they were informed that it was the king's pleasure that they should go to the city of Saphet under Mount Nasebden, in the province Daven. They obeyed, but at the city gates Adarphares bade them halt, and gave notice that the king had heard how they had cursed him, and now they must embrace fire-worship or die.

"Cruel nation," cried Dausas, "the blood of the Christians of the East is still trickling from your fingers, and you will see the blood of Western Christians shed." Then turning to his flock, "Courage!" he said, "think that we shall be delivered from the yoke of bondage and restored to our country." The captives were then slain by fifties, to the number of 265. Twenty-five remained who apostatised. What had become of the other ten we are not told. A deacon, Ebed-Jesu, who had been left for dead, recovered, and was attended by a man in the neighbourhood, and together they buried Dausas, Mariabus, and some of the priests in a cave at the foot of the mountain, and shut the mouth of it with stones. DAVANAN. In the parish of Rothesy, in Bute, there are the ruins or vestiges of twelve little chapels, and among them is Kildavanan, which gave its name to a lordship, but whether there was a saint called Davanan, or whether Kildavanan meant simply the "church of the two little monks," is not known (Orig. Par. ii. 223-4, 229; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 322). [J. G.]

DAVID (1) (in one MS. written Dadub), one of the four luminaries in the Barbeliot system (Irenaeus, i. 29). It is apparently the same name as the DADES of Epiphanius (Hier. 26, p. 90): just as in the same lists we may probably identify the Eleleth of Irenaeus with the Elilaeus of Epiphanius. [G. S.]

DAVID (2) Bishop of the 5th century. About A.D. 440, he carried a letter from pope Leo the Great to the bishops of Mauritania, and is praised by the pope. (Patrol. Lat. liv. 653, Leon. Mag. Epist. num. 12, § 666; Ceillier, x. 199.)

[W. M. S.]

(3) Deacon, treasurer of the church of Edessa, in the 5th century, one of the witnesses produced by Samuel, one of the four presbyters of that church, who had belonged to the party of Rabulas, their late bishop, and accused his successor Ibas before Photius of Tyre, etc. The judges rejected the testimony of David. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 653; Ceillier, x. 653.) [W. M. S.]

(4) Is a common form of the Irish Dabi, Mobi, &c. [DABIUS]. The most famous of the name was David, son of Guaire Ua Forannain, who succeeded St. Dubhthach in the episcopate at Armagh, in A.D. 548. He seems to have been of the family of the Hy-Fiachrach, and to have ruled only a short time at Armagh, as the Four Masters enter his death at A.D. 550, where also they call him "Legate of all Ireland." (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 188 n. e; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 269, 293; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 13; Ware, Ir. Bishops, by Harris, 38.)

(5) ST. (DE)GUL, (DE)WI, the most eminent of all the Welsh saints, called in his native tongue Dewi.

His Period.—The Annales Cambriae, our earliest authority for his existence, place his death in A.D. 601; and one reading, which the Monumenta only gives in brackets, under the year 458, has this entry: "St. Dewi nascitur anno tricesimo post discessum Patricii de Menevia" (M. H. B. 830, 831). Geoffrey of Monmouth places his death in A.D. 542, and William of Malmesbury in A.D. 546. Ussher has taken great pains to prove that he died A.D. 544, at the age of 82 (Brit. Ecol. Ant. Works, 1347; vi. 43, 44, Chron. Index, ad ann. 544); but Rice Rees, who has followed him in his computations, believes it is necessary to place his birth 20 years later, and fixes A.D. 566 as the last date possible for his death. Messrs. Jones and Freeman, in their History of St. David's, incline feebly to the A.D. 601 of the Ann. Camb., and this also is the date adopted by Haddan and Stubbs (Councils, i. 121, 143, 148), who remark that David would thus come into view just as the history of Wales emerges from the darkness that conceals it for a century after the departure of the Romans. His Life, if it could be depended upon, would illustrate an extremely interesting period, when the native Christianity of this country, after outliving the Roman occupation, was struggling single-handed with a fiercer paganism, and just a generation before it had to encounter a reappearance of Rome and a new spiritual conquest.

His Biographers.—The earliest known Life of this saint was written some five centuries after his period by bishop Rythmark, Rithmarch, Ryddmarch, or Ricemarchus, the last but one of the British occupants of the see of St. David's at the close of the 11th century, who wrote only a few years before the bishops of St. David's became subject to Canterbury, and when it was their interest to make out the ancient independence of the Cambrian church. His work, which is printed in Wharton's Anglia Sacra, vol. ii., is the source of all the existing Lives; it professes to be drawn from documents extant at St. David's in the writer's time; the style is rugged and unclassical, but the author shews himself, as Jones and Freeman remark, well acquainted with the localities. He was followed, at the distance of another century, by Giraldus Cambrensis, bishop of St. David's from A.D. 1199 to 1203, who professed chiefly to present Ryddmarch in a more scholarly dress. His work will be found in the same volume of the Anglia Sacra, and in vol. iii. of Mr. Brewer's recent edition of Giraldus. Abridged from these are the lives by John of Tinemouth and Capgrave, and those inserted in the Acta Sanctorum of Colgan and the Bollandists, and none of these vary much from each other. The latest is one edited in 1853 from a Cotton MS. in Welsh and Latin (Cambro-British Saints, edited for the Welsh MSS. Society by W. J. Rees, p. 102). A résumé of authorities is given by Jones and Freeman (Hist. of St. David's, 240), and a full and careful list of all known materials, manuscript and printed, is to be seen in Hardy (Descr. Catal. i. 766).

The story of his life.—The asserted facts of St. David's life, or rather such of them as are not legendary on the very face, meet with various degrees of credence from authors of repute. Rees, in his Essay on Welsh Saints, while rejecting several circumstances as manifestly fabulous or incredible, such as his going to Jerusalem to be consecrated, is disposed to accept enough to make out a biographical narrative. We shall in the first place give an abbreviated sketch of this ground, selecting for the most part those incidents to which an historical interest would attach.

His father was Sandde ab Ceredig ab Cunedda, in mediæval Latin Xantus or Sanctus, prince of Keretica, a province answering to modern Cardiganshire. His mother was Non, Nonna, or Nonnita (a name still preserved in "Nun's Well" and a ruined chapel existing on the shore of Bride's Bay), daughter of Gynyr or Caergawch. His birthplace was near Hen-Meneu or Hen-Mynyw, latinè Vetus Menevia, and he was baptized at Porth Clais in that neighbourhood (a narrow creek running inland for about a quarter of a mile) by Elvi, Aelvius, or Albeus, bishop of Munster, "who by divine providence had arrived at that time from Ireland." He is said to have been educated first under St. Illutus in his college at Caerworgorn (afterwards called from him Llanillyt Fawr, or Lanwit Major, five miles from Cowbridge), and subsequently in the college of Paulinus (a pupil of Germanus and one of the great teachers of the age), at Ty-gwyn ar Daf (Rees, Welsh Saints, 178), or at Whitland in Carmarthenshire (Jones and Freeman); and here he spent ten years in the study of holy scripture. In course of time David became head of a society of his own, founding or else restoring a monastery or college at a spot which Giraldus calls Vallis Rosina (derived as is generally supposed from a confusion between Rhos, a swamp, and Rhosyn, a rose), near Hen-Meneu, and this institution was subsequently named, out of respect to his memory, Ty Dewi, House of David, or St. David's. In those days, remarks Rees, abbots of monasteries were looked upon in their own neighbourhoods as bishops, and were styled such, while it is probable that they also exercised chorepiscopal rights in their societies (Welsh Saints, 182, 266; cf. Haddan and Stubbs, i. 142, 143). Such an episcopal or chorepiscopal dignity David enjoyed before his elevation to the archbishopric of the Cambrian church. It was the Pelagian controversy that occasioned his advancement to this summit. To pronounce upon the great heresy that was then troubling the church, archbishop Dubricius convened a synod at Brefi, and David, whose theological reputation was too great for him to be spared, had to be dragged to it from his beloved retirement. The eloquence and force with which he put the troublers to confusion made such an impression, that the synod at once elected him archbishop of Caerleon and primate of the Cambrian church, Dubricius himself resigning in his favour. The locality of this synod, which holds a marked place in Welsh ecclesiastical traditions, was on the banks of the Brefi, a tributary of the Teifi; Llanddewi Brefi it was afterwards called, from the dedication of its church to St. David. It is eight miles from Lampeter in the county of Cardigan, and from recent archaeological discoveries it has been identified with an important Roman station, the Loventium of the Itineraries (Lewis, Top. Dict. of Wales; cf. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 117). The Pelagian heresy, however, still survived, and the new archbishop convened another synod, the issue of which was so decided as to distinguish it by the name of the Synod of Victory. It is entered in the Annales Cambriae, "Synodus Victoriae apud Britones congregatur," under the year A.D. 569, but not with full confidence (M. H. B. 831). It is also mentioned, but without a date, in the Annales Menevenses (Wharton, Angl. Sac. ii. 648). After residing for a while at Caerleon on Usk, where the seat of the primate was then established, David, by permission of king Arthur, removed to Menevia. The transference of the head-quarters of the Cambrian church from the famed Roman fortress that commanded the entrance into Wales, the Urbis Legionum, to that obscure, remote, and extremely desolate region, has of course excited great curiosity as to what the reason could have been. Rees conjectures a desire to dignify a spot endeared to him by early associations. This would not be worthy of an archbishop. The "frequency of people at Carlegion," to which Godwin attributes it, was not worthy of a church. The "remote and solitary situation fitted for heavenly contemplation" (Jones and Freeman, 237) would be worthy of him had he been little else than an ascetic. Could there have been any better reason? We know that Menevia, the Menapia of the Itineraries, was one of the ports from which ships passed over into Ireland (Wright, Celt. Romani, and Saxon, 138). The Roman road Via Julia conducted to it; the voyage across was five and forty miles; the Menapii, one of the tribes which held the eastern coast of Ireland, were no doubt a colony from the opposite shore of Britain (ibid. 43); David's baptism by the bishop of Munster indicates a religious connexion between Menevia and Ireland. The tradition of a mission of the British church to Ireland to restore the faith there, under the auspices of David, Gildas, and Cadoc (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 115) points the same way. Why may we not, therefore, account for the removal of the see by assuming that the tide of the Saxon conquest drove the British church to cultivate closer relations with their Celtic brethren opposite?

As primate, David distinguished himself by saintly character and apostolic zeal, a glowing, not to say an overcharged, description of which is given in Giraldus. It is generally agreed that Wales was divided into dioceses in his time. Rees, in his learned Essay on the obscure but interesting subjects of the Welsh saints, has carefully studied the dedications and localities of the churches of the principality, and among them are found a large number terminating in David's native name, ddewi, or otherwise connected with his memory (see the list in Welsh Saints, p. 52). These instances, moreover, are found to prevail in a well-defined district; and Rees has ingeniously used these circumstances for the purpose of ascertaining the limits of the diocese in which archbishop David exercised immediate jurisdiction. The result may be seen at pp. 197-199 of the Essay. His successor in the see was Cynog.

Such is the story of St. David, omitting glaring and obvious legends. Jones and Freeman have carefully examined it (St. David's, 246 sq.), and their conclusion as to what are the historical facts which we may safely accept is this: that St. David established a see and monastery at Menevia early in the 7th century, the site being chosen for the sake of retirement; that his diocese was co-extensive with the Demetae; that he had no archiepiscopal jurisdiction; that a synod was held at Brefi, in which he probably played a conspicuous part, but that the objects of it are unknown; and finally that of his immediate successors nothing is recorded (ibid. 257). These writers leave on their reader's mind a vivid impression of the "strange and desolate scenery" of the spot now named after St. David, and give some curious antiquarian details of it. The story has had to be sifted by Messrs. Haddan and Stubbs likewise, for the chapter of their Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, which is headed 'British Church during the Period of the Saxon Conquest.' But the nature of their important work did not allow of any connected narrative or discussion, and their views are given in various notes and observations (i. 115-120). It will suffice here to observe that as to the synod of Brefi and the synod of Victory, though the fact of their having been held is not questioned, the dates given to them respectively, a little before A.D. 569 and in A.D. 569, are later than Rees's latest possible date for David's death; while the accounts given of the synods by Rice-marchus, and Giraldus after him, are regarded as purely fabulous, and directed to the establishment of the apocryphal supremacy of St. David and his see over the entire British church. There is besides more than a doubt cast upon the statement that the purpose of those assemblies was to crush Pelagianism. Valuable documentary information and references as to the whole subject of the early Welsh episcopate are given in Appendix C of the chapter we are speaking of, and the point is maintained that "there is no real evidence of the existence of any archiepiscopate at all in Wales during the Welsh period, if the term is held to imply jurisdiction admitted or even claimed (until the 12th century) by one see over another."

David was canonised by pope Calixtus about A.D. 1120; he was commemorated on March 1 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 201). [C. H.]

DAVID (6) sixth bishop of Spire and first abbat of Weissenberg, is described by Bruscius as a pious, wise, and most honourable man. He is said to have ruled his diocese eight years, about the middle of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. t. v. p. 716.) [D. R. J.]

(7) ST., 41st bishop of Bourges, lived in the end of the 8th century and died A.D. 802. He is said to have been buried in the monastery of St. Laurentius (Gall. Christ. ii. p. 20). [D. R. J.]

(8) 5th abbat of the monastery of St. Martin, Savigny, near Lyons, lived in the reign of Charles the Bald (Gall. Christ. iv. p. 260). [D. R. J.]

DAZINAS, or DAZIZAS. Of the 4th century, addressed by Eustathius, A.D. 373, in a letter in which he accused St. Basil of bad faith, and of Apollinarian errors. (Basil Gall. Epist. xxxi. § 223, cxliv. § 379, Patrol. Graec. xxxiii. pp. 566, 917; Ceillier, iv. 361, 453.) [W. M. S.]

DEAL-UN, or DALHUNUS, an Englishman of the 8th century, addressed by Lullus, afterwards archbishop of Mayence, as his master. Sending him some little presents, he asks him to forward to him some works of bishop Aldhelm, either prose, verse, or rhyme. Lullus was then a deacon, in Germany. (Patrol. Lat. xcvi. 819, etc.; Ceillier, xii. 131.) [W. M. S.]

DEATH AND THE DEAD. I. Plato most, and Aristotle to some extent, influenced the teaching of the Fathers of the Church on death: the former by his interpretations of the beautiful myths relating to the unseen world and a future judgment before Radamanthus, Æacus, and Minos, at which every body was to appear naked and unclothed: which he said meant that death was no more than a separation of the soul from the body (Gorg. c. 80, and Phaed. c. 15); and the latter by proving metaphysically that the soul is in part separable from the body—the eternal from the corruptible. But besides its intrinsic recommendations, Christians saw this view authoritatively confirmed by the account given of the death of Christ in each of the Gospels: "He yielded up His spirit," as in St. Matthew; "expired," as in SS. Mark and Luke; the latter having interpreted it by anticipation in recording His last words: "Father, into Thy hands I will deposit my spirit;" and "gave up His spirit," as in St. John. This, again, was in harmony with the account given of the raising of the daughter of Jairus by St. Luke (viii. 55), "Her spirit came back:" and illustrated remarkably those remarkable words in Genesis (ii. 7) recording the creation of the first man, "Quum in primordio duo diversa atque divisa, limus et flatus, unum hominem coegissent:" as Tertullian says (De Anim. c. 27); and on which he founds his declaration further on: "Opus mortis discretio corporis animaeque" (ib. c. 51). So far therefore they were agreed; but on what ensued they hesitated, till at length with characteristic idiosyncrasy the Eastern and Western Fathers committed themselves to the two separate lines of thought that lay open before them—having been already traced in separate schools—one by the writers of the O. T., where the death of the righteous and wicked, of Ahab (2 Kings xxii. 40) as well as David (1 Kings ii. 10), is described as sleep; the other in myths accepted by poets and philosophers, where the intermediate state is shadowed forth as so much time spent in conscious action or suffering by the disembodied soul, previously to its final destination. Accordingly St. Chrysostom is full of the first idea: "For this cause, too, the place itself is called a cemetery; that you may know that the dead laid there are not dead, but at rest and asleep. For before the coming of Christ death used to be called death . . . and not only so but Hades . . . but after his coming and dying for the life of the world, death came to be called death no longer, but sleep and repose" (Hom. de Coem. et Cruc. op. tom. ii. 398, ed Ben.). Elsewhere he speaks of it as a state of ease and of deliverance from the cares of this life, entitling all who departed thither in friendship with God to the congratulations of those who survived them (Hom. in 1 Thess. iv. 13; ib. i. 765). The one formidable circumstance that he connects with it—namely, that there is no place for repentance after death—he dwells upon exclusively to convert the living (Ep. ad Theod. i. 8; ib. i. 11). True, the church had always prayed for the dead: but that custom had come from the Jews; and was easily explained, on the supposition of a judgment to come, to have been prompted by considerations of it alone. The treatises of St. Augustine—De curâ pro mortuis gerendâ; his Enchiridion and City of God particularly—set Western minds speculating upon infinite points in the opposite direction; namely, what good the living might still be able to do for the dead, or the dead for the living. What special grounds, it was asked, had the church for commemorating saints and martyrs in her public services, besides praying for the dead? and what was it that had been meant by St. Paul in his 1st Epistle to the Corinthians (ii. 16) when he contemplated "a man's work being burned, but himself saved, yet so as by fire"? To the last query the bishop of Hippo replied in his last-named work (xxi. 26, § 4): "Post istius sane corporis mortem, donec ad illam veniatur, qui post resurrectionem corporum futurus est damnationis et remunerationis ultimus dies, si hoc temporis intervallo spiritus defunctorum ejusmodi ignem dicuntur perpeti, quem non sentiant illi qui non habuerunt tales mores et amores in hujus corporis vitâ, ut eorum ligna, foenum, stipula consumatur: alii vero sentiant, qui ejusmodi secum aedificia portaverunt, sive ibi tantum, sive et hic et ibi, sive ideo hic ut non ibi, saecularia, quamvis a damnatione venialia, concremantem ignem transitoriae tribulationis inveniunt, non redarguo quia forsitan verum est." To the next, in his Enchiridion (c. 107): "Neque negandum est defunctorum animas pietate suorum viventium relevari, cum pro illis sacrificium Mediatoris offertur, vel elemosynae in ecclesiâ fiunt; sed iis prosunt, qui dum viverent, ut haec sibi postea possent prodesse, meruerunt." It was by this subtle distinction that he avoided contradicting St. Chrysostom, and indeed all previous teaching in the church that there was no place for repentance beyond the grave.

Such was the argumentative basis for what was afterwards developed into the mediæval doctrines of indulgences and purgatory, never realised practically by Easterns to this day. On the remaining point there has been more harmony between the East and West in practice from the 5th century downwards; but in the East it wears still the language of poetry; in the West the hints suggested by St. Augustine in his first-named treatise have long since been reasoned out with dogmatic precision. "Quoniam ista quaestio vires intelligentiae meae vincit, quemadmodum opitulatur martyres iis, quos per eos certum est adjuvari—utrum ipsi per se ipsos adsint uno tempore tam diversis locis, et tantâ inter se longinquitate discretos: sive ubi sunt eorum memoriae, sive praeter suas memorias ubicunque adesse sentiuntur: an ipsius loco suis meritis congruo, omni mortalium conversatione remotis, et tamen generaliter orantibus pro indigentibus supplicantur (sicut nos oramus pro mortuis, quibus utique non praesentatur, nec ubi sint, nec quid agant scimus), Deus omnipotens qui est ubique praesens, nec concretus nobis, nec remotus a nobis, exaudiens martyrum preces, per angelica ministeria usquequaque diffusa, praebeat hominibus ista solatia, quibus in hujus vitae miseriâ judicari esse praebenda, et suorum merita martyrum ubi vult, quando vult, quomodo vult, maximeque per eorum memorias, quoniam hoc novit expedire nobis ad aedificandam fidem Christi pro cujus confessione sunt passi, mirabili atque ineffabili potestate ac bonitate commendat" (c. 16). Invocation of saints spread rapidly from the date of this treatise; but practically the Gentile world had been long since prepared for it by the hero-worship in paganism which it displaced.*

The remaining aspect in which we find death viewed by the Fathers was strictly new; viz. as having been entailed by sin. This had been authoritatively laid down for them by St. Paul in his one Epistle to Westerns, i.e. the Romans; and it was a doctrine that was more explicitly brought out afterwards in the Western than in the Eastern Church. The denial of it by Pelagius and his followers elicited its argumentative statement from St. Augustine. In opposition to their assertion that the condition of the natural man had not been changed by sin, "the Catholic faith," said he, "maintained the first man to have been so made that he need not have died; so changed by sin that he could not but die:" a penalty from which nobody, not even those who had been born again in Christ and renewed by His Spirit, had been exempted, so far as this life was concerned; but to which, if faithful in this life, they could not ever be exposed again—(c. Julian. i. 96). "Posse non mori," described, in his way of putting it, the condition of Adam before sinning: "non posse non mori," the condition of all men in this life since then: "non posse mori," the condition of all who obtain salvation through Christ in the next world. (Comp. Alcuin, de Trin. iii. 18; and Lombard's Sentences, b. ii. dist. 19.) Death and life were consequently both from God; but death had been incurred by man as a punishment, whether he liked it or not: life was offered to him as a gift, which he might accept or not as he liked. When the Pelagians argued that eternal death alone was penal, St. Augustine rejoined by asking if the mere separation of the soul from the body be not penal also, why should nature manifest the repugnance to it that she does in all cases? (c. Jul. ii. 86). Who ever died by choice? Every body would rather not if he could.

Sin and death having been thus brought into juxtaposition as cause and effect, their respective natures were analysed anew with striking effect. Sin was the act of the soul, not of the body; and death the dissolution of the parts of the body, not of the soul. The soul was the culprit, and the body the sufferer. "Don't talk to me," says St. Cyril (Catech. iv.), "of the body being accessory to sin as a cause; for if sin be caused by the body, how is it that a corpse never sins?" Decay was not inherent in matter, but had been produced by the will. In reality, therefore, sin was and ought to be called death, and freedom from sin life. Those who continued in sin might be said to be dead while they lived; those who forsook sin to be risen from the one death truly so called. People were said to be dead in sin, and dead to sin; to be dying daily long after they had been baptized or born anew. St. Ambrose in one treatise (De Bono Mortis, c. 1) speaks of death as threefold: 1. the death of the soul by sin; 2. the death of the soul to sin; 3. the death of the body when we depart from this life. Elsewhere (De Fide Resur. ii. 36) he supplies a fourth kind: the death of the soul as well as the body which is in store for all those who depart from this life with sins unrepented. But this last is more commonly called the second death; the name supposed to be given to it in the Apocalypse (xx. 6), where it is described as powerless on those who "have part in the first resurrection," that is, in the resurrection from sin obtained through Christ in this life. Such, at least, is the interpretation of this passage by St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xx. 1-9); according to which view we have two deaths and two resurrections contradistinguished, temporal and eternal in each case. Still, whether "the first resurrection" described there applies, or at any rate should be limited, to what takes place in this life, has been warmly debated by Millenarians as well as Roman Catholics. (v. Art. CHILIASTS.)

To the objection of punishing sins committed in this life with what is called "second death" in the next—temporal acts with eternal sufferings—the Fathers replied, that transgressions against the Infinite required infinite satisfaction, such as Christ had made, or endless penalties where that was rejected. And undoubtedly death regarded from their—or, in other words, the Christian—point of view, as due to sin, has suggested immeasurably deeper views of moral responsibility than any known to the wisest previously, and has elevated human character in proportion: "Quotidie morior, Apostolus dicit," in the words of St. Ambrose, "melius utique quam illi qui meditationem mortis philosophiam esse dixerunt. Illi enim studium praedicarunt: hic usum ipsum mortis exercuit" (De Fide Resurrect. ii. 35).

There was another side to this aspect, transcendently more Christian still. "For Christ

* See the tract of Archbishop Ussher, on 'Prayers for the Dead,' in Tracts for the Times, No. 72.

also suffered once for sin: the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God," as St. Peter says (1 Pet. iii. 18). The sacrifice for sin was infinitely more potent for good, than sin for evil. It not only cancelled death, but guaranteed immortality. The spell of death was dissolved when it had been undergone by One who was sinless: thus substantiating conversely, that it had been caused by sin. Christ being truly and properly man, and intending to die for man, underwent the self-same death that all of us undergo. His sufferings were terminated by His soul quitting His body. But, again, Christ being God as well as man, and both indissolubly, though His soul and body were parted from each other, there never was any separation of either from His Godhead. His Godhead was never absent from His flesh in the tomb, nor from His soul in hell; but, on the contrary, reunited them as soon as ever the debt which He had come to discharge for others was fully paid. According to the Fathers, this was symbolised in the verse which says, "Canst thou draw out leviathan with a hook?" (Job xli. 1.) As Rufinus expresses it (In Symb. § 16-17): "Sicut ergo hamum escâ contactum si piscis rapiat, non modo escam ab hamo non removet, sed et ipse de profundo, esca aliis futurus educitur, ita et is qui habebat mortis imperium rapuit quidem in morte corpus Jesu, non sentiens in Eo hamum Divinitatis inclusum: sed ubi devoravit, hæsit ipse continuo, et diruptis inferni claustris, velut de profundo extractus, trahitur ut esca caeteris fiat . . . Non ergo damno aliquo aut injuriâ Divinitatis Christus in carne patitur: sed, ut per infirmitatem carnis operaretur salutem, Divina natura in mortem per carnem descendit: non ut lege mortalium detineretur a morte, sed, ut per Sese resurrectionis januas mortis aperiret: velut si quis rex pergat ad carcerem, et ingressus aperiat januas, resolvat catenas, vincula, seras, et claustra comminuat, et educat victos in remissionem, et eos qui sedent in tenebris et in umbrâ mortis luci ac vitæ restituat. Dicitur ergo rex fuisse quidem in carcere, non tamen eâ conditione quâ fuerant ceteri qui tenebantur in carcere: sed illi quidem ut poenas solverent, hic vero ut absolveret poenas." The fact is, that having done this in His own case, Christ procured for us all the means of repeating it in perpetuity for ourselves. By enabling us to become partakers of His divinity (1 Pet. i. 4), He more than restored to us the original righteousness which Adam had before he sinned, and by the new germ implanted in us at our baptism, unless lost subsequently by our misconduct, secured the raising in incorruption of our bodies as well as our souls, and their reunion in bliss for ever. (See Bp. Bull's State of Man before the Fall; and Lombard's Sentences, ii. 19.) [E. S. Ff.]

II. The condition of the dead in Christ, intermediately till their bodies are raised, must now be considered as a separate topic. If there is any one practice in the Christian Church, not specifically recognised in the New Testament, which can claim the sanction of primitive antiquity, it is that of praying for the souls of the faithful departed. It was, as has been said already, part of its inheritance from Judaism. The well-known passage in 2 Maccabees (xii. 41-45) shews that, both at Jerusalem and in Alexandria, among

Hebrews and Hellenists, it was thought possible "to make a reconciliation for the dead that they might be delivered from sin." Those whose death in battle was looked upon as a judgment for a secret sin, were yet not despaired of by their friends. Money was collected and a sin-offering was offered. The practice was clearly familiar and common. Prayers for the dead have entered into the ritual of every Jewish synagogue from the earliest times to which that ritual can be traced. The Talmud tradition that faithful Israelites should suffer in the fire of Gehenna for twelve months at the most for the sins of their lives, and that this time might be shortened by the intercession and offerings of their friends, may represent a later and corrupt development; but the use of the kaddisch, or special prayer for the dead, which was believed to have this power, and which was used on Sabbaths, New-moons, and Feast-days, goes back to the second or third century, if not earlier (Eisenmenger, Entdecktes Judenth. 6). Inscriptions in Jewish cemeteries at Rome (Garucci, Cimitero degli antichi Ebrei, pp. 34, 44; Nuove Epigrafi, p. 8), belonging to the same period, lead to the same conclusion. The silence of the New Testament in reference to the practice, even where the subject-matter of teaching or narrative would naturally have suggested it, is of course significant. It is neither condemned as among the corrupt traditions of the Pharisees, nor enforced upon the members of the new society. One passage only, the prayer that Onesiphorus may "find mercy in that day," while direct messages are sent not to him, but to his household (2 Tim. i. 16-18, iv. 19) has been considered as implying that the practice which must have been familiar to St. Paul in his life as a Pharisee, was not abandoned by him in his work as an Apostle. It must be admitted, however, that there is a like absence of any distinct trace of such prayers in the Apostolic Fathers. It may have been that the dominant belief in the immediate nearness of the Second Coming of the Judge threw into the background the thoughts and anxieties of men as to the intermediate state between death and judgment. When we pass the threshold of the second century, however, the evidence of their use multiplies on every side, and is of such a nature that it leads to the conclusion that they had from the first been the natural growth of Christian thought and feeling as to the state of the departed. The Liturgy in the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 41) includes a prayer for all souls that have pleased God from the foundation of the world. That of St. James asks God to remember all, named or unnamed by the church, from righteous Abel downwards, and to give them rest in the land of the living, in the paradise of God. Those that have the names of St. Mark, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, contain passages substantially identical (Neale's Ancient Liturgies, pp. 18, 19, 65, 122, 136). The agreement of so many independent witnesses affords some proof that this element, common to all, was to be found in the archetypal Apostolic liturgy from which they were all derived. But the feeling that prevailed among the believers in Christ shewed itself even more strikingly in their monumental inscriptions. In the Catacombs at Rome, in the cemeteries of Gaul, we find the prayer — VIVAS IN PACE, VIVAS IN CHRISTO, AETERNUM VIVATIS, SPIRITUS TUUS BENE REQUITESCANT, DEUS CHRISTUS OMNIPOTENS SPIRITUM TUUM REFRIGERET (Martigny, s. v. Acclamations, Purgatoire, Rufrächissement). Some of these may, it is true, belong to a later time than that of which we are now speaking, but there is no sign throughout of any break of continuity, no indication at any moment that the prayer was looked upon as a novelty. From first to last, the thoughts connected with death are those of rest, peace, tranquillity, all of them capable of increase through the prayers of friends on earth. When we pass to the writings of the teachers of the church, the witness is no less clear. Tertullian, at the time when he was the most zealous opponent of any innovation, speaks again and again, not only of prayers, but of the Eucharist as an "oblatio," a "sacrificium," offered on the anniversary of a loved one's death, as a long-standing usage, a thing of course in the common life of all Christians (Tertullian, de Cor. Mil. c. 3, de Monogam. c. 10, Echart. ad Custit. c. 11). Cyprian carries on the tradition in the same church, and treats the denial of the prayers of the church as the severest penalty (Epp. 34, 37). Origen is a witness for the Church of Alexandria (in Rom. xii.). Cyril of Jerusalem, as might be expected, reproduces the very phrases of the Liturgy of St. James (Catech. Myst. iv. 6), and teaches that the "greatest benefit" accrues to the departed from such prayers. When Aetius appeared as the precursor of the Protestant view on this subject, assuming one broad line of demarcation in the unseen world, on one side of which such prayers were needless, and on the other fruitless, he was treated as opposing what had been the practice of the church from the beginning (Epiphanius, Haeres. 75). His protest was, at all events, uttered in vain. In all the Churches of the East and West prayers were still offered for the dead; the Eucharist, as the highest act of intercession, was still thought of as an "oblatio," a "sacrificium," for them.

The thoughts as to the unseen world which suggested or followed upon the practice were, at first, as far as the data for judging go, hazy and undefined, and certainly did not involve what we know as the Romish theory of purgatory in its full development. The worshippers were not troubled with questions as to their heathen friends, were content to think of them as lost for ever, dwelt only on the condition of the departed faithful. And this they pictured to themselves as one of imperfect yet progressive blessedness, a place of rest and refreshment, not altogether without suffering, if suffering were needed for purification or satisfaction, with higher or lower degrees of light and glory, leaving for those nearest to perfection what was spoken of in the Gospels as Abraham's bosom and the paradise of God. Prayers availed to accelerate the progress, perhaps to mitigate the penalty. They were offered, accordingly, for all without exception, prophets, apostles, saints, martyrs, for Peter, Paul, John, even for the Mother of the Lord (Ambrose, Serm. 20 in Ps. 118; Hilar. in Ps. 118), who was not as yet thought of as exalted to her throne in Heaven. When feeling came to be crystallised into theory, however, as men of acute and logical intellect became prominent as teachers of the church, it was necessary to give more sharply defined reasons. At first they were connected with the expectations of a millennial kingdom, and a resurrection of the just who were to be sharers in it. Tertullian is the chief exponent of this phase of thought. That "first resurrection" is the inheritance of all baptized persons who have not fallen into deadly sin, but a "medicum delictum" will be punished by a corresponding delay (de Animâ, c. 58). The object of prayers for the dead is to obtain "refrigerium" during the time of expectation and a share in the first resurrection (de Monogam. c. 10). Men will rise sooner or later according to their deserts (Cont. Marcion. iii. 24). The belief continued to determine the thoughts of men at least as late as the 4th century. Ambrose, praying for the souls of departed emperors, asks for a "matura resurrectio" (de Obit. Valent. ad fin.), speaks of them as "beati, si quid meae orationes valebunt" (ibid.), goes indeed one step further, and says of those who are not sharers in the first resurrection, at the beginning of the millennial kingdom, that they will continue "burning" till the second, or at least "remain longer in their punishment" (in Ps. i.).

Millennial expectations, however, though not formally abandoned, fell into the background, and the great theologians of the 4th and 5th centuries had to find a theory about prayers for the dead which did not depend on them. Chrysostom was content with an emotional rhetoric. The "prayers were not in vain;" the dead, even if sinners, might be helped by them, and not by them only, but by alms and oblations (Hom. 41 in 1 Cor.). They were to be used only for the baptized, for all others, the ἀμύητοι, there was only Gehenna. Even catechumens were to be helped (one does not see the logical ground of the distinction) by alms rather than by prayer (Hom. 3 in Philipp., Hom. 24 in Johann.). The hypothesis of a penal discipline after death had meantime gained ground in the East, and Gregory of Nyssa, not without a marked tendency to a belief in universal restitution, says that those who are not purified by prayer and wisdom in this life must pass through the πύρ καθάρσιον after their departure. Augustine, in this as in other things, at once more logical and more emotional, has to reconcile his impulses and his theory. He has no doubt about his mother's salvation, yet he prays after her death that her sins may be forgiven her; that God will not enter into judgment with her; that his father too, though less advanced in holiness, may be forgiven also (Confess. ix. 13). The growing tendency to the cultus of saints led him, indeed, to think it wrong to pray for martyrs, who ought rather, "quia impleverunt caritatem," to be entreated to pray for us (Serm. 17 de Verb. Apost. Tract. 84 in Joann.). He recognises that there will be "purgatoriae poenae" for the sins of some men (de Civit. Dei, xx. 25). In the small treatise known as the Enchiridion he distinguishes more in detail. For the very good, prayers, alms, the sacrifice of the altar are acts of thanksgiving, for the not very bad, . . . well, in that case, they, at least, serve as a consolation to the living. So we may pray, he adds in words every way remarkable "ut sit plena remissio, aut certe ut tolerabilior fiat damnatio" (Enchir. ad Laurent. c. 110). The prayer of Prudentius for himself may be taken as expressing the feeling which must often have been prominent in men's prayers for others:—

"Esto, cavernoso, quia sic pro labe necesse est
Corporea, tristis me sorbeat ignis averlo,
Saltem mirificos incendia lenta vapores
Exhalat, aestuque calor languente tepescat:
Lux immensa alios, et tempora vincta coronis
Glorificat: me poena levis clementer adurat."

DEBO or BEBO, was bishop of Avignon about the year 429. He was previously not an ecclesiastic, but a senator of advanced years and splendid character. Throughout his career he was universally beloved for justice, mildness, and every good work. In 433 he restored the church of St. Paul, which had been destroyed by the Vandals, and which he afterwards dedicated to SS. Peter and Paul. In the Index Sanctandreanus, he is referred to in the following words: "Quinto calendis Maii Debo episcopus, postquam sedisset annos circiter octo, et utiliter admodum et gloriose rexisset episcopatum, obdormivit in Christo, sepultusque requiescit in ecclesia sanctorum apostolorum, quam decenter construxerat, et cum magna solemnitate biennio ante consecraverat." Debo was the twenty-second bishop of Avignon, and was succeeded by Julius. (Gall. Christ. i. p. 861.) [D. R. J.]

DECALOGUE. (Δεκάλογος, δέκα λόγια, δέκα κεφάλαια, νομοθεσία.) That the ten commandments have long occupied a high place in the scheme of Christian teaching cannot be denied. But has this been so from the foundation of Christianity? In the Apostolic Fathers there is little or nothing which bears directly on this question. The earliest evidence is found in Pliny's celebrated letter (x. 96), in which he asserts that the Christians of Bithynia used to bind themselves by a solemn oath to abstain from theft, robbery, adultery, and perjury (ne furta, ne latrocinia, ne adulteria committerent, ne fidem fallerent). Tertullian in his Apologety (ch. ii.) quotes Pliny's letter in a way which makes it almost certain that this "sacramentum" of the Bithynian Christians was based upon the commandments of the second table.

In his treatise Adversus Judaeos (ch. ii.), this father speaks more plainly. He asks how one could suppose that God gave the law to one people only and not to the whole human race. The principles of the decalogue had been given from the creation; the law of Moses was the latest and fullest edition of the original law (lex principalis). Also cf. De Pudicitia, chs. iv. and v.

The testimony of Irenaeus is still stronger. In the fourth book of his work Adversus Haereses the writings of Moses are called the words of Christ (ch. iii.); certain chief commands are identical in the Scriptures of both covenants (eminentiora et summa sine quibus salvari non potest in utroque eadem suavit, ch. xxvi.). Moreover the decalogue differs from the rest of the law (ch. xxxi.); its words are still in force and contain natural and universal laws; the precepts of bondage were fit only for punishing and educating the Jewish people.

Clemens Alexandrinus in his Stromata (bk. vi. ch. xvi.) speaks of the decalogue as a pattern of genuine γνῶσις (ὑπόδειγμα δ' ἡμῖν ἐκκείσθω εἰς σαφήνειαν γνωστικῆν). He also discusses the commandments in detail, and evidently looks upon them as permanently binding on Christians as well as on Jews.

Origen's opinion on the subject may be gathered from his eighth Homily on the book of Exodus, where in treating of the first and second commandments, he points out that the first was addressed not merely to the Israelites, but also in a higher sense to all who by forsaking sin have escaped the bondage of their land of Egypt.

If St. Augustine's views be asked, we may refer to his treatise Contra Faustum (bk. xv. chs. v. and vii.), where he maintains that the decalogue is hostile to the principles of the Manichaeans, and in proof of this discusses the commandments one by one. Again in his treatise De Caecichandis rudibus (ch. xxiii.) he asserts that after the descent of the Holy Spirit, the disciples instead of finding the decalogue a burden were able to keep it with a feeling of pleasure.

The testimony of the Apostolical Constitutions, whatever be the exact date of the work, is most valuable, inasmuch as it entirely supports the views of the above-mentioned fathers. The decalogue is called νόμος φυσικός (i. 6, 3), and a distinction is carefully drawn between the original law (Exod. 20) and the repetition of it (δεύτερωσις, Exod. 34) after the people had worshipped the golden calf (νόμος δὲ ἐστὶν ἡ δεκάλογος ἢν πρὸ τοῦ τὸν λαὸν μωσχοποιῆσαι θεὸς αὐτοῖς ἐνομοθέτησεν). Christ abolished the additions made at the second lawgiving (πάσας τὰ διὰ τῆς δευτερώσεως ἐπέσακτα); the decalogue He confirmed and expanded (vi. 22, 4). The church has received the decalogue and has been taught the law (ii. 25, 11); the Christian is bidden to remember the commands of God (πάντοτε μνημένος τῶν δέκα τοῦ θεοῦ λογίων), and a bishop is expected to distinguish between the first and second lawgivings (νόμον καὶ δευτέρωσιν διαίρων), and to decide clearly what is the law for believers and what the fetters imposed upon unbelievers (τί ἐστὶ νόμος πιστῶν καὶ τί δεσμὰ ἀπιστῶν, ii. 5, 4).

The Christian church, therefore, from the first century onwards has laid a special stress on the decalogue, and has accepted and used it as a basis of moral teaching. [W. J. J.]

(2) Bishop of Eugubium in Umbria. circ. A.D. 416. Pope Innocent I. answers certain questions of his in a canonical letter, praising him for his attendance at Rome, and observance to the see of St. Peter, which must on account of its origin be always the guide in disputed ecclesiastical customs. In this letter Innocent confines his own diocese to the churches of the city of Rome. (Innocent I. Epist. num. 25, Patrol. Lat. xx. 551; Ceillier, vii. 518.) [W. M. S.]

DECIOUS. The reign of this emperor, though among the shortest in the Roman annals (A.D. 249–251), has gained a pre-eminence in ecclesiastical history altogether disproportioned to that assigned to it in the general history of the empire. It was burnt in on the memories of men as the reign of Mary was on the minds of English Protestants, as that of Charles IX. was on the minds of the Huguenots of France. It was a fiery trial at the time, and it was the occasion of many memorable controversies.

Of the earlier life of Cn. Messius Decius Trajanus we know but little. He is said to have been born at Budela, in Pannonia, but when he first appears in history it is with a grown-up son, himself between fifty and sixty, as a member of the Roman senate, in the last year of the reign of Philip the Arabian. The legions in Pannonia were mutinous, and had elected one of their officers, Marinus, as emperor. The senate were alarmed. Who would be able to restore order? Philip, as trusting to the popularity of Decius with the troops, and his loyalty to himself, assigned the task to him. He went, but either his loyalty failed, or he found himself unable to resist the impetuosity of the legions. Marinus was easily disposed of; but then they elected him, and forced him to lead them into Italy. Near Verona they encountered Philip, who was defeated and slain (June 17, A.D. 249), and Decius began to reign. As if conscious of the greatness of his task, he associated his own son and Annius Maximus Gratus with him as Caesars. His most conspicuous administrative act (all the more notable as determined on when he was contending against the Goths) was more significant, and, as far as it went, spoke strongly for his desire to govern well. The office of censor had been in abeyance since the reign of Titus. It was now restored by Decius. Wise or unwise, the step was that of a man who saw that unbridled luxury, and the social confusions that followed on it, were the evils which were hastening on the destruction of the empire. The speech, which is reported in the Augustan History as having been addressed by him to the newly-appointed censor (see Gibbon, c. x.), shews an earnestness of purpose which may fairly be set against such phrases as the "execrable animal," the "hostis Dei," applied to him by Lactantius (de Mort. Persec. c. 4) as indicating a general depravity of character prior to the persecution with which his name was identified.

The edict which made his name a byword of reproach had its origin, probably, in a like motive. What seemed to be needed was to restore the rigorous morality of the old Roman life, and to do that it was necessary to restore also the old religion which gave that morality its sanctions. The new faith, or, as it would seem to Decius, the new superstition, which was rearing its head in every city in the empire, sapping the foundations of the old, must be stamped out. If we may judge by the confessions of the great Christian teachers, who owned that the church had deserved the sufferings which now fell upon it, the lives of its members did not at that time present a very lovely aspect. Christian men were effeminate and self-indulgent, trimming their beard and dyeing their hair; Christian women painted their faces, and brightened their eyes with cosmetics. The clergy were covetous and ambitious, looking on their profession as a path to wealth and influence. In addition to these evils they presented, even more than they had done in the days of the Antonines, the aspect of a secret society, with a highly compact organization, slowly stealing on, year by year, towards an usurped dominion. If the old calumnies of Thyesteian banquets and Oedipodean, i. e. incestuous, orgies, had died out, or been refuted by the great apologists, it was not the less alarming to see that society enlisting among its members thousands in all classes throughout the empire. The fact that the late emperor had been supposed to favour it, that there were whispers that he had been secretly a member of it, was enough (even if we reject the wild story of his having done public penance before Babylon at Antioch) to add another element to the policy which Decius now adopted. The zeal with which officials and mob alike entered into the policy of persecution, the fact that it had been anticipated by an outbreak of fanaticism at Alexandria a year before the publication of the edict, shewed that a ruler, who would put himself vigorously at the head of the enemies of the Christian church, was sure to enlist the support of a party which might well seem to him stronger than that of its supporters.

That policy was opened early in A.D. 250, by an edict which is no longer extant,* but of which we can form a fair estimate, partly from an account of it given by Gregory of Nyssa (Vit. Greg. Thaum.), and partly from the history of the persecution, as traced by Cyprian, in his epistles, and the treatise de Lapsis, and by Dionysius of Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. vi. 40-42). It did not order any sharp measures of extermination. The emperor did not contemplate a massacre like that of St. Bartholomew, or cruelties like those of the Dragonades. He aimed rather at following in the steps of the emperor whose name he had adopted. Magistrates throughout the empire were ordered, under heavy penalties, to put pressure upon the worshippers of Christ, so as to bring them back to the religion of their fathers. If that end were attained there was to be no further molestation. The prefects were not slack to act on their instructions, and the work began. Fear did its work on many whose faith had never had any real groundwork in conviction. The seats of the magistrates were thronged with apostates, some rushing eagerly to be conspicuous among the first to offer sacrifice, and sprinkle incense on the altar; some pale and trembling, as if they were themselves about to be sacrificial victims. In that crowd of renegades were to be seen, too, not a few of the base and feeble-hearted priests of the Christian church. Others found out an ingenious way of satisfying their conscience, and securing their position and their life. The magistrates of the empire were not above the influence of bribes, and for a reasonable money payment would give a certificate (libellus) that sacrifice had been duly offered, without making the actual performance of the rite compulsory. The libellatici were rightly branded by Christian feeling with a double note of infamy for this miserable compromise. They added the guilt of dishonesty and falsehood to that of cowardice and denial. Bad as the sacrificati, the thurificati might be, they were not so contemptible as these.

* A document purporting to give the text of the Edict was published at Toulouse in A.D. 1664, but is universally acknowledged to be spurious.

When the work had passed through this first stage, attention was directed to those who remained faithful, and measures of severity were, as in the time of Trajan, brought to bear on them. They were summoned, and, in the event of their not appearing, sought out and dragged before the prefects and other magistrates, questioned as to their faith, required to sacrifice, exposed to insults and outrages if they refused, thrust into prison, and, in many instances, ill-treated till they died. The persecution was met, as in all like crises, in very different ways, by men of different temperaments. Some, the wiser and more prudent bishops, such as Dionysius of Alexandria, and Cyprian of Carthage, followed the counsel of their Lord (Matt. x. 23), and the example of Polycarp, fled from the violence of the storm themselves, and exhorted their followers to do the same. Some, who thus withdrew from the common life of men, never returned to it (as e. g. Paul, the hermit of the Thebaid, and Maximus of Nice), and the Decian period has been commonly regarded, though with some exaggeration, as the starting-point of the anchoritic life. The wiser pastors continued, as far as they could, to watch over their flocks, and to keep them steadfast in the faith, even while they were exposed to taunts and suspicions from those to whom they seemed guilty of cowardice or deception. Others languished in prison, like the sufferers at Rome, of whom Cyprian tells, "sine solatio mortis." Some courted death not in vain, or met it bravely.

The persecution of Decius (commonly reckoned by church historians as the seventh) may fairly be measured as to its extent, if not its actual severity, by the list of martyrs under it who still retain their place in the calendar of the Western church. They shew that it was at once more extensive, and more systematic than any that had preceded it. Fabian, bishop of Rome, was among the foremost of the victims; Babylas of Antioch, Pionius of Smyrna (seized, it was said, while celebrating the anniversary of the martyrdom of Polycarp), Agatha of Sicily, Polyeuctes of Armenia, Carpus and his deacon of Thyatira, Maximus (a layman) of Asia, Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, Acacius of the Phrygian Antioch, Epimachus and Nemesius of Alexandria, Peter and his companions of Lampascus, Irenaeus of Neo-Caesarea, Martial of Limoges, Abdon and Sennen, Persians, who, being at Rome, were involved in the sufferings of the Christians of that city, Cassian of Imola, Lucian a Thracian, Trypho and Respicus of Bithynia, the Ten Martyrs of Crete, have all found a place in the martyrologies of this period, and, after allowing for the uncertainty which attaches to some of the names, the list is enough to shew that there was hardly a province of the empire where the violence of the storm was not felt. Among those, who by their sufferings earned the title of confessors (which seems to have been then, for the first time, used in this sense), though they escaped death, were Origen, who was tortured on the rack, and the boy Dioscorus who, at the age of fifteen, offered himself for the crown of martyrdom, but was spared by the Alexandrian prefect in pity for his youth. Not to be passed over, in telling the story of this reign, is the well-known legend of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, told for the first time by Gregory of Tours (de Glor. Martyr. c. 95). Confessing the faith, like Dioscorus, in the prime of early manhood, they were, it was said, walled up in a cave, and left to die. They fell asleep, and the place acquired a local fame for its sanctity. In the reign of Theodosius (A.D. 447) the cave was opened, and the sleepers awoke, went forth and were startled at the changes which they witnessed, temples destroyed, and churches standing in their place. Their second life was, however, of short duration. They again lay down together and fell asleep, this time not to wake again.

Happily, the persecution was as short as it was severe. The attacks of the Goths (or the Carpi, probably a Gothic tribe), drew Decius and his son into Pannonia. They fell in battle, and with their death there was a lull till the accession of Valerian. In some respects the after-effects of the Decian persecution were more important than its direct results. It cleared off the crowd of half-hearted Christians, and left behind those who were prepared by its discipline for the severer struggles that were to come under Valerian and Diocletian. Questions arose as to the treatment of those who had apostatised (the "lapsi" of Cyprian's treatise) under its pressure. Were the "libellatici" to be dealt with on the same footing as the "thurificati"? Were either class to be looked on as capable of readmission into the fold of Christ? Was that readmission to be conditional upon the church's normal discipline, or were the confessors of the period to be allowed to give a certificate of absolution (the "libellus pacis") to those in whose weakness or repentance they saw sufficient reason for indulgence? The uncertainty which gathered round much of the history of the period made it easy to find in it materials for polemical bitterness. Those who prided themselves, like many of the Roman confessors, on their constancy, looked down with scorn on the indulgence shewn by Cyprian and Cornelius to the "lapsi," and even taunted the latter with having been a "libellaticus." The tendency to ascetic rigorism of discipline would doubtless have shewn itself sooner or later in any case, but historically the whole long history of the Novatian schisms had its beginning in the Decian persecution. (Comp. Euseb. H. E. vi. 39-45; Cyprian de Laps., and Epp. passim, the articles in this dictionary on the persons named above, and an excellent paper on DECIUS by Hefele in Wetzer and Welte's Kirchen Lexicon. For the general history of the reign, see Gibbon (c. x.), whose narrative is based on Zosimus and Zonaras.) [E. H. P.]

DECIUS I., eighth bishop of Mâcon (Matisco). The period assigned to him by Severinus is from 599 to 612. (Gall. Christ. iv. 1042.) [D. R. J.]

DECIUS II., succeeded Deodatus as eleventh bishop of Mâcon. In some old documents he is described as a saint, but nothing is known of his life. He lived in the latter part of the 7th century and the beginning of the 8th. (Gall. Christ. iv. 1042, 1043.) [D. R. J.]

DECLAN (1). Among the many saints who went to the continent and wrought in the evangelisation of Bavaria, with St. Virgilius or Fergal, St. Rupert, St. Alto, and others, was St. Declan, who is said to have died at Frisengen, on, it seems a first day of December in the middle of the 8th century (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 12; Colgan, Acta SS. 301, col. 2).

DECLAN (2) Declan or Deglan, son of Ere, bishop of Ardmor, July 24. The legendary accretions of a late date have done so much to involve in almost impenetrable obscurity the life of this saint, especially when they are accepted as history by such recognised authorities as Abp. Ussher and Colgan, that it is now difficult to attain the truth through the misleading haze of fable; in legend his life has a well-defined outline, but in authentic history he is almost unknown, and to the genuine facts of his life we are mostly guided by inference. The origin of all the difficulty is to be sought for in the attempt in the 11th or 12th century, to shew that bishops were in Ireland before St. Patrick, and that therefore Armagh had no such clear pretensions to the primacy as were claimed for her. (See the whole question discussed by Dr. Todd, St. Patrick, 198, 220-1.) Declan was son of Ere and Deitsin or Dethidin, and through his father Ere, who was called "Dux Nandesi," or chief of the Desii, he was descended, not, as the Mart. Doneg. says, from Eochaidh Finn Fuathairt (the race of St. Brigida, of Kildare), but from Fiacha Suidhe, son of Fedlimidh Rechtmair (or the Lawgiver), who was king of Ireland, A.D. 164-174, or earlier according to the Four Masters. He was born in Decies, in the county of Waterford, to which as a descendant of Fiacha Suidhe his father belonged, but the date is our first difficulty. Those who would make him precede St. Patrick in evangelising Ireland, must place his birth at latest about the middle of the 4th century, while the acceptance of the genealogy in the Latin Life (Vita S. Declani), which makes Ere fifteenth in descent from Fedlimidh, puts it well into the 7th century, which, on the other hand, is probably too late; the nearest we can approach to it is perhaps by placing his birth towards the end of the 6th century. His parents were Christian, and the infant was baptized by a priest named Colman, in all likelihood Colman (Nov. 24), son of Lenin, of Cloyne, in the barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, who died A.D. 600; at the age of seven Declan is said to have been put under the charge of a holy man who was newly returned to Ireland, and was named Dimma or Dima. This is most likely to have been Dimma Dubh, subsequently bishop at Connor, but descended of the great Munster family of Dal Cais and Clan of Sil-m Blod; he lived till A.D. 658. (For this early part of St. Declan's life see Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 201; Todd, ut supra, 207-9; Colgan, Acta SS. 73, c. 2, and Tr. Thaum. 613, col. 2; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 25; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 333 sq.; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. iii. 48.) From at least this point begins the mythical, where we are told how Declan remained for a long time under Dimma, along with many who afterwards erected cells in Munster; how he then set out for Rome, met St. Ailbhe, and was consecrated bishop, with the special mission to evangelise his native country; how on his way home he met St. Patrick, who was as yet unconsecrated, but who prophesied that in thirty years he would follow him to Ireland (Ussher and Colgan put this meeting with St. Patrick in A.D. 402); how he preached to his comprouvincials, and established a cell of seven men near Lismore, on the spot where he was born; how he again visited Rome, spent some time as he returned with St. David at Menevia, and was miraculously guided to a place called Ard-na-georach, which he afterwards called Ardmore; and how the four bishops, St. Ailbhe of Emly, St. Ciaran of Saighir, St. Declan of Ardmor, and St. Ultan of Ardraccaan taught the people of Ireland, and had gathered many converts when St. Patrick landed; yet how after some opposition they were content to submit to St. Patrick as their common master, and have the extent of their episcopal jurisdiction regulated by him. But here the chronology halts on every hand, as St. Ailbhe died at the latest in A.D. 541, and St. David was consecrated probably in A.D. 540. Taking however everything into consideration, St. Declan probably was a contemporary of St. Ultan, and died about the middle of the 7th century, but Lanigan would put him a century earlier. (Todd, ut supra, 209-14; Lanigan, ut supra, i. c. 1, § 12, c. 6, § 7, c. 9, § 7; Ussher, ut supra, cc. 16, 17; Colgan, Acta SS. 459, c. 9; Butler, Lives of the Saints, vii. 396; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. i. 40 sq. 220 n. 3; O'Flaherty, Ogygia, i. pt. 1, p. 43, ii. pt. 3, cc. 75, 79, 85.) Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 199-202) quotes largely from the Lives of St. Ciaran, St. Ailbhe, and St. Declan, for their connexion with St. Patrick, and (ib. 250-2, c. xv.) discusses, doing what he can to decide in the affirmative, the question whether there were Christians in Ireland before the arrival of St. Palladius and St. Patrick. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jul. 24, tom. v. 590-608) have their usual carefully compiled commentary, followed by the Life of St. Declan, taken from a MS. of Louvain, and collated with a MS. of the college of St. Isidore, at Rome. [J. G.]

DECUMANUS, ST., a Welsh devotee, who lived as a hermit at the place called from him St. Decuman's, near Watchet in Somersetshire, on the sea-coast ("pervectus est ad littus oppositum prope castrum Dorostorum," Capgrave, fol. lxxvi., who gives a legendary life of the saint). His sacred well was long pointed out there. He is said to have died A.D. 706 (Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 27, vi. 24; Haddan and Stubbs, i. 161). There was also a chapel dedicated to him in the parish of Wendron, near Helston, in Cornwall (Oliver's Monasticon Dioc. Exon. p. 443). [C. W. B.]

Castrum Dorostorum is now Dunster Castle. Rees, who gives the life under the name of Degeman, states that he was patron saint of Roscrowther in Pembrokeshire, and of Llandegeman an extinct chapel in the parish of Llanfihangel Cwm Dû, in Brecknockshire. (Welsh Saints, 305; see also Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 389; Haddan and Stubbs, i. 161.) [C. H.]

DEDA, presbyter and abbat of Peartaneu in the province of the Lindissi. Bede, who calls him "vir fidelissimus," had from him what he states concerning the early evangelisation of Lincolnshire and the multitude of people baptized in the Trent by bishop Paulinus in the presence of king Edwin. Deda's authority was an old man who had himself been one of the multitude, who also described the personal appearance of Paulinus preserved in Bede (H. E. ii. 16). Peartaneu is by Camden called Bardney, a monastery in the centre of Lincolnshire; but all later authorities, including Camden's editor, point out the mistake, and shew that it was Partenay, a cell of Bardney (Camden, ed. Gough, ii. 229, 267; Tanner, Notit. Lincoln. lxi.; Monast. Anglic. i. 622, 625, note i.; Smith's Beda, H. E. ii. 16, iii. 11; Birch, Fasti Monast. 62). Bede himself in one passage (iii. 11) clearly distinguishes the two houses, calling Beardaneu a "noble monastery," to which king Oswald's bones were taken, and just afterwards referring to the monastery, "quod vocatur Peartaneu." Partenay was near its parent house, but ancient writers are silent as to its origin. [C. H.]

DEFENSOR (1) First bishop of Angers. Nothing certain is known either of his origin or age. The Acts of St. Julian relate that that saint converted the person who held the civil office of defensor at Le Mans, whom some identify with this Defensor. Others held that the Defensor who was the first preacher of the Gospel in Anjou, is he whom Sulpicius Severus and Fortunatus enumerate amongst the bishops who in vain endeavoured to prohibit St. Martin from the see of Tours. In Gallia Christiana the latter opinion is with a little hesitation preferred. The name of Defensor does not occur amongst those of the patron saints of the church of Angers. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 545; Vita S. Julani Episc. Cenoman., ascribed to Lethaldus the monk; Patrol. Lat. cxxxvii. 781.) [D. R. J.]

(2) A monk of the monastery of Ligugé (Locociagense monasterium), which St. Martin founded on the river Clain (ad Clenum amnem), not far from Poitiers. He lived about the end of the 7th century, or the beginning of the 8th. Defensor, having embraced the monastic life at Ligugé, made study one of his principal occupations, and became so learned that he won for himself the title of Grammarian, which in ancient times was only applied to men of letters. He devoted himself more especially to the study of the Fathers, and at the advice of Dursinus, who directed his studies, he made extracts of the most edifying passages and formed them into a book, which he called Scintillarum, seu Sententiarum catholicorum latorum.

In a short preface to that work, he says that he undertook it in order to spare his readers the trouble of reading a great number of volumes; that he had collected into this volume all that they could wish on the subjects which he undertook to treat; that to prevent any imputation of imposture, and for fear that his work might be considered apocryphal, he had carefully marked at the head of each sentence the name of the Father from whom he had taken it. These sentences are, as a rule, short; and the Fathers whom he cites are St. Clement, Origen, St. Cyprian, St. Basil, St. Augustine, Eusebius, a certain Josephus, not otherwise known, SS. Caesarius, pope Gregory, Isidore of Seville, and the Lives of the Fathers. The work is divided into eighty chapters, or seventy according to some manuscripts. It treats of the principal Christian virtues, such as charity, patience, the love of God and of one's neighbour, humility. It is evident from the preface that he was well instructed in the doctrine of St. Augustine, and that he had much modesty. The latest author he quotes is St. Isidore of Seville, who died about 536. In the same work he mentions that he had been brought up and taught by Ursinus, who is none other than the prior or abbat of the same name who wrote one of the Lives of St. Leger, bishop of Autun, and lived about the year 682 or 683. Sixtus of Sienna, who must have read this work, since he quotes the first words, speaks of it with much praise. At the commencement of the 9th century it was found, without the name of the author, in the library of St. Riquier in Ponthieu. Mabillon having discovered a copy of it in the library of Montcassin, had the preface printed in the appendix to the second volume of his annals. He appears to think that the work had never been printed, but Possevin mentions three editions, one published at Antwerp, by Stelfius, in 1550; another at Venice, by Bartholemi de Albertis, in 1552; and the third at Cologne in 1554. (Defensor Locociagens. Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. 595; Mabillon, Annal. O. S. Benedicti, i. 10, ii. 704, § 23, i. 21, n. 12; Spic. iv. 484; Sixtus Siennensis, Bib. lib. iv. p. 24, 2; Hist. Lit. de la Fr. iii. 654, 655.) [D. R. J.]

DEGA. [DAIGH.]

DEGUI (Asser, Gest. Aelfr. in M. H. B. 488), bishop of Menevia. [DAVID, ST.] [C. H.]

DEICOLUS (DEICOLA, DEEL, DICHULL), of Lure, abbat, commemorated Jan. 18. This saint is one of those who accompanied St. Columbanus (Nov. 21) from Britain to Burgundy, and, so long as St. Columbanus was at Luxeuil, the life of the monk is merged in that of his master, the abbat. There are many lives of St. Deicolus extant, based apparently upon the same outline of fact, but filled in with many mythical details, and dealing more in wonders to magnify the saint, than in distinct historical delineation. The most accurate and important life is given by Colgan (Acta SS. 115-27) and the Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. 18, tom. ii. 199-208), and belongs to the 10th century. Others are given by Vincentius, Petrus, Menard, Belfortius, and the Benedictines, while many ancient biographies are believed to be still extant in manuscript. His memoirs have also been often written in modern times, shewing his popularity, both in Britain and on the continent. [COLUMBANUS; GALLUS.] St. Deicolus was uterine brother of St. Gallus (Oct. 16), the apostle of Switzerland, and came to Gaul about A.D. 575, according to Baronius, or in A.D. 589 according to others. He was with St. Columbanus at Luxeuil, when that abbat was banished from Burgundy by Thierry II, at the instigation of the queen-mother, Brunchild, and would have accompanied him into exile had he not failed from bodily weakness, and been left, as was supposed, to finish his earthly pilgrimage among the brushwood near the monastery. By divine strength and guidance, however, he found his way through the forest, till reaching, under the pilotage, it is said, of some swineherds, the place where the town of Lutra or Lure now stands, in the province of Burgundy, and department of Haute-Saône, he built his cell there, which in course of time grew into a large and flourishing monastery, the centre of a busy population. He is said to have visited the Roman pontiff. At the end of about ten years at Lure, he saw death approaching, had his friend Columbanus appointed to the abbacy in his room, and then retiring into greater seclusion died on Jan. 18, A.D. 625. His chief festival has always been Jan. 18. The Scotch writers, Dempster and Camerarius, have appropriated him as an Albanic Scot, and called him abbat of Sutrium in Etruria, but they err in both particulars. (O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Script. iv. 184; Montalembert, Monks of the West, ii. 348, 476-80, Edinb. 1861; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 13, § 1, c. 16, § 4; Butler, Lives of the Saints, i. 271-2; Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, i. 280-8; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 301-19; Dempster, Hist. Ecol. Gent. Scot. ii. 211-12; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 87; Prim. Ch. Hist. Ir. i. 334-35.) [J. G.]

DEIFERUS, Welsh saint. [DIER.]

DEINIOLEN, DEINIOL AB DEINIOL AIL, DEINIOL FAB, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, son of Deiniol first bishop of Bangor in Carnarvonshire. He was a member of his grandfather's monastery at Bangor Iscoed, and after the destruction of that house [DINORIUS] he retired to his father's monastery at Bangor in Cardiganshire, succeeding him as second abbat, but whether he also succeeded his father in the bishopric of Bangor is left unexplained. It is stated that he founded the church of Llandeinioelen in Carnarvonshire in A.D. 616. The chapel of Llanddeiniol Fab, subject to Llannidan in Anglesey, has been called after his name. He was commemorated on November 23 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 281). [C. H.]

DEINIOL WYN (DANIEL), a Welsh saint of the 6th century, son of the abbat Dunawd Fyr or Dinodus, whom he assisted in establishing the monastery of Bangor Iscoed on the Dee, and the father of Deiniolen. He is regarded as the founder of the monastery in Carnarvonshire called Bangor Deiniol and Bangor Fawr, which was raised by his patron Maelgwn Gwynedd, or Malgwyn, or Malgo Conan, a prince of North Wales, to the rank of an episcopal see, and Deiniol was the first bishop, consecrated, it is said, by Dubricius. On Ussher's chronology of his life see Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 258. He occurs in Stubbs, Legist. 157. Information about his monastery and notices of himself will be found in Tanner, Notit. Pref. 1, Carnarvon ii.; Monast. Angl. vi. 1297; Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. x. 7; Stillingfleet, Orig. Brit. i. 184, 185; Camden, ed. Gough, ii. 429; Annals of Ulster (O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Script. iv. 45); Haddan and Stubbs, Concils, i. 124, 143; Ussher, Brit. Eccles. Antiq. wks. ed. 1847, t. v. pp. 112, 115, 542; t. vi. p. 44, and Chr. Index; E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 498. The Annales Cambriae record his death under A.D. 584, M. H. B. 831. He was buried in the island of Bardsey, and was commemorated on Dec. 10. The churches attributed to him are few and not disposed in such a way as to indicate the probable extent of his diocese on the principle of estimation adopted by Rees. Those founded by him were Llanddeiniol in Cardiganshire, Llanddeiniol or Itton in Monmouthshire, Hawarden in Flintshire, and Llanuwchllyn in Merionethshire. The chapels dedicated to him were Worthenbury in Flintshire (formerly subject to Bangor Iscoed, but now a separate benefice) and St. Daniel's, subject to Monkton in Pembroke (Rees, Welsh Saints, 258-260). [C. H.]

He is counted among the Irish saints by Mar-

O'Gorman, Maguire, Mort. Doneg. and Mart. Tullaght, because he lived some years as a hermit upon Inis-aingin, now Inchinneen, or Hare Island, in Lough Ree, parish of Bunown, Westmeath, which must have been before his consecration by St. Dubricius (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 175 n. 55; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 452 n. 7). [J. G.]

DELPHIDIUS, husband of Euchrocia and father of Procula. He was a distinguished orator and poet of Gaul towards the end of the 4th century. He lived at Bordeaux (Burdegala), and died before his wife and daughter became involved in the Priscillianist troubles. (Ausonius, de Profess. Burdejal. carm. vi. Prosepi Chronicon, p. 2. Latinus Pacatus Drepanius, Panegyric of, Panegyrici Vet. xii. 29.) [M. B. C.]

DELPHINUS (1) ST., second bishop of Bordeaux. Nothing is known of his origin, his country, or when he succeeded to the bishopric. In the year 381 he was present at the council of Saragossa, and took an active part in the condemnation of Priscillianus, Salvianus, and Instantius, as heretics. He then hastened to his diocese, in order to prevent them from spreading their heterodox doctrines amongst his people, and when they arrived at Bordeaux, he compelled them to quit Aquitaine and betake themselves to Italy. In 385 Delphinus assembled a council at Bordeaux, in which Priscillianus and Instantius, who had been made bishops by their adherents, were again condemned. But Delphinus is more especially famed for having converted and baptized Paulinus, and for having been his first guide in his holy life, about 388 (Mart. prol. Rom. ad d. 24 Dec.). Writing to him in 398, Paulinus mentions the existing pope Anastasius.

Delphinus is thought to have died in 404. Under him flourished at Bordeaux several writers praised by Ausonius: Minervius, Delphidius, Herculanus, and Arboreus. We may mention also Ausonius himself and Paulinus. (Gall. Christ. ii. 787; Paulinus Nolanus, Patrol. Lat. lxi.; Ausonius, Patrol. Lat. xix.) [D. R. J.]

(2) Bishop of Lyons. [DALFINUS.]

DELPHINUS (3) or DELPHIUS, 7th abbat of St. Denis, Paris, in the reign of Childebert III. (Gall. Christ. vii. p. 341). [D. R. J.]

DEMETRIANUS (1) A magistrate at Carthage prominent in the persecution under Gallus. He had been able to visit Cyprian frequently and apparently as an inquirer; his accusations of the Christians as evoking Divine vengeance in plagues, &c. drew forth the angry, powerful treatise ad Demetrianum. The elder commentators treated him as proconsul of Africa, but Pearson refutes this. He was aged, "sub ipso exitu," p. 196; and himself a persecutor: "admoves . . . tua immanitas," c. 25 (22). May we not perhaps conclude that he was one of the five native primores who held himself still responsible for the execution of the decree of Decius when the persecution "of Gallus" began, A.D. 252? (Cyp. Ep. 43, iii.) [E. W. B.]

(2) Bishop of Antioch, succeeded Fabius as fifteenth bishop, according to a letter of Dionysius of Alexandria to Cornelius bishop of Rome (Euseb. H. E. lib. vi. c. 46). In the first year of his episcopate, A.D. 252, the council was held at Antioch which decided against the claims of Novatus (Mansi, tom. i. pp. 867, 871; Hard. tom. v. p. 1498). The length of his episcopate is uncertain. The Chronicon of Eusebius assigns him seven years, Scaliger six. According to an obscure tradition he suffered death as a martyr in the second year of his episcopate; but this is rendered very doubtful by the silence of his contemporaries, and by the fact that at the second synod of Antioch, called against Paul of Samosata, he is not so designated. He was the father of the next bishop but one, Domnus I. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. tom. ii. p. 705). [E. V.]

DEMETRIANUS (3) Martyr in Cyprus in the persecution of Galerius. The presbyter Aristocles had fled to a mountain cave, but came down one day to the church of St. Barnabas, and was entertained by Demetrianus the deacon and Athanasius the reader, and told them that he had been commanded in a vision to present himself at the metropolis of the island. They accompanied him, and were imprisoned, burnt, and beheaded with him, June 23 (Men. Basil.). [E. B. B.]

(4) Disciple of Lactantius, who dedicates to him his earliest Christian treatise, On the Work of God, and two volumes of letters. He praises his docility and modesty, and exhorts him not to devote himself so entirely to the public affairs with which he is charged, as not sometimes to think of heaven. In his treatise he seems anxious to obliterate any earlier impressions he may have made on Demetrianus. (Hieron. Liber de Viris Illustr. c. 80, Patrol. Lat. xxiii. 688; Lactant. de Opific. c. i., Patrol. Lat. vi.; vii. p. 1; Ceillier, ii. 1495.) [W. M. S.]

DEMETRIAS, a Roman virgin to whom Jerome wrote his treatise (Ep. 130, ed. Vall.) on the keeping of virginity. Her family was illustrious at Rome, her grandmother Proba (who is much praised by Jerome) having had three sons, all of whom were consuls. Demetrias had in early life wished to take the vow of virginity, but was afraid of her parents' opposition, they having intended to marry her. On hearing her intention, however, they fully approved it, and it gladdened all the churches of Italy. Her father having died just before the sack of Rome by Alaric, the family sold their property and went on board ship. They set sail for Africa, witnessing the burning of Rome as they left Italy; and on arriving in Africa fell into the hands of the rapacious Count Heraclian, who took away a large part of their property. Jerome exhorts Demetrias to a life of study and fasting; to care in the selection of companions; to the consecration of her wealth to Christ's service; and to working with her own hands. He warns her not to perplex herself with the difficult questions introduced by the Origenists; and recommends the study of Scripture. He exhorts her to prefer the coenobitic to the hermit life, and bears his testimony, as he had done thirty years before to Eustochium, to the excellence of the virgin-state, notwithstanding the attacks made upon it. DEMETRIUS (1) a deacon of Vienne, to whom, according to Maximus (ii. 152), Irenaeus (p. 342) addressed discourses concerning faith, from which Maximus gives some extracts; but no such discourses seem to have been known to Eusebius. (Massuet, Diss. ii. p. cv.) [G. S.]

DEMETRIUS (2) (of Alexandria) succeeded Julianus in A.D. 189, as eleventh bishop of Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. v. 22). He presided over the see for 43 years, and died A.D. 231-2 (Euseb. H. E. vi. 26). He appears to have been a man of an energetic and imperious nature. He took an active interest in the Catechetical School, though there is no evidence that he had himself taken part in its work, like many other bishops of the city. He is said to have sent one of its early chiefs, Pantaenus, on a [second?] mission "to the Indians" on their own request (Hieron. de Vir. iii. 36 [PANTAENUS]); and after Clement had left Alexandria, he placed Origen at its head, c. A.D. 203 (Euseb. H. E. vi. 5), and strenuously encouraged him to continue his work, when his indiscreet zeal had exposed him to misrepresentation (Euseb. H. E. vi. 8). On a later occasion (A.D. 217) he despatched Origen in a mission to the Roman governor of Arabia, at the governor's earnest invitation (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19). Origen fulfilled his mission satisfactorily, but not long afterwards Demetrius's friendship for him was interrupted. [ORIGEN.] According to a late, and not very trustworthy authority, Demetrius is reported to have written letters on the keeping of Easter, maintaining the view which was adopted at Nicaea (Euty-chius, Ann. pp. 363 ff.; Migne, Patrol. vol. cxi.). Other legendary stories of his life are given in the Chronicon Orientale (pp. 72 f. ed. 1685), and (after this) more briefly by Tillemont (Mémoires, Origène, art. vii. tom. iii. p. 225, ed. Bruxelles).

The statement that Demetrius first changed the singular ecclesiastical arrangement of Egypt, by appointing three bishops in addition to the bishop of Alexandria, who had formerly governed the whole province, is probably correct, though the only direct authority for it is that of Euty-chius, patriarch of Alexandria, in the 10th century (comp. Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 230). It is possible that this change was due to special views on church government, which may have influenced Demetrius in his harsh judgment on the ordination of Origen beyond the limits of his jurisdiction. (3) One of the presbyters of Alexandria sent by Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria and confessor (A.D. 247-265), during the persecution of Decius, to administer secretly to the faithful in that city. (Euseb. lib. vii. c. 11, Patrol. Graec. xx. p. 672, § 261; Ceillier, ii. 398.) [W. M. S.]

(4) African bishop. Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. 2, A.D. 252; Cyp. Ep. 57, de Bapt. 1, Cyp. Ep. 70, 7; De Bapt. 3 Sent. Ep. 36; bp. of Leptiminus (Leptis minor), near Hadrumetum. [E. W. B.]

(5) One of the Egyptian bishops, to whom the emperor Gallienus wrote in A.D. 262, permitting them to return to the places of worship taken from them during the late persecution. (Euseb. lib. vii. cap. 13, Patrol. Graec. xx. p. 673, § 262; Ceillier, ii. 412.) [W. M. S.]

(6) Martyr at Thessalonica under Maximian, Oct. 26 (Men. Basil.).

DEMETRIUS (7) Martyr at Dabundenum under Maximin and Maximian, Nov. 15. (Men. Basil.) [E. B. B.]

(8) Centurion, presented Tarachus, Probus, and Andronicus, martyrs, afresh before the tribunal of Numerianus Maximus at Tarsus in Cilicia, May 21, A.D. 304, under the persecution of Diocletian. (Ruinar, Act. Sinc. Mart. p. 423; Ceillier, iii. 32.) [W. M. S.]

(9) A heretic, correspondent of Nilus of Sinai, about the close of the 4th century. (Nil. Epist. 253; Patrol. Graec. lxxix. 176; Ceillier, viii. 217.) [W. M. S.]

(10) Bishop of Pessinus in Galatia Secunda and metropolitan, a faithful friend and supporter of St. Chrysostom. He was one of the forty bishops who rallied round Chrysostom when the synod of the Oak was sitting, and was chosen, with others, to convey Chrysostom's reply to its citation (Pallad. pp. 13, 15, 70). He was also one of the bearers of Chrysostom's letter to Innocent I. and the Western bishops (ib. 10, 11, 27), and after its favourable reception travelled through the East to publish the intelligence of his acquittal by the bishop of Rome and his brethren. We find him again in Rome, in A.D. 405, when he and his companions received a letter from Chrysostom, thanking them for their services, and recommending to their kindly notice John, a presbyter, and Paul, a deacon, who were proposing to join them there as a refuge from the persecutions they were exposed to at Constantinople (Epist. 148). He accompanied the Western deputation to Constantinople, and shared in the ill-treatment they met with on their arrival. On the unsuccessful issue of their embassy, Demetrius was banished to one of the Egyptian oases, but died of brutal treatment on the road (Pallad. pp. 30-34; 194.) [E. V.]

(11) Monk, contemporary of John Chrysostom. Chrysostom dedicates to him the first book of his work On Compunction, according to his request that he would write on the subject. Demetrius is represented as having gained a high degree of holiness, but described himself as still creeping on the earth; he often said to Chrysostom, kissing his hand and watering it with tears, "Help me to soften the hardness of my heart." (Patrol. Graec. xlvii. 393; Chrysost. de Compunct. ad Demetr.; Ceillier, vii. 23.) [W. M. S.]

(12) ST. In Gallia Christiana: the name only of this saint is given as the first bishop of Gap, but nothing is said about him. He lived in the beginning of the 5th century, and was succeeded by St. Constantius. He is celebrated on Oct. 15. (Gall. Christ. i. 452.) [D. R. J.]

(13) Bishop of Philippi (A.D. 533-536), sent with Hypatius, archbishop of Ephesus, in A.D. 533 by the emperor Justinian I. to Rome, with a letter on the subject of the Nestorians, in which he begged pope John II. to fortify himself and the patriarch with letters against certain unsound monks. (Labbe, Concil. iv. p. 1742; Ceillier, xi. 116.) [W. M. S.]

(14) Bishop of Naples, A.D. 587. Addressed by pope Gregory the Great, who exhorts him to receive with much gentleness those who, having doubted, desired to be received into the church. Three years afterwards he was deposed for his crimes. (Greg. Epist. i. 14, ii. 6, Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. pp. 459, 542, §§ 500, 572; Ceillier, xi. 481, 487.) [W. M. S.]

DEMIURGUS, the artificer, in the system of Valentinus, the title given to the framer of the world. Common to all the Gnostic sects, and springing out of the idea of the essential evil of matter, is the doctrine that the world was made not by the Supreme God, but by some inferior or even hostile agency. Orthodox Judaism had admitted the theory that God had used the instrumentality of angels in the making of the world; and in the Timaeus of Plato the Supreme Creator (to whom the title Demurgus is given) commits to subordinate deities the task of carrying out the work of creation that he had commenced. The transition was easy to the doctrine that angels had made the world without the will or against the will of the Supreme. In several, and these apparently the earliest, of the Gnostic systems, the making of the world is attributed to a plurality of angels. So Irenaeus tells (i. 23, 1) of the system of Simon, (23, 5) of the system of Menander, (24, 1) of the system of Saturninus, in which the number of these angels is reckoned as seven, and (25) of the system of Carpocrates. Again, in his report of the system of Basilides (24, 4), we are told that our world was made by the angels who occupy the lowest heaven; but special mention is made of their chief, who is said to have been the God of the Jews, to have led that people out of the land of Egypt, and to have given them their law. The prophecies are ascribed not to the chief but to the other world-making angels. In the Ophite system described (ch. 30), which has many affinities with that last mentioned, the making of the world is also ascribed to a company of seven angels, whose names are given, but their chief, Ialdabaoth, comes into still greater prominence. A long myth is related concerning his origin and history; he is the God of the Jews, and the giver of their law, and we have again the statement that the prophecies came from the other six angels, with a detailed account which prophecy came from which angel. The Latin translation, confirmed by Hippolytus (Ref. vii. 33, p. 256), makes Irenaeus state that according to the system of Cerinthus creation was made by a power quite separate from the Supreme God and ignorant of Him. Theodore (Her. Fab. ii. 3), who here copies Irenaeus, turns this into the plural number "powers," and so Epiphanius (28), and apparently Philaster (36), represent Cerinthus as agreeing with Carpocrates in the doctrine that the world was made by angels. There remain two systems, in which the work of creation is ascribed to a single power; that of Marcion, in which the title God is given to the maker of the world, who is distinguished from the higher good God; and the system of Valentinus. It is in the latter system that the name DEMIURGUS is used, which occurs nowhere in Irenaeus except in connexion with the Valentian system; and we may reasonably conclude that it was Valentinus who adopted from Platonism the use of this word. When it is employed by other Gnostics it may be held either that it is not used in a technical sense, or that its use has been borrowed from Valentinus. But it is only the name that can be said to be specially Valentinian; the personage intended by it corresponds more or less closely with the Ialdabaoth of the Ophites, the great Archon of Basilides, the Elohim of Justinus, etc.

According to the Valentinian theory, from Achamoth three kinds of substance take their origin, the spiritual (πνευματικόν), the animal (ψυχικόν), and the material (ἕλη); to the second kind the Demiurge belongs. He is ignorant of all that is spiritual, but he is king over the other two provinces. The word Demiurgus properly describes his relation to the material; he is the father of that which is animal like himself. He frames the seven heavens, as well as all material and animal things, according to forms furnished by his mother; working however blindly, and ignorant even of the existence of the mother who is the source of all his energy. So he ignorantly supposes that he has made the world of himself, and makes the false claim "I am God, and there is none other." He is besides the maker, out of the appropriate substance, of an order of spiritual beings, the devil, the prince of this world, and his angels. But the devil as being spiritual is able to recognise the higher spiritual world, of which his maker the Demiurge, who is only animal, has no knowledge. The devil resides in this lower world, of which he is the prince, the Demiurge in the heavens; his mother Achamoth in the middle region, above the heavens and below the Pleroma. But though previously ignorant the Demiurge learned from the Saviour; and his reward will be that in due season he will ascend to the middle region inhabited by his mother, though, for want of a spiritual nature, he is incapable of attaining to the Pleroma. We are told also (Hipp. Ref. vi. 32, p. 191), that the Demiurge is of a fiery nature, the words of Moses being applied to him, "the Lord our God is a burning and consuming fire," a text used also by Simon (Ref. vi. 9, p. 163). The Ialdabaoth of the Ophites is also described as a fiery God (Ref. v. 7, p. 104). The name God is given to the Demiurgus by Valentinus himself (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 13, p. 603). The account of the Demiurge's ignorance of a superior is strictly parallel to what is told of Ialdabaoth (Irenæus, l. xxx. 6, p. 110). But the closest resemblance to the Valentinian system is found in the account given by Irenæus (l. xxix. 4) of the Barbeliot system. We have the story of the fall of Sophia, the origin of the Demiurge, who is here called Proarchon, his framing the world, and himself inhabiting the firmament, his ignorance of a superior, and his claim to be "God alone, beside whom there is no other." It is impossible to doubt that there is a connexion between the two systems; and it seems to us that the Valentinian is the later.

If there is reason to think that the Demiurge of Valentinus is to be identified with the Ialdabaoth of the Ophites, and that he again is but the chief of seven creative angels of an earlier system, it follows that the Gnostic Demiurge is not historically connected with the σοφία of the Book of Wisdom or the Logos of Philo. For Gnostic speculation appears to have started not with the idea of a single creative principle, but with a plurality of agents supposed to be employed in making the world, it being only as the myth grew that attention was concentrated on the leader of the band, and his brethren lost sight of. [VALENTINUS.] [G. S.]

DEMOCRATES, rhetorician at Carthage, under whom Augustine of Hippo studied with success in A.D. 370. (August. Conf. ss. III. iii. 6, Patrol. Lat. xxxii. p. 685; Ceillier, ix. 2.)

[W. M. S.]

DEMONOLOGY, or the science of demons, was a popular study both in Greece and Rome, as well as Judæa, when the gospel began to be preached. It had become popular in Greece and Rome, as it invested the worship of idols with a reality that was at once novel and mysterious, and spiritualised forms and ceremonies that were becoming intolerable to enlightened minds. The idol was no longer a senseless and helpless image of metal, wood, or stone: it was the habitual abode of a spirit, inferior indeed to God, but superior to man, and a regularly accredited medium of communication between God and man. Socrates had, from the description given by him of his own case, suggested the further inference that everybody was through life watched over by his attendant demon, who frequently saved him from harm, if nothing more. Apuleius devoted a special treatise to this branch of the subject (De Deo Socrat.). Plotinus, Jamblichus, and Porphyry made demonology the corner-stone of a new system out of old materials. For the Jews the subject had a more practical interest. If idolatry was always a crime to them under any circumstances, it was a greater crime than ever when associated with beings whom their vulgate, or Greek version of their Scriptures, never mentioned but in opposition to the true God, and distinguished by name from His favoured messengers. The light in which they are regarded throughout the New Testament and by Josephus, shews plainly that the Jews could never have been familiar with their name but in a sinister sense. The Scribes, according to St. Mark, said of our Lord: "He hath Beelzebub: and by the prince of the devils casteth He out devils" (iii. 22); meaning, as the evangelist interprets them (v. 30), that He "had an unclean spirit." Further, we learn from other passages of the New Testament that there were then regularly appointed officials among the Jews, called "exorcists," whose business it was to free men from their influence (Acts xix. 13; comp. St. Matt. xii. 27). Josephus (Ant. viii. 2. 5) describes the casting-out of a demon in the presence of the emperor Vespasian, his sons, and his nobles, by a man of his own tribe named Eleazar, which he witnessed himself. Persons labouring under their influence, who had to be thus operated upon, were called by a special name: demonised demoniacs, or energumens.

Thus much for the fact of their existence, which was believed by everybody who then professed any belief in the unseen. It was grounded on traditions as old as the hills. Hesiod had, in a passage of singular beauty, dramatised its best side:

Τρις γὰρ μύριοι εἰσὶν ἐπὶ χθονὶ πονυβουτεῖρη
'Αθάνατοι Ζηῆος, φύλακες θνητῶν ἀνθρώπων, etc

(Op. et D. 252-5; comp. 120 sqq.); and Plato (de Rep. v. 15) was indebted for most of his ideas of it to him. It was the association of demons with image-worship alone that was new; and this led to further speculations on their origin and nature tending to dogmatism, from which the fathers themselves are not wholly free. "The followers of Plato," says St. Augustine, "distinguished three classes of beings endued with reason: gods, men, and demons. Of these, demons held a middle position every way between gods and men: having the air for their abode, and being gifted with passions like men, but immortal bodies like gods" (De C v. D. viii. 14). Some, probably the greater number, of them had once been men; others, who constituted a more exalted class, watched over men (Apul. de Deo S. p. 688-90). "The remaining multitude of invisible beings," says Porphyry, "are what are called indiscriminately demons by Plato. Such of them as have received names from men get honour and service paid them everywhere like the gods. Others, whose names have never got into general vogue, are known and served nowhere but in a few obscure towns or villages. The rest go by the name of demons. And there is this general persuasion about them all: that they can harm those who provoke them by defrauding them of their accustomed service; and benefit those who propitiate them by prayers, sacrifices, and the like" (De Abst. ii. 37). In what follows, he distinguishes them into two classes: good and bad; but it is on the bad—their malevolence, sensuality, and duplicity—that he dwells most. On the origin of their connexion with idols, Hermes Trismegistus, quoted by St. Augustine (De Civ. D. viii. 23), taught that they had made images their abode on the invitation of man, becoming as it were their souls, and being attached to them ever afterwards in each case by a tie that could not be broken as long as the image remained. There, their votaries might always count on finding them, ready to be propitiated by gifts, ready to befriend any that came to them for aid. The spell indeed was supposed to be dissolved on anything happening to the image, as we learn from Porphyry (ap. Euseb. Præp. Ev. v. 15); and Hermes, in very remarkable terms, prophesied the impending extinction of the idolatrous worship then practised in Egypt, his own country. All these statements are passed under review, and criticised exhaustively by St. Augustine in his best manner. His opponents and he were both agreed that the worship of idols throughout the Roman empire was, in reality, the worship of demons: that demons arrogated divine honours in their own right, and were really potent for good and for evil in a way that appeared miraculous to man. The issue which he, in common with the rest of the fathers, raised against his opponents was this: that it followed from hence, that no demons were, nor ever could be, morally speaking, but evil: first, from the licentious and inhuman rites with which they allowed themselves to be served; and secondly, because they arrogated honour that was due to God alone. There were no differences of opinion between him and his opponents about the facts; there were no differences of opinion between him and the rest of the fathers about the main corollary which they deduced from them, and upheld as being also the unequivocal teaching of Scripture. In Scripture, the beings entrusted with messages from God to man repudiate divine honours, and are never called demons. In Scripture, the beings to whom the Gentiles are charged with offering sacrifice—and such sacrifice as is invariably mentioned with reprobation as degrading to man—are never called angels. If on some points the fathers may be thought to have speculated in excess of their facts, or dogmatised in excess of their authorities, this at least was not one of them, where they drew the line sharply between angels and demons in point of character. On their origin they were no less agreed. Both, they affirmed unanimously, and with a confidence that was brought into strong relief by the hesitating tone of their opponents, had been created equally with themselves; and were still equally dependent upon the will of Him by Whom all things exist. When they were created, where they dwelt, and how they became bad, were points which divided the fathers themselves, as they could not be made plain from Scripture. Scripture revealed to the descendants of Adam a good deal about themselves. It went back to their primaevial state; chronicled their origin, together with that of the creatures over which they ruled, and on which they lived; explained how their manifold imperfections had been brought about, and how they might all be cancelled in a future state. But of other subjects in which they were less interested, and of other beings inhabiting other worlds, in particular, it told them next to nothing at all. It threw a veil over their existence at first, it let their character appear only by snatches for some time; till, latest and fullest of all, it proclaimed their hostility to man. When the fathers dogmatised on the obscure hints contained, or thought by them to be contained, in Scripture on the two first points, the results were such as might have been anticipated. They failed in making Scripture speak plainly, where Scripture was designedly reserved or mute. Taking Gen. vi. 2 sqq. for his text, St. Justin Martyr (Apol. ii. 5) described demons as the fruit of an illicit intercourse between the sons of God and the daughters of men, or between angels and women; and declared that the names given by them to their progeny were those which poets and mythologists in after times attributed to the gods of Greece and Rome. Athenagoras (Apol. c. 25), Tertullian (De Virg. Vel. c. 7, and Apol. c. 22, with the note of the Oxford Tr.), and others shared his opinion; not but that he may have derived it from Josephus (Ant. i. 3). Lactantius (Divin. Inst. ii. 15) improved upon it by characterising the event in question as the sin by which angels fell; attributing the fall of Satan himself (ib. c. 9) to a higher and earlier cause. Origen, in all probability, with a full perception of the difficulties involved in these positions, abstains from advocating any view but what he calls the common one. "Videamus," he says in his work on Principles (i. 7), "quæ sint de quibus disserere convenit secundum dogma nostrum: id est, secundum Ecclesie fidem. Omnes animæ, atque omnes rationabiles naturæ factæ sunt, vel creatæ: sive sanctæ sint, sive nequam . . . quoniam quidem omnia a Deo per Christum facta sunt, sicut generaliter Joannes docet in Evangelio (St. John i. 1-3). Per species autem et numeros ordinatè describens ea quæ facta sunt, Paulus apostolus disserit hoc modo, quo omnia ostendat facta esse per Christum dicens: 'Et omnia in Ipso creatæ sunt, quæ in coelis sunt, et quæ in terrâ' . . . (Col. i. 16). Quòd ergò sunt, non est proprium, nec sempiternum, sed a Deo datum . . . (ib. ii. 9). Est etiam illud in ecclesiastica prædicatione, esse angelos Dei quosdam et virtutes bonas, qui Eï ministrant ad salutem hominum consummandam: sed quod isti creati sint, vel quales, aut quomodo sint, non satis in manifesto designatur . . . De diabolo et angelis ejus contrariisque virtutibus ecclesiastica prædicatione docuit, quoniam sunt quidem hæc; quæ autem sint, aut quomodo sint, non satis clarè exposuit. Apud plurimos tamen ista habetur opinio, quòd angelus fuerit iste diabolus, et apostata effectus, quamplurimos angelorum secum declinare persuaserit, qui, et nunc usque, angeli ipsius nuncupantur . . . (Præf. §§ 10 and 6). Unde constat, quòd execrabiles illos fecit prævaricatio, non natura,—as he says elsewhere (in Exod. Hom. viii. 2). Other fathers expressed themselves with less reserve. According to St. Chrysostom (in Gen. i. Hom. ii. 2), Moses had deliberately refrained from saying anything about the creation of angels. SS. Ambrose (in Psal. i. 2), Basil (Hexæm. i. 5), and Jerome (in Tit. i. 2-9, and Vallars. ad l.) maintained that they were created ages before the creation described by him. “Six thousand years are not yet completed of our time,” says St. Jerome, “and how many limitless periods, what number of previous times, how many beginnings of ages, must we picture to ourselves in which angels, thrones, dominions, and other powers have served God, and without changes or qualifications of seasons subsisted at his command?” St. Augustine contended for the opposite view with more success. He pleaded that the Psalmist (Ps. cxlviii. 2, sqq.) would never have placed angels at the head of the created universe described by Moses, had they not been created at the same time themselves. Nor, again, could it have been said in Job (xxxviii. 7), “Quandò facta sunt sidera, laudaverunt Me voce magnà omnes angeli Mei,” had their creation not preceded that of the stars on the fourth day. Taking his stand, then, on Gen. i. 1-5, or the work of the first day, and contrasting the creation of light then, with the creation of lights on the fourth, he pronounced that it was not the material light, but the immaterial, or angelic host, that was called into being, when God said: “Let there be light.” Accordingly God bore testimony to this light, as it started into being, that “it was good.” But He bestowed no such approval on what followed: “God divided the light from the darkness,” it is said; “and God called the light day, and the darkness night:” but neither act elicits any comment. The separation between the material light and darkness three days afterwards, on the other hand, was accompanied by just the declaration which is wanting here, “God saw that it was good” (v. 19). St. Augustine thus made this contrast his ground for concluding that it must have been the separation between the elect and fallen angels that was chronicled in the former case, so that the sin of angels, like that of man, happened on the day of their birth. Again, remarking that the day on which their creation and sin happened, is called “one day,” not the first, in the LXX., he concluded once more that it was meant to be kept distinct from the rest—whether the rest are to be considered ordinary days or not—as having neither date nor duration assigned to it (De Civ. D. xi. 9-33; De Gen.

imp. Lib. § 20-28). This, of course, was all speculation with him, and might be criticised in detail: μία σαββάτων, for instance, St. Matt. xxviii. 1, is rightly translated “prima sabbati;” still it is, substantially, the view which has obtained most credence; and was, according to some, raised to the rank of a dogma by the third Lateran council, A.D. 1215 (can. i.; comp. the commentators on Lombard’s Sentences, ii. 2 sqq.).

We may now pass to the question what their sin was. Bishop Bull has shewn conclusively (Def. Fid. Nic. iii. 5, 1 sqq., Oxt. transl. 1852) that several of the ante-Nicene fathers, including Tertullian and Lactantius, St. Athanasius himself and others in later times, attributed to the Son of God “a certain nativity,” dating from the creation of all things, and quite distinct from His eternal generation. He was called “first-born of every creature,” by St. Paul (Col. i. 16) on the same principle: “for by Him were all things created,” as it is expressly stated in the next verse. Thus the occasion to which they refer is His coming forth (προέλευσις) from the Father to create the world, and His manifestation to the world just made. Or, to quote from St. Paul again—and in terms still more to the point—“When He bringeth in the first-begotten into the world He saith, ‘And let all the angels of God worship Him’” (Heb. i. 6). St. Paul is here quoting the 7th verse of the Psalm “Dominus reparavit” (96 or 7). We must conclude, therefore, that he considered the whole Psalm a glowing commemoration of that event. And thus, whether envy—which was the opinion of Lactantius (Div. Inst. ii. 9, with Dufreynoy’s note)—or pride—which was the opinion of the fathers in general—constituted the sin of angels, it was evoked in any case by their having to do obeisance to the Son of God on their creation, according to the teaching of the church at large, splendidly drawn out by our great national poet (Par. Lost, v. 600 sqq.). Finally, that it began with one and spread to the rest through him, is a point on which there never have been two opinions in the church. To the problem of heathen philosophy—ποθέν τὸ κακόν; Christianity was unanimous at the outset in collecting from the books of the New Testament this practical answer—Satan was the original sinner. His sin, caused exclusively by his own spontaneous act, introduced evil into the world. He first communicated the disease to angels, and then to man: God having created both upright, and punished neither till they had each done wrong. If it was asked who Satan was, it replied unhesitatingly that he had been identified by Christ Himself as chief of those demons, with whose characteristics all were familiar, and who were then worshipped with idolatrous rites (St. Luke ix. 14-20). St. John had further characterised him as the “serpent” and “devil” of the Old Testament (Rev. xx. 2), and added emphatically that the purpose for which Christ had come was to destroy his works (i. 3, 9).

What he had actually lost by his sin was less obvious at first sight; yet the fathers were persuaded that they found it explained to them in Scripture with tolerable precision. St. Gregory the Great (Moral. xxxiv. 23 sqq.) understands both what is said of Behemoth, “Ipse est principium viarum Dei” (Job xl. 14), and what is said of Leviathan, “Non est super terram potestas, quae compareret ei" (ib. xli. 24), of him literally. "Quamvis enim internae felicitatis beatitudinem perdidit, naturae tamen suae magnitudinem non amisit, cujus adhaec viribus humana omnia superat." He has only the same explanation to offer of the verse which says: "There was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord: and Satan came also among them" (ib. i. 6). "Valdè quaerendum est, quomodò inter electos angelos Satan adesse potuerit, qui ab eorum sorte, exigente superbiâ, dudum damnatus exivit. Sed rectè inter eos adfuisse describitur, quia etsi beatitudinem perdidit, naturam tamen iis similem non amisit: et si meritis praegravatur, conditione naturae subtilis attollitur" (Moral. ii. 4). If bad and good angels were thrown together at one time in the courts of heaven, bad and good men are thrown together in the church militant on earth still. But there are some positive grounds for assuming his condition under the Gospel to have changed materially from what it had been under the Law. The kingdom of Christ has been established in heaven as well as on earth; and in heaven of course, with most grandeur, of the two. When our Lord, therefore, said in laying its foundations, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven," it was the simple fact that He was enunciating, as St. Cyril says: "For before the Incarnation of the Saviour, Satan had dominion over the world, and was worshipped by almost everybody. But he fell like lightning at last, when from having been worshipped by the multitudes he had enthralled, he came to be trodden under foot by his very worshippers" (in S. Luc. x. 18). This is a point to which we shall have to recur again, and pursue much further. There is another point demanding our attention which should be brought out first. The fact enunciated by our Lord was a distinct fulfilment of prophecy. The prophet Isaiah had apostrophised Lucifer falling from heaven ages before; and in his fall the fathers with one consent saw the fall of Satan foreshadowed. In the words of St. Augustine: "What is here written in figure of the king of Babylon, and said, either of, or to him in the letter, is to be understood of the devil" (De Doct. Christ. iii. 37). "Unde et Salvator ad discipulos loquitur: 'Videbam Satanam quasi fulgur de coelo cadentem,'" adds St. Jerome (in Is. vi. 14, 12). This, again, will account for St. Jude speaking of him and his in plain terms, as "the angels who kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation" (v. 6); and for St. Paul styling him "the prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2); and them "the rulers of the darkness of this world" (ib. v. 12), &c.

Such designations are for the first time given them in the New Testament; just as in the Old Testament the ordinary name for him is the "Devil" or slanderer: not "Satan," or the adversary—never the "Tempter"—never the "Evil one"—and for them "demons," never "unclean spirits." We might string together a list of passages from the New Testament warning the individual Christian against their assaults, and assuring him of his perfect ability through Christ to overcome them all. It would be difficult to select one passage from the Old Testament of this character. Under the Law, he and they are represented as being served by men with idolatrous rites: under the Gospel, he and they are represented as being impotent to cope with any Christian who is true to his profession. Thus a contrast is observable between the condition of the fallen angels under the Law, and since the Law, indirectly recognised everywhere by the fathers, yet hardly brought out by them into such prominence as it deserves—a contrast apparently dictated by the special features of each dispensation in succession, and marking under both periods a correspondence between the true and false systems too regular and elaborate to have been undesigned. What St. Paul says of the tabernacle that it was "a figure of the time then present" (Heb. ix. 9) might have been said equally well of both dispensations, and of the false system in both cases as well as the true.

The Law, for instance, was from beginning to end a system of external observances and material sacrifices, as St. Paul there characterises it. People satisfied their duties, when their offerings were ceremonially faultless, and offered at the proper time and place. By comparison, their prayers were few and optional. When difficulties arose, they enquired of the Lord through the priest or prophet; and if they came with good dispositions, replies were vouchsafed them, betokening supernatural foreknowledge. We know from the books of the Old and New Testaments when this system began and ended. We know from other sources that, during the same period, a ceremonial which was the exact pendant to it prevailed all over the Gentile world. Temples, altars, sacrifices, priests, oracles, were just as indispensable to the false religions of Egypt, Assyria, Phoenicia, Greece, and Rome, as to the true religion of the Hebrew Lawgiver, with this one difference; namely, that images, which had divine honours paid them under the former, were absolutely condemned in the latter. Then, as they closed respectively, there was another contrast brought to light, which, though it had existed all through, had hitherto been hid or unheeded. The Law was explained to have been "received by the disposition of angels" (Acts vii. 53), or to have been "spoken by angels" (Heb. ii. 2), though it prohibited any worship except to One, who was no angel, but Jehovah. Under the idolatrous system opposed to it a multitude of demons, differently named in different places, but everywhere subordinate to a chief of their own class, and whose name varied as much as their own, were the recognised deities, one and all. Heaven was considered to be their abode in the one case, and of the angels who waited upon Jehovah in the other. Both systems—at least in every place where they had ever opposed each other—came to an end simultaneously, making way for a true and false system of another kind. And, just at their close, a new phenomenon, strangely similar, appeared in both. They who had been served with idols possessed themselves in many cases of the bodies of men: He who had been worshipped as Jehovah became man. Then it was, that their mutual relations began to be made patent to man. There never was any collision, properly speaking, between them. They were the first to proclaim His Divinity, and their own impotence to resist His commands. Similarly, the part which they were to play in future was in many respects the reverse of what they had played hitherto. Their abode was to be no longer heaven, where Christ was about to reign with His saints; and they were to be vanquished where they had been previously worshipped on earth, as St. Cyril says. Churches were to be erected where their temples had stood; images of martyrs and confessors were to take the place of their idols. Pagan manners and literature were to be displaced by Christian. All this it would be beyond their power to avert. Their action was to be limited, in future, to the individual. They might tempt him to do wrong—Christians were guaranteed heaven under the system which displaced the Law, through the indwelling of the Spirit, if they remained true to their engagements. But whether they would remain true to their engagements or not, was a point which from first to last rested with themselves. They were not compelled to accept—they were free to the last to reject—the heaven which had been won for them. The only path that would conduct them thither had not been traced by themselves, and was a rugged one. It was, indeed, easier for them to break, than to keep, their engagements. There was no period of their lives when they could say they were proof against relapse—such relapse, too, as precluded recovery. Then, in order that nothing might be wanting to their probation in this life, power was given to “the devil and his angels” to “sift them as wheat”—to endeavour to undermine their resolutions, and frustrate the work of the Spirit of Christ in their souls, though nobody could fall a victim to them but by his own fault.

Such, then, is the full account of this matter. The struggle between good and evil under the Christian dispensation was to be waged by spiritual agencies exclusively—with spiritual too, not carnal weapons. There was the spiritual society called the church, with her invisible means of grace and invisible Head, assailable through her members, on one side: on the other, those formerly called demons, but now “unclean spirits,” with the devil, or Satan, the Tempter, or Evil One, for their leader: all equally concealed from view. But the issues of the contest had been decided in advance by Christ in His own Person, and the final triumph of His elect people foretold by Him and His apostles in the plainest terms.

It only remains to substantiate these positions in detail from the fathers. 1. For the general principle involved in them we may refer to the first and last of the seven rules of Tichonius—“De Domino et Ejus corpore,” and “De Diabolo et Ejus corpore,” respectively—for interpreting Scripture, commended by St. Augustine (Migne, P. trol. xviii. 15 sqq.), and to the last twelve books of his own great work (De Civ. Dei, xi. 1 sqq.) where the rise and progress of the two rival cities are sketched. 2. That “the things which the Gentiles sacrificed they sacrificed to demons”—in the words of St. Paul (1 Cor. x. 20)—“The worship of demons,” Origen tells Celsus, “is the worship of those who are called gods: ‘omnes enim dii gentium daemonia,’ as the Psalmist says (xcv. 5, sec. lxx.) . . . Hence we avoid the service of demons as a pest: designating by that name all the accustomed service, with altars, images, or temples, paid to the gods by the Greeks” (c. Cels. vii. 69). And again:

“Celsus makes his next point what both the Jews and Christians affirm with one mouth, when called upon to explain why they abstain from meats offered to idols; saying that they who have devoted themselves to the God of all must not banquet with devils” (ib. viii. 31). It was on this account that abstinence from meats offered to idols was enjoined by the apostles themselves (ib. c. 29).

“You renounce the devil . . . and all his pomp,” says St. Cyril; “now by the pomp of the devil are meant theatres, horse-racing, hunting with hounds, and all such vanities . . . all the dainty dishes exhibited at idolatrous gatherings . . . common and indiffererent in themselves, but which on the demons being invoked over them become tainted. After this you renounce all his worship. Now the worship of the devil is prayer made before idolatrous shrines: all that is done in honour of dumb idols; the lighting of lamps, the burning of incense by springs and rivers, which some, deceived by dreams or by the demons themselves, have been led to frequent, hoping to get cured of their bodily pains and the like. Go not after any such. Augury, divination, omens from sounds, amulets, inscriptions on leaves, enchantments, and occult arts of every sort, all such are services of the devil” (Cat. xix. 6–8). Hence, “they who know the Christian literature both of the Old and the New Testament,” says St. Augustine, “are far from imputing it as a crime to the heathen, that they build temples, inaugurate priesthoods, and offer sacrifices: their crime being that they honour idols and demons with such. . . . When God is thus served, agreeably with His own inspiration and direction, it is true religion; when demons are thus served, to gratify their impious pride, it is baneful superstition . . . Hence it is plain enough to perceive that it is not immolating in the abstract, but immolating to idols and demons, which true religion condemns in the Gentile ritual . . . Nor can the Gentiles excuse their sacrilegious rites and images, by investing them with a poetic meaning; for it is creature-worship that is at the bottom of them all, in flagrant opposition to the worship that is due to God alone” (Ep. cii. § 18–20, ad Deogr.).

Several of the earlier fathers, as St. Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Tertullian, Minucius Felix, Origen, Arnobius, and even some contemporaries of St. Augustine, as St. Gregory Nazianzen, and St. Jerome, went so far as to credit demons with a literal appetite for rich meats and savoury smells. “Daemones indigere cibo, attrahere nidores, satiari sanguine, delectari sulfitu, constans est Origenis opinio,” says Delarue (in Orig. Ehort. ad Martyr. c. 45). Indeed he believed they had bodies like men. But St. Augustine started a truer and deeper account of the matter. He taught that they desired sacrifice for no other reason than because they knew it to be due to the true God. “What they relished, in reality, were not, as Porphyry says, and as others think, sacrificial odours but divine honours. . . . They, then, whose aspiration is to be thought divinities, are charmed with the mind of the suppliant infinitely more than any number of smoking victims; that having obtained possession of it, they may stand between it and the true God, and so prevent man from becoming His sacrifice, while sacrificing to another than Him" (De Civ. D. x. 19). "Atque adeo Scripturae sanctae stupri vocabulo utuntur in idolatriae exprobratione," as Tertullian puts it (De Idolat. c. 1). "Fraudis conditio ea est . . . si quis alienum rapiat, aut alii debitum denegat. Et utique erga hominem admissa fraus maximi criminis nomen est. At enim idolatria fraudem Deo facit, honores Illi suos denegans, et conferens aliis, ut fraudi etiam contumeliam conjugat." There was a time formerly, when idolatry was not, he continues: "Previously to the development of that monstrosity, there were temples without images, as indeed is still evident from what remains of them here and there. It was idolatry nevertheless in fact, though not in name: just as it needs neither idol nor temple to be so still. But after that the devil had imported into the world makers of statues, images, and the like, the evil acquired a name and a celebrity from idols which had been wanting to it in its ruder stage . . . and which was the reason of all such arts being forbidden under the Law. For Enoch had foretold long before, that all the elements, and all the animate portion of the world in sky, sea, and earth, would become idolatry in the hands of the demons or fallen angels, that they might be worshipped as God, instead of the Lord" (ib. c. 4). Hence, whether it commenced in element, animal, or hero worship, was, and had long been, a mere antiquarian question: "Idolatria, non propter personas quae assumuntur, sed propter officia ista damnata est, quae ad daemones pertinent" (ib. c. 15). According to Lactantius, astrology, soothsaying, augury, the so-called oracles, necromancy, magic, and whatever evil devices were practised by men in public or secret, had originated with the demons (Div. Inst. ii. 17); indeed the prophets of the Old Testament had intimated as much. From this standpoint the fathers in general could account without difficulty for the action of a superhuman power in the system opposed to them, when pressed with evidences of it which they could not dispute. "Every spirit is winged," says Tertullian, "demons as well as angels. They are thus everywhere in a trice. For them the whole world is one spot; and what happens in every part of it is both known to, and made known by them with the same ease. Thus their speed is taken for omniscience, their nature being unknown; and every now and then they get credited with having brought to pass what they announce" (Apol. c. 22). St. Augustine supplements this by a further consideration: "Accessit etiam daemonibus pro tam longum tempus quo eorum vita protenditur, rerum longè major experientia, quam potest hominibus propter brevitate[m] vitae provenire" (De Div. Doctr. c. 3). By way of preface to his tract on this subject, he tells us he was sitting at his own house, surrounded by a number of lay friends, in Easter week, conversing on the great controversy between Christians and pagans, when, incidentally, questions having been started on the divination of demons, one of the party maintained that the destruction of the temple of Serapis at Alexandria, which had just taken place, had been foretold by somebody some time before (comp. Soc. E. II. v. 16-17). To this St. Augustine replied that it was not more surprising that demons should have the means of knowing and predicting the destruction in store for their own temple and image, than the various other things which within certain limits they were permitted to know and to foretell. It was the discussion that ensued which suggested this treatise. We may infer, therefore, that the views there expressed were such as average laymen of the 5th century would be ready to adopt as their own. The decline of paganism in general, and of the oracles in particular, wherever the gospel was preached, was another prolific topic with the fathers, as well as a most certain fact. "Formerly," says St. Athanasius, "the world was filled with oracles and their frauds; and the responses of Delphi, Dodona, Boeotia, Lycia, Libya, Egypt, and the Cabiri, together with the Pythian priestess, occupied a high place in the imagination of men. But now since Christ has come to be preached everywhere, their madness has ceased, and they have not a diviner left. Formerly demons practised upon mankind by spectres and enchantments; and by getting possession of fountains and streams, and wood and stone, drove the weakminded out of their senses. But now, since the manifestation of the Divine Word, all this has stopped. . . . Formerly, men worshipped heroes, and the beings called Zeus, Cronos, and Apollo by the poets. . . . But now, since the Saviour appeared, they have been exposed in their true character as mortal men; and Christ alone has been recognised among men as the true God—the Divine Word, and God as well. Lastly, why should I speak of the art of magic that was so highly prized, seeing that before the Word became incarnate it was in high force and repute with the Egyptians, Indians, and Chaldeans, to the amazement of all beholders, but has now by the manifestation of the Word, and the presence of truth, been convicted and utterly swept away?" (De Incarn. v. c. 47). "Who can fail to see that the teaching of the Saviour is increasing everywhere, and every species of idolatry, and all that is opposed to His faith, decreasing and tottering to its fall?" (ib. c. 55). Eusebius confirms this by the express testimonies of Plutarch and Porphyry (Praep. Ev. v. 16-17).

Φοίβος μαρτυροῦντο Θεῶν μῶρον οὐκ' ἔσσοντα, says St. Gregory Nazianzen (Carm. II. 2. 7. 253), alluding to the oracles and Sibylline prophecies that, no less than the true prophets, had foretold their fall. "Hoc autem significat," as St. Jerome writes of Isaiah (Comment. XII. 41), "quod post adventum Christi omnia idola conticuerint: uti Apollo Delphicus, et Loxias, Deliusque et Clarius, et caetera idola, futurorum scientiam pollicentia, quae reges potentissimos deceperunt."

There was another fact akin to this, and in truth explicable by it alone, to which the fathers were unanimous in appealing, and appealing in such a way, that, to believe they misrepresented it, would be tantamount to maintaining that there was a conspiracy between heathenism and Christianity to deceive mankind, all the time they were waging war to the knife with each other. It was that demons had to comply with any summons addressed to them by Christians invoking the name of Christ, or making the sign of the cross. Tertullian thus openly challenges his opponents: "I will not argue the question any further in words; there is a speedier way of demonstrating on which side the truth lies. Let one be brought before your tribunal, confessedly possessed with a demon. Then let that spirit be commanded to speak by any Christian, and he will profess himself a demon with as much truth as he professes himself a god elsewhere with falsehood. Similarly, let one be produced of those who are thought to be acted upon by a god . . . unless they all confess themselves to be demons, not daring to lie to a Christian, let the blood of the adventuresome Christian be shed on the spot" (Apol. c. 23). Another African, Minucius Felix, says: "Believe them to be demons on their own shewing, and confessing the truth about themselves. For no sooner are they adured by the only true God, than involuntarily the wretched bodies of which they have gained possession are set in a tremor all over, and either they take themselves off at once with a rush, or steal away by degrees, according to the effect produced by the faith of the patient or the grace of the operator" (Octav. c. 27). If Tertullian and Minucius had spoken thus alone, it might have been set down to temperament; but when the same thing is stated, as a fact with which all were familiar, by such witnesses, and so widely separated from each other by age, country, language, and even theological views, as St. Justin Martyr (Apol. ii. 6 and c. Tryph. c. 30), Theophilus (ad Autol. ii. 8), Origen (c. Cels. i. 6), Lactantius (Div. Inst. iv. 27), Eusebius (Præp. Ev. iii. 6), and St. Athanasius (De Incarn. v. c. 47-8), to name no more; and when the cessation of such miracles is allowed honestly by writers of no less credit in after times, we should have literally no alternative left us in reason but to admit the fact as we find it stated, even if it stood alone; but it comes to us trebly confirmed, when we find it alike explaining, and explained by other contemporaneous phenomena, for which there is at least as much heathen as Christian evidence.

Lastly, with respect to the part played by demons under the Christian dispensation. "You must beware," says St. Cyprian, "of their subtle and more clandestine machinations, and not merely those which are plain to all. For can any thing evince greater craft or subtlety than the game played by our adversary, who on finding himself detected and overthrown by the coming of Christ, and by the salutary flood of light thus shed over all lands for the saving of mankind, and beholding his own idols and shrines deserted by reason of the increasing shoals of believers, struck out a new method of attack, and served himself of the very profession of Christianity to deceive the unwary, by inventing schisms and heresies: hoping by these means to subvert the faith, corrupt the truth, and dis sever unity" (De Unit. Eccl. c. 3). We find the same sentiment expressed in almost every chapter of ecclesiastical history treating of heresies or their authors, "About the same time," says Eusebius, "Manes, or the madman, as his name imports, common also to the demoniacal heresy founded by him, commenced his reprobate career, the demon and adversary of God, Satan himself, urging him on to the destruction of many" (E. H. vii. 31). In the same spirit Constantine conjured Arius and Alexander, on hearing of their dispute, "to withdraw from the temptations of the devil while they could" (Soc. i. 7).

Persecutions, again, were regarded as his work, in primitive times, no less than heresies, and on grounds no less obvious. For Christians were then persecuted on no other grounds than for being Christians, and when arrested the alternative was invariably proposed to them of sacrificing to demons, that is, to the heathen gods. Hence, Tertullian, in his soul-stirring address to the martyrs: "Domus quidem diaboli est carcer, in qua familiam suam continet. Sed vos ideò in carcerem pervenistis, ut illum etiam in domo sua conculcatis, jam enim eum foris congressi conculcaveratis" (c. 1).

"The greatness of our troubles here," say the Christians of Lyons and Vienne in their affecting letter to their brethren in Asia (Euseb. E. H. v. 1), and the intense wrath of the Gentiles against the saints, and what our blessed martyrs have gone through, are past words to describe: the adversary having put forth all his strength by way of giving us a foretaste of what his uncompromising opposition is to be. For he has gone every length in practising and disciplining his emissaries against the servants of God, excluding them from all places of public resort alike, and not allowing them to shew themselves abroad anywhere. But he has been opposed by the grace of God mightily working in our behalf, by which the weak have been delivered, and those possessed of powers of endurance like rocks, called to the front, to draw off the whole brunt of his assault upon themselves, and they have withstood him to the death." This is prefatory to a long list of martyrdoms under Verus. There is a similar preface to the martyrdoms under Diocletian by Eusebius himself (ib. viii. 4), and both should be read side by side with the edicts of Maximinus (ib. ix. 7, and De Mart. Palest. c. 9), and Julian (Soz. E. H. v. 16), issued with the avowed object of upholding heathenism. At the same time this view was not held without qualification even in those days: as we find Eusebius confessing, almost in the same breath, that the last of the persecutions recorded by him was occasioned, at least in part, by the backslidings and internal dissensions, consequent on success, of the Christians themselves (E. H. viii. 1).

Nor was this qualification, in general, absent from the minds of the fathers in dealing with psychological questions. The devil was neither supposed by them to tempt Christians to sin in every case, nor to be able to force them to sin in any. Consequently, the guilt of their sin in every case rested with themselves alone. They could always resist, and overcome him if they pleased, and there were times frequently, when he could not even be charged with having suggested sin to them in any way. St. Chrysostom says no less nobly than truly, "Sin is, of the two, more formidable than the demon . . . nor is it so great a matter to be freed from the demon as from sin. The demon is no real impediment to our getting to heaven, but rather contributes to it, by adding to their virtue whom he tempts. Whereas sin excludes from heaven" (in Act. Hom. xli. 3-4). St. Augustine thus strikes the balance between ourselves and him. "The corruption of the body which weighs down the soul is not the cause, but the punishment of the first sin, nor was it the corruptible body that made the soul sin, but the soul the body: and although from this corruption of the flesh a number of incentives to vice spring, and such desires are themselves vicious, still we must not make the flesh responsible for all the vices we commit, as though we charged no portion of them upon the devil, who is distinct from the flesh." (De Civ. D. xiv. 3.) As St. Leo says, "He is always on the alert, ready to transform himself into an angel of light, to lay his snares here there and everywhere, and leave no stone unturned to corrupt the faith of those who believe. He is well aware whose desires are inflammable, whose besetting sin is gluttony, whose fondness for luxuries he may work upon, where he may instil envy, whom he may break with sorrow, deceive with joy, prostrate with fear, cajole with flattery. He is conversant with the habits of all, ventilates their cares, scrutinises their affections, tries his worst to do mischief wherever he finds the greatest desire to do good." (Serm. in Nat. D. vii. 3.) But all in vain, if he is resisted as he should be. "Let it be granted," says St. Augustine, "that the devil makes suggestions to us occasionally, far from his forcing the unwilling, everybody becomes his of their own accord. For he neither seduces nor entraps any body, between whom and himself he has not already discovered a likeness. Sometimes he encounters one who lusts, and his lust opens a door by which the suggestion of the devil enters. Sometimes it is one who fears, and the devil tells him to avoid what he knows inspires him with fear: another he bids get possession of what he knows he covets. Thus he enters by these two doors of fear and desire. Close them, and you fulfil what you have just heard read in the epistle: 'Neither give place to the devil.' For there the apostle wished to shew that though the devil may enter and take possession, it is man in every case who lets him in" (Serm. de Script. xxxii. 11).

In conclusion, as St. Chrysostom says, "It is not in this case, as with athletes. For there you must prostrate your adversary, or you have not conquered. Here you conquer, merely by keeping your footing. . . . There two strive for the mastery, so that one is crowned, only when the other is laid on his back. Here it is otherwise, all that the devil is anxious about being our defeat. I have conquered therefore, when I have defeated his purpose. . . . Though I have not succeeded in throwing him down, still, if I have not been thrown myself, I am victor. To be sure, the victory of victories is, when he has been trampled under foot, as he was by St. Paul. . . . Let us imitate the apostle, then, and try to be superior, or at least to give him no handle. Riches at once furnish him with a handle. Money and vainglory not merely set him up, but render him furious. Why strive with him at all? Once come to close quarters, and it is uncertain what the issue will be. Trample him under foot, and your victory is assured. Be it ours therefore to trample the power of the devil under foot, first our sins, then all that relates to this life—wrath, arrogance, concupiscence, all the affections and lusts—that when we go hence, we may not be found to have betrayed the power given us by God, nor forfeit the reward that is in store for us. If we have failed in this, who will entrust greater things to our keeping? . . .

If we have not vanquished him who has been put under us so completely, with what assurance can we present ourselves at the house of our Father?" (in Eph. c. vi.; Hom. xxii. 5).

Such, in general, is the teaching of the fathers respecting the devil and his angels of the New Testament: and the demons, gods of the nations, or idols of the Old. Nor can it be denied that it is on the whole consistent and intelligible, based upon facts, and in accordance with Scripture. When our Lord told the Seventy, on their re-joining Him (St. Luke x. 18), "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven"; and when he told St. Paul, in appearing to him (Acts xxvi. 18) that He sent him "unto the Gentiles . . . to turn them from the power of Satan unto God," there can be no dispute but that He gave utterance to what has since become fact. The worship of idols has ceased, wherever it has crossed the path of the Gospel from east to west; and Christ is and has long been worshipped where Satan and his angels have been dispossessed. Tempter is the highest office which Satan can fill in Christian lands, and even in this he cannot succeed with any who resist him. People have come to doubt of his existence, from seeing so little of his power, where he was once worshipped as God. These facts have neither diminished in breadth, nor lost in importance, since patristic times; and the spirit of confidence and agreement with which the fathers expatiated on them in their infancy is much the most surprising part of their theory. Whatever opinions any of them put forward that were peculiar have been tacitly abandoned, and are therefore entitled to no notice, where the antiquarian point of view would be out of place. Similarly, neither is this the place for unravelling the mazes of gentile mythology nor for enumerating the oracles, and other modes of divining then in vogue, nor for distinguishing between those Sibylline books which had a heathen, and those which had a Christian origin.

DEMOPHILUS, bishop of Constantinople, A.D. 370; expelled 380; died 386; formerly bishop of Berea. He was born of good family in Thessalonica (Philostorg. H. E. ix. 14). Liberius, however, in a letter from his exile in Thrace (Hilarius Pictav. vol. ii. frag. 6, Patrol. x. 690; Baronius, ad ann. 357), mentions one Demophilus, whom he speaks of as a brother bishop, and who appears to have taken part in persuading him to sign the creed adopted at the synod of Sirmium. If this is the same Demophilus, the Berea of which he was bishop was probably in Thrace. He was present at the council of Rimini in 359, and was one of the Arian bishops who were deposed at the council (Soc. H. E. ii. 37), though the sentence does not appear to have been carried into effect.

On the death of Eudoxius in 370 he was elected by the Arians to the bishopric of Constantinople (Soc. H. E. iv. 14; Soz. H. E. vi. 13). Theodorus, bishop of Heraclea, appears to have taken the chief part in his ordination as holding the exarchate of Thrace. The people, however, were much divided in opinion, so that many substituted the cry "unworthy," ἀνάξιτος, for the common formula ἐπίσκοπος with which the declaration of an election was usually received (Philostorgius, H. E. ix. 10). The orthodox party chose Evagrius for their bishop, and he was ordained by Eustathius, the deposed bishop of Antioch. This was the signal for an outburst of fury on the part of the Arians.

Eustathius and Evagrius were banished by Valens, and their followers bitterly persecuted. It is recorded that eighty presbyters, who had gone to Nicomedia with a petition to the emperor, were by his orders put on board a ship, as if to be conveyed to exile in Thrace, but at the entrance of the Propontis the ship was set on fire and abandoned by her crew, so that the prisoners perished in the flames (Soc. H. E. iv. 14, 16; Soz. H. E. vi. 13, 14). Demophilus, soon after his accession to the throne of Constantinople, went to Cyzicus in conjunction with Dorotheus, or Theodorus, of Heraclea, afterwards bishop of Antioch, the same who took the principal part in his ordination, in order to procure the election of an Arian bishop, the see having been vacant since the banishment of Eunomius. But the people of Cyzicus refused to acknowledge them till they had anathematised Aetius, Eunomius, and their followers. When the patriarch and his friends had given this proof of their orthodoxy, they were permitted to ordain a bishop chosen by the people. It is added that the bishop who was ordained straightway and clearly taught the consubstantial faith (Philostorgius, H. E. ix. 13).

In 380 changed times came for the patriarch, and for the Arians, not merely of Constantinople, but of the neighbouring cities. It is for this that the reign of Theodosius and the patriarchate of Demophilus are so memorable. The emperor Theodosius offered to confirm him in his see, if he would subscribe the Nicene Creed. Demophilus refused, and was immediately ordered to give up his churches. He then called his followers together, and, standing upright in their midst, repeated the text, "If they persecute you in one city flee into another," saying, "Since the emperor excludes us from the churches, we will henceforth hold our assemblies without the city," and then retired, with Lucius of Alexandria and some others, to a place of worship without the walls (Soc. H. E. v. 7). The churches of Constantinople, which had for forty years been in the hands of the Arians, were now restored to the orthodox. This change of possession went on in the churches of other cities, and made disturbances. This was, in fact, the general disestablishment of Arianism and the re-establishment of Catholicism. It was a grand event in the history of the church, and the leading point in the career of Demophilus. Philostorgius (H. E. ix. 19) adds that he went to his own city, Berea. But this must have been some time afterwards, or he must have returned from exile, for he represented the Arian party at the synod held in Constantinople, A.D. 383 (Soc. H. E. v. 10; Soz. H. E. vii. 12).

Philostorgius says that Demophilus was wont to throw everything into confusion, especially the doctrines of the church. He gives a passage from a sermon preached by him at Constantinople, in which he compares the human nature of the Saviour as lost in the divine, in the same manner as a glass of milk poured into the sea. (Philostorgius, Patrol. Graec. lxx.; Sozom. and Socr. Patrol. Graec. lxxvii.) [P. O. and C. H.]

DEMOPHILUS, a monk, addressed in the 8th letter which appears under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite. (Patrol. Graec. iii. p. 1083; Ceillier, x. 552.) [W. M. S.]

DEMOSTHENES, the superintendent of the kitchen of the emperor Valens, who had wormed himself into his master's confidence, and arrogated the right of being a judge in theological controversies. When Valens was on his way to Caesarea, A.D. 371, Demosthenes was sent before him, to endeavour by his menaces to reduce Basil to submission to the emperor's wishes. His failure, and the quiet contempt with which, on a second occasion, Basil bade him be content with his culinary art, and not meddle with theology, are narrated in an earlier article (BASIL THE GREAT). If he is the same person with the Demosthenes, who four years later held the office of vicar of Pontus, we have in him one of the many examples presented by the history of the Eastern empire of the manner in which base arts raised the meanest persons to the highest dignities. This Demosthenes proved the great enemy of the orthodox, and, though quite ignorant of the outlines of the faith, espoused the cause of the semi-Arians, of whom he summoned a council at Ancyra, on which occasion he endeavoured to secure the arrest and imprisonment of Basil's brother, Gregory of Nyssa, on the charge of the malversation of some church funds (Basil, Epist. 264, 385, 405). [GREGORY NYSSEN.] In the spring of 276 Demosthenes summoned another synod of the religious enemies of Basil and Gregory, at Nyssa, at which Gregory was deposed, and an Arian put in his place (Epist. 10, 264). Theodotus, the orthodox bishop of Nicopolis, having died, he endeavoured to force on the church of that place a bishop consecrated by Eustathius of Sebaste. This attempt was unsuccessful (Epist. 192.) [E. V.]

DEMOSTRATUS, a writer whose works were in circulation among some heretics, opposed by Plotinus (Porphyry, Life of Plotinus, 16).

[G. S.]

DENEFRITH, the ninth bishop of Worcester. He was consecrated, according to Florence of Worcester, in 798, and made his profession of obedience to Aethelheard, archbishop of Canterbury. This document, which is preserved (Haddan and Stubbs. iii. 525), is remarkable as containing a considerable portion of the Athanasian creed. Denebert appears as attesting charters from 801 to 817, and died, according to Florence, in 822. Several acts of his, later than A.D. 800, appear among the Worcester charters in Kemble's Codex Diplomaticus, i. cf. Anf. Sac. i. 471. [S.]

DENEFRITH, the fifth bishop of Sherborne; his name is found attached to charters from 794 to 796, and he is possibly the unnamed bishop of Sherborne, who made his profession to archbishop Ethelheard (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 529; Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 620). [S.]

DENEHAEH, or DENEHEAH, abbat of Reculver, who received a grant from Eadbert of Kent by a charter of A.D. 747, considered spurious or doubtful. (Kemble, C. D. No. 1004; Birch, Fasti Monast. 62; Monast. Anglic. i. 454.) [C. H.]

DEOBYTA, or LEOBYT, of the 8th century, addressed in his third letter by Lullus, archbishop of Mainz. It is a letter of consolation. (Lullus, Epist. in Patrol. Lat. xvi. p. 820; Ceillier, xii. 131.) [W. M. S.]

DEOCARIUS, the seventh bishop of Antipolis, was present at the council of Châlons, in the time of king Clovis, A.D. 644, or according to Sirmundus 650. (Cointius, Annal. tom. iii. p. 173; Mabillon, ad ann. 658, §§ 63 and 64; Gall. Christ. iii. 1148.) [D. R. J.]

DEOCARUS, ST., abbat of Hasenrietanum, Herriadam, or Heidenheim, in the diocese of Eichstädt. Very little is known of St. Deocarus, except that he lived in the 8th century.

In 1316 his body, which had been buried in the chapel of St. Mary, afterwards a Capuchin monastery, was raised, and some relics therefrom were translated to the church of St. Lawrence, Nürnberg. In 1482 the body was translated to a new chapel at Herried, and through its virtue many blind, lame, and sick were supposed to have been cured. It is not known when St. Deocarus died, but he is commemorated on the 7th of June (AA. SS. Bolland. Jun. ii. ad diem, 7; Migne, Encycl. Théolog. xl. 737).

[D. R. J.]

DEOCHAIN. As we find erumther or priest used as an appellation in the Irish calendars, so we have also such entries as "Deochain Aedh, of Cuil-maine, Jul. 10 and Aug. 31," "Deochain Menn, of Chlainarathair, April 25" (standing possibly for Nenn or Nennius), and "Deochain Reat, March 3," where the ecclesiastical title of deacon is employed to designate the saint.

[J. G.]

DEODATUS (1), ST., abbat, Blois, was born at Bourges, and became a monk under St. Phaltrus in the monastery of Issoudun in Berri.

His legend is given as follows in a MS. of Rouen. With the permission of his abbat, he left the monastery, and went in quest of a solitude adapted to his wishes. He fled by night in company with a presbyter named Baudomirus, who had arrived there a few days previously. So swiftly did they run that they arrived at their destination (Blois) the same night. There Deodatus built for himself a cell, in which he lived alone. The fame of his sanctity and good works soon spread far and wide, and he was visited by king Clovis, who happened to be then at Vindeuicum during a campaign against the Goths, according to one of the saint's biographers, but the Bollandists say that it is the bellum Alamanicum which must be referred to. That expedition having at length proved successful, the king attributed his success to the prayers of Deodatus, whom he rewarded by giving him some extensive lands in the neighbourhood of his cell, and also 26 lbs. of gold and silver, that he might have the means of feeding the poor and supporting his disciples. Having done these things, king Clovis went to St. Remigius and received holy baptism. With the means thus placed at his disposal by the bounty of the king, Deodatus established a cloister, which harboured in his time as many as forty monks. He died in peace in the 6th century, and is commemorated on the 24th April. (AA. SS. Boll. April, iii. p. 273; Migne, Encycl. Théolog. xl. 737.) [D. R. J.]

DEODATUS (2), or ADEODATUS, tenth bishop of Mâcon, ordained St. Eligius presbyter, and was present at the council of Châlons A.D. 644, and the seventh year of the reign of king Clovis II. (Gall. Christ. iv. 1042; Audouenus, E'v'ij' Vita, cap. ii. in Patrol. Lat. lxxxvii. p. 477; Ceillier, xi. 754.) [D. R. J.]

(3) ST., or DIEUDONNÉ, or DIÉ, bishop of Nevers, and founder of the monastery of Jointures in the Vosges. His life was written in the 10th or 11th century by Valeandus, a monk of the abbey of Moyenmoutier, and is given in the 151st volume of Migne's Latin Patrology, page 611.

Deodatus is said to have been born towards the beginning of the 7th century, from one of the most illustrious families of western France. About the year 655 the people and clergy of Nevers, who knew his gifts, talents, and spotless life, chose him with one voice to be their bishop. He was present in 657 with St. Eloi, St. Onen, and St. Amand at the council of Sens.

Although eminently successful in the government of his flock, he felt attracted to a solitary life, asked his diocessans to choose a successor, and departed to the Vosges mountains, which were in the diocese of Teul. St. Bodon, bishop of Toul, allowed him to build cells for himself and his disciples. At Romont, a nobleman named Aselepas is said to have been so struck by a wonderful deed of Deodatus, that he built a monastery, where Deodatus left two of his disciples, Villigot and Martin, who became patrons of the priory of Romont.

Bishop Deodatus then passed to a place called Argentile, now Sainte-Hélène, where he began the foundations of a monastery. But the country people looked askance at his enterprise, and forced him to leave it incomplete.

He accordingly took to the mountains between Lothringen and Elsass, and having made his way into the forest of Hagenau, he settled in that part which is called Heiligenforst, the Holy Wood. Here he made acquaintance with St. Arbogaste, at that time leading a solitary life, and afterwards bishop of Strasburg.

But his neighbours again expressed their opposition to his residence, and he moved on to an island called Novientum, afterwards Ebersmünster, where had been formed since 661 a little settlement of solitaries, who received bishop Deodatus with joy. His reputation soon attracted a large number of followers; and the liberality of king Childeric II. enabled him to build a church in honour of St. Peter and St. Paul, in which he placed the relics of St. Maurice, which he had obtained from Ambrose, abbat of St. Maurice in Valais. He dedicated the church himself with much solemnity in the midst of a large concourse of Christians.

The government, however, of such a large community as Ebersmünster left him little time for contemplation. He gave up his office, and retired to a place near the town of Ammerschwihr, in the highlands of Elsass, whence he was for the third time driven away by the boorish population.

A lord of that country, named Hunus, touched by his misfortune, offered him one of his estates. But Deodatus replied that he had not quitted his bishopric to enter on other domains. He determined to find a place so deserted that none could feel jealousy at his presence.

Accordingly about the year 669 he returned to the Vosges, and stopped in a glen near the Meurthe, which he named Vallis Galilæa, and which is still called Val-de-St.-Dié. But this valley, then uninhabited, was soon thronged by numbers of devout persons desirous to place themselves under his guidance; and the solitude of the cell which he had built and the chapel which he had dedicated to St. Martin, where he lived in peace, eating only herbs and wild fruits, afforded him no longer the tranquillity for which he craved. He therefore built, at some distance from his cell, the monastery of Jointures, so called from the junction of the Rothbach with the Meurthe. The bishop of Toul expressed his consent, and Numerian, bishop of Treves, metropolitan of the province, granted bishop Deodatus the privilege of exercising episcopal functions in his monastery. He gave his monks the discipline of St. Columbanus.

Two leagues from Jointures was the monastery of Moyenmoutier, founded, after the example of Deodatus, by Hidulphus, formerly bishop of Treves. A very close intimacy sprang up between these two prelates. As Deodatus grew older, he redoubled his austerities. Feeling his end approach, he assembled all the community round his cell, gave them his last advice, and received the emblems of communion from the hands of his friend Hidulphus. He died in his friend's arms on June 19, A.D. 679.

His body was buried by his friend in the church of the Virgin. The chest which contained his bones was burned by the Swedes in 1635. The abbey of St.-Dié, round which grew up a town which bore its name, was in the middle of the 10th century made collegiate, and became a celebrated chapter of canons. In 1777 pope Pius VI. erected it into a bishopric. In 1802 this episcopal see was suppressed, but in 1821 it was restored by pope Pius VII. (Migne, Encycl. Théolo. xl. p. 745; Valcandi, Vitu S. Deodati, Patrol. Lat. cli. p. 611.) [W. M. S.]

DEODATUS (4), 28th bishop of Chartres, succeeded Gambertus, in the latter half of the 7th century. He consented to the founding of a new monastery by his mother Adrebertana, the deacon Chrotharius being appointed first abbat. He is buried at St. Martin's-in-the-Vale (Gall. Christ. viii. 1101). [D. R. J.]

(5) Bishop of Amiens, was 13th in succession, and lived in the latter half of the 7th century (Gall. Christ. ix. 1156). [D. R. J.]

(6) Or THEODATUS, ST., 38th bishop of Vienne. The biographers of this saint have filled many pages, if not volumes, with discussions about the exact year in which he succeeded to the bishopric and the year in which he died, the difference being after all very small, if not unimportant, except as it bears upon the general history of the period in which he lived. Of the personal history of Deodatus very little is recorded, but he is said to have been a man of great abstemiousness and frugality, justice and mercy. He became bishop of Vienne the year Theodoric died, which is variously stated to have been in 688, 690, or 691, the last of which is most probably correct. It may be safely stated that it was at the end of the reign of Theodoric or at the beginning of the reign of his successor Anastatius, Pippin being mayor of the palace under Sigebertus, king of Austrasia. As an additional clue to the date, it may also be mentioned that when Deodatus ruled the church of Vienne Claudius was bishop of Besançon, St. Audoenus bishop of Rouen, Audomarus bishop of Tarbes, Damianus bishop of Paris, Theodorus archbishop of Canterbury, Mansuetus bishop of Milan.

At this time also St. Leodegarius was cruelly persecuted and afterwards beheaded by Ebroinus, his brother Gerinus and others being punished in various ways. Deodatus died in 707 or 708, and is commemorated on the 15th October. (AA. SS. Boll. Oct. vii. 55; Gallia Christ. xvi. 34; Ado, Martyrologium; Patrol. Lat. cxxxiii.; Du Saussay, Martyrol. Gallic.) [D. R. J.]

DEODATUS (7), 24th bishop of Beauvais, is mentioned in the 11th epistle of pope Zacharias, sent about the year 745 to the bishops of Gaul. Le Coite thinks that he sat until the year 752 (Gallia Christ. ix. 696; Patrol. Lat. lxxxix. 948). [D. R. J.]

(8) Bishop of Soissons. Nothing is recorded of him except his name, which is given 31st in the series (Gall. Christ. ix. 339). [D. R. J.]

(9) 38th bishop of Bourges, ruled that diocese from A.D. 774 to 783, according to the conjecture of Le Coite; but nothing more is known about him (Gall. Christ. ii. 20; Cointius, Ann. Eccl. Franc.). [D. R. J.]

(10) Eighth bishop of Evreux, from about A.D. 619 to 640, and succeeded St. Landulfus. He occurs in a diploma of Clotaire II. (Gall. Christ. xi. 567). [D. R. J.]

DEODEFRIDUS, 42nd bishop of Paris, succeeded Madalbertus about the middle of the 8th century. In the year 757, that being the sixth year of the reign of Pippin, he subscribed to the charter granted to the monastery of Gorze. Ten years afterwards, i.e. in 767, a council was held at Gentilly, near Paris, to discuss the sculpture and painting of images of the saints, their use in churches, etc.; also concerning the filioque, on the occasion of the message sent from the East from the emperor Constantinus to king Pippin. As this council was held in the diocese of Paris, the conjecture that Deodefridus was present is not unreasonable (Gall. Christ. vii. 29). [D. R. J.]

DEOGRATIAS (1), a presbyter who had submitted to Augustine six questions, mainly relating to pagan objections or difficulties. 1. Will our resurrection be like that of Lazarus or that of Christ? 2. How is it that Christianity appeared in the world so late? 3. Why do Christians condemn sacrifices and incense, which have been in use from time immemorial? 4. How can infinite duration of punishment be consistent with the words "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again"? 5. Did not Solomon say that God had no son? (Prov. xxx. 4.) 6. What ought we to think of the incredible story of Jonah? To the first question he answers that the difference in origin between Christ's body and ours will not forbid a similar resurrection. He speaks of his eating and of his scars. It is from this passage that Milton has drawn (P. L. v. 434 sq.). To the second his answer is twofold. The fathers believed on Him that was to come, as we on Him who is come; and He chose to come when He knew that men should and would be prepared to receive His doctrine. The Semi-Pelagians made use of this last saying, and Augustine touches on it in his Retractions, and thus recasts it in his book on Predestination, "He appeared when and where He knew that there were those who had been elected in Him before the foundation of the world." To the third he replies that since the shedding of the blood of Christ, the only true sacrifice, a change in the kind of sacrifices had been divinely sanctioned. To the fourth he answers, that a measure is different from that which is measured; our will is the measure; and that which has desired eternal enjoyment of sin may justly meet eternal severity of punishment. For the fifth, he quotes Prov. viii. 25. For the sixth he maintains the historical truth, and brings out the allegorical meaning of the story. (Aug. Ep. 102 [49], vol. ii. 370.)

This Deogratias may be the same as the deacon of Carthage, who about A.D. 400 was charged with instructing catechumens, a work at which other people thought him peculiarly successful, and he found himself greatly at a loss. He wrote to Augustine for hints on the subject. "In what order should he present the articles of the faith? Should he use any exhortation at the end of his narrative, or only give precepts, by observing which his hearers might know that Christian life and profession were retained?" Augustine answers at length in a book De Catechizandis Lulibus (Migne, vi. 309-343). The first point, according to Augustine, is to teach joyously, but this is God's gift. For the order, it is best to go through the main facts of the scripture history in their chronological sequence, showing how all led up to the coming of Christ, and how His love to us demands the return of our love to Him. "The New Testament is hidden in the Old, the Old manifested in the New." The great foe of love is pride: "proud man is a great misery, but a humble God a greater mercy."

Then he gives directions (ch. v.) for inquiring into the motives of catechumens (from others, if possible, if not their own answers must be accepted, and made the base of exhortations), and for passing from the narration of past revelations, to admonitions concerning the future. He then suggests that a somewhat different method would have to be adopted with educated inquirers, who are likely already to have made themselves acquainted with the faith to which they ask to be admitted (ch. vii.). Grammarians and orators are especially to be warned against taking offence at the rude style of Scripture, or of preachers, and to be taught to look for mysteries below the surface.

He next gives six causes of tiresomeness in catechising, with suggestions for obviating the difficulties. He recommends that the catechumens should be allowed to sit down, not compelled to listen standing. He also recommends that the catechist should inquire whether they are already familiar with what he is telling them.

He finally gives two examples of discourses in preparation for baptism, the one longer, the other briefer.

One passage of this work is cited by Facundus (in Morian, p. 578), that, namely, in which Augustine recommends inquiry as to the books from which more educated inquirers have drawn their knowledge of Christianity, as the books may have been heretical, or unguarded statements of orthodox fathers may give rise to heresies. (The book is noticed by Augustine in his Retractions, ii. 14; compare Ceillier, ix. 264; Alzog, 403.) [E. B. B.]

DEOGRATIAS (2) Elected, after a long vacancy to fill the see of Carthage, by permission of Genseric, at the instance of Valentinian, A.D. 454. When Genseric returned from the sack of Rome with hosts of captives, and parents and children, wives and husbands, were severed as they were sold into slavery, Deogratias sold all the plate of the churches to redeem them, and as there were no buildings in the city large enough to house them he furnished two great churches with beds for the purpose. This created the envy of the Arians, who thought to kill him, but God took him to Himself after three years' episcopate. (Ceillier, x. 450, from Victor Vitensis.) [E. B. B.]

DEORA. [DORA.]

DEORAIDH. [DIRAIDH.]

DEOTIMUS, 36th bishop of Orleans, before A.D. 788. He succeeded Nadatimus, probably after being a monk of Fleury, for no catalogue makes him abbat of that monastery. His donations of certain estates were confirmed by Hugh Capet and Robert. (Charter VII. of the Church of Orleans, A.D. 990; Gall. Crist. viii. 1419, 1487.) [W. M. S.]

DERBHFRACH, of Drnim Dubhain, commemorated April 4. In Colgan (Acta SS. 713, c. 4, n. 11) there is given among the saints of the family of the Orghielli and race of Colla Dachrioch, "St. Derfroechea, alias Darercha, daughter of Eochaidh, son of Crimthann, son of Fiach, &c., 11th Nov. or 23rd Mar." This is Derbhfrach or Dearfraoich, mother of St. Tighernach (Apr. 4), bishop of Cluain-eois, now Clones, in Monaghan [TIGHERNACH] (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 95). Petrie (Round Towers of Ireland, 348) is of opinion that she flourished towards the close of the fifth century, and quotes the following curious note from the Felire of Aengus, relating to her wooden Duirtheach or church at Druim Dubhain, near Clogher, in Tyrone: "Derbfrach, the mother of Tighernach of Cluain Eois. She is called Coechdamair of Druim Dubhain here, for having refused to split the timber at the erection of her Duirtheach." [J. G.]

DERBILEDH. [DARBILE.]

DERCHAIRTHINN, of Uachter-aird, Mar. 8. Of the race of Colla Uais, king of Ireland, she is given among the saints of the family of St. Maedhog (Jan. 31), of Ferns, as "Derecharthania filia Ennii, filii Trenii," &c. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 71; Colgan, Acta SS. 222, c. 4). She probably belonged to the church which was founded at Uachter-aird (now Oughterard, in the barony of South Salt, co. Kildare), in the sixth or seventh century by a St. Brigida, who is different, however, from the saint of Kildare (Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 404).

[J. G.]

DERFEL or DERFEL GADARN, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, brother of Rhydud, Sulien, and Crisiolus, other Welsh saints, was the founder of the church of Llandderfel in Merionethshire, from whence his image, made of wood, was taken and burnt at Smithfield at the time of the Reformation; commemorated on April 5. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 221.)

[C. H.]

DERMITIUS. [DIARMAID.]

DERMOR, daughter of Maine, of Airiudh Baine, July 6. This is the entry in Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 189), where she is kept distinct from Ethne and Cumman, who were both virgins and sisters, daughters of Cormac, son of Ailill, of the race of Cathair Mor, king of Ireland. But in Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 184 n. 8, 270, col. 1), and Mart. Tallaght (by Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. p. xxviii.), these three are classed as sisters, all daughters of Maine or Manius, of Airiudh-bainne [CUMMAN (1)].

[J. G.]

DERUVIANUS, mentioned with Faganus, who are called the first bishops of Congressbury, A.D. 167, in the 'Glastonbury Chronicle,' quoted by Wharton (Angl. Sac. i. 553). [CUNGAR.] He is evidently the Duvianus said to have been sent with Faganus by pope Eleutherus, at the request of Lucius, to preach the Christian faith to the Britons. Matthew of Westminster names this papal missionary Deruvianus and Deruvianus (Flor. Hist. ed. 1570, lib. i. p. 112). [DUVIANUS.]

[C. H.]

DERWA, ST., a name only preserved in Mertherderwa, i. e. "the martyr Derwa," in the parish of Camborne in Cornwall. The old chapel existed till late in the middle ages (Munimenta Academicæ, ed. Anstey, p. 559), as well as a "bridge of Derwa." The name is now corrupted into Menadarva. The name Dervanus occurs in the story of king Lucius's message to pope Eleutherus. The prefix Merther is more common in Wales than in Cornwall. [C. W. B.]

DESIDERATUS (1), ST., twelfth bishop of Besançon, lived in the 4th century, and is commemorated on the 27th July. But little or nothing is known of him except the tradition that his parents, who were of noble rank, had a divine revelation, in which they were promised a son destined to adorn the episcopate by his brilliant virtues, and that Desideratus more than realised the sanguine hopes of his family by the purity of his life and the admirable manner in which he discharged his episcopal functions. Upon the death of Fronimius, the clergy and people unanimously elected Desideratus bishop, whereupon, says Chiffletius, he immediately began to sow the word of God in the hearts of believing minds, and to heal those languishing in body, to redeem the captives and prisoners, to take care of widows and the poor, and to rightly govern the people entrusted to him by the Lord; and because he was such an admirable bishop, he left many disciples as his successors in the priesthood. St. Desideratus was buried in the church of Lyon le Saunier, but his bones were translated, or, which is more probable, newly enshrined in the same place in the time of Carolus de Novocastro, archbishop of Besançon (AA. SS. Boll. July, vi. p. 432). [D. R. J.]

DESIDERATUS (2) addressed in the 5th century by Sidonius Apollinaris, bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, in a letter which asks him to come and console the husband and father of a lady named Phylimatia, who had died; he consults him also about an epitaph which he had composed for her. (Sidon. Apol. Ep. lib. ii. num. 8 Patrol. Lat. lviii. p. 482; Ceillier, x. 384.)

[W. M. S.]

(3) ST., ninth bishop of Verdun, was born of a noble race of the Alemanni in Thuringia, and succeeded St. Vitonus in the bishopric. He was married before he was made bishop, and had a son named Siagrius. During his episcopate he suffered much persecution from king Theodoric, through the machinations of a certain Sirivaldus, whom Siagrius, after the death of the king, slew in revenge for his father's wrongs. Thereupon Desideratus, who had long been in exile, returned to his diocese. Finding it reduced to extreme poverty, Desideratus petitioned Theodebert, the son of Theodoric, for help. The king favourably received his petition, and sent the prelate a large grant of money to be distributed amongst his people. Some time afterwards Desideratus offered to refund part of that money to the king, who, however, refused to accept it, saying that he thought himself sufficiently rewarded in having been the means of succouring a miserable people. In the year 535 St. Desideratus subscribed to the council of Auvergne, and in 549 to that of Orleans. His episcopate lasted twenty-five years, and he died in the year of our Lord 554, according to the ancient lists of bishops, and the obituaries of the monastery of St. Vito (Gall. Christ. xiii. 1166).

(4) ST., presbyter of Châlons. Gregory of Tours says that he had seen him in the monastery of Gurthonum, "a man of magnificent holiness, who often cured colds, toothaches and other diseases by prayer. He was so complete a recluse that he never left his cell; whoever wished saw him there. He left the world ennobled by his unusual virtues. The blessed bishop Agricola, hearing of his death, sent his archdeacon to bury the blessed man in the cemetery of the city; but the monks resisted, and the archdeacon was unable to fulfil his commission. Later on the bishop built a leper-house in the suburbs, and, collecting the citizens and all the clergy, transferred the blessed body to the chapel of the new institution." As bishop Agricola died about 581, the death of Desideratus may be placed about 570. (Greg. Tur. de Gloria Confessor. cap. 86, Patrol. Lat. lxxi.; AA. SS. Bolland. April 30, p. 778.)

[W. M. S.]

3 G

DESIDERATUS (5) Eighth bishop of Alby, succeeded St. Salvius in the year 586. Gregory of Tours says of him: "Post obitum Sti. Salvii, hoc anno Desideratus Albigenis episcopus datus est" (Greg. Tur. lib. 8, Hist. cap. 22; Gall. Christ. i. p. 5). [D. R. J.]

(6) Fourteenth bishop of Digne, was present at the council of Narbonne in the year 791, but nothing else is recorded of him except the order in which he stands amongst the other bishops of his diocese (Gall. Christ. xvi. 513, and vi.; Instrumenta, col. 3). [D. R. J.]

(7) ST., bishop of Clermont, is placed nineteenth in succession. But although so many writers call him bishop there is no proof that he ever was of that rank. In the Liber de Altaribus Ecclesie Claromont. there is mention of a St. Desideratus buried in the church of Illidium, and it is agreed that in that church many canonised persons were buried who were not bishops (Gall. Christ. ii. 243). He lived about the end of the 6th century, and is commemorated on February 11 (A.A. SS. Boll. Feb. ii. 552). [D. R. J.]

(8) Otherwise DIDO, fifteenth bishop of Châlons, lived in the reign of king Clotarius, and succeeded St. Gratus in the bishopric, about the middle of the 7th century. He is mentioned in Gallia Christiana as Desideratus, known by the name of Dido, of whom hardly anything has been reported except the charges made against him (Gall. Christ. iv. 873). [D. R. J.]

DESIDERIUS (1) [DIDIER], presbyter in Aquitaine. Desiderius and Riparius, or Didier and Ripaire, as they are commonly called, were two learned priests who had charge of neighbouring parishes in the diocese of Comminges in Aquitaine, in the 4th century, and the beginning of the fifth. It was at their joint instigation that St. Jerome wrote his treatise against Vigilantius, who was a neighbour of theirs. They wrote a common letter on the subject, which they sent to St. Jerome by Sisinus, who was then going to Palestine and Egypt. The subject of this article is supposed by many to be the same Desiderius alluded to in terms of praise by St. Jerome in many of his writings. But Tillemont is of opinion that St. Jerome had several friends of the same name, and that they all come in for a share of his notice.

It seems more likely that it was another Desiderius, whom in one of his letters St. Jerome invites with his sister Serenilla, both living at Rome, to pay him a visit in Palestine, writing both in his own name and that of St. Paulinus. The other Desiderius was also probably he at whose suggestion Jerome began the translation of the Pentateuch.

It cannot be decided whether it was to him of Aquitaine or to the other that, in 396 or 397, St. Sulpicius Severus dedicated his Life of St. Martin, bishop of Tours.

The same difficulty occurs as to the identity of the Desiderius to whom St. Paulinus addressed his epistles. Desiderius had written to ask St. Paulinus to explain to him the blessings which Jacob, when dying, gave to the twelve patriarchs. St. Paulinus, instead of complying with his request, tells Desiderius that he must develop for himself those mysteries hidden for so many preceding ages; that being a man blessed of God, a pure vessel, and fit to approach God, his mind being all the more enlightened because his body was so chaste, he might obtain by faith all that he asked of Paulinus. St. Paulinus afterwards asked Rufinus for the same explanation which he himself had hesitated to give to Desiderius. [DESIDERIUS, 2 and 3.]

(Hieron. Praefatio in Pentateuch. Patrol. Lat. xxviii. p. 147; Hieron. in Vigilant. cap. 2, 121 b; Patrol. Lat. xxiii. 339; Hieron. Ep. num. xlvi.; Patrol. Lat. xxii. 492; Paulin. Nol. Epist. num. 43; Patrol. Lat. lxi. 382; Sulpicius Severus, Patrol. Lat. xx. 159; Till. tom. xii. p. 288; Hist. Litt. de la Fr. ii. 86 et sq.) [D. R. J.]

DESIDERIUS (2). It is believed that several correspondents of Jerome had the name Desiderius. It is therefore impossible to fix the identity of each in the several letters. There was at any rate a presbyter who, towards the close of the 4th century asked Jerome to translate the Pentateuch. Jerome writes to him about the enterprise, and speaks of this letter as a prologue (Hieron. Patrol. Lat. xxiii. 241).

He is said to be not the same Desiderius as he to whom Jerome addressed a letter about A.D. 394 (Epist. num. xlvi.; Patrol. Lat. xxii. 210), asking him to come to Jerusalem, and offering him copies of his works, in particular the De Viris Illustribus; this second Desiderius is described as a man of reputation, eloquent, and known to the public by several works of distinction; he lived with his sister Serenilla at Rome. Which Desiderius was the correspondent of Paulinus bishop of Nola (Patrol. Lat. lxi. 382; Epist. xliii.), or which the correspondent to whom Sulpicius Severus addressed his book on the Life of St. Martin (Patrol. Lat. xx. 159), is undetermined (Ceillier, vii. 551, 619; viii. 78, 116; Hist. Littéraire de France, ii. 86, etc.). [W. M. S.]

(3) (DIDIER), St., seventh bishop of Nantes, is much spoken of in the writings of the Fathers of the Church in France. He is probably the same as Desiderius (1), presbyter in Aquitaine, the correspondent of Jerome, to whom Paulinus Nolanus, and Sulpicius Severus may also have written. Bishops Leo of Bourges, Eustochius of Tours, and Victurius of Le Mans, addressed to him the synodical letter of the council of Bourges in 451. [DESIDERIUS, Presbyter in Aquitaine.] (Ruinart, Histoire Abrégée des Evêques de Nantes; Le Brun des Marettes, Epistolae S. Paulini; Gall. Christ. xiv. 796.) [D. R. J.]

(4) ST., bishop of Langres, placed third in succession. That he was bishop and slaughtered by barbarians is sufficiently established by the documents of the church of Langres, the breviaries, the lists of prelates, and a number of churches dedicated to him; the martyrologies of Ado and Usuard (Patrol. Lat. cxxiii., cxxiv.); the writers on the persecution of the Vandals, the Acts of St. Antidius, bishop of Besançon, and the Chronicon of Siegbert (Patrol. Lat. clx.). All the rest is uncertain, and De Tillemont thinks that the popular legend must have confused with this bishop some saint who is no longer known.

The legend is as follows. Desiderius was a poor peasant, and worked in the fields. When towards the end of the 4th century the bishop of Langres died, the people took him from the plough and unanimously elected him bishop. Desiderius, although he had not sought or coveted the honour, recognised in the voice of the people the will of God. He therefore responded to the call, and discharged the office of bishop very efficiently, and with much honour to himself. He ended his career by dying a martyr, under the emperor Henricus, when the Vandals overran France and laid waste the country with fire and sword, especially one small town in Champagne, which took the name of Saint-Dizier, from the name of the bishop-martyr St. Desiderius (Gall. Christ. iv. 510; S. Warnaharii, Vita S. Desiderii; Patrol. Lat. lxxx. 195). [D. R. J.]

DESIDERIUS (5) Seventh bishop of Châlons. SS. Joannes, Desiderius, and Flavii, all three bishops of Châlons, are commemorated on the same day as St. Desideratus, a presbyter of Châlons, viz. on the 30th of April. Desiderius was succeeded by St. Agricola. (AA. SS. Bolland. April 30, p. 778; Gall. Christ. iv. p. 864.) [D. R. J.]

(6) Bishop of Fréjus (Forojulienis), was the seventh bishop of that diocese. In the year 541 he was represented at the fourth synod of Orleans by a priest of Grenoble, of whom it is said: "Missus a domino Desiderio episcopo Forojulienis consensit et subscripsit." (Gall. Christ. i. 423.) [D. R. J.]

(7) Fifth bishop of Toulon, ruled his diocese in the latter half of the 6th century. His name occurs amongst the subscribers in the fourth council of Paris (A.D. 573), and he subscribed by proxy at the second synod of Mâcon (A.D. 585). (Gall. Christ. i. p. 742.) [D. R. J.]

(8) Tenth bishop of Helosa, or Elusa, commonly Eause, formerly metropolis of the province of Novempopulana in Gaul; after the destruction of Eause, the dignity was transferred to Auch (Auscium).

On the death of bishop Laban, in the time of king Childebert II., who had subscribed the second council of Mâcon in 585, king Childebert sold the see, and it was obtained by Desiderius, a layman. Gregory of Tours says that king Childebert had sworn never to appoint a layman to a bishopric, but was induced by the accursed thirst for gold. (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. lib. viii. cap. 22; Patrol. Lat. lxxi.) [W. M. S.]

(9) ST., twenty-ninth bishop of Vienne, was born of a noble family at Autun, and from his boyhood was so passionately devoted to the study of literature, that he was subsequently rebuked in a letter by pope Gregory, who hearing that he not merely studied but taught grammar, vehemently reprov'd him, and told him that the praises of Jove did not go well in the same mouth with the praises of Christ. In his youth he was sent to Vienne, where he was adopted and brought up as a son by St. Naamatus, then archbishop. After the death of Naamatus Desiderius continued his discipleship under his three successors, viz. SS. Philippus, Evantius, and Verus III., the last of whom he himself succeeded as archbishop in the time of pope Gregory. It was then that the pope sent him that rebuke about his devotion to profane literature.

At that time the infamous queen Brunecchildis contracted an incestuous marriage with Meroveus, the son of Chilpericus, her brother-in-law, her own husband king Sigebertus having lately been assassinated in an expedition which he was making against that same brother, with a view to wresting his kingdom from him. When Chilpericus heard of his son's abnormal marriage, he was naturally indignant, and had the young man shut up for the rest of his life in a monastery. But Desiderius was not content with that. He acted the part of John the Baptist, and rebuked the wicked queen for her conduct, whereupon she began to act the part of Herodias, and instituted against her admonitor a persecution which ultimately cost him his life. To give a sort of pretext to her persecution she got some prelates who were on her side to hold a synod at Châlons, on the Saone, in the year 603, in order to try the bishop who had dared to rebuke her, and the result was that Desiderius was deposed and banished to an island, which is thought to have been Levisium or Barbe, near Lyons, or possibly one of the Hebrides. In the MSS. of Chiffletius it is said that the queen stirred up against the saint all the people, high and low, rich and poor, bringing against him false witnesses and false accusations.

In the course of four years the queen recalled him from his banishment, in the hope of gaining him over to her side, but Desiderius remained as firm as ever, and treated her with as much severity as before. She then ordered him to return to his diocese. Some time afterwards he was sent for by prince Theodoric, who wanted to consult him on the subject of concubinage. Desiderius persuaded him to banish harlots from the palace, and settle down in lawful marriage with Ermenburga, a maiden of high rank. The queen was again enraged with the bishop, as she supplied the king with lawless pleasures that she might be able to keep in her own hands the reins of government. She had not forgotten the old wound, and this time determined to get rid of him altogether. She ordered three base knights, named Bëffan, Gasifred, and Boto, to arrest him at the doors of the church. The mob was then incited against him, and the holy bishop was stoned until he was all but dead, when he was despatched by being stabbed in the neck, A.D. 608; but the dates are variously given from 607 to 612. He is commemorated on the 23rd of May. (AA. SS. Bolland., v. p. 251; Chosier. Histoire de Dauphiné, ix. § 17, and Antiq. de Vienne. Greg. Mag. Ep., Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. §§ 831, 832, 1019, 1140; Labbe, Concil. v. 1216, iv. 40; Patrol. Lat. lxxi. §§ 605, 609; Aimoinus, de Gestis Francor. iii. 89; Ado Vienn. Passio S. Desiderii, Patrol. Lat. cxliii.; Hermannus Contractus, Patrol. Lat. cxliii. 56; Gall. Christ. xvi. 28.) [D. R. J.]

DESIDERIUS (10) Third abbat of Saint-Germain, Paris, which he ruled sixteen years in the beginning of the 7th century (Aimoinus, de Gestis Francorum, lib. iii. cap. 91; Gall. Christ. vii. 420.) [D. R. J.]

(11) ST., nineteenth bishop of Auxerre. The anonymous author of the Acts of the Bishops of Auxerre, which are given by Labbe in his Bibliotheca Manuscriptorum, and by Migne in the 138th volume of his Latin Patrology, has a long biography of this bishop.

It appears that he was of Aquitaine, son of Nectaria, who was buried in the monastery of St. Amantius of Cahors, a man of the highest rank and greatest influence, nearly related to queen Brunehild and her sons the kings of the Burgundians and the Franks. By their munificence he had immense wealth and possessions, which he transferred liberally to churches and monasteries. The witnesses of his liberality were his cathedral church of St. Stephen, the basilica of St. Germain, the basilica of St. Amator, the monastery of SS. Peter and Paul, the basilica of St. Julian, the nunnery of St. Martin, the basilicas of St. Gervasius and St. Protasius, of St. Columba and St. Leo at Sens, of St. Ursinus of Bourges, of St. Amantius of Cahors, of St. Saturninus at Toulouse, and the cathedral of Cahors. There was hardly any notable church of Burgundy or Aquitaine which had not received farms from Desiderius.

This princely person held the see eighteen years, and died in November about A.D. 622. He was buried near his predecessor St. Aunacharius, in the basilica of St. Germain. (Patrol. Lat. cxxxviii. 236; Gall. Christ. xii. 268.)

[W. M. S.]

DESIDERIUS (12) Bishop of Cahors early in the 7th century. He was born at Alby of a noble family, and being early sent to court became the trusted minister and treasurer of Clothaire II. and his son Dagobert I. His brother Rusticus, who preceded him as bishop of Cahors, having lost his life in a popular tumult, Desiderius, though still a layman, was, at Dagobert's instance, ordained, and raised to the episcopate. He died on a visit to his paternal property at Alby, A.D. 652. A biography, with a long catalogue of miracles, is to be found in Migne (Patrol. vol. lxxvii. pp. 217-267). Two books of letters are extant, printed by Migne (ibid.). Book I. contains letters from Desiderius to the monarchs and bishops, &c. of his day, and Book II. letters from them to Desiderius. They supply very little of interest for the history of the time. The biography contains two letters to him from his mother Herchenefreda, the former of which apprises him of the violent death of his brother Rusticus, and calls upon him to bring the murderers to justice. Desiderius was a munificent benefactor to the city of Cahors, in which he erected several churches and monasteries. (Bibl. Max. Patr. tom. viii. p. 579; Canisius, Lect. i. 631; Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 580.) [E. V.]

(13) Sixth bishop of Rennes, gave his approbation to the privilege accorded to the monks of Fontenelle about the year 682; but the exact date of that charter is uncertain, some assigning to it the year 687. Bollandus and others say that he was put to death near Besançon, and reckon him amongst the martyrs. (Rer. Gallic. Script. iii. 618; Derie, Hist. Eccl. Bret. ii. 135; AA. SS. Boll. Vita S. Auserberti; Gall. Christ. xiv. 741, 742.) [D. R. J.]

(14) Thirteenth bishop of Evreux (Ebroicum), in the province of Rouen. In the 11th chapter of the Life of Leufred occurs the following: "About this time Desiderius held the see of Evreux, from which place the cell of Leufred was distant about two leagues. The bishop, hearing the fame of the recluse, and the number of his saintly followers, overcome with envy and hatred because he had dared to build a monastery and guest-house in his own diocese without consulting him, went one day with his officials to the cell of the man of God. After grievous words of reproof, he determined to take him back with him to his episcopal city to punish him heavily. But as he was returning he fell from his horse and was hurt. Taking this as a rebuke for his wrath, he bade Leufred return to his cell, and thereafter diligently cultivated his friendship. This occurred when Ansbert was archbishop of Rouen, between A.D. 689 and 695." (Gall. Christ. xi. 568.) [W. M. S.]

DESIDERIUS (15), duke of Tuscany, succeeded Aistulf in the kingdom of Lombardy, A.D. 756, by an election in which pope Stephen II. and king Pepin concurred (Anastas. vi. Concil. p. 1628). Desiderius bound himself to restore certain towns to the Roman church. Pope Stephen died the same year, and was succeeded by his brother pope Paul I., whom we find complaining (Anastas. vi. Concil. p. 1679) in letters to king Pepin of the bad faith of the Lombards.

In A.D. 768 Desiderius lent troops to Christopher, primitarius of the Roman see, to expel the intruding pope Constantine from Rome, after the death of pope Paul I. In A.D. 769, after the death of Sergius, archbishop of Ravenna, Desiderius maintained a whole year in that see the intruder Michael (Anast. vi. Concil. 1711).

In A.D. 770 pope Stephen III. heard with the greatest dismay that Desiderius proposed an alliance with the Frankish royal family; his daughter was to marry Charles or Carloman, and his son Adelgis was to marry their sister. It was of course the interest of the popes to prevent any connexion between the Franks and Lombards. Pope Stephen wrote a most extraordinary letter (Patrol. xcvi. 255-62) to the Frankish princes, warning them against pollution with the blood of that "faithless and most unsavoury nation," "whence the race of lepers was known to have its source." Charles, unmoved by the denunciations of eternal fire, and by the consecration of the eucharist on the tomb of St. Peter over the pope's letter, repudiated his wife, and married the daughter of Desiderius; but within a year he insulted his new ally by repudiating her in turn, and marrying Hildegard, a Swabian. Stephen was badly used by Desiderius, for he forced him, when prisoner in the Vatican, to write a lying letter to Charles, saying that the towns were restored.

In A.D. 772 pope Stephen III. was succeeded by pope Adrian I.; Desiderius tried to entice him to pay him a visit at Pavia, but the invitation was refused. Desiderius, in revenge, ravaged the borders of the papal territory. Adrian appealed to Charles, who, disregarding the family of Carloman, had united the whole of the Frankish dominions under his own rule. Charles was glad to oblige the pope, because he had refused to crown the disinherited princes when Desiderius, who had espoused their cause through hatred of Charles, had asked him to do so. Charles offered Desiderius money if he would satisfy the pope; and Adrian even offered to pay the rejected visit to Pavia if Desiderius would restore his rights. Desiderius, thinking that Charles would be occupied with his Saxon war, offered evasive answers; but in A.D. 773 Charles invaded Italy, besieged Pavia, overthrew the Lombard kingdom, and forced Desiderius to retire to a monastery at Liège, where he ended his days in penitence and works of piety. (Pagi, xiii. 101; Baronius, vols. xii. and xiii.; Robertson, iv. cap. vi.; Ceillier, xii. 113, 115, 116, 117, 118, 134, 135.)

[W. M. S.]

DESIGNATUS (1), ST., 13th bishop of Liège, succeeded Ursicinus, who is supposed to have flourished about the end of the 5th century; but the exact date is uncertain, as it is not known how long either of the three bishops, St. Agricolaus, Ursicinus, or St. Designatus, sat. The latter is commemorated on the Calends of December, although, according to the Belgian Chronicle, he died on the Ides of January (Gall. Christ. iii. 813).

[D. R. J.]

(2), ST., bishop of Utrecht, died in the year 525, or, as some say, in 508, others 511. The original seat of this diocese was at Tongres or Tongern, hence Designatus is described in ancient documents as bishop of Tongres (depositio S. Designati Tongrensis Episcopi et Confessoris, MS. Florarium); but about the time of Clovis I. the see, after having probably been vacant for some time, on account of the Huns, Vandals, Goths, and Franks, was translated to Utrecht. Very little is known of Designatus, except that he was the third bishop from Agricolaus. There is a legend that he raised from the dead three soldiers, who gave their property to the church. By some writers, his mother is said to have been the daughter of a king of the Scots. He is commemorated on the 13th of Jan. (AA. SS. Boll. Jan. i. 814).

[D. R. J.]

DESINIANUS was second bishop of Orleans, and lived about the middle of the 4th century. He succeeded Diopetus, and was followed by St. Evurtius (Gall. Christ. viii. 1410).

[D. R. J.]

DEUSDEDIT (1) Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 655-664. He was a native of Wessex (Beda, H. E. iii. 20), and, according to Elmham (p. 192), his real name was Frithonas, which was probably changed to avoid any offence that might be given by the elevation of a Saxon to the primacy for the first time. He was consecrated at Canterbury by Ithamar, bishop of Rochester, on March 26, A.D. 655 (Beda, ut supra). The history of the southern province is at this time most obscure; and there is only one official act, the consecration of bishop Damian, with which the name of Deusdedit can with any certainty be connected. He died, it is believed, on July 14, 664 (H. E. iii. 20, 28; iv. 1), and was buried at Canterbury in St. Peter's porch (Councils, iii. 99), obtaining afterwards a place in the calendar on July 15. A short account of Deusdedit was compiled by Goscelin, but it is of no value (Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 261-2). This is abridged in Capgrave and the Acta SS. July, iv. 48, and is verified in a MS. in the Lambeth library. [J. R.]

At this period there were eight bishoprics in the heptarchy: two in Kent, at Canterbury and Rochester; one among the East Saxons; one in Mercia; one among the East Angles at Dunwich; one over the Northumbrians at Lindisfarne. The principal see of the West Saxons was at Dorchester, and for a brief interval there was a second at Winchester (see Stubbs, Regist. 3). The magnitude of these bishoprics for the most part, as compared with the Canterbury diocese or even with all the kingdom of Kent; the circumstance of their being nearly all filled, and vigorously worked by bishops of Celtic or foreign consecration, unconnected in their origin with Canterbury (Hook, Abps. of Cant. i. 127), or in their working with one another, shew but slight consolidation in the church, or rather the churches, of England, and prove how much in the shade the successor of Augustine must now have been. No less than six or seven of the consecrations of Deusdedit's time were by Celtic or French bishops, and only one by the archbishop of Canterbury. When Wilfrid was to be consecrated he went to France. Ceadda indeed sought consecration in Kent, but the archbishop was then dead. It must have been a mere flourish of Elmham to talk of his having greatly increased the church, especially by ordaining bishops, priests, and deacons (ed. Hardwicke, 193). The council of Whitby in A.D. 664, so important in its bearings on the future of the English church, was held without him, and neither his voice nor his sentiments are heard of. The South Saxons, his immediate neighbours, were now the only nation without a bishop or a church, and he does not appear as taking any measures for their conversion. But it should here be noticed that Damian, the only bishop of his consecration, was a South Saxon (Beda, H. E. iii. 20). Once he is discovered beyond the limits of Kent, at the consecration of Medeshampstede in the kingdom of Mercia (A. S. C. ad an. 657). Another glimpse of him is seen in the consecration of the 70 nuns who were settled at St. Mary's in the Isle of Thanet (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 649). Hook considers that another glimpse of him is to be found in Eddius (Vit. Wilf. c. 57), and that the archbishop is there alluded to as putting himself in communication with the Celtic party with a view to an understanding with them. When to all this we add that there was an interregnum of a year and a half before his accession, and another long interregnum after him, we may conceive the depression to which the chair of Augustine had arrived half a century after its establishment, and we can appreciate all that Theodore did to revive its importance, and place it supreme over the English church, when it had reached its lowest ebb.

Deusdedit was the sixth archbishop, succeeding Honorius. After him his chaplain Wighard was elected, but Theodore sat. Deusdedit commenced the line of English archbishops, which was only once broken, and that by his successor. The first English archbishop was consecrated ten years after the first English bishop, who was Ithamar, and Ithamar the first English bishop consecrated the first English archbishop. Bede places Deusdedit's ordination on March 26, and the year by calculation is A.D. 655. But that day was a Thursday, and some error may be suspected. Bede says he governed his see nine years, seven months, and two days (H. E. iii. 20), which space does not tally exactly with the dates; Elmham says nine years, four months, and two days (p. 193, ed. Hardwicke). The Kentish reign in which he lived was that of Eareobert, and both the king and archbishop died on the same day (Bede, II. E. iv. 1; Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 664). It was the year of the eclipse says Bede, and the year of the pestilence, and besides the heads of the church and state in Kent, bishops Tuda at Lindisfarne, and Cedda at Lastingham, died that year. No charters with Deusdedit's signatures are known. Elmham (ib.) says he was buried with his predecessors in the church of the monastery, and gives his metrical epitaph. Stevenson quotes as an authority for his Anglo-Saxon name the Chron. Cant. in Trinity Hall, Camb. (note ad Bed. H. E. iii. 20, cf. Smith, ad Bed. iv. 1). [C. H.]

DEUSDEDIT (2) Keeper of the judicial archives at Ravenna in the 6th century. The extreme importance of the office is shown by the letter of Cassiodorus, chancellor and prime minister of Theoderic, king of Italy, which exhorts Deusdedit to probity and caution. (Cassiod. Epist. lib. xi. num. 21, Patrol. Lat. lxxix. 871; Ceillier, xi. 220.) [W. M. S.]

(3) ST., was sixth bishop of Rodez, but nothing is known of him except from the following inscription on an ancient slab of white marble:—DEUSDEDIT EPISCOPUS INDIGNUS FECIT FIERI HANC ARAM. and from an old document, dated A.D. 1275, referring to the above inscription, which states that it was found with relics 700 years old or more. If, as the Benedictines remark, that be the case, then Deusdedit must have been bishop of Rodez before A.D. 599. (Gall. Christ. i. p. 200.) [D. R. J.]

(4) Bishop of Milan, elected by the clergy and people, A.D. 600, after the death of Constantius. Pope Gregory the Great writes to the people and clergy of Milan, consenting to their nomination, provided that Deusdedit was a fit person. Deusdedit was at the time a deacon (Greg. Epist., Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. 1094, 1095). In writing afterwards to this bishop (Greg. Epist., Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. 1206, 1238), he allows the request by a bishop of goods acquired before his episcopate. (Ceillier, xi. 520, 528.) [W. M. S.]

(5) Pope. A Roman by birth, consecrated 19th October, according to Pagi; 13th November according to Fleury, A.D. 615, to the see of his native town; died December 3, A.D. 618. "C'est le premier pape, dont on ait des bulles scellées en plomb" (L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, i. 249). A doubtful, or, more likely, spurious letter of his is given and commented upon in Mansi, x. 536-8. [E. S. Ff.]

(6) Bishop of Cagliari (A.D. 649), present at the council of the Lateran, Oct. 5, 649, in which he took a leading part against the Monothelites. (Tom. vi. Concil. p. 75, etc.; Ceillier, xii. 927, etc.) [W. M. S.]

DEUTERIUS (1) Metropolitan of Caesarea in Mauritania, addressed by Augustine of Hippo (Epist. num. cexxxvi., Patrol. Lat. xxxiii. p. 1033) in a letter which warns him against Victorinus the Manichee, who, pretending to be Catholic, had got himself ordained deacon of the church of Mallianum, and had been doing great mischief at Hippo. He is to be refused pardon unless he discloses all the Manichees at Mallianum. The letter describes the difference between the Auditores and the Electi amongst the Manichees. (Ceillier, ix. 184.) [W. M. S.]

DEUTERIUS (2) Bishop of the Arians at Constantinople. Theodorus, reader of the church of Constantinople in the 6th century, in the time of the patriarch Timothy, a historian, relates that Deuterius, when baptizing a man named Barbas, used the words, "Barbas is baptized in the name of the Father, through the Son, in the Holy Spirit." (Theodor. lib. ii. Hist., Patrol. Græc. lxxxvi., part i. p. 195; Ceillier, xi. 104.) [W. M. S.]

(3) Third bishop of Lodeve, was present with other bishops at the council of Auvergne during the reign of Theodebert, A.D. 535, not in 541, as Plantavitus and the Sammarthani say. (Gall. Christ. vi. 528; Labbe, Conc. iv. 1805.) [D. R. J.]

DEUTHERIUS, also called Deotherius and Deotharius, was the seventh bishop of Vence. He was present in the year 541 at the fourth synod of Orleans, and subscribed at the fifth synod of Arles in 549, the second of Mâcon in 585, and that of Embrun in 588. (Greg. Turon. Hist. lib. ix. c. 24; Gall. Christ. iii. 1214.) [D. R. J.]

DEVENICK, Confessor, commemorated Nov. 13. The legend of this saint, whose name is not found in any of the Irish lists, is given at length in Brev. Aberdon. (pars aestiva, f. clx. a), and in the View Dioc. Aberd. (in Coll. Sh. Aberd. and Banff, 267 sq.), but it is evidently devoid of chronological accuracy. It represents him as an old man at the time St. Columba and St. Machar or Mauricius were preaching in the north-east of Scotland, and then as dividing the work between himself and St. Machar, he going to Caithness, while St. Machar remained as bishop at Aberdeen. In consequence of a prior compact entered into between the two saints, the body of St. Devenick was brought back to Aberdeen and buried at the neighbouring church of Banchory-Devenick. Boece calls him archdeacon, but King and others style him bishop. And though the legend represents him as a contemporary of St. Columba, the Scotch annalists place his death in A.D. 887, in the reign of Soluathius. But the Scotch kings named Selvach, latinised Soluathius, were both in the eighth century, and thus the time of the saint is left in utmost uncertainty, though the balance of authority or general acceptance would lean to the sixth century. He had dedications at Banchory and Methlic, both in the diocese of Aberdeen, and also at Creich in Sutherlandshire, where he is known as St. Teavneck. Bishop Forbes asks whether he may not be the same as St. Dewednack, to whom the church of Landewednack is dedicated, but the only relation appears to be a resemblance of names. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 323-4; Boethius, Scot. Hist. B. ix. c. 30; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 20-1; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 198; King, Calend. Nov. 13.) [J. G.]

DEVIL. [DEMONOLOGY; DIABOLUS.]

DEWI (Annal. Camb. ad an. 458, M. H. B. 830), bishop of Menevia. [DAVID, ST.] [C. H.]

DEXIANUS, bishop of Seleucia in Isauria, and metropolitan. He was present at the council of Ephesus, in A.D. 431, when he took the Eastern side, and remonstrated against beginning the proceedings before the arrival of John of Antioch. He sat in the concliatorium, and joined in the act of deposition of Cyril and Memnon (Labbe, Concil. tom. iii. col. 598), for which he was excommunicated by Cyril and his party (ibid. col. 654). While a presbyter he had been guardian of the church of St. Thecla, at Seleucia, in which capacity he had displayed great zeal, for which he is much commended by Basil of Seleucia. (Basil Seleuc. de Mirac. St. Theclae, ii. 17; 13, 14, 30; Le Quien, Oriens Christian. tom. ii. col. 1013.) [E. V.]

DEXTER, son of Pacianus, bishop of Barcelona (circ. A.D. 360-390). Under the emperor Theodosius he was administrator of the Domain, A.D. 387. Under Honorius he was prefect of the Praetorians, A.D. 395. To him Jerome dedicated his book of ecclesiastical authors. Jerome speaks of a history by Dexter, a medley. In A.D. 1620 a chronicle was published under the name of Flavius Dexter, said to betray the hand of a Spanish Jesuit, Jerome de Hyguera. (Hieron. de Viris Illustribus, cap. 32 and 106, Patrol. Lat. xxii. 603; Ceillier, v. 157, vi. 279.)

[W. M. S.]

DIABOLUS, in the system of Carpocrates, an angel, subordinate to the chief of the angels who made the world, whose office it is to conduct departed souls to this chief for the purpose of being examined by him (Irenaeus, i. 30; Epiphanius, Haer. 27).

In the system of Valentinus, a spirit of wickedness formed by the Demiurge from the grief of Achamoth; prince of this world, where he has his abode; able on account of his spiritual nature to attain a knowledge of the higher spiritual world, of which his maker the Demiurge, who is only animal, is incapable (Irenaeus, i. 5, p. 27; see also Heracleon ap. Origen T. xiii. in Joan. iv. 225). In the account of Hippolytus (vi. 33, p. 192), Diabolus, who presides over the Hyle, or material world, is distinguished from Beelzebub, the chief of the demons, these last being formed, not like matter from the grief of Achamoth, but from her perplexity.

In the Gnostic systems generally the devil has either no place or a very subordinate one, the principle of evil being ascribed to matter or to the being supposed to have formed it. It seems to be this being, not the devil, who in the system of the Peratae (Hipp. Ref. v. 16, pp. 133, 136) is spoken of as the "prince of this world," and "murderer from the beginning." [See PERATAE.]

Epiphanius (Haer. 42, p. 304), unsupported by the other authorities, represents Marcion as holding the devil to be a third principle intermediate between the good God and the Creator, but this seems to be a mistake of Epiphanius. [See MARCION, PREFON.]

In the Clementine Homilies (19, 20), the nature and origin of the devil are treated of. The result arrived at is that he is a being whose disposition, resulting from the combination of the elements of which his body is composed, is to rejoice in evil. This disposition fits him to carry out the will of God in the punishment of the wicked. God has therefore made him ruler over the present world, and uses him as his left hand in smiting those who deserve affliction. As doing the will of God in afflicting lawfully, he neither deserves nor receives punishment in Tartarus, for however severe the punishment to the souls of men who are forced to dwell with him there, the place causes no pain to him whose nature it is to delight in darkness. And at the end of the world a change of his disposition may take place, so that he will thenceforth cease to rejoice in evil. This theory concerning the punishment of the wicked reproduces what has been stated in an earlier part of the book (Hom. ix. 9), but there concerning demons. The doctrine concerning demons appears to have been fully treated of in the earlier work on which the homilies are founded; the discussion concerning the devil to be an addition of the later writer. [DEMONOLOGY; SATAN.] [G. S.]

DIACONANUS (DIACONIANUS), C. and M. Dec. 23. The Martyr. Aberd. supplies us with the name of St. Diacomanus at Keig, a parish in Aberdeenshire; "Eodem die Sancti Diaconani confessoris apud Keg Aberdonensis diocesis." But beyond the name and designation he remains an unknown Scotch saint. His usual feast is Dec. 23, but on Sept. 23 Camerarius has "S. Diocomanus martyr." (Gordon, Monast. i. 102; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 177; Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. vi. 225; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 137, 324.)

[J. G.]

DIADOCHUS, a bishop of Photice, in Epirus Vetus, c. A.D. 450, highly commended by Victor Vitensis, who boasts of having been his pupil. He was the author of a work "De Perfectione Spirituali," in 100 chapters, preceded by ten "Oporo or Definitiones, giving the definitions of the ten chief Christian virtues: faith, hope, charity, patience, chastity, &c. The work is praised by Photius (Cod. 201) as one drawn from experience not from theory, useful not only to those who are seeking to attain perfection, but to those who have made considerable progress towards it. (Bibl. Patrum, Lugdun. 1677, tom. v. p. 884; Fabric. Biblioth. Graeca, lib. v. c. 14; Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 442.) [E. V.]

DIANIUS or DIANAÆUS, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, for more than twenty years, a saintly man much venerated in the early church, notwithstanding his somewhat doubtful orthodoxy. He may be almost certainly identified with the anonymous bishop who baptized Basil the Great on his return from Athens, and ordained him lector (Basil, de Sp. Sancto, 29, p. 357). Basil speaks of him in terms of the most affectionate respect, expressing the reverence and love he had entertained for him from his earliest years, and describing him as a man remarkable for his virtues, frank, generous, and attractive from his amiability, venerable both in aspect and in character (Epist. 51, (84)). We see him, however, in the history of these troubled times weak and undecided, led by his peaceful disposition to deprecate controversy, and by his feebleness to side with the strongest; destitute of any strong theological convictions, and wanting the clearness of thought to appreciate the subtleties of doctrine. He was, therefore, too often found on the semi-Arian side of the church. If, as Tillemont* holds, he is the same with the Danius who heads the list of bishops to whom pope Julius directed his dignified reply to the insolent letter addressed to him from Antioch, Dianius took a leading part in the synod held at that city in the early months of A.D. 340, by which the deposition of Athanasius was confirmed, and George of Cappadocia placed on the throne of Alexandria (Epistola Julii, apud Athanas. Apolog. ii. p. 239).

He also took part in the famous synod of Antioch, in Encaeniis, A.D. 341, and was present at Sardica, A.D. 347, where, according to Hilary (p. 29), he joined in the anathema against Julius and Athanasius. His weakness of character was still more fatally shewn, when after the council of Constantinople, A.D. 359, the formula of Rimini was sought to be imposed on the church by the authority of the emperor. To the intense grief of Basil Dianius yielded to the pressure, and signed the heretical document. Basil felt it impossible any longer to hold communion with one who had so far compromised his faith, and fled to Nazianzum. It was reported that he had anathematised his bishop, but this he indignantly denies (Basil, Epist. 51, (84)). Dianius keenly felt the absence of his eloquent and able young counsellor, especially when Julian endeavoured to re-establish paganism. After two years he recalled Basil, and declared that he had signed the creed of Rimini in the simplicity of his heart, in the hope of restoring peace to the distracted church, without any idea of impugning the faith of Nicea. Basil was satisfied with Dianius' explanations, and returned to his former post of adviser of the bishop till his death, which was not long delayed. It may probably be placed A.D. 362.

DIARMAID, latinised DERMITIUS, was a very common name in Ireland, and borne by many of the saints: some of these are simply placed upon a day in the calendars, with or without their father's name and the place of dedication, while others have a few particulars preserved by history or tradition.

(1) Son of Mechair, bishop, of Airthearmuighe in Tuaithe-ratha. Commemorated Jan. 16. Colgan conjectures that it was either this saint or another bishop of the same name, venerated on Oct. 12, who was the Diermitius whose soul was one day carried into heaven by the angels, as we read in St. Adamnan (Vit. St. Columb. iii. c. 8). But as that is said to have taken place in East Oriel, Armagh, he could scarcely have been Diarmaid of Armoy, co. Antrim, or of some other place similarly named in Toora, co. Fermanagh (Reeves, Adamnan, 204, and Eccl. Ant. 80; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 388 n. 12; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 19).

[J. G.]

* Montfaucon, in loc., identifies the Danius of Julius's letter with the Arlan bishop of Nicea, Diognius, otherwise known as Theognius or Theognes. But the names are not sufficiently alike for this identification, and Tillemont's view is the more probable. We have followed Hefele in distinguishing the Antiochene council, by which the insolent letter was sent to pope Julius, from the celebrated council in Encaeniis of A.D. 341, with which Sozomen (H. E. iii. 5) and Socrates (H. E. li. 8-10) con-

DIARMAID (2) Bishop, grandson of Aedh Roin, of Disert Diarmada in Leinster. June 21. He was of the race of Fiatach Finn, king of Ulster, and had his cell at Disert-Diarmada, which is now better known as Castledermot, in the baronies of Kilkea and Moore, co. Kildare. O'Donovan says he erected his monastery about A.D. 500 (referring to Archdall), but this date must be far too early, and probably an error for A.D. 800. The Book of Lecan traces his genealogy up to Muiredach Muinderg, king of Ulster. But there were two kings of Ulster, called Aedh Roin, and of the same race, whose deaths the Four Masters place in the years 649 and 732. Diarmaid is usually regarded as son of the later, and thus as belonging to the end of the 8th century. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 175, 400 n.; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 265, 331, 462 n.°; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 202; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 314, 3rd ed.)

(3) Bishop of Gleann-Uissen, in Ui-Bairrche, July 8. This saint is mentioned by Colgan, Archdall, Harris, and Lanigan, and the truth in their guesses is put in a clear light in few words by Dr. Reeves (Adamnan, 163 n.):—"S. Diarmaid of Killeeshin was seventh in descent from Daire Barrach, who was second son of Cathair Mor, king of Leinster, and afterwards of Ireland, in the early part of the second century, and whose descendants occupied Ui-Bairrche, now Slieve-margy, on the S.E. of the Queen's County, near Carlow, and were represented in after ages by the family of Mac Gorman." From his relationship to Daire Barrach in the second century, he must have lived long before the saint of the same name and place, whose obit is given by the Four Mast. (by O'Donovan, i. 521) in A.D. 874. He was also called Modimog, and his descent from Cathair Mor is given in eight generations inclusive, by Dr. Todd. (Book of Hymns, Fasc. ii. 291, in Book of Sanctilog. Geneal. in Book of Lecan, fol. 49 b, col. 1; Book of Rights, by O'Donovan, 194 n. c.)

(4) Bishop of Inis-clothrann, in Loch-Ribh, Jan. 10. He was of the race of the Hy-Fiachrach, and his father was Lugna, son of Lugaidh, who traced his descent to Dathi, son of Fiachra, son of Eochaidh Muighmeadhoin. His mother was Deidi, or Dediva, or Editua, daughter of Trian, son of Dubhthach h-Ua Lughair, and having a family of six sons and a daughter, saints. He was a very learned man, and perhaps left, with other small works, a collection of prayers in the form of a litany, which was extant in Colgan's time, though from the later names in it, it was evidently interpolated by other hands. So pure and conciliatory was he, that one was counted happy who enjoyed his spiritual friendship; such especially were St. Ciaran of Clonmacnois (Sept. 9), whose spiritual father he was, and St. Senan of Inis Cathay (March 1), who was bound to him probably by the same spiritual tie, and with whom as a neighbour he ever lived on a most friendly footing. He built his monastery on Inis-Clothrann, now Inish-cloghran, in Lough Ree, in the Shannon, where many became famous for learning and piety. It is said that "ex monacho factus est sacerdos, ex sacerdote abbas, ex abbate episcopus," but he is usually styled only priest and abbat. The year of his death is unknown, but as he is said to have been descended in the seventh generation from Dathi king of Ireland, who was killed about the year 427, Colgan and Lanigan believe that he must have lived about, or even later than, A.D. 540. There is a tradition, which has a place even in Icelandic legend, that no female of man or beast could live in his island; the truth probably is that, while alive, he secluded himself, like his neighbour St. Senan and so many other saints, from the remotest contact with female society, and after his death this prohibition has remained as a memorial of him. (Colgan, Acta SS. 51-2 for his memoir, 248, c. 2, 527, c. 23; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 13, 401; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 3; Ulst. Journ. Arch. iv. 128; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 152-58.)

DIARMAID (5). When St. Patrick was in Meath, he is said to have founded a church at a place called Druim-Chorcorthri, and left there his nephew Diermitius, son of Restitutus [DARERCA]. He is called "episcopus Drumensis." (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 130, c. 6, 231, col. 1. 266, col. 1.)

(6) Jan. 15. The eldest brother of St. Corbmac (March 26), son of Eoghan, son of Muredach, in Munster, was Diermitius or Diarmaid, who like his brothers left his native place in Ireland for the propagation of the faith [CORBMAC (5)]. He went northward to the coast of Connaught, and built his church in the district of Cairbre, now Carbury barony, in the county of Sligo. It was first called Rosredheadh, but afterwards, when his brothers came to him, it was called Kill-mac-neogain, or church of the sons of Eoghan: by a chieftain of the Hy-Fiachrach, called Flann Dubh or Dubh Flann, it was richly endowed, and this pious act brought much blessing on him and his seed. Thus we read of Diarmaid in Colgan's memoir of St. Corbmac taken from an ancient Irish MS. (Acta SS. 731, c. 4), and in his note (ib. 755 n. 9) Colgan adds that in his day there was still a church in the diocese of Elphin that was known as Kill-mac-neogain, yet he is not sure as to the actual day of dedication; that is, whether the brother of St. Corbmac is the Diarmaid of Jan. 15, or of Oct. 12, and, he might have added, of Dec. 12 or Dec. 20 (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 219)

(7) Aug. 2. "Dermitius was held in great honour by St. Columba. He was abbat in Iona, and was celebrated in the Hebrides" (Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 165). There seems a confusion here, as the Dermitius, who was contemporary with St. Columba, was either his attendant, of whom we know nothing but the name, or the father of Aedh, who was a consenting party to the granting of Kells to St. Columba (Reeves, Adamnan, 42). But the person honoured in the Hebrides was St. Dermitius or Diarmaid, the twentieth abbat of Hy, during whose primacy the Columban monastery under his charge suffered great affliction from the pirates, and gave St. Blathmac and his companions to martyrdom [BLATHMAC]. He was also called Dalta Daighre, but for what reason we do not know (DALTA). He succeeded Kellach in A.D. 815, and after A.D. 831, was in turn succeeded by Indrecht. The Four Mast. (by O'Donovan, i. 429) have the entry at A.D. 816, "Diarmaid, abbat of Ia Coluim Cille, went to Alba (Scotland)," but in the edition used by Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 500, col. 2), there was added "cum scriniis divi Columbae," probably for their greater safety, as afterwards in the year 831 he took them to Ireland. He has some dedications in Dumbartonshire. (Reeves, Adamnan, 388-9; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 20, § 11, c. 21, § 2; Grub, Ecol. Hist. Scott. i. 125-7; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 323.) [J. G.]

DIATIMUS, bishop of Lymirus in Lycia, who, with other of the Lycian prelates, wrote to St. Basil in 375, expressing their desire to separate themselves from the heterodox Asiatic bishops, and to enter into communion with him (Basil, Epist. 403, 420). [E. V.]

DIBRIC (Annal. Camb. ad an. 612. M. H. B. 831 n.), bishop. [DUBRICIUS.] [C. H.]

DICASIUS, bishop of Tabia in Galatia Prima (circ. A.D. 314-325), present at the council of Neocaesarea, circ. A.D. 315. (Labbe, Concilia, i. p. 1488; Ceillier, ii. 640.) [W. M. S.]

DICHLETHE O'TRIALLAIGH. In his genealogies of the Hy-Fiachrach, M'Firbis gives an account of the descendants of Eochaidh Breac, son of Dathi, and, amongst others, of Fearamhla, the mother of the three O'Suanaigns of Raithin [FIDHAIRLE]. She was mother also of Dichlethe O'Triallaigh, who, according to the legend left Tirawly, co. Mayo, and settled at Disert O'Triallaigh, now Dysert in the barony of Clanmaurice, co. Kerry, and lying south-west of Listowel. His kindred and dedication are otherwise unknown. (Gen. Hy-Fiachrach, by O'Donovan, 34, 39-41.) [J. G.]

DICHOLL. [DICHOLL.]

DICHU, son of Trichem, of Sabhall, April 29. This saint is closely connected with St. Patrick and his preaching in Ireland, as he was his first Christian convert in Ulster, and continued faithful to the end. His father, Trichem, was a chief of Uladh or Ulster, and of the race of Fiatach Finn, who was ancestor of the Dal Fiatach; besides Dichu, he had six sons who were saints (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 114 n.; Colgan, Acta SS. 60, c. 2; but see Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 213). It is said that when St. Patrick landed at the mouth of the Slany, or at the entrance of one of the branches of Strangford Lough, in what is now the barony of Lecale, he hid his boat and proceeded to explore the country. The first to see him was a swineherd, who, mistaking him and his companions for robbers, ran and informed his master. This was Dichu, who came at first to protect his property, but was so struck with the words and appearance of the apostle of Ireland, that he soon gave in his entire submission to the faith, and was the first to believe and be baptized. In the later Lives a fearful picture is drawn of his atrocity, and wonders are multiplied; as when Joceline calls him "vir viribus robustus, statura giganteus, animo atrox," and relates how he was miraculously stayed from killing St. Patrick. On St. Patrick's return from attempting to convert his former master Milchu, he was with St. Dichu for a time at Magh-innis (now Lecale, as said above, a barony in co. Down beside Strangford Lough, and anciently belonging to the family of the Macgenises), where he is said to have given to St. Patrick a tract of land, and a barn or granary, which was converted into a church, and known as "Sabhal Patraic," or in its Latin form "Zabulum" or "Horreum Patricii," and now Saul, of which to adopt Dr. Reeves's words (Ecol. Ant. 40), "this church was the first founded by St. Patrick: its ground the first offering; and its owner, Dichu, the first convert to Christianity in Ulster." Colgan and Ussher place the conversion of St. Dichu in A.D. 432. Lanigan is of opinion that the "Sabhall Padruic" was a real barn or granary, given up by the convert to his master, while others think that it was only so called from the church having been built in the form and position of St. Dichu's barn; but Reeves is more inclined to believe that the word Sabhal or Horreum was an ecclesiastical technical term for a church possessing some peculiarity, such as this which deviated from the usual position in that it stood north and south, yet built, it may be, in imitation of the original Sabhal of Dichu. Having been thus early given to St. Patrick, Saul continued to be his favourite retreat, and was the scene of his departure to the Lord. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. passim; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 405-6; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. c. 5, § 2; Todd, St. Patrick, 344-45, 407-9; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 108, 3rd ed.) [J. G.]

DICTINIUS, a Priscillianist authority. Leo the Great, in his letter to Turribius, devotes a section to the writings of Dictinius, and condemns them. Dictinius had repented and recanted, and was recovered to the Catholic faith. His Priscillianist treatises, however, though disowned by their author, are described by Leo as still circulating among the Priscillianists, and held in reputation by them (S. Leo, Ep. xv. 16). [M. E. C.]

DICUL, one of the two presbyters to whom Furseus, the apostle of East Anglia, associating his brother with them, left the charge of his monastery at Cuobheresburg and the care of souls attaching to it, when he retired. (Bede, H. E. iii. 19.) For the period see FURSEUS. [C. H.]

DICULLUS, a monk of the Scottish nation, in charge of a very small monastery of five or six brothers at Bosanham in Sussex, a spot encompassed by the sea and woods. The existence of this mission comes to light in the history of Wilfrid, who on his arrival among the pagan South Saxons found that it had made no impression among the natives. (Bede, H. E. iv. 13.) [C. H.]

DIDA was the seventh abbess of the Benedictine monastery of St. Peter, Lyons, and ruled in the time of Fulcoaldus, bishop of Lyons. With the consent of Fulcoaldus, Proculus, bishop of Auvergne, translated by his legates the body of his predecessor St. Bonitus from the church of this monastery to Auvergne. Dida at first resisted this proceeding, but at length consented, retaining as a relic a part of the amfulbal or head-covering of the saint (Gall. Christ. iv. 284). [D. R. J.]

DIDANUS, or DIDOCUS, a subregulus, who about A.D. 727, on the death of his wife Safrida, founded a nunnery at Oxford for twelve religious virgins of noble birth under the government of his daughter Frideswida. (Monast. Anl. ii. 134; Tanner, Notit. ed. Nasmith, Oxf. xxiii.) [C. H.]

DIDO (1) was twenty-sixth bishop of Poitiers, and uncle to St. Leger, bishop of Autun and mayor of the palace of Francia; he stood in the same relationship also to Gerinus, count of Poitiers. After the death of king Sigebert, bishop Dido lent himself to the ambitious schemes of Grimoaldus, mayor of the palace. By his counsel Grimoaldus caused the young prince Dagobert, his ward, son and heir of Sigebert, to be tonsured; and by his instrumentality, Grimoaldus sent him in perpetual banishment to the Scots. (Sigeberti Gemblacensis Vita Regis Sigeberti, Patrol. Lat. elx. p. 730.)

Dido got into very bad odour through his friendship with the perfidious Grimoaldus, but when the latter and his son Childebert, the pseudo-king, were deposed, Dido again gained considerable favour with the royal family. The anonymous author of the life of St. Leger, relates that Leger became greatly improved under the tutorship of his uncle Dido, who is described as celebrated for sagacity and wealth. When Leger was twenty, Dido ordained him deacon; then after a short time he made him archdeacon, and shared with him the government of his diocese.

About the year 663 he subscribed to the privilege which Bernefridus, bishop of Amiens, conceded to the monastery of Corbie, on the petition of king Clotaire. It is not known for certain how long Dido ruled. He probably succeeded to the bishopric A.D. 673, or thereabout, if the statement be true that he lived up to the time of king Theodoric, who reigned after the death of his brother Childeric. Some say that Dido was sent into exile with St. Leger by Ebroinus, the rage of Ebroinus against St. Leger extending itself to the uncle.

(2) or DODO, thirty-second bishop of Nogent, lived in the 8th century, but nothing else is known of him (Gall. Christ. ix. 986).

[D. R. J.]

(3) or BIDO, thirty-seventh bishop of Tours, succeeded Guntrannus II. According to the Chronicon Turonense he was bishop of that diocese from the year 742 to the year 744, and was succeeded by Raganbertus. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 32; Mabill. Annales Ord. S. Bened., tom. ii. p. 30.) [D. R. J.]

DIDYMIA, fourth abbess of the monastery of Sainte-Croix de Poitiers, in the 6th century. It was in this same monastery that the rebellion took place which was headed by the nuns Chrodielis and Basina, in the time of the abbess Leuovera. Didymia succeeded Justina, who had followed Leuovera, the successor of Agnes, the first abbess under St. Radegonde, the queen who had founded the monastery. Didymia and the other sisters of the community requested Bandonivia, a nun who had been brought up under the eyes of St. Radegonde, to commit to writing the facts which had come within her personal knowledge in the life of that saint. Bandonivia at first excused herself on the plea of incapacity, but the abbess Didymia required her obedience, so she wrote a continuation of the life of St.

Radegonde which had been already written by St. Fortunatus. The latter work is to be found in vol. lxxxviii. of Patrol. Lat. and with the continuation by Bandonivia in vol. lxxii. (col. 651) of the same work. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1301; Ceillier, Hist. Gén. des Auteurs sacrés. i. 194.)

DIDYMUS and DOMITIUS, to whom Dionysius of Alexandria wrote a letter, setting forth a table for eight years of the time of Easter, and shewing that it must be later than the vernal equinox. The letter was written from Paretonia, and gave some account of the persecution of Valerian, and of Dionysius' flight. Ceillier (ii. 409) thinks there were two letters of Dionysius to this pair, one on Easter, another on the persecution; but a comparison of Eus. H. E. vii. 10 and 20 seems to point to an opposite conclusion.

DIDYMUS, head of the catechetical school of Alexandria in the 4th century. He was born in 309 or 314 (Tillemont, Mém. x. 387). When only four years old he lost his sight from a disease in the eyes; and in consequence was never taught, as he himself declared, even the usual rudiments of learning. But his extraordinary force of character and intense thirst of knowledge triumphed over all the disadvantages entailed by this great privation. He prayed for inward light, "but added studies to prayers." (Rufin. ii. 7.) He learned the alphabet by and off wooden tablets, feeling with his hands the letters engraved on them. He became acquainted with words and syllables by great efforts of attentive listening. In this way he taught himself grammar, rhetoric, logic, music, arithmetic, geometry; and became so thoroughly master of these sciences as they were then known and cultivated, that in discussing the subjects connected with them he was a match for all who had studied them in books (Soc. iv. 25; Soz. iii. 15; Theod. iv. 26). He attained a truly wonderful familiarity with the Scriptures; and it was, we may say, characteristic of the discernment of Athanasius that he placed the blind scholar in the presidency of the catechetical school, as a fitting successor of Pantaenus and Clement. According to Philip of Side, who lived early in the next century, he was the twelfth who occupied that chair. Two anecdotes of his earlier manhood are connected with the name of Antony, who, when visiting Alexandria in order to support the Catholic cause against the Arians, entered Didymus's cell, and in spite of his modest reluctance obliged him to offer up prayers in his hearing (Rosweyd. Vit. Patr. 944, 539, ed. 1617). At the same time he asked Didymus whether he was sad on account of his blindness. After the question had been twice repeated, Didymus owned that he did feel the affliction painfully. "Do not be distressed," rejoined the saintly hermit, "for the loss of a faculty enjoyed by gnats and flies, when you have that inward eyesight which is the privilege of none but saints." This latter incident is recorded by Jerome (Ep. 68, cf. Soc. iv. 29), who probably heard it from Didymus's own lips, at a time when he stayed for a month at Alexandria in 386, mainly, as he tells us (Prolog. in Eph.) in order to see Didymus, and to have Scripture difficulties explained by him, motives which had led many others to visit the Egyptian capital (Soz. l. c.). "In many points," wrote Jerome in A.D. 400 (Ep. 84), "I give him thanks. I learned from him things which I had not known; what I did know, his teaching has helped me to retain." Rufinus was also, and for a much longer time, a pupil of Didymus. Another anecdote is told by Palladius (Rosweyd. Vitae Patrum l. c.), who visited him four times, and heard him say that he was one day mourning over the "miserable life of Julian," and the sufferings of the church under his reign. He abandoned himself to sorrow, and tasted no food. At last, worn out with depression and anxiety, he fell asleep in his chair, and dreamed that he saw four horsemen on white steeds, hurrying in different directions, and calling aloud to each other. "Tell Didymus, 'To-day, at the seventh hour, Julian died: arise, therefore, and eat, and send word to the house of bishop Athanasius.'" On awaking, he took note of the exact time specified in the dream, and found afterwards that it tallied with that of the emperor's death in his Persian expedition.

Sozomen says that in arguing for the Nicene faith, Didymus was successful by his extreme persuasiveness: he seemed to make every one a judge of the points in dispute (iii. 15).

Testimonies to his great ability are quoted from Isidore of Pelusium, who wrote to him as to one who was an "acute and thoughtful inquirer, who could not be ignorant of anything" (Ep. i. 331), and from Libanius (Ep. 321) to Sebastian the Manichean, a "dux" of Egypt, who took part in the persecution of Alexandrian Catholics at the time of Athanasius's fourth exile. [ATHANASIUS.] "You cannot surely be unacquainted with Didymus, unless you are unacquainted with the great city where he has been pouring out his learning, for the benefit of others, night and day."

Our fullest information about him is derived from Jerome, who frequently refers to him as his old teacher, and affectionately describes him as "my seer," in allusion to the contrast between his physical blindness and his keenness of spiritual and intellectual perception. He translated into Latin Didymus's treatise "On the Holy Spirit," and prefixed to it a preface, in which he spoke of the author as having "eyes like the spouse in the Song of Songs," as "unskilled in speech but not in knowledge, exhibiting in his very speech the character of an apostolic man, as well by luminous thought as by simplicity of words." Writing in 392 (De Viris Illustr. 109), he gives a short biographical account of Didymus: "Blind from childhood, and therefore elementorum ignarus, he made himself an object of universal wonder by entirely mastering even dialectics and geometry. . . . He has written many admirable works;" then follows a list of them:—"On all the Psalms," "On the Gospels of Matthew and John," "On Dogmas," "Against the Arians," two books; "On the Holy Spirit," one book, "which I have translated into Latin;" "On Isaiah" [that is, as we learn from Jerome's Prologue to his own work on that prophet on the latter part, ch. xl.-lxvi.] eighteen tomes; "On Hosea," writing to me, three books; "On Zechariah," at my request, five books (see too, Prolog. in Zach.); "On Job," and others innumerable, some of which he elsewhere mentions—e.g. on the first Ep. to Corinthians (Jerome, Ep.

49) on the Galatians (Ep. 112, Prolog. in Galat.), on odd numbers (Ep. 48), on Jewish versions of the Old Testament (Adv. Ruf. iii. 34), and also a reply to Rufinus's question about the death of infants (ib. iii. 28), and comments on Origen, "de Principiis" (ib. i. 6). Jerome does not mention his comments on the Catholic Epistles, nor his treatise against Manicheism. He adds, "He is still alive at this day, and has passed his eighty-third year." Didymus died in 394 or 399 (cf. Tillemont, x. 796). One characteristic of Didymus as a theological writer was his zeal in defending the theological reputation of Origen; and it was this which, after his death, exposed his own name to some unfriendly judgments. We find Jerome himself speaking of Didymus as a defender of Origen, and as careful to put a good sense upon Origen's questionable language (Ep. 84), or as he more fully expresses himself in his Apol. adv. libros Rufini, written six years after the death of Didymus—"Didymus is a most avowed champion of Origen"; (i. 6) "certainly on the subject of the Trinity, he is Catholic"; and Jerome adds that his notes on Origen put forward an orthodox interpretation of Origen's language on that point, but that on other matters he openly expresses Origen's words, and defends as pious and Catholic "what all churches condemn" (ii. 16). Again, further on in the same work Jerome writes, "In Didymus we extol his great power of memory, and his purity of faith in the Trinity; but on other points, as to which he unduly trusted Origen, we draw back from him" (iii. 27).

The extent to which he may be called an Origeniser has been matter of question. See Mingarelli's "Commentarius" prefixed to his edition of Didymus's De Trinitate (Bologna, 1769). In his extant writings there is no assertion of Origenian views as to the pre-existence of souls, and he affirms, more than once, the endless nature of future punishment; but he seems to have believed that some of the fallen angels occupied a midway position between angels and demons, and would be ultimately forgiven. It is remarkable that neither Epiphanius nor Theophilus, nor indeed any one before the 6th century except Jerome, laid Origenism to his charge. And with regard to the alleged condemnation of his memory by the Fifth General Council, as he is never named in the Acts, the utmost that can be made of such a statement is, that the condemnation of Origen in that synod's eleventh anathema (Mansi, ix. 383) was somewhat largely construed as carrying with it, by implication, the condemnation of other writers who were more or less identified with his school of thought. See Tillemont's "comparison of Didymus with St. Gregory of Nyssa" (x. 396).

With regard to Didymus's work "On the Holy Spirit," we see clearly that it was a protest against Macedonianism. He begins by dwelling on the reverence due to the subject. (See Tillemont, x. 393.) He treats of it, he says, because errors are abroad as to the Person of the Divine Comforter, whom he proceeds to set forth as absolutely apart from all created beings, as immutable, together with the Father and the Son; as holy by essence, not by participation; as the source of holiness and other moral excellences, to angels and to men. He proves His Godhead from the Apostolic benediction, from the case of Ananias and Sapphira, from the sending forth of Paul and Barnabas, from St. Paul's words in 1 Cor. iii. 16, &c.; he distinguishes between Him and all ministering spirits; he speaks of Him as "put forth from the Son, that is, proceeding from the Truth"; he interprets "the Lord is the Spirit" as spoken of the Son, who there takes the Spirit's name because of their community of nature; he notices one or two objections (dealing with them somewhat in the tone of Athanasius), and concludes by exhorting his readers to purge their minds from all moral hindrances to the perception of sacred truth.

His comments on the Catholic Epistles are extant, as translated by Epiphanius Scholasticus (see Galland, Bib. Vet. Patr. ii.). They were first printed in 1531. The same translators, it may be added, gave a Latin version of Didymus's commentary on the Proverbs, which was mentioned by Cassiodorus. His notes on 1 Peter shew a dislike of Chiliasm, as a carnal and frivolous theory; he asserts free will, opposes Manicheans, admits the possibility of faults on the part of angels being cleansed through Christ, and in words which are very characteristic of the indomitable student and teacher, addresses a rebuke to Christians who neglect sacred studies, and attend only to practical life (on 1 Peter iii. 15). He comments briefly on 2 Peter, but sets it aside as spurious and "not in the canon," although, Mingarelli remarks, in the De Trinitate he cites it as Petrine. The chief features of his remarks on St. John's three Epistles are, (1) the earnestness against Docetism, Valentinianism, all speculations injurious to the Maker of the world, (2) the assertion that a true knowledge of God is possible without a knowledge of His essence, (3) care to urge the necessity of combining orthodoxy with right action. In the notes on Jude, he says that Christ is called the only Sovereign because He is the only true God: for, on the one hand, the fact that Jesus is sovereign does not deprive the Father of sovereignty, nor does the Father's Divinity make the Son external to true Godhead. He speaks of the doom of those who turn away absolutely to evil as hopeless.

His treatise "Against the Manicheans" (published by Combesisius in his Actuum irium Novum, 1672) begins with logical formulæ, intended to disprove the existence of two unoriginated Principles. From the blame and punishment attached to evil, he infers that Satan and his followers are not evil by nature; he discusses the terms, "by nature children of wrath" (which he understands to mean, "really children of wrath"), "children of this world," "son of perdition," "generation of vipers," with the aim of shewing that they do not contravene the great moral facts of free will and responsibility. (There is no sufficient reason against identifying him with the Didymus who is reported, Soc. iv. 23, to have said, "Keep the thought of providence and of judgment ever before your mind, for nearly all men stumble in these matters.") The devil, he urges, was created good, and became a devil by his own free will. If it be objected, why then did God make a being who was to become so pestilent? the objection really lies against the whole plan of God's moral government, which intends His rational creatures to become good by choosing goodness, and therefore leaves them capable of choosing evil, and drawing on themselves the result of such a choice. In this work he also asserts the transmission of original sin: a Saviour born by ordinary generation would have incurred the sin entailed on Adam's whole posterity. His three books "On the Trinity" have not reached us in a perfect state. They are interesting as exhibiting the Athanasian character, so to speak, of his thought in presence of Anomoeans and of Macedonians. He discusses the question of "generation by will," uses the analogy of light and of radiance, dwells on such texts as John i. 1 sq., Rom. ix. 5, 2 Cor. xiii. 13, Gal. i. 1, Phil. ii. 6, 7, 1 John v. 20. Occasionally he quotes texts with some verbal inexactness. He more than once adduces the "mighty God" of Isa. ix. He admits 2 Peter as genuine: perhaps when he wrote this work, the opinion which he had formerly held as to the non-canonicity of that epistle had been reconsidered. He is very earnest, almost in the style of the "Athanasian Creed," on the co-equality of the Divine Hypostases (he uses that term in the sense which the younger generation of Catholics had adopted since the earlier days of the Arian strife). He enforces the perpetuity of Christ's Kingdom (as if he were in controversy with Marcellians), and he speaks of the Virgin Mother as Theotocos (ii. 4). He bestows much time and pains on the Macedonian controversy. Occasionally he kindles and glows with strong devotional fervour, and concludes an eloquent passage on the glory of the Holy Trinity with a thrice-repeated Amen. Shortly before this passage, it is right to add, he invokes the archangels, and expresses his belief in the intercession of the saints (ii. 7).

Some fragments of his lost works have been preserved in "Catena" or "Anecdota." One passage from the commentary on the Psalms is translated by Dr. Pusey in his Doctrine of the Real Presence, p. 442, where he mentions the fact that "Card. Mai proposed to publish fragments on the Holy Eucharist from Didymus's Commentary on Proverbs." [W. B.]

DIER (DIHEUFYR, DEIFERUS), a Welsh saint, placed by Rees among those who flourished between A.D. 566 and 660, brother of Tyfydog, Tudur, Twrnog, and Marchell, other Welsh saints, and founder of the church of Bodfari in Flintshire. He is mentioned by the name of Deiferus in the legend of St. Winefred, near whose monastery at Gwytherin in Denbighshire he lived a recluse life. Cressy, who places her death in A.D. 664, says she was commemorated on March 7. (Cressy, Ch. Hist. of Brit. xvi. 9; Rees, Welsh Saints, 276.) [C. H.]

DIERA. [DIORA.]

DIGAIN, Welsh saint of the 5th century, brother of Erbin another Welsh saint, of the family of Cystennyn Gorneu. To him is attributed the foundation of Llangerniw, or the "Church of the Cornishmen," in Denbighshire. Commemorated November 21. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 134.) [C. H.]

DIHEUFYR, Welsh saint. [DIER.]

DIMA (DIMMA, DIOMA, with the latinised DIMANUS, DIMMANUS, and DIMAUS, and the Irish diminutive DIMMOG). Under its various forms, this name is of frequent occurrence in ancient Irish history, and found occasionally in the Scotch, while Diuma, first bishop of Mercia, had probably only a different form of the same name [DRUMA].

DIMA (1) March 9. O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 73) says "There is a Dioma, bishop, son of Senach, of the race of Eochaidh Fionn-fuathairt, of which is Bright," and Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 613, c. 3), without deciding between March 9 and 22, gives him as "St. Dimanus, episcopus, filius Senaci," among the saints belonging to the family of St. Brigida, of Kildare.

(2) June 27. On this day O'Clery (Mart. Doneg.) commemorates "Dioman, priest." When St. Patrick built the church of Fothrath during his first visit to Dalriada, he gave it in charge to two of his disciples, "Cathbadio praesbytero, et Dimano monacho," and Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 146, c. 130, 182 n.¹⁹⁶) thinks this Diman the priest is one of those commemorated on June 27 and Nov. 3.

(3) July 19. Camerarius (De Scot. Fort. 164) places St. Dimannus Abbas at July 19, and says he died in the Scotch province of Strathnavernia (Strathnairn) in A.D. 670. Whether the same person or not, but probably not, a "St. Dimaus, St. Sigenii discipulus," is given by Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 201) as one of those bishops, who, being attached to no one church, preached throughout Scotland, and drew the people to the faith and virtue by the sanctity of their lives; he flourished in A.D. 664, and is commemorated on Nov. 16. From the place and date given him by Boethius, Leslaeus, Dempster, and Camerarius, he is in all likelihood Dimaus, bishop of Connor, who died A.D. 658 or 659, and was one of those ecclesiastics of the north of Ireland whom the newly elected pope John addressed in his well-known Paschal letter [CRONAN (11) and DIMA (5)]. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jul. 19, tom. iv. 580) take occasion under this saint's name to rebuke the unritual habits of the Scottish and Irish hagiologists:—"Et mirantur Scoti aequae ac Hiberni nos in eorum sanctis admittendis paulo morosiores." (Bp. Forbes, Nid. Scot. S. Sants, 219, 236, 324; Boethius, Hist. Scot. lib. iv. f. 176; Leslaeus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. lib. iv. 151; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 105, 201.)

(4) Dimma, son of Cas, May 12. In the Life of St. Declan given by Ussher (Eccl. An. c. 16, wks. vi. 335 et al.) St. Declan is said to have been, at the age of seven, put (A.D. 360) under the charge of Dymma, "a religious man and wise, and proved in the faith of Christ," along with another boy called Carpre or Coibre, son of Colnim, who afterwards became a holy and venerable bishop. And in the table of the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 40) there is the note at Dimma or Dionna, son of Cas. "He is patron of Cill-Dioma in Caenraige of the county and diocese of Limerick, and has a holiday, a festival, and a station. He was also the master of Declan and Coibre, son of Colman, bishop, as we read in the Life of Declan; and he was in the Desi of Mumhain." But as it is certain that St. Declan did not belong to the fourth century [DECLAN (2)], and as it is more than probable that if St. Declan was under a St. Dimma, it was under Dimma Dubh [DIMMA (5)], the writer of the note is evidently in error, when thus connecting the son of Cas with St. Declan. What he calls "Cill-Dioma in Caenrighe" is now the parish of Kildimo in the barony of Kenry and county of Limerick, and by attaching "in the county of Limerick, patron," to Dimmog, of Cluain-caoin (April 26), he plainly thought that the latter was only the diminutive form of Dimma. (O'Flaherty, Ogygia, ii. pt. 3, c. 79, p. 292; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 159-60).

DIMA (5) Dubh, bishop, of Condeire (Connor), Jan. 6. Dima or Dimma Dubh (the black, from his dark hair or complexion) has his memoir given by Colgan (Acta SS. 16, on Jan. 6), and was son of Aenghus, son of Cairthenn Finn, &c. (Mart. Doneg.), of the race of Cormac Cas, son of Oillil Olum; he thus was a native of Munster and of the Dalcaessian line of the royal house there. He was also cousin-german of St. Breacan (May 1) of Ara, son of Eochaidh, son of Cairthenn Finn [BRECAN (5)]. In youth he was committed to the care of St. Colman Ela (Sept. 26) for education at the monastery and school of Lynally, in King's County, where he made such progress in learning and piety as in course of time to become abbat of Lynally and bishop of Connor. In the Life of St. Cronan (Apr. 28) of Roscrea, there is a story related of a Dima who copied the book of the Gospels for Cronan in the space of forty days and nights, without food or rest; this is supposed by some to have been St. Dina Dubh, but others, like Lanigan, with greater reason doubt Dima Dubh's being the Dima there spoken of, and his having in any way given a semblance of foundation to the myth. He appears, however, in authentic history as Dimanus or Dimaus, one of the bishops in the north of Ireland to whom in A.D. 640, John, when pope-elect, addressed the famous letter upon the Paschal question, urging them to conformity with Rome and the rest of Christendom, and also upon the Pelagian heresy [CRONAN (11)]. He is in all probability the St. Dima "vir religiosus, et sapiens, atque probatus in Christi fide," who was entrusted with the education of St. Declan, who was also a native of Munster, but this must entirely militate against the early date of St. Declan [DECLAN]. We have no account of the time of his birth, but he is said to have died at a very advanced age in A.D. 659 (Ann. Tig.), and as St. Colman Ela, who died A.D. 611, was succeeded by him as abbat before that time, he could not have been born later than A.D. 570. The Annals of Ulster call him Domaingert, but this is a mistake by O'Conor, as the true reading there is Dimma Niger. The beautifully illustrated copy of the Gospels, written by the scribe Dimma for St. Cronan of Roscrea about the close of the 6th century is now preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, and, being known as the "Book of Dimma," is classed A, 4, 23 in the MSS. collection of that library. (Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 324; Reeves, Ecl. Ant. 149, 240; O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. ii. 201, iv. 53; Betham, Ir. Ant. Researches, i. 43 sq.; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 15, § 11; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 73-9; Todd, St. Patrick, 207-9; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 269; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. iv. 273-74.) [J. G.]

DIMANUS, DIMIANUS, missionary to Britain. [DUVIANUS.] [C. H.]

DIMOERITAE. This was another name for the followers of Apollinarius (see under that name), and is probably to be explained by the help of a passage in a letter written by Gregory of Nazianum to Nectarius of Constantinople (Ep. 202, al. Or. 46). Gregory, when speaking of Apollinarius's book, mentions that it affirmed that, He Who had come down from above had no νοῦς, but that τὴν θεότητα τοῦ Μονογενοῦς τὴν τοῦ νοῦ φύσιν ἀναπληρώσασαν, μέρος γενέσθαι τοῦ ἀνθρωπείου συγκράματος τὸ τρίτομόριον, ψυχῆς τε καὶ σώματος κατὰ τὸ ἀνθρώπινον περὶ αὐτὸν ὄντων, νοῦ δὲ μὴ ὄντος, ἀλλὰ τὸν ἐκείνου τόπον τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγου ἀναπληροῦντος. Since then the Apollinarians maintained that our Lord assumed only (διμοιρία) two of the three parts (σῶμα, ψυχὴ, νοῦς) of which perfect humanity consists, they were called by Epiphanius Dimoeritae.

Epiphanius (Haer. lxxvii.) is the chief existing reporter of their views. They were divided into ramifications both numerous and subtle; some asserting one tenet more definitely than another, and all outpacing their leader. As Epiphanius says: "It is quite impossible to believe that so learned and good a man as Apollinarius ever held all the views which are put forward by those who bore his name. For example, some denied especially the perfect Incarnation of Christ; some asserted His body consubstantial with His divinity; some emphatically denied that He had ever taken a soul; others not less emphatically refused to Him a mind."

The sect appears to have included many who were both respected and honoured by their contemporaries, and the means taken to restore them to the church were both wise and kind. St. Athanasius, Basil, and Gregory of Nazianum all adopted the plan of treating them gently. They instructed others to follow the plan which they themselves adopted, and which proceeded upon the principle of distinguishing between the individual and the opinion held by him, much as Christ had taught them to distinguish between the sinner and his sin. "State firmly," was their advice, "and definitely the teaching of the church on the points in question, in order that you may arrest proselytism: tell them that their opinions are not those of the Church Catholic, nor their thoughts those of the Fathers of the church" (Athanas.); but that done, kindness and gentleness were to do the rest. "We must pray," says Epiphanius, "that he who holds these views be not separated from the church of Christ, nor from the sweet communion of the entire brotherhood, but that he may put away his habit of controversy, and listen to Him Who appeals to him: "Return, return, that we may look upon Thee" (Cant. vi. 13).

The views of the Apollinarian party seem to have both shrunk in intelligence and developed in subtlety when Epiphanius became acquainted with them. These views professed to be based on texts of Holy Scripture, such as St. John iii. 15 and 1 Cor. xv. 47; but the interpretation of these passages was so forced, or the passages themselves so divorced from their contexts, that it was an easy task to expose the weakness of the foundations. "When the Lord came, He took not our flesh, nor one like it, but one wholly different," was one man's argument. A second persisted: "If He did take our body, yet

His nails, His flesh, His hair, and every member were different," utterly reckless that he was reproducing an exploded Valentinian conception. They needed Epiphanius's rebuke: "Do not pass by the faith delivered by Prophet, Evangelist, and Apostle for the sake of introducing fabulous and sophistical ideas."

* Among the leaders of the Dimoeritae was one Vitalius. Both Gregory of Nazianzum and Epiphanius came in contact with him; and the former while Vitalius was, it would seem, a presbyter, the latter when he had been made a bishop of the sect. Vitalius was a man of irreproachable character, but thoroughly imbued with the principle of reservation. He agreed with his opponents in the accepted interpretation of certain frequently-quoted passages of Scripture; and, by so doing, he left the impression both upon Gregory and pope Damasus that he was himself orthodox; but when the doctrines logically deducible from those passages were pressed, then, it became only too evident how much Vitalius had reserved. Gregory found it necessary to withdraw his previous approval of Vitalius, and his followers took their revenge in abuse; τὸ δὲ ἐν προσκυνεῖν μὴ ἀνθρώπων Θεοφόρον, ἀλλὰ θεὸν σαρκοφόρον. It was an age of profane abuse and nicknames, in which neither party spared the other. Because the orthodox belief asserted that Christ assumed perfect humanity, the Apollinarians taunted the Catholics with being "Anthropolatrians," or worshippers of a man; the Catholics, with equally bad taste, twitted the Apollinarians with being "Sarcolatrians," or worshippers of one who had taken the flesh alone, and not the other parts of perfect humanity: the Apollinarians retorted by the profane sneer that Christians who believed that the Lord's body was born of the Virgin Mary believed not in a Trinity but in a Quaternity.

When Epiphanius was at Antioch, he had a long discussion with Vitalius on his opinions. The bishop Paulinus had produced a profession of faith countersigned by Athanasius: in this the belief in the Trinity in Unity was confessed, and the true and proper Incarnation asserted (ὅτι δι' ἡμᾶς ἄνθρωπος γέγονεν, ἐκ τε τῆς ἁγίας παρθένου καὶ ἁγίου πνεύματος γεννηθείς. οὐτε γὰρ ἄψυχον, οὐτε ἀναισθητὸν, οὐτε ἀνόητον σῶμα εἶχεν ὁ σωτήρ). At first, as point after point was raised, discussed, and agreed upon, pleasure and satisfaction were evinced by all present; but when the crucial question was put: "You admit the Incarnation, do you also admit that Christ took a mind (νοῦν)?" The answer, "No," at once destroyed the value of the previous concessions. Epiphanius persisted: "In what sense then do you call Christ τέλειος?" and Vitalius replied: "τέλειον ἄνθρωπον λέγομεν εἶναι, εἰ τὴν θεότητα ποιήσομεν ἀντὶ τοῦ νοῦ καὶ τὴν σάρκα, καὶ τὴν ψυχὴν; ὡς εἶναι τέλειον ἄνθρωπον ἐκ σαρκὸς, καὶ ψυχῆς, καὶ θεότητος ἀντὶ τοῦ νοῦ." The point was debated without results. Epiphanius urged that not only was nothing gained by excluding mind, as we understand it, from the nature of Christ; but also that by such exclusion much was lost which made His nature, character and actions intelligible. Vitalius and his followers either could not or would not meet Epiphanius's arguments; they avoided them by reverting to their favourite texts, "We have the mind of Christ"

(1 Cor. ii. 16) was a passage sufficient in their opinion to prove indubitably that the mind of Christ must have been different from the ordinary mind; and the Catholic and usual interpretation of St. Paul's words may almost have been said to have been set aside by them, because not sufficiently subtle.

Other tenets held by the Dimoeritae, not perhaps generally, but by detached sections of the sect, are given by Epiphanius. Some were due to the teaching of Apollinarius, others were imported from other systems. (a) A distorted interpretation of 1 Cor. ii. 8 was put forward in support of the view that the Divinity of our Lord suffered: to which Epiphanius could not avoid making the half-humorous reply that "these people, not understanding the passage, wish to be very sophistical;" though it might have been pleaded in their behalf, that there was about this time a very dangerous tendency, even among those whose orthodoxy was unquestioned, to talk about God being born, God dying, &c.; language never harmless to the best, and fatal to such as the Dimoeritae. (b) Some held that the Virgin Mary lived with Joseph as her husband after the birth of Jesus Christ. To such men as Epiphanius, this tenet was apparently very offensive. His comment upon it is one of incredulous amazement: "I wonder if they do say this." (c) The Chiliast notions entertained by Apollinarius were extended and defined. Some believed that after the first Resurrection, they should live for 1000 years the life they were then living; that marriage, circumcision, strict attention to the law would continue in the new life as in the old. This and other Judaistic conceptions were severely rebuked both by Gregory of Nazianzum and Epiphanius.

The Dimoeritae probably existed, as a sect, for a few years only, either under their own name or as Vitalians, Synusiasts, Polemians, Valentinians, recording the name of some favourite leader or favourite opinion. Then they died out, or merged themselves into other bodies holding views similar to their own, or were brought back again to the church. The books, psalteries, and hymns composed and issued by Apollinarius and his principal followers were met, and their effects counteracted by books and hymns such as have given to Gregory of Nazianzum a name among ecclesiastical song-writers; the animosity of the emperor Theodosius, extended to them in common with Arians, Manicheans and Macedonians, must have shaken the steadfastness of many; and the decisions of the councils of Constantinople and Chalcedon would throw additional discredit as well as anathema upon opinions which attempted to explain with mathematical precision the inscrutable 'mysteries' of God. The speculative tendency of the Eastern church had originated these opinions, and that same tendency killed them or suffered them to give place to other and newer speculations. For a time, but by God's providence for a time only, Apollinarianism did unquestionable harm. It was, as Epiphanius sorrowfully puts it, the work of that adversary "who ever troubles the human race, mingling with excellent food his deleterious poison, and infusing bitterness even into honey."

Athanasius's letter to Epictetus, bishop of Corinth, and two books against Apollinarianism; Gregory of Nazianzum's letter to Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople (sometimes called Orat. 46, see Migne's edition, iii. col. 329, &c.); do. two letters to Cledonius (sometimes called Orat. 50, 51; see Migne, iii. col. 175, &c.); Basil, Letters, 264, 265; Epiphanius, Panaria, iii. 11; Hæc. lxxvii. (ed. Dindorf, iii. 1, p. 454); Oehler, Corpus Hæreseolog. ii. 330, &c.; and the usual Church histories, e.g. Neander, Niedner, Hase, Robertson, s.r. 'Apollinarianism,' should be consulted with reference to this subject. [J. M. F.]

DIMPNA (DYMPNA), virgin and martyr, commemorated May 15. Of this saint Messingham (Florileg. Insul. Sanctor. 345-50) gives a legend of life and martyrdom, a sequence, and also a short memoir extracted from John Molanus (Natales Sanctorum Belgii). The Bollandists (Acta SS. Maii 15, tom. iii. 475-95) give the life published by Messingham, with the addition of many miracles, some of which are ancient and some of more recent date; the Bollandists think she belongs to the 7th century. The latest is The Life of St. Dimpna, Virgin, Martyr, and Patroness of Gheel, by the Rev. John O'Hanlon, M.R.I.A., Dublin, 1863. Some would identify her with St. Damhnat, but it is most probable that Damhnat was a different person [DAMHNAT]. St. Dimpna was the daughter of a heathen king in Ireland, and, having been secretly baptized, devoted herself body and soul to the service of Christ. From the unnatural advances of her father she fled to Belgium under the guidance of the priest Gerebern, the martyr and patron of Sonsbeck. Having pursued and discovered the fugitives, her father, who was still repelled by his daughter, first put Gerebern to death, and then St. Dimpna. Her relics were preserved with great care and reverence at Gheel. May 30 is the day of her death, and May 15 that of her translation. But her date is very uncertain. To meet the conditions of the legend, she must have lived very early, and thus Lanigan places her birth about A.D. 500. It is more probable, however, that she belongs to the 7th century (Colgan, Acta SS. 713, c. 4, col. 2; Butler, Lives of the Saints, v. 243, May 15; Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 16, § 13). Adam King (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 152) gives her a much later date: "S. Dymnpa, virgin dochter to ye king of irland martersid be hir alwin father vnder leo ye 3 A.D. 720." [J. G.]

DINAN, missionary to Britain. [DUVIANUS.] [C. H.]

DINCOMALUS or VINCOMALUS (Graecè Βινκομάλος), one of the nineteen great officers of state present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. He was Master of the Sacred Offices (Labbe, Concil. iv. 78, etc.; Ceillier, x. 683).

[W. M. S.]

DINERTACH, of Cluain-mór, Oct. 9. He is entered on this day in the Martyrologies of Donegal and Tullyght, and Colgan (Acta SS. 597, n. 17) mentions him among several others belonging to Cluain-mór-Maethog in Leinster, while he refers also to another Cluain-mór in Muskerry. There are two places in Leinster called Clonmore, "one," says O'Donovan (Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 379, n. 2) "near the river Slaney, in the barony of Bantry and co. of Wexford, and the other in the barony of Rathvilly and co. of Carlow. There is at the latter a holy well called Tober-Mogne, and the editor (O'Donovan) is of opinion that it is Cluain-mór-Maethog." [J. G.]

DINGAD AB NUDD HAEL, Welsh saint of the 6th century; but no churches are ascribed to him. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 269.) [C. H.]

DINGAD AB BRYCHAN, Welsh saint of the 5th century, founder of the churches of Llandinog in Carmarthenshire and Llanigad or Dingatstowe, Dingestow, or Dynstow, in Monmouthshire; commemorated on November 1. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 140.) [C. H.]

DINOCRATES, brother of Perpetua, martyr. He died at the age of seven. Her Acts relate that when in prison she had a vision of him in suffering, and after she had prayed for him, a second vision in which she saw him refreshed (Ruinart, Act. Sinc. 96). Augustine of Hippo, in the first of his four books On the Soul and its Origin, says that the account is not canonical, and that it cannot be used as an argument about unbaptized children, because it does not say whether the boy had been baptized or not (August. de Animâ, i. 10, Patrol. Lat. xlv. 475; Ceillier, ix. 468). [W. M. S.]

DINOOTH, DINOTHUS (DUNAWD, DUNAWD FAWR, DUNAWD WR, DUNOD FYR), abbat of Bangor Iscoed, a Welsh saint, placed by Rees among those who flourished between A.D. 500 and 542. He was originally a North British chieftain, whom the Triads call one of the three pillars of his country in battle; but reverses drove him into Wales, where he found a protector in Cyngen, son of Cadell, prince of Powys, who had given an asylum to his father Pabo under similar circumstances. Following the example of many other British chieftains of that period on losing their lands in the progress of the Saxon arms (Rees, Welsh Saints, 207), Dunawd embraced a life of religion, and under the patronage of Cyngen he founded, in conjunction with his sons, Deiniol, Cynwyl, and Gwarthan, the monastery of Bangor on the Dee, of which he was the first abbat. The mention of his name by Bede, in his narrative of the second conference at Augustine's Oak, seems valuable as fixing a date in the uncertain chronology of the Welsh saints. That the historian here (H. E. ii. 2) gives his own authority for the abbat's having been alive then is universally assumed; whereas the passage cautiously says, "tempore illo Dinoot abbas prae-fuisse narratur." Bede, who wrote a century and a quarter after Augustine's time, shews no special acquaintance with the internal affairs of the Britons, and we cannot help suspecting that the same uncertain chronology which is now found besetting Welsh hagiology existed when he wrote. A later statement, besides making the founder of Bangor alive in A.D. 602 or 603, brings him to the conference itself, though he must have been in the extremest old age, and to get there he would have had a mountain journey from the Dee to the lower Severn (see Dict. of Ch. Antiqq. AUGUSTINE'S OAK; also Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 40, 41 on Augustine's journey); while it even reports the speech which he is said to have made in the name of the British church in answer to Augustine. An account of the document which conveys this information may be seen in Haddan and Stubbs (Councils, i. 122), where the answer is quoted in the original Welsh with Spelman's Latin translation. Two copies of the original MS. exist in the Cottonian collection. It is accepted as genuine by Leland (Tanner, Biblioth.

.748, art. 'Dinotus,' p. 228), Stillingfleet (Orig. Brit. i. 536), Lappenberg (Hist. of Eng. i. 135). On the other hand it may be observed that the document does not mention the name of Augustine, nor does it make any allusion to one subject of the conference which is markedly noted by Bede, the evangelisation of the Anglo-Saxons. In fact it contains no name whatever, but the gist of it is a firm and temperate repudiation of papal authority, and an assertion of the supremacy of "the bishop of Caerleon upon Usk" over the British church. For any internal evidence to the contrary, the "Answer" might have been penned in reply to some demand made upon the British church by the see of Canterbury centuries after Dinooth. It bears upon that subject, and that alone. Moreover, if St. David removed the see to Menevia, how comes Caerleon upon Usk in the abbat's mouth?

Dinooth is after all a shadowy personage, and we know less about him than of his famous monastery. This stood upon the right bank of the Dee, ten or twelve miles from Chester. The name of Bangor ys y coed (Bangor under the wood) distinguishes it from other Bangors, especially that of Caernarvonshire, where the son of Dinooth founded another monastery, which was soon afterwards made the seat of a bishopric [DEINIOL]. So numerous were the monks of Bangor Iscoed that, as Bede puts it, on their being divided into seven parts with a ruler over each, none of those parts consisted of less than 300 men, who all lived by the labour of their hands. The Triads say it contained 2400 monks, who took their turn, 100 each hour, to perform divine service day and night without intermission (Camd. ed. Gough, ii. 429). Another tradition is that "there were seven chancels in Bangor Iscoed, and 300 devout monks, men of learning, in each chancel, praising God day and night without ceasing" (E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 548). It thus corresponded in magnitude with the Irish Bangor [COMGALL], and from the learned men mentioned by Bede as residing there it must have been as much a college as a monastery, a circumstance hardly in keeping, however, with the military antecedents of its founder. It was not against this institution in particular that Augustine's prediction was levelled, but the British church and people at large; nor was it beyond the reach of his own sagacity to have made a prediction that "if they would not preach the way of life to the English nation they should at their hands undergo the vengeance of death." It is not so certain that the British church was neglecting its missionary duties as it is that it refused to prosecute them in conjunction with Augustine. This conjunction ("una cum nobis," Bede) involved, in fact, their ecclesiastical submission, and should not be lost sight of in the narrative of the conference. "Dinot's Answer," in recognising this as the sole object of Augustine, was so far to the point, and may have appeared to some one in after times a sufficient ground to assign the document to this occasion. The judgment fell about ten years afterwards, A.D. 613 (Ann. Camb. and Ann. Tighern., preferable to earlier dates, as 603 of Flor. Wig. and 606 or 607 of A. S. C., cf. Haddan and Stubbs, i. 123), when Ethelfrid, the pagan king of Northumbria, invaded the Britons at Chester. Being about to give battle, he observed their "priests," who were there to pray for the soldiers, drawn up apart in a place of greater safety, and under the military protection of prince Brocmail. They had come chiefly from Bangor, after a three days' fast. This spiritual body had not been brought upon the field like chaplains of a modern army, and the invader, naturally regarding them as a contingent of his enemy, attacked them first and slew about 1200, only 50 of them escaping. We may suppose either that Bede here uses the term "sacerdotes" and "monachi" as synonymous, or that the priests were in charge of the monks, leading their devotions. It was a disastrous blow to Bangor, and was naturally handed down as a fulfilment of Augustine's words; but we do not hear that the monastery itself was attacked. Some 60 years later the annalists record "Combustio Bennchoriae Britonum" (Hadd. and St. i. 125), probably referring to this Bangor of the Dee. Malmesbury (G. R. ed. Hardy, i. 66) describes the extensive ruins of the place in his day—"tot semiruti parietes ecclesiarum, tot anfractus porticum, tanta turba ruderum, quantum vix alibi cernas;" the credibility of which description has been sometimes almost destroyed by translating the first clause, "the ruined walls of so many churches." The remains had nearly disappeared in the time of Camden, who (as well as Bede's editor, Smith, after him) suspected that they had belonged in reality to the Roman Bovium, but probably without reason (Camd. ed. Gough, ii. 422, 429; Smith, ad Bed. E. H. ii. 2; Tanner, Notit. ed. Nasmith, Flint, ii.). The spot is now to be found on the road between Wrexham and Whitechurch, about five miles from each, in that detached portion of Flintshire which lies on the right bank of the Dee between Cheshire and Salop. Its modern state and surviving vestiges are described in Lewis (Topog. Dict. of Wales, art. 'Bangor'). Leland's description will be found in his Itinerary (vol. v. p. 30, 2nd ed. Hearne). [C. DIOCLES, correspondent of Gregory of Nazianzum, circ. A.D. 382. The letter of Gregory is about a marriage in which Diocles is interested, and recommends modesty and the absence of buffoonery at wedding feasts. (Patrolog. Graec. xxviii. Ep. 232, col. 375; Ceillier, v. 266.)

DIOCLETIAN (DOCLES, DIOCLES, CALUS VALERIUS DIOCLETIANUS JOVIUS), A.D. 284-305. The acts that make the reign of this emperor memorable in the history of the church belong to its closing years. Had he died before A.D. 303 he would have taken his place among the rulers whose general tolerance helped Christianity to obtain its victory. As it is, his name is identified with the most terrible of its persecutions. For three centuries men reckoned from the commencement of his reign as from the era of martyrs;^a and the date is still recognised in the Coptic church as the basis of its chronology.

The earlier years of Diocletian need be noticed here only so far as they connect themselves with the struggle which came to a head when his work seemed nearly over. Elected by the soldiers in Bithynia at the age of 39, after the murder of Numerianus, he was formally installed at Nicomedia. In A.D. 286 he chose Maximianus as his colleague, gave him the title first of Caesar and then of Augustus, and sent him to command in the West, while he remained in the East, residing chiefly at Nicomedia, and doing all in his power to make it, by lavish outlay on its buildings, as a new capital for the empire. It was symptomatic of his intention to uphold the religion of the state that he assumed the surname of Jovius, and gave to his colleague that of Herculius. There are no traces in him either of the philosophical eclecticism which had distinguished some of his predecessors, or of the tendency to Oriental rites which had characterised others. His earlier acts, on the other hand, shew something of the syncretic temper that looks on all national religions as things to be patronised and defended. Thus in his address to the legions on his accession he appeals not to Jupiter but to the "all-seeing sun" as bearing witness that he was guiltless of the death of Numerianus. So we find among the buildings with which he embellished the various provinces of the empire, temples of Zeus, Apollo, Nemesis, Hecate, at Antioch, of Isis and Serapis at Rome, of Isis again at Phylae, of Mithras (here also we trace sun-worship) at Vindobona. Even his choice of epithets for himself and his colleague may have indicated a purpose to defend the cultus of the gods against the forces that threatened it, as Jupiter and Hercules had together resisted the rebellious Titans. He consulted haruspices and augurs as to the success of his enterprises. In more difficult emergencies he sent to the oracle of the Milesian Apollo at Branchidae (Lactant. de Mort. Persec. c. 10-11). The decree in A.D. 295 against "malefici et Manichaei" is in the tone of one who partly as a politician, partly from reverence, wishes to revive and reorganise the religion which he had inherited, and so to win the favour of the gods (Cod. Greg. v. 1, xiv. 4, ed. Haenel, quoted in Preuss. Kaiser Diocletian und seine Zeit, p. 134).

^a The received Christian era, introduced by Dionysius Exiguus in A.D. 527, did not take its place in general use till the 7th or even the 8th century (Nicolas, Chronology of History, pp. 3, 12).

The appointment of Constantius Chlorus and Galerius in A.D. 293 as Caesars under the two Augusti, introduced new elements into the history of Diocletian's reign. Each of them was called on to prove his loyalty to the system into which he was adopted by a new marriage. Constantius divorced Helena and married Theodora, the step-daughter of Maximianus. Galerius, also repudiating his former wife, received the hand of Valeria, the daughter of Diocletian and Prisca. To Constantius was entrusted the government of Gaul and Britain, to Galerius the provinces between the Adriatic and the Euxine. Diocletian kept the provinces of Asia under his own control. Maximianus had those of Africa and Italy.

The edict of Gallienus, A.D. 259, had placed Christianity in the number of religiones licitae, and there had been no formal persecution since that date. Diocletian and Maximian began by adopting the same policy; and the martyrdoms which are referred to the earlier years of their reign, like those of St. Maurice and the Theban Legion, at Martigny (Octodurum), of St. Victor at Marseilles, of SS. Cosmas and

Damian and others in Cilicia, if they are more than legendary, must be referred to special causes, and not to a general policy of persecution against Christians. The somewhat cloudy rhetoric with which Eusebius (H. E. viii. 1) describes the condition of the church of this time indicates that the last struggle between it and the old religion of the empire could not long be averted. The most trusted and influential eunuchs of the king's household, Dorotheus and Gorgonius, were avowedly Christians, and as such were excused from attending at heathen sacrifices (Euseb. viii. 1). The letter of Theonas, bishop of Alexandria, to Lucianus the chamberlain of Diocletian,^b shews that he had been promoted to a high place in the emperor's favour, and had it in his power to promote others. Theonas counsels him to use the opportunities thus given him for the furtherance of the good cause, and hints that if he could get a Christian appointed to take charge of the imperial library, there might be an opening for working upon the mind of the emperor himself, for naming Christ and urging His divinity. As it was they gained considerable influence over Prisca the wife and Valeria the daughter of Diocletian, and though their rank and the emperor's policy kept them back from an open profession of faith, their absence from all sacrifices became noticeable and made men look on them with suspicion (Lactant. de Mort. Persec. c. 15). So it was that churches were built in every city and crowded with worshippers. Buildings that had met the wants of a former generation were now found too small and had to be enlarged. The church of Nicomedia was the most conspicuous edifice in the city. The adherents of the old system had good reason for alarm. They saw in every part of the empire an organised society that threatened it with destruction.^c

Symptoms of the coming conflict began before long to shew themselves. Malchus, the disciple of Plotinus (better known as Porphyry), wrote against the religion of the Christians while maintaining a tone of reverence towards Christ himself, and so became in their eyes their most formidable opponent. Hierocles, first as Vicarius of Bithynia and afterwards, probably, as prefect of Egypt, fought against them with the pen as well as with the sword, and published "Words of a Truth-lover to the Christians," in which He whom they worshipped was compared with Apollonius of Tyana. Within the imperial circle itself there were those who were impatient of the tolerance of Diocletian. The mother of Galerius, who gave sacrificial banquets almost daily, was annoyed because Christian officers and soldiers refused to come to them. The case of Maximilian of Theveste, in proconsular Africa, who in A.D. 295 had refused to serve as a soldier and take the military oath, on the ground that it was incompatible with his allegiance to Christ, that of Marcellus (A.D. 298) who at Tingis in Mauritania solemnly renounced his allegiance to the emperor rather than take part in festivals which he looked on as idolatrous, had probably alarmed Galerius himself. How was military discipline to be maintained, how was the empire to be defended, unless decisive measures were taken? (Ruinart, Acta Sincera, pp. 309, 312).

^b The letter is to be found in D'Achery's Spicilegium iii. 297, and Galland's Biblioth. Patr. iv. It does not name the emperor of whom it speaks, nor the see of which the writer was bishop. Neander, however, may be held to have proved that it applies to Diocletian more than to any later or earlier emperor. Euseb. (H. E. vii. 32) names a Theonas as having presided over the church of Alexandria from A.D. 287 to 300.

^c The inscription said to have been found at Ciutua in Spain (Gruter, pp. 280, 283) in honour of Diocletian and Maximian: "Delecto Christianorum nomine qui rempublicam evertebant," is of doubtful authenticity (cf. Hübnér Corp. Inscr. Lat., vol. ii. p. 26*). But the feeling with which the pagan population of the empire looked on the persecution has its analogue in that which pervaded Catholic Europe after the Massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Occasions were soon found.⁴ Diocletian, who seems to have had a devout belief in the old methods of divination, had offered sacrifice, and the haruspices were inspecting the entrails of the victim to see what omens were to be found there. The Christian officers and servants of the emperor were present as part of their duty, and satisfied their conscience by making the sign of the cross upon their foreheads. The diviners were, or pretended to be, struck with amazement at the absence of any signs such as they expected. They sacrificed again and again with the same result. At last they declared that their work was hindered by the presence of profane persons. The emperor's rage was roused. His personal attendants, all who had any office in his palace, were ordered to sacrifice under penalty of being scourged if they refused. Letters were sent to military officers bidding them to compel the soldiers under them to a like conformity under pain of dismissal from the service. Soon there was another step taken. The mother of Galerius was, as has been said above, in the habit of giving almost daily banquets of a sacrificial character to which the officers of the army and household were invited. She was irritated at the persistent absence of the Christians and incited her son to take more active measures against them. They urged the emperor on, and found but a feeble resistance. He deprecated the slaughter that was sure to ensue; he wished to confine the edict to those who were servants of his household or soldiers in his army. He would take counsel with his friends. He would consult the gods. One of the haruspices was accordingly sent to the oracle of the Milesian Apollo at Branchidae. And the answer came, not from the priestess only, but, as it were, from the god himself speaking from the recesses of his cave, telling him that the presence of the self-styled "just ones" on the earth made it impossible for the oracles to speak the truth. This turned the scale and the emperor gave way. All he asked for was that bloodshed might, if possible, be avoided. Galerius had wished to condemn to the flames all who refused to sacrifice.

After many divinations the Feast of the Terminalia (Feb. 23rd) of A.D. 303 was chosen as the fit day for issuing the edict which was to set limits to the progress of the new society. At break of day the prefect attended by officers and secretaries went to the church of Nicomedia while Diocletian and Galerius watched the proceedings from the palace. The doors were broken open. Search was made for the image of the Christian's God, which, strange as it may seem, they still expected to find there. All the books of the church were burned, all its fittings sacked. The fear of the fire spreading made Diocletian shrink from burning the church itself, but a body of pioneers with their axes and crowbars brought it in a few hours to the ground. The next morning an edict was issued ordaining that (1) all churches were to be demolished; (2) all sacred books were to be burnt; (3) all Christian men who held any official position were not only to be stripped of their dignities, but to be deprived of civil rights, and therefore rendered liable to torture and other outrages; while Christian men who were not officials were to be reduced to the condition of slaves. A Christian who had the temerity to tear it down, with the sarcastic exclamation, "More triumphs of Goths and Sarmatians!" was seized, tortured, and burnt alive at a slow fire. Shortly after this a fire broke out in the palace and suspicion fell upon the Christians, notably upon the eunuchs in the palace. The use made of the occurrence to work upon Diocletian's fears justified the impression left on the minds of Christian writers that it was a device contrived by Galerius and executed by his slaves. Enquiries were at once set on foot and all who were suspected examined by torture; within a fortnight there was another alarm of the same kind, and now there was no limit to the old man's fury. His wife and daughter were compelled to free themselves from suspicion by joining in sacrifice. The eunuchs of his household, before so trusted, Dorotheus, Gorgonius, Petrus, were put to death. The persecution raged throughout the province. Some were burnt, some drowned, some thrust into dungeons. Altars were set up in every court of justice, and both parties to a suit compelled to sacrifice before they were allowed to plead. A second edict ordered that all the clergy of the church, without option of sacrifice, should be imprisoned [ALBANUS]. Anthimus, bishop of Nicomedia, was beheaded (Euseb. H. E. viii. 6). Hierocles carried on his two-fold work as author and as magistrate, and silenced by torture those whom he failed to convince. Letters were sent to Maximianus and Constantius in the West, urging them to adopt like measures there. The former was but too willing an instrument. The latter, more humane and disposed to a policy of toleration, was compelled to join in destroying the buildings of the Christians, and was glad if he could save their lives. (Lactant. de Mort. Persec. cc. 12-16).

It would be out of place to enter here upon the narratives of individual martyrdoms. They are to be found with more or less fullness in the Acta Sincera of Ruinart, in the Annals of Baronius, in most Church Histories, notably in Fleury, viii. and ix. What we have to remember is the extent, the continuance, and the ferocity which distinguished it from all others. In Syria and Palestine, in Egypt and Western Africa, in Italy and Spain, the passions of men were let loose against those whom they feared or hated, and they raged without restraint. Ingenuity was exhausted in devising new forms of torture for Christian men. For Christian women there was always the ready punishment of outrage and indignity. In Gaul and Britain only was there any safety. Constantius was said (Euseb. Vit. Const. i. 16) to have shewn a marked preference for those who were true to their religion, and refused to sacrifice. Elsewhere every town in the empire witnessed acts of incredible cruelty. The wish to destroy all the sacred books of the Christians, and all the accessories of their worship, led men to seize on the deacons, readers, and others connected with the churches, and put them to the torture till they gave them up.

In the December of the same year, A.D. 303, Diocletian went to Rome to celebrate with Maximian the twentieth anniversary of his accession. He seldom visited Rome, but in the previous year he had celebrated with unusual magnificence the last triumph that Rome was ever to witness. At the Vicennalia the licence of the people offended him, and he left after two weeks for Ravenna. There he was attacked by a severe illness, which detained him for some months. Slowly he made his way to Nicomedia. He became worse on his arrival. Prayers were offered for his recovery in all the temples. It was rumoured that his death was concealed till the arrival of Galerius. When he appeared to contradict the rumour, he was so altered that he could hardly be recognised. His mind, it was said, was seriously affected. Galerius came, but it was to press on the emperor the duty and expediency of resigning. Maximian had been already persuaded to consent to take that step. After a feeble resistance, Diocletian yielded. The two Caesars were to become Augusti. He would fain have named Maxentius, the son of Maximian, and Constantine, the son of Constantius, to take their place; but Galerius used the mastery he had gained, and coerced or persuaded him to appoint Maximin and Severus, in whom he hoped to find more submissive instruments. When the formal acts had been completed, the emperor laid aside his official names, Diocletianus and Jovius, and returned to the simple Diocles, which he had borne in youth.

The history of the year that followed will be found under other heads (GALERIUS, CONSTANTINE, LICINIUS). The retired emperor settled at Salona, on the coast of Dalmatia, and occupied himself with building and gardening. He lived to hear, in July, A.D. 306, of the death of Constantius, and the succession of Constantine. In A.D. 307 Galerius came to consult him, and the two met once more at Carnuntum. Maximian, too, was present at the conference, and urged him to return to take the reins of government; but Diocletian pointed to his cabbages, and refused to abandon them for the cares of state. Three years afterwards Maximian, after vainly struggling against the growing power of Constantine, was compelled to end his life by his own hands. In the following year (A.D. 311) Galerius died in the agonies of a loathsome and horrible disease, and before his death confessed, by an edict of toleration, that the attempt which he had made to crush Christianity had failed. Diocletian survived to witness the alliance between Constantine and Licinius, to receive and decline an invitation to a conference with them at Milan, to hear that Constantine had charged him with conspiring first with Maxentius and then with Maximin, and had ordered his statue and that of Maximian to be thrown down in every part of the empire. In A.D. 313 the end came, some said through poison (Aurel. Vict. Epist. 39); to avoid a worse fate at the hands of Constantine and Licinius, some through the general failure of health, which had led to his resignation (Lactant. c. 42). It was characteristic of his fate as representing the close of pagan imperialism, that as he was the last emperor who celebrated a triumph at Rome, so was he also the last who received the honour of apotheosis at the hands of the Roman senate (Preuss, p. 169).

The fate of the two members of Diocletian's family, who at one time seemed likely to have taken their place openly among the converts to Christianity, deserves a passing notice. Their tendency to it seems to have drawn them together, and after Diocletian's abdication, his wife resided altogether with her daughter Valeria. It is possible that they exercised some influence over Galerius, and this may be the explanation of the fact, that though he was the author of the whole scheme of persecution, the provinces over which he ruled presented hardly any of the instances of martyrdom which were conspicuous in Egypt and in Syria. On the death of Galerius, they fell into the hands of Maximin, who, after vainly suing for the hand of Valeria, confiscated all they had, and banished them to Syria. Thence they managed to communicate with Diocletian, and he in vain tried to secure their liberation. When Licinius became master of the East, on Maximin's death, they went to him at Nicomedia, and were courteously received by him. The murder of Candidianus (a natural son of Galerius, whom Valeria had adopted), and that of the children of Severus, alarmed them, and they made their escape. For fifteen months they wandered in disguise and abject poverty through the provinces in which they had once lived in imperial state. At last they were detected at Thessalonica, executed, and their bodies flung into the sea (Lactant. de Mortib. Persec. cc. 39-41, 50, 51). [E. H. P.]

Graec.* vii. 332) says, "Trypho, Origenis discipulus, Epiphanius tom. ii. p. 176; Photius, lib. i. § 15, contra Man." In Actis Archelai Diodorus potius appellatur." See ARCHELAUS. [E. B. C.]

(2). [CLAUDIUS (1).]

(3) Presbyter of Antioch, and c. A.D. 379, bishop of Tarsus, one of the most deservedly venerated names in the Eastern church, for learning, sanctity, courage in withstanding heresy, and zeal in defence of the truth. Diodorus has a still higher claim on the grateful remembrance of the whole church as, if not the founder, the chief promoter of the rational school of scriptural interpretation, of which his disciples, Chrysostom and Theodorus of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret, were such distinguished representatives.

Diodorus was of a noble family of Antioch, in which city he passed nearly the whole of his life until he became a bishop (Theod. H. E. lib. iv. c. 24). He studied philosophy or secular learning at Athens, where he may not improbably have been an associate of Basil and Julian the future emperor. (Facund. lib. iv. c. 2, p. 59.) Basil speaks of him as "a nursing," (θρεψίμα) of Silvanus, bishop of Tarsus, but whether at Tarsus, or before Silvanus's elevation to the episcopate, at Antioch, is not specified. (Basil, Epist. 81, p. 151.) On his return to his native city, Diodorus and his friend Flavian, also of noble birth (subsequently bishop of Antioch), embraced a religious life. The epithet μωδῶν, applied to him by Suidas, indicates that at one period of his career at least he was living under monastic rule, and we learn from Socrates and Sozomen that Diodorus and another friend named Carterius presided over a place of ascetic retirement, in or near Antioch, in which Chrysostom and his companions Basil and Theodorus were initiated in asceticism (Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 3; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 2).

While still laymen at Antioch, during the reign of Constantius, Diodorus and Flavian exerted themselves energetically for the defence of the orthodox faith against the assaults of the Arians, which were covertly supported by Leontius, the bishop of the city, c. 350. They were indefatigable in their exhortations to the orthodox laity to adhere to the faith, gathering them even by night around the tombs of the martyrs, to join in the antiphonal chanting of the Psalms, which, Theodoret tells us, was first instituted or revived by them, as a means of kindling religious zeal, after the model ascribed by tradition to the martyred bishop of their church, the holy Ignatius (Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 8; Theod. H. E. lib. ii. c. 24). These services became even more influential when Leontius, unwilling either to sanction or to forbid them, sought to check their ardour by desiring that they might be transferred to the church, and they contributed much to strengthen the faithful to meet the persecutions which were sent to try their fidelity so severely. The weight of Diodorus and Flavian at Antioch was proved, when in 350 their threat of withdrawal from communion induced Leontius to suspend the infamous Aetius from the functions of the diaconate to which he had ordained him (Theod. u. s.) [AETIUS]. On the accession of Julian, his insane attempt to rekindle the vitality of an expiring Paganism, of which Antioch was one of the chief theatres, provided a new field for the energies of Diodorus. Both his pen and his tongue were active in denouncing the folly of a return to an exploded superstition, to an extent that called forth the scurrilous jests of Julian, who, in his letter to the heresiarch Photinus, upbraided the "Nazaraei magus," as he blasphemously termed him, with having deserted the philosophy he had learnt at Athens for the boorish theology of fishermen, and turned against the celestial gods the learning he had acquired in their most favoured home. He taunted Diodorus with the consumptive weakness which had been induced by his labours and austerities, ascribing his wrinkles and pallid cheeks, and emaciated frame, to the vengeance of the offended deities, whose majesty he had defied. (Facundus, in Defens. trium Capitul. lib. iv. c. 2, p. 59.)

The persecution of the catholic cause instituted by the Arian Valens recalled Diodorus, who had by this time become a presbyter, to his former championship of the Nicene faith. During the frequent banishments of Meletius, the spiritual instruction of his diocese was chiefly entrusted to him and Flavian, and he, in the words of Theodoret, saved the bark of the church from being "submerged by the waves of misbelief." (Theod. H. E. lib. v. c. 4.) Valens having forbidden the Catholics to meet within the walls of cities, Diodorus gathered his congregation in the church in the old town to the south of the Orontes. Immense numbers—Chrysostom says "the whole city"—assembled and were "fed by him with sound doctrine," from "a tongue flowing with milk and honey," themselves meanwhile supplying his necessities by their gifts. (Chrysost. Laus Diodori, § 4; tom. iii. p. 749.) When forcibly driven out of this church he gathered his congregation in the soldiers' exercising ground, or "gymnasium," and exhorted them from house to house. The texts and arguments of his discourses were chiefly furnished by Flavian, and were clothed by Diodorus in a rhetorical dress. His oratory is compared by Chrysostom to "a lyre" for melody, and to a "trumpet" for the power with which, like Joshua at Jericho, he broke down the strongholds of his heretical opponents. He also held private assemblies at his own house for the exposition of the faith, and the refutation of heresy. (Theod. H. E. lib. iv. c. 25; Chrysost. l. c.; Facundus, lib. iv. c. 22.)

It is not to be supposed that such dauntless championship of the faith failed to provoke persecution. The life of Diodorus was more than once in danger, and he was forced to seek safety in flight (Chrysost. l. c.). The title of a "living martyr," however, which Chrysostom applies to him is rather based on his self-inflicted mortifications than on his sufferings for the faith. Once at least when driven from Antioch he joined his spiritual father Meletius at his place of exile, Getasa in Armenia, where on one occasion, in A.D. 372, he met Basil the Great. (Basil, Epist. 187.) The intimate terms on which Diodorus was with Basil are seen from the tone of Basil's correspondence, in which he speaks of the strengthening affection he feels towards him, both personally as a pupil of Silvanus, and for the grace given him in the exposition of Scripture, by which so many were reformed. In one of his letters he very unceremoniously criticises two books Diodorus had recently sent for his perusal. One he says he likes because it is short, and its style so simple and to the point. This he retained, and intended to get copied as soon as he could meet with a transcriber. The other he pronounces to be both too long and too flowery; demanding too much time to peruse, and too much labour to comprehend, and he concludes by giving him some very reasonable advice in composition. (Basil, Epist. 165, p. 187.) In another letter Basil expresses his conviction that a letter, put into his hands, bearing Diodorus's name, must be a forgery, because it sanctions marriage with a deceased wife's sister. (Epist. 197.)

Great as were the services rendered by Diodorus by his undaunted defence of the catholic faith, it is not on these that his chief claim on the gratitude of the church rests. As the head of the theological school at Antioch he pursued himself and taught others to pursue a healthy common-sense principle of exposition of Holy Scripture, which discarding allegorism on the one hand and coarse literalism on the other, sought by the help of criticism, philology and history, and other external resources, to discover and develop the true meaning of the sacred text, as intended by the authors. If the tendency of the principle of exegesis introduced by Diodorus and followed by his pupils, was to some extent rationalistic, yet as employed by him and his great disciple Chrysostom—and we should probably be able to add Theodorus of Mopsuestia if we had larger remains of his commentaries—it did not go beyond the limits of a healthy rationalism, recognising the human element as well as the divine in Holy Scripture, and repudiating the notion of inspiration which would reduce its authors to mere automata, and firmly holding the truth of a gradual development in revelation, and a steady advance in the moral standard and spiritual intuition of its subjects in successive ages. This rationalistic tendency is asserted to have been carried to unsound lengths by his great pupil Theodorus of Mopsuestia, whose language in connexion with Nestorian doctrine has been used to disparage the teaching of his master. But even if Theodorus's teaching on the subject of the Incarnation deserves the heretical brand fastened on it by the venomous bitterness of controversy, we may not improperly think of his other great pupil, and ask with the calm and moderate Dupin, "should not the faith of St. Chrysostom rather serve to justify Diodorus than the error of Theodorus to condemn him?" (Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 3; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 2; Hieron. de Vir. Illust. No. 119.)

On the restoration of Meletius to his diocese in A.D. 378, one of his first acts was to appoint Diodorus bishop of Tarsus and metropolitan of the then undivided province of Cilicia (Facundus, lib. viii. c. 5). His career as bishop, according to Jerome (de Vir. Illust. No. 119), was less distinguished than as presbyter. He took part in the great council of Antioch A.D. 379, which ineffectually attempted to put an end to the Antiochene schism, as well as in the second oecumenical council at Constantinople in A.D. 381. At this council, according to Sozomen, he was the author of the elevation of the layman Nectarius, himself of Tarsus, to the episcopal throne of Constantinople on the resignation of Gregory Nazianzen (Soz. H. E. lib. vii. c. 8). By the decree of the emperor Theodosius, July 30, A.D. 381, Diodorus was named as one of the orthodox Eastern prelates, communion with whom was the test of orthodoxy (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. i. 3; t. vi. p. 9). Meletius having died during the session of the council, Diodorus, in violation of the compact made with the view of healing the schism, united with Acacius of Beroea in consecrating Flavian as bishop of Antioch, for which act both the consecrating prelates were excommunicated by the bishops of the West (Soz. H. E. lib. vii. c. 11). Once certainly Diodorus visited the former scene of his labours (c. 386) when Chrysostom was in the zenith of his fame as a preacher. Diodorus was in feeble health, but he mounted the pulpit and delivered an elaborate panegyric on his former pupil, to which Chrysostom responded in a few days by a similar eulogium, recounting his former labours and sufferings in behalf of the truth (Chrysost. Laus Diodori, u. s.; Facundus, lib. iv. c. 22). Diodorus was followed to Tarsus by another of his celebrated pupils, Theodorus, afterwards bishop of Mopsuestia, who was ordained presbyter by him and remained at Tarsus till the death of his master, whose successor he is said to have aspired to be. Phalerius appearing as bishop of Tarsus at a council held at Constantinople in A.D. 394, the date of Diodorus's death is approximately fixed. We are told by Facundus and others that he died full of days and glory, revered by the whole church and honoured by its chief doctors. Facundus, in his elaborate defence of his orthodoxy, quotes the eulogistic expression addressed to him and employed of him, by Basil Meletius, Theodoret, Domnus of Antioch, and even by the chief impugner of the soundness of his faith, Cyril of Alexandria. The letters of Athanasius quoted by Facundus seem to be proved by Tillemont to refer to another Diodorus, the bishop of Tyre. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. viii. 912; Athanasie, note 98, to whom Epiphanius dedicated in very honourable terms his treatise, De Duodecim Gemmis, which had been written at his request.)

The high credit enjoyed by Diodorus in the church was disturbed by the controversies which broke out in the succeeding century on the subject of Nestorianism. His rationalising spirit had led him to express himself on the Incarnation in language containing the principles of that heresy afterwards more fully developed by his disciple Theodorus. So that, not without justice, he has been deemed to have been the virtual parent of Nestorianism, and has been called "a Nestorian before Nestorius." It was Diodorus's repugnance to the errors of Apollinarianism which led him to the opposite errors of Nestorianism. His sense of the importance of the truth of Christ's manhood caused him to insist on its distinctness from His Godhead in a manner which gradually led to its being represented as a separate personality. He drew a distinction between Him Who according to His essence was Son of God—the eternal Logos—and Him Who through divine decree and adoption became Son of God. The one was Son of God by nature, the other by grace. The son of man became Son of God because He was chosen to be the receptacle or temple of God the Word. It followed therefore that Mary could not be properly termed "the mother of God," nor could God the Word be strictly called the son of David, that designation belonging, according to human descent, to the temple in which the Divine Son tabernacled. Diodorus therefore distinguished two Sons, the Son of God and the son of Mary, combined in the person of Christ. When, then, the great Nestorian controversy set in, Cyril clearly saw that, apart from the watchword Θεοτόκος, which had not yet arisen in the days of Diodorus, what men called Nestorianism was in fact substantially nothing else than the doctrines of Diodorus as developed by Theodorus of Mopsuestia, and that if Nestorianism were to be crushed the object could only be fully accomplished by obtaining a condemnation of the doctrines of Diodorus as the fountain head. This condemnation it was most difficult to obtain. No name was held in so much reverence throughout the East as that of Diodorus. To impugn his teaching was to cast a slight on the centre of orthodoxy, the maintainer and promulgator of the apostolic faith handed down by the Fathers. Cyril, however, was of far too determined a spirit to shrink from such a step. If orthodox views of the Incarnation were to be established, the authority of Diodorus must, at any cost of enmity and unpopularity, be destroyed. Every means was therefore taken by him and his party to enforce, by the aid of the emperor and the patriarch Proclus, his condemnation, together with that of his still more heretical pupil Theodorus. Cyril himself, in a letter to the emperor, described them in the harshest terms as the fathers of the blasphemies of Nestorius (Theodoret, tom. v. p. 854), and in a letter to John of Antioch denounced them as "going full sail, as it were, against the glory of Christ." It is not surprising that Diodorus began to be looked upon with suspicion by those who had been accustomed to regard him as a bulwark of the faith, insomuch that Theodoret, when himself accused of Nestorian leanings, did not venture to quote the words of Diodorus in his defence, though he regarded him with reverence (σέβω), as "a holy and blessed father," because his enemies looked upon them as heretical as his own (Theod. Epist. 16). In the hope of rehabilitating his credit, Theodoret wrote a treatise to prove the orthodoxy of Diodorus, the result of which was to lead Cyril to a persual of them, and to pronounce them categorically heretical (ib. Epist. 38, 52). All that was done, however, to depreciate the authority of Diodorus, both by Cyril and Rabbulas of Edessa, only exalted him in the estimation of the Nestorian party, and the opposition contributed to the formation of the independent Nestorian church, still existing in melancholy isolation, which looks upon Diodorus and Theodorus with the deepest veneration as its founders. The presbyter Maris of Haddaschir, in Persia, translated the works of Diodorus into Persian, and we are told that they, together with those of Theodorus, were also translated into Armenian and Syriac and other Oriental tongues (Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. iv. pp. 209, 284; Clark's transl. Liberat. Breviar. c. 10). Diodorus was naturally anathematised by Eutyches and his followers. Flavian III., also bishop of Antioch, was compelled by the Monophysites to pass an anathema on the writings of Diodorus and Theodorus in A.D. 499. The controversy respecting the orthodoxy of the writings of Diodorus was revived in the sixth century by the interminable disputes about "the Three Articles." There is a full defence of his orthodoxy by Facundus in his "Defensio Trium Capitulorum" (lib. iv. c. 2). Photius asserts that Diodorus was formally condemned by the fifth oecumenical council held at Constantinople A.D. 553, but it does not appear in the acts of that council. Diodorus was a very copious author, the titles of between twenty and thirty distinct works being enumerated in various catalogues. Of these, to the grievous loss of the church, the whole have perished, with the exception of some fragments, no less than sixty having been burnt, according to Ebed-Jesu, by the Arians. His writings were partly exegetical, partly, and that mainly, controversial. He wrote comments on the whole of the books of the Old and New Testament, excepting the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Catholic Epistles (1 John however being commented on), and the Apocalypse. In these, according to Jerome (de Vir. Illust. No. 119), he imitated the line of thought of Eusebius of Emesa, but fell below him in eloquence and refinement. The reason alleged for this inferiority, his deficiency in secular learning, is hardly consistent with what Julian says of his studies at Athens. Perhaps Jerome looked on Diodorus with somewhat prejudiced eyes, as an adherent of Meletius. Fragments of these comments are frequent in the Greek Catene, but they are not always accurately distinguished from those of Theodorus of Mopsuestia.

The controversial writings of Diodorus embrace a very wide field. He was ready to wield his pen against any one, pagan, Jew, or heretic, by whom the truth was impugned. Heathen philosophers—Plato and Aristotle—later assailants of the faith—Porphyry—heretics of every name and hue—Sabellius, Photinus, Marcellus, the Manicheans, Eunomians, Apollinarians (συνουσιασται) all in turn came under his review and had their errors exposed and confuted. Controversy occupied so much of his thoughts that his contributions to direct dogmatic theology seem to have been comparatively trifling. The following list of his works, derived from Suidas and Photius, etc., is given by Fabricius (Biblioth. Græc. lib. v. c. 24):—(1) Contra Fatum, a work in eight books and fifty-three chapters, in which he refutes the follies of judicial astrology, and proves, against Bardesanes and others, that the world had a beginning and was created, that man is endowed with free-will, that God is not the author of evil, and that the world is governed by Divine providence. Of this work we have an elaborate summary by Photius (Cod. 223). (2) Contra Platonem de Deo et Diis (Theod. Lect. apud Suidam). (3) Adversus Photinum, Malchionem, Sabellium et Marcellum (Theodoret, de haeret. fab., lib. ii. c. 11). (4) Chronicon, in which some chronological errors of Eusebius are corrected. (5) De eo quod unus sit Deus in Trinitate, a work directed against the Eunomians (Ebed-Jesu; Assemani, Bibl. Orient. III. i. 28). (6) Adversus Melchisedicitas. (7) Contra Judeos. (8) De resurrectione mortuorum. (9) De anima adversus varias haereticorum opiniones. (10) Capita ad Gratianum Imper. (11) De Sphaera et quinque Zonis et contrario astrorum motu. (12) De Sphaera Hipparchi. (13) De Prudentia (called by Ebed-Jesu liber Politicorum). (14) De natura et materia, et de eo quod justum est. (15) De Deo et falsa Graecorum materia. (16) Naturae invisibiles de nihilo factas esse. (17) Ad Euphronium philosophum. (18) Contra Aristotelem de corpore coelesti. (19) Quomodo opifex quidem semper, opera vero ejus non semper permaneat. (20) Quomodo velle et nolle sit in Deo aeterno. (21) Contra Porphyrium de animalibus et sacrificiis. (22) Contra Manichaeos (in twenty-five books, of which Photius remarks that he is not quite successful in overthrowing the "living gospel" of the Manichees, but is quite successful in shewing the true meaning of the passages of scripture misinterpreted by them), (Phot. Cod. 85; Theod. Haeret. fabul. i. cap. ult.). (23) De Spiritu Sancto, directed against the Macedonians. (Photius remarks that he detected the Nestorian taint already infecting this book) (Cod. 102; Leontius de Sectis, p. 448). (24) Adversus Synusistas, i.e. the Apollinarians. Fragments of this work, which was the chief ground of charging Diodorus with Nestorian views (Cyril, Epist. ad Succensum et Acacium; Liberatus, c. 10), are extant in Leontius Byzantinus, de Sectis, contra Nest. et Eutyech. lib. iii.; Bibl. Patrum, Lugdun. pp. 448, 704. (25) Adversus Contentiosum. (26) To these must be added the Commentaries on Holy Scripture, already spoken of. It is possible that some of his writings may be still extant among the Nestorians (Assemani, Bibl. Or. III. ii. 24). Diodorus is accredited with a liturgy, the use of which, according to Renaudot, was prohibited "in Synodo Diamperensi." The liturgy named by Bona (Rer. Liturg. i. 9) is probably that of Theodorus, the two names being very often confounded. At present Renaudot says of the Nestorians, "liturgiam ejus" (Diodori) "nomine nullam habent." [E. V.]

DIODORUS (4) bishop of Tyre, 381, correspondent of Epiphanius of Salamis. Diodorus had asked Epiphanius to explain the twelve stones of the breast-plate of the Jewish high priest. This was the origin of the treatise of Epiphanius, De Gemmis, which we have probably in an abridged form. (S. Epiphanius de Gemmis, Patrol. Graec. xliii. 294; Ceillier, vi. 420.)

[W. M. S.]

(5) Praedestinatus invents two bishops of this name, a bishop of Crete (i. 12) who opposed the Secundiani, and a bishop of Nicomedia (i. 58) who opposed the Metangismonitae).

[G. S.]

DIOGA. Bishop of Leptis magna (Leptimajus) in prov. Trip., Colonia Victrix Julia, on river Cinyphus. Voted by proxy through Natalis, 85th suffrage, Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. vii.; the rare name of Dioga occurs, Gruter's Inscr. p. 1254, n. 6, in S. Crucis in Hierus. at Rome, with another bearing the African name Namphamo.

[E. W. B.]

DIOGENES (1) presbyter of Alexandria in the 4th century. The Anomaeans approached Basil bishop of Ancyra with having caused Diogenes, one of their party, to be flogged as he passed by Ancyra, as well as with having taken from him his papers. (Sozomen. iv. 24, Patrol. Graec. lxvii. 1189; Ceillier, iv. 321.)

[W. M. S.]

(2) Bishop of Genoa, attended the council of Aquileia, and joined in the condemnation of Palladius and Secundianus (Ambrose, iii. 821-843).

[J. Ll. D.]

(3) A liberal friend of Chrysostom, who sent him a considerable sum of money during his exile at Cucusus, A.D. 404-5, by the hand of Aphraates. Chrysostom desired at first to return the present, but on the refusal of Aphraates to take it back, he begged Diogenes to devote it to the missions in Phoenicia. (Chrysost. Epist. 50, 51.)

[E. V.]

(4) Bishop of Seleucobelus in Syria Secunda, who though a "digamus" was consecrated by Alexander of Antioch (Theodoret, Epist. 110). He attended the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, when he joined the Oriental party, and was excommunicated by Cyril (Labbe, Concil. tom. i. col. 599, 654).

[E. V.]

DIOGENES (5) a bishop who had been twice married, but was ordained by Alexander bishop of Antioch, and Acacius bishop of Beroea. Theodoret, in a letter to Domnus bishop of Antioch, instances Diogenes amongst others as an example of this fact. (Theodoret, Epist. 110; Patrol. Graec. lxxxiii. 1305 (1180); Ceillier, x. 23.)

(6) Bishop of Cyzicus (A.D. 449-451), metropolis of the Hellespont, present at the rejected council of Ephesus A.D. 449; and at the council of Chalcedon A.D. 451, where he subscribed the confession of faith. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 118, 601; Ceillier, x. 677 and 692).

DIOGENIANUS, third bishop of Alby, who flourished about the year 406, is named by Gregory of Tours as one of the most illustrious bishops of his age. Quoting the words of Paulinus, presbyter, he brings forward Diogenianus amongst other most notable prelates of Aquitaine. (Gall. Christ. i. 3; Gregor. Turon. Hist. lib. ii.)

DIOGENUS (1), ST., first bishop of Geneva, lived, according to some writers, about the end of the third century, while others maintain that he is the same Diogenus who was present at the council of Aquileia in the year 381, when St. Ambrose presided. In the acts of that council the Diogenus who was present is styled "Genuensis episcopus," but for "Genuensis" some have read "Genevensis." In the ancient chart known as Tabula Peutingeri, as well as in the Martyrology of Ado and other writings, the confusion of names was very common, e.g., Gennaua for Geneva, or Genna, therefore it is hardly to be wondered at if we here and there find St. Diogenus of Geneva described "Genuensis episcopus." (Labbe, Conc. t. ii. col. 976; Mansi, t. iii. col. 602; Gall. Christ. xvi. 377.)

[D. R. J.]

(2) ST., second bishop of Grenoble, succeeded St. Dominus about the end of the fourth century, but nothing is known of him except his name. Some think that he is the Diogenus who is supposed to have been about that time bishop of Geneva, and that therefore Geneva was within the diocesan boundaries of Grenoble. But this conjecture is overthrown by the acts of the council of Geneva, in which Diogenus, bishop of Geneva, is stated to be sitting next to Dominus of Grenoble. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 219.)

DIOGNETUS. [EPISTLE TO DIOGNETUS.]

DIOMEDES, a Christian physician of Tarsus, who came to Nice in the days of Diocletian. The soldiers, sent to summon him before the emperor, found him dead, so they cut off his head and brought that. Diocletian ordered the head to be restored to the carcase. There is a legend that the soldiers had been struck blind, but, on returning the head to the trunk, recovered their sight (Menol. Aug. 16).

DION, proconsul of Africa in A.D. 295, under whom suffered Maximilian. Dion tried to persuade him to enlist and serve in the army; but at last, as he persisted in refusing, had him beheaded. (Ruinart, Acta Sinc. Martyr. p. 300; Ceillier, ii. 479.) [W. M. S.]

DIONYSA, mother of Euthymius the Solitary, wife of Paul, of Melitene on the Euphrates. She bore a son in the 4th consulship of Gratianus, A.D. 375, and dedicated him to divine service, as she had long been barren, and had prayed with her husband for a child. (Zacharias, Vita Euthymii; Patrol. Graec. lxxxvi.; Ceillier, xi. 272.) [W. M. S.]

DIONYSIA (1) virgin martyr at Lampsacus, A.D. 250. Seeing Nicomachus suddenly seized with madness and dying in horror, after having denied the faith under torture, and sacrificed to the heathen gods, Dionysia cried out, "Miserable and most wretched man! Why, for one hour's respite didst thou take to thyself unceasing and indescribable punishment!" The proconsul Optimus hearing, had her brought to him, and asked if she was a Christian. "Yes," she answered, "and that is why I weep for this unhappy man, who loses eternal rest by not being able to suffer a moment's pain." The proconsul dismissed her with a brutal order. But next day, having succeeded in maintaining her chastity, she escaped her guards, and joined Andrew and Paul, two Christians who were being stoned to death; "I wish to die with you here," she said, "that I may live with you in heaven!" Optimus, hearing what had happened, ordered her to be taken from Andrew and Paul, and beheaded. The sentence was executed May 15, A.D. 250, the second year of Decius. (Ruinart, Act. Sinc. Mart. p. 159; Ceillier, ii. 118.) [W. M. S.]

(2) At Alexandria A.D. 251, mother of many children, but not having loved her own children more than her Lord, died by the sword, along with the venerable old lady Mercuria, without having been tried by torture, as the prefect had succeeded so ill with Ammonarion that he was ashamed to go on torturing and being defeated by women (Dion. Alex. ad Fab. ap. Eus. II. E. vi. 41). [E. B. B.]

(3) ST., a Christian martyr in the 5th century. According to the narrative of Victor Vitensis, her contemporary, she was a lady of rare beauty in Africa, who preferred tortures, shameful indignities, and death to renouncing her faith; a victim of the persecution of the orthodox or Catholic Christians by Hunneric, son and successor of Genseric, king of the Vandals. Hunneric commenced his reign with clemency and toleration, but soon became a fierce persecutor of the opponents of Arianism. Dionysia was stripped and scourged before the gaze of the populace; and with her dying breath encouraged her son, Majoricus, to endure his tortures bravely, saying, "Let us keep our wedding-garment undefiled, that the Lord of the Feast may be well pleased." She is commemorated in the Roman calendar on December 6.

Baronius calls Victor, the author of the history of this persecution, bishop of Utica (Ann. Eccles. viii. p. 463); but Pagius in his notes on the Annals, and Chiffletius in his commentary on Victor's work (Elucidationes ad Vit.) make him bishop of Vita in the province of Byzacum (ad loc. cit.). Lizon (ad Vit.) denies that Victor the historian and Victor the bishop are one and the same person. Victor himself speaks of himself as writing sixty years after the irruption of the Vandals. As that invasion was A.D. 429, the date of his book is A.D. 488 or 489. The date assigned for the martyrdom of this Dionysia is 484.

DIONYSIUS (1) PSEUDO-AREOPAGITA. Under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite there has passed current a body of remarkable writings, which it will be the object of the present article to discuss. But before entering on the main question, whether the author of these writings was the Dionysius converted by St. Paul (Acts xvii. 34), it will be convenient to clear the ground by discriminating each of them from a third Dionysius, the St. Denys of France. The identity of all three, as is well known, was a matter of popular belief for many centuries; and even at this day it is maintained by some writers, with as much zeal, if not as much acrimony, as the possession of the true relics of Dionysius was once contested between the monks of St. Denys and those of St. Emmeran of Ratisbon.

Was, then, the convert of St. Paul at Athens the first apostle of France? The answer would not seem doubtful from the following considerations:—(1) The antecedent improbability that a bishop of Athens, as Eusebius declares the Areopagite to have been, should be afterwards sent on a missionary journey into Gaul. (2) The fact that, when Dionysius of Corinth is writing to the Athenians, and citing the example of his namesake, their first pastor, he makes no allusion to his mission to that country, or his martyrdom there. (3) The statement of Sulpitius Severus, that the earliest martyrs for the faith in Gaul were to be found under the reign of Aurelius ("ac tum primum intra Gallias martyria visa," Sacr. Hist. ii. 46), i.e. after A.D. 160. (4) The circumstance that neither the old martyrologies, nor the old French chroniclers, contain any hint of the identity of the two. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. i. 30) fixes the coming of St. Denys into France as late as the reign of Decius, or subsequent to A.D. 250; while Usuardus, who wrote his Martyrologium for Charlemagne, shews the opinion prevalent in his own time, by assigning one day (Oct. 3) to the memory of the Areopagite, and another (Oct. 9) to that of the patron saint of France. Nor is it any objection to this that, in the Roman missal, the passage from Acts xvii. relating to the Areopagite is appointed as the lesson for the latter festival, as though this implied a recognition of the identity of the two. For the same reasoning, applied to the Festival of the Assumption, from which the gospel is taken from St. Luke x. 38-42, would of course imply the identity of Mary of Bethany with the Virgin Mary. In short, before the compilation of abbat Hilduin's Areo- pagitica, in the reign of Louis le Débonnaire (A.D. 814–840), the identification of the two seems to have been almost undreamt of. From that period indeed the notion was eagerly accepted by French ecclesiastics, as flattering to national vanity; and Abelard, himself a monk of St. Denys, narrowly escaped with his life for opposing the popular theory. The 17th century, a century that witnessed the challenging of so many accepted traditions, was prolific in writers on both sides of this question; and it is interesting to learn that it was the very last which occupied the mind of Pascal. A dissertation on the subject has been found in manuscript among his papers (quoted by l'abbé Darras, in the work cited below, p. xiii. n.), in which he lays down the principles that ought to guide all such discussions. Yet, even to the present hour, the associations of Montmartre and St. Denys seem to bias the judgment of Pascal's countrymen; and the conclusion of one of them respecting Dionysius, which deserves to be quoted for its epigrammatic point, may be taken as a representative of many:—"Né dans Athènes, Lutèce d'Orient, il meurt à Lutèce, Athènes d'Occident; successivement époux de deux Églises, dont l'une possédera son berceau, et l'autre, sa tombe. Montmartre vaudra la colline de Mars." (L'abbé Dulac, inf. cit. p. 13.)

If it has been seen from the above how extremely slender is the evidence for identifying Dionysius the Areopagite with St. Denys of France, the reasons for believing the latter to be one and the same person with the author of these writings will appear equally slight.

In the first place, their style and subject-matter all betoken a philosophic leisure, not the active life of a missionary in a barbarous country. A residence in the East is implied in the very titles of the persons to whom they are addressed: Timothy, bishop of Ephesus, Polycarp of Smyrna, St. John in Patmos, and the like. This is admitted on all hands. The attempted explanation is, that they were composed before Dionysius left Athens to seek his new commission from Clement of Rome. Let us see what this supposition leads to. From the Scholia of St. Maximus on the 10th letter, as well as from the doubtful 11th letter itself (see Dion. Op. ed. Migne, vol. ii. col. 574 and 700), we learn that the author was twenty-five years of age, when, in company with Apollonphanes, he witnessed at Heliopolis the supernatural darkness of the Crucifixion. Now in the Div. Nom. iv. § 12, he quotes the famous saying of Ignatius, when on his way to martyrdom, ὁ ἐμὸς ἔπος ἐσταύρωται. If we fix the martyrdom of Ignatius in A.D. 109, Dionysius must then have been at least 101 years old before he laid down the pen. But further, in the closing sentence of the treatise in which these words occur, he announces his intention of undertaking another work, on Theologia Symbolica. This was accordingly still in the future. In the beginning of his epistle to Titus (Ep. ix.), he speaks of it as finished, and sent to Timothy. A still further space of time must therefore have elapsed before Dionysius had abandoned his literary labours. And we should be thus required to suppose, if we accepted the once prevalent tradition, that the author of these writings, when now considerably more than a hundred years old, left his abode and occupation in the East to seek at the hands of Clement (who, according to the best authorities, must have been dead some time) authority to proceed as a missionary into Gaul. Such a theory requires only to be stated for its own confutation.

After this preliminary inquiry we may approach the study of the writings themselves, considering them, for convenience, under the following heads:—(1) Their external history; (2) their nature and contents; (3) the different theories as to their date and origin; (4) their influence on later authors.

(1) It is now generally admitted that the first unequivocal mention we have of these writings is to be found in the records of the conference held at Constantinople in A.D. 532. In that year the emperor Justinian had invited Hypatius of Ephesus, and other bishops of the orthodox side, to meet in his palace the leaders of the Severians. During the course of the debate, these alleged writings of the Areopagite were brought forward by the latter party in support of their Monophysite views; and the objections made to them by Hypatius have been preserved. If genuine, he asked, how could they have escaped the notice of Cyril and others?—"illa enim testimonia, quae vos Dionysii Areopagitae dicitis, unde potestis ostendere vera esse, sicut suspicamini? si enim ejus erant, non potuissent latere beatum Cyrillum," etc. So Innocentius of Maronia represents him as speaking (Concilia, ed. Mansi, tom. viii. col. 821); and the question put by Hypatius has never been satisfactorily answered. Supposed traces of them have been pointed out in Origen, in Dionysius of Alexandria, in Gregory Nazianzen; ingenious reasons, on the other hand, have been given to explain the concealment in which, for five centuries, they are imagined to have lain; but these have alike been confuted again and again. Still, whatever their parentage, from this appearance at Constantinople they are never lost sight of. Writers of the school which had at first objected to them soon found how serviceable to their own cause these writings might be made. And thus a chain of testimony begins to be attached to them in unbroken continuity. They are cited by Ephraem, patriarch of Antioch, who died in A.D. 546. His contemporary, John of Scythopolis, wrote scholia upon them, now confused inextricably with those of Maximus; while Leontius of Byzantium also bore witness to them towards the end of the same century. The names of Sophronius of Jerusalem (c. 629); of St. Maximus the Confessor, who died in 662, persecuted by the very sect which had at first adduced these writings; of Anastasius of Sinai (c. 680); of John of Damascus (c. 740); of Michael Syngeles, or Synceclus (c. 820), the author of a Life of Dionysius; may be briefly quoted out of a much longer list, as bearing testimony to the acceptance of the Dionysian writings in the Eastern church, down to the point where the concurrent stream of evidence comes in from the West.

In the Western church we first find these writings mentioned by pope Gregory the Great (c. 590); but his manner of citing them leaves it doubtful whether he had seen or only heard of them. In his Homily on St. Luke xv. 1–10 (Hom. xxxiv. § 12), after comparing the nine pieces of silver, which the woman in the parable had not lost, to the nine orders of angels; the tenth, or missing one, being mankind; he proceeds to quote the substance of a passage in the Celest. Hierarchy (vii. § 3), introducing it with the words, "Fertur vero Dionysius Areopagita, antiquus videlicet et venerabilis pater, dicere," etc. The first word here employed, fertur, may perhaps have been meant to convey (as a modern editor thinks) not so much a doubt about the contents of the writings themselves, as about the author's title to the name he had assumed. On the whole, it seems most natural to conclude that Gregory only knew them by report. In any case, they did not become generally known in the West till after A.D. 827. In that year Michael the Stammerer sent a copy of them to Louis le Débonnaire, the son of Charlemagne. The abbey of St. Denis, near Paris, was thought to be the most fitting receptacle for such a treasure; and its abbat, the superstitious and unprincipled Hilduin, who afterwards joined in Lothaire's rebellion against his father, had the office of compiling a collection of Areopagitica in honour of the event. This work, which the writer professed to have based on documents then extant, has been thought worthy of being printed; but its contents are described in equally unfavourable terms by Sirmond and by Cave. In the next reign, that of Charles the Bald, a Latin translation of all the Dionysian writings was made by the great scholar Joannes Erigena, the one who did most, after Alcuin, to keep the flame of true learning alive at the court of France. His translation is first publicly mentioned by pope Nicholas I., in a letter to Charles in A.D. 861, and is warmly praised by Anastasius Bibliothecarius in 865. "Mirandum est," the latter writes to Charles, "quomodo vir ille barbarus . . . talia intellectu capere, in aliamque linguam transferre valuerit." Not that Erigena's translation, though the only one in use for some centuries, has any pretensions to elegance, or even minute accuracy. As he himself wrote, in a metrical epistle to his royal master:—

"Mihi sat fuerit, si planos carpere sensus Possem tardiloquus, pragmata sola sequens."

Still, no other translation was attempted till that of Joannes Sarracenus, the friend of our John of Salisbury, about A.D. 1170. This was followed, half a century later, by that of Robert Grosseteste, bishop of Lincoln, only a portion of which has been printed; and later on we have the versions of Thomas, abbat of Vercelli (c. 1400), of Ambrosius the Camaldolite (c. 1436), of Ficinus (c. 1492), Joachim Perionius (1555), Lanssel (1615), and Corderius (1634); the last of which is that retained in the modern edition of the Abbé Migne, Paris, 1857. When it is added that the first edition of the collected works, in the original Greek, was that which issued from the Juntine press at Florence in 1516, enough will have been said upon the external history of these writings.

(2) When we come to examine the Dionysian writings themselves, we find them to consist of four extant treatises, followed by a collection of ten letters, or fragments of letters. As they stand in the order commonly given, these are:—

A. Περὶ τῆς οὐρανίας ἱεραρχίας, On the Heavenly Hierarchy, in xv. chapters, addressed by Διονύσιος ὁ Πρεσβύτερος to his συμπρεσβύτερος, Timothy.

B. Περὶ τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς ἱεραρχίας, On the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, in vii. chapters, to all but the first of which is appended a Θεαρία, or spiritual contemplation of the sacred rites described: similarly addressed.

C. Περὶ Θεῶν ὀνομάτων, On the Names of God, in xiii. chapters, also addressed to Timothy.

D. Περὶ μυστικῆς θεολογίας, On Mystic Theology, in v. chapters, addressed as before.

After these come four letters addressed to Γάιος θεραπεύτης, one to Δωρόθεος λειτουργός, one to Ζωσίματος ἱερέυς, one to Πολύκαρπος ἱεράρχης, one to Δημόφιλος θεραπεύτης, one to Τίτος ἱεράρχης, and a tenth and last to Ἰωάννης θεόλογος, i.e. the Apostle St. John. An eleventh letter, addressed to Apollonphanes, is only found in a Latin version, said to be by Erigena, and its genuineness is all but universally denied.

Now this list of writings, from one point of view, is not only complete as an exposition of the Dionysian system, but is also in its proper order. For we may take, as an epitome of that system, the words of St. Paul with which the first sentence in the volume concludes:—"For of Him and to Him are all things" (Rom. xi. 36). God, the centre towards which all tend, and at the same time the all-embracing circumference within which all are included; the constant streaming forth from Him, like rays from the visible sun, of divine influences whereby men are purified, illumined, and drawn upwards to Himself; man's powerlessness to know the real nature and being of God, while yet he may be drawn near to Him, in the mystic communion of a loving faith: such is, very briefly, the burden of the Dionysian strain. And it is plain that, if we take the De Divinis Nominibus as the central portion of the writings, and treat the two Hierarchies as one consecutive whole (which indeed they are), we have enough to fill up the outline sketched above. In the Celestial and Ecclesiastical Hierarchies, with their ninefold orders of heavenly and of earthly ministrations, we have the means, the machinery (so to speak), whereby God communicates Himself to man. In the Divina Nomina we have disclosed to us, so far as can be seen through veils and shadows, the Fountain-head of all light and being, the object of all thought and desire. In the Mystic Theology, we have the converse of the path marked out in the Hierarchies, the ascent of the human soul to mystic union with God. The three great sections of the Dionysian writings, as we thus see, answer very strikingly to the three elements of which he makes his hierarchy to consist:—τάξις, ἐπιστήμη, and ἐνέργεια πρὸς τὸ θεοειδὲς ἀφοιουμένη (Eccles. Hier. iii. § 1).

At the same time, we are made aware by the author of the existence of a series of treatises, still more numerous than the preceding, to one or other of which he refers in various places, as if he thought them necessary for the completion of his design. These are:—

a. Περὶ τῶν θεῶν ἕκων ἕκων, On Divine Hymns (referred to in the Cel. Hier. vii. § 3).

b. Συμβολικὴ θεολογία, Symbolic Theology (Cel. Hier. xv. § 6, and elsewhere).

c. Περὶ νοητῶν τε καὶ αἰσθητῶν, On the Objects of Intellect and Sense (Ecl. Hier. cap. ii. Contempl. § 2).

d. Θεολογικαὶ ὑποτυπώσεις, Theological Outlines (Div. Nom. i. § 1).

e. Περὶ Ψυχῆς, On the Soul (Div. Nom. iv. § 2).

f. Περὶ δικαίου καὶ θείου δικαιοτηρίου, On the just Judgment of God (Div. Nom. iv. § 35).

To these are added by Sixtus Senensis and others—

g. Περὶ τῶν ἀγγελικῶν ἰδιοτήτων καὶ τάξεων, On the Properties and Orders of Angels (Div. Nom. iv. § 2), which is probably only his Celestial Hierarchy under another name; and

h. Ἡ κατὰ νόμον ἱεραρχία, The Legal Hierarchy (supposed, apparently by some misunderstanding of the text, to be cited in Ecl. Hier. iii. § 10).

The question of these missing treatises is one of the most perplexing of all connected with the subject. Did they ever exist? If so, what has become of them? Peter Lanssel, in 1615, recorded the fruitlessness of his own search for them. Are they, from first to last, mere inventions of the author, designed to parry attacks on his own weak points, and to suggest the filling up of deficiencies which in reality he left unsupplied? It seems very probable; as, in point of fact, something like what might be implied in d. and f. is greatly needed, to supply the defects of Dionysius's teaching on such matters as the Incarnation, and the nature and destiny of Evil. But, if this be the true account of the case, while our respect for the intellectual completeness of the author's mind is increased, our opinion of his moral straightforwardness must be diminished. However, as he is certainly entitled to the credit of his conception of such a theological system, whether all the parts be duly filled in or not, we may set down the whole list of works, extant and missing, according to Hipler's theory of their classification; merely observing that, with the exception of a hint that the Theological Outlines was meant to precede the Names of God, and the Symbolic Theology to follow that treatise (Div. Nom. i. § 1 and xiii. § 4), there is next to nothing to shew what order was contemplated by the writer himself. Hipler's order is:—

- α'. Mystic Theology—an exposition of intuitive or spiritual, as opposed to dogmatic, theology.
- β'. Theological Outlines—including the doctrine of the Trinity and the Incarnation.
- γ'. On the Names of God—the doctrine of God's being and attributes.
- δ'. Symbolic Theology—continuation of the preceding, with special reference to the mystical names of God found in the Bible.
- ε'. Heavenly Hierarchy—angelology.
- ς'. On the Soul—anthropology.
- ζ'. On the Objects of Intellect and Sense—cosmology.
- η'. On the Legal Hierarchy—cosmogony, and the Old Testament scheme of redemption.
- θ'. Ecclesiastical Hierarchy—New Testament scheme of redemption.
- ι'. On the just Judgment of God—eschatology, and vindication of the ways of providence.

If we could consider the author as having mapped out such a cycle as this at all completely in his own mind, he would certainly be entitled to the praise which Hipler bestows upon him, of having not only anticipated, but surpassed, the Scientiæ Fons of John of Damascus, that "Aquinas of the Eastern church."

It would be impossible, within the limits of this article, to attempt anything like a minute analysis of the extant works. The Heavenly Hierarchy opens with what sounds almost like the keynote of the whole, the text πάσα δόσις ἀγαθή, κ.τ.λ., of St. James i. 17. The language, by the way, in which the simple words of the Apostle are expanded and paraphrased in this passage will convey no bad idea of the generally turgid style throughout:—ἀλλὰ καὶ πᾶσα Πατροκινήτου φωτοφανείας πρόδος, εἰς ἡμᾶς ἀγαθόδοτος φοιτῶσα, πάλιν ὡς ἐροποῖς δύναμις ἀνατακτικῶς ἡμᾶς ἀνακληροῖ, καὶ ἐπιστρέφει πρὸς τὴν τοῦ συναγωγῆ Πατρὸς ἐνότητα καὶ Θεοποιὸν ἀπλότητα (Cel. Hier. i. § 1). To bring us to Himself, God graciously makes use of signs and symbols, and of intervening orders of ministers, by whose means we may be gradually raised to nearer communion with Him. Such an organization is what he calls a Hierarchy,—“a sacred order, and science, and activity, assimilated as far as possible to the godlike, and elevated to the imitation of God proportionately to the Divine illuminations conceded to it” (Cel. Hier. iii. § 1, tr. by Westcott). The members of the Heavenly Hierarchy are the nine orders of Angels;—the term Angel being sometimes used alike of all the orders, and sometimes, in a more proper and restricted sense, of the lowest of the nine. The names of the nine orders appear to have been obtained by combining with the more obvious Seraphim, Cherubim, Archangels, and Angels, the five deduced from two passages of St. Paul, Eph. i. 21 and Col. i. 16. In each of these passages four names are mentioned, of which three (ἄρχαι, ἐξουσίαι, κυριότητες) are common to both, while one is peculiar to each, δυνάμεις to the former, θρόνοι to the latter. Thus, five are obtained from St. Paul; and these, blended with the four above-mentioned, make the mysterious nine. These nine are subdivided into triads, ranged thus in descending order:—

1.	{ Seraphim	Σεραφίμ.
	{ Cherubim	Χερουβίμ.
	{ Thrones	Θρόνοι.
2.	{ Dominations ..	Κυριότητες.
	{ Virtues	Δυνάμεις.
	{ Powers	Ἐξουσίαι.
3.	{ Principalities ..	Ἀρχαί.
	{ Archangels	Ἀρχάγγελοι.
	{ Angels	Ἄγγελοι.

The same list is given by Gregory the Great in the Homily above referred to (Hom. xxxiv. § 7), with one trifling variation in the order: a variation easily explained by a comparison of Eph. i. 21 with Col. i. 16, but which was thought of sufficient importance by Dante to be introduced into the Divina Commedia (Par. c. xviii.). Though there is a due gradation in ministerial office, yet all the members of the Heavenly Hierarchy have the same common object, that of raising men through ascending stages of purification, illumination, and perfection, εἰς μετοχὴν ἱερὰν καὶ μετὰδοσιν καθάρσεως ἀμυγῶν, καὶ θείου φωτός, καὶ τελεστικῆς ἐπιστήμης. (Cel. Hier. vii. § 2.) Each is as a mirror inclined to the rays of the sun, receiving light from above, and reflecting it on objects below. The light thus transmitted shines alike on all, though all have not a like capacity for receiving it. And here comes in what is one of the weak points of the Dionysian system, or rather, one of the unsatisfactory consequences of his theory. It professes to maintain the freedom of the human will (οὐδὲ γὰρ ἠναγκασμένην ἔχομεν ζωὴν, κ.τ.λ., Cel. Hier. ix. § 3); but those who accept not the divine illumination are represented as doing so, not in any active spirit of hostility, but by reason of the unfitness of their nature: ἡ τῶν νοερῶν ὕψων ἀνομοιότης τὴν ὑπερπλήρη τῆς πατρικῆς ἀγαθότητος φωτοδοσίαν . . . ἀμέθεκτον ποιεῖ (ib.). If such a plea be admitted, if the dull earth cannot by virtue of its nature receive or reflect the light like the clear glass, the question may well arise: Who hath resisted His will? The problems thus introduced, of the nature of evil, and man's responsibility, though partly discussed (the former of them, at least) in a following treatise, are almost unavoidably left unsolved by one starting with the conception of Dionysius.

The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy is the counterpart and continuation on earth of the Celestial Hierarchy in heaven. Its orders form indeed but the lower rounds of the same heavenly ladder, whose summit reaches upwards to the throne of God. The same triple and ninefold distinctions run through them both. What the primal Godhead is to the Celestial Hierarchy, Jesus is to the Ecclesiastical: Ἰησοῦς, ὁ θεαρχικώτατος νοῦς καὶ ὑπερούσιος, ἡ πάσης ἱεραρχίας τε καὶ θεουργίας ἀρχὴ καὶ οὐσία (Eocl. Hier. i. § 1). And it is observable that, even in this relationship, the human name of our Saviour is always used. As was the case with the heavenly orders, but in a still greater degree, owing to their partly corporeal nature, men stand in need of signs and similitudes for their instruction. These signs and symbols, like the teaching by parables of our Lord, serve a twofold purpose; being a medium for conveying a knowledge of the truth to the holy, and a veil to hide it from the profane. Our knowledge of them is derived partly from the Scriptures, partly from oral tradition (διὰ μέσου λόγου, σωματικῶν μὲν ἀυλοτέρου δὲ δυνως: ib. i. § 4). The three symbolic acts, or sacraments, of Christianity, forming the first and highest triad of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, are Baptism (ἡ ἱερὰ θεογενεσία), Communion (κοινωνία τε καὶ σῦναξις), and the Consecration of the Holy Chrism (μύρον τελετή). These are discussed in chapters ii. iii. and iv. respectively. The highest rank is given to the Holy Chrism, partly because of its use being necessary in other sacred rites, and partly because of its more immediately representing to us the office of the Anointed One, Χριστός. Hence the three correspond severally to the three stages of ascent to God: Baptism setting forth our washing, or purification; Communion, our enlightening; the Holy Chrism our perfecting. In chapter v. the three orders of the sacred ministry, forming the second triad, are described, together with the manner of their consecration. The next chapter contains an account of the three orders of the last, or lowest, triad; namely, the monks, who are in a state or process of perfection; the initiated, or holy lay people, who are in a state of illumination; and the catechumens, who are in the probationary state of purification. The seventh, and last chapter, is occupied with a description of the rites of the holy dead.

It is in this treatise that the forced and inflated style of the author is most noticeable, from the fact that the subject under treatment had its own recognised terminology. The ordinary terms are everywhere discarded, and new ones, often suggestive of the ancient mysteries, are introduced. Thus he describes Christian people as τοὺς τῆς ἱερᾶς μυσταγωγίας τὴν τελετὴν ἐξ ἱεραρχικῶν μυστηρίων καὶ παραδόσεων τετελεσμένους (Eocl. Hier. i. § 1). The common words for bishop, priest, and deacon are replaced by ἱεράρχης, ἱερεύς, and λειτουργός; and in the first of these, as Casaubon remarked, he has not been content with substituting ἀρχιερεύς for ἐπίσκοπος, but has used the inverted form ἱεράρχης. The adoption of ἱερεύς is still more remarkable, if we suppose the titles of the various works to be genuine; for in them Dionysius writes to Timothy as πρεσβύτερος τῷ συμπρεσβυτέρῳ. In the terms also chosen to express the three stages of spiritual ascent, κάθαρσις, μῆσις, τελείωσις, and especially in the use of the word ἐποπτεύεσθαι (ἡ πρὸς μόνων ἀμέσως τῶν παντέρων . . . ἐποπτευομένη, Eocl. Hier. iv. § 4), we are reminded of the heathen initiations, from which the proverbial ἐποπτεύειν μοι δοκῶ had its rise. As his great preceptor, Dionysius refers in this book to Hierotheus, said by tradition to have been a convert of St. Paul in Spain (Mariana, Annal. Hisp. iv. 3). What precise period is indicated by the ritual thus disclosed to us is a matter beyond our limits to discuss. It may suffice to say that the best authorities consider it to point to the sixth century.

The long and important treatise On the Names of God (Περὶ θείων ὀνομάτων) has for its subject the inquiry into what may be learnt of the being and attributes of God from the names under which He is revealed to us in holy Scripture. These names, like all other outward channels for the communication of spiritual knowledge, can reveal His real nature to us but very imperfectly. Even this knowledge is not attainable by us without prayer; which, like the golden chain of Homer, lifts us up to heaven while we seem to be drawing it down to earth; or which, like the rope thrown out to mariners from a rock, enables them to draw their ship nearer to the rock, while they pull as if they would draw the rock to them (Div. Nom. iii. § 1). To those who thus approach the study of God, the first thing revealed is His goodness, the far-reaching effulgence of His being, which streams forth upon all, like the rays of the visible sun (ib. iv. § 1). Akin to this is His divine beauty (κάλλος), which attracts and calls (καλεῖ) all things to itself. Hence its name: ὡς πάντα πρὸς ἑαυτὸ καλοῦν, ὅθεν καὶ κάλλος λέγεται (ib. iv. § 7). Then comes the question how—if God be so good, so beautiful, so lovely, and if these divine influences permeate all created things to their utmost—there can exist anything evil? How can that Good One have had the will to introduce it: πᾶς ὁ ἀγαθὸς αὐτὸ παραγαγεῖν ἡβουλήθη; or how can there be a multitude of demons (δαιμονία πληθὺς) inaccessible to good influences, and a cause of all evils to themselves and others? (ib. iv. § 18). These questions are answered consistently, if not satisfactorily. Evil is nothing real and positive, but a defect, a negation only: Στέρησις ἔρα ἐστὶ τὸ κακὸν, καὶ ἄλλειψις, καὶ ἀσθένεια, καὶ ἀσυμμετρία, κ.τ.λ. (ib. iv. § 32). As what we call cold, is but a deficiency of heat; or darkness, of light; so what we call evil is a deficiency of goodness. When the sky grows dark, as evening sets in, that darkness is nothing positive, superadded to what existed before: we are conscious of gloom merely from the disappearance of the light, which was the true existence (ib. iv. § 24). This subject is pursued, in a very noble train of thought, to some length, and is followed by a discussion of still other names and titles, adapted to the infirmity of human understanding, under which God's attributes are made intelligible to us. That the author is conscious of his theory of evil not being logically complete, appears manifest from his briefly referring to another supposed treatise, Περὶ δικαίου καὶ θείου δικαιοῦντος (ib. iv. § 35), for a settlement of the question how far evil, being such as is described, deserves punishment at the hands of God.

Of two legends, widely known in connexion with the name of Dionysius, from their insertion in the Breviary of the Latin church, one must be briefly noticed here, as the passage containing it is found in the present work. It is to the effect that when Dionysius was present with Timothy, to whom he is writing, and James δ ἀδελφός, and Peter, ἡ κορυφαία καὶ πρεσβυτέρα τῶν θεολόγων ἀκρότης, and other disciples, "for the spectacle of the body which was the beginning of life and recipient of God" (ἐπὶ τὴν θέαν τοῦ ζωαρχικοῦ καὶ θεοδόχου—al. φωτοδόχου—σώματος (ib. iii. § 2), no one but the apostles surpassed Hierotheus, his preceptor, in the inspired hymns and praises to which he gave utterance. This is commonly assumed to refer to a gathering of the apostles round the death-bed of the Holy Virgin. But the vagueness of the language will be noticed. The whole passage comes in with singular abruptness, as a sequel to one on the power of prayer. In the paraphrase of Pachymeres, the names of the apostles are left out altogether. And hence the explanation of it given by Barradas (quoted by Hipler, ubi inf. p. 48 n.), far-fetched as it may seem, is perhaps deserving of consideration: namely, that the gathering round the θεοτόκος really represents the assembly of believers for the reception of the Holy Eucharist, bending (as the words of one liturgy express it) "ante splendida et theodocha signa cum timore inclinati."

The short treatise on Mystic Theology may be described in few words, as indicating to us the means of approaching more nearly to God, previously set forth under the Divine Names, by reversing the procedure adopted in the Hierarchies. In them we saw a succession of manifestations, gradually becoming more symbolic and more corporeal as they descended, in indulgence to the weak and corporeal nature of man. But now, he who would aspire to a truer and more intimate knowledge of God, must rise above signs and symbols, above earthly conceptions and definitions of God, and thus advance by negation, rather than by affirmation, κατ' ἀφαί-ρσειν, not κατὰ θέσιν. Even in the Hierarchies (Coel. Hier. ii. § 3) Dionysius had spoken of ἀπόφασις as a surer way of penetrating the divine mystery than κατάφασις. And he now enforces the same truth by an illustration which, if not taken directly from Plotinus, presents a striking parallel to one used by him—that of the sculptor, who, when striving to fashion a beautiful statue, realises his conception by chipping away the outer marble, and removing what was in fact an obstruction to his own ideal (Myst. Theol., c. ii., compared with Plotinus de Pulchritudine, ed. Creuzer, 1814, p. 62).

Of the Letters, the first two are little more than detached notes on points of the Mystic Theology; on our ἀγνωσία of God, and His transcendent nature. The third is a short fragment on the meaning of the word ἐξαίφνης in Mal. iii. 1, "The Lord . . . shall suddenly come to his temple," and the application of that text to the Incarnation. The fourth, addressed, like the three previous ones, to the monk Caius, treats briefly of the Incarnation, and the nature of that human body with which Christ could walk upon the waters (cf. Div. Nom. ii. 9). The fifth, to Dorotheus, is on the meaning of the divine darkness (δ θεῖος γνόφος) spoken of in the Mystic Theology. The sixth, to Sosipater, teaches the important lesson, that labour is better spent in establishing truth than in confuting error. The seventh is a much longer letter, addressed to Polycarp, in which he bids him answer the taunts of the Sophist Apollphanes, by recalling to his memory the days when he and Dionysius were fellow-students at Hierapolis, and his own remark when they beheld the darkness of the Crucifixion: ταῦτα, ὃ καλὲ Διονύσιε, θέλω ἀμοιβαίαι πραγμάτων. The exclamation attributed to Dionysius himself, as it appears in the Latin Breviary, Aut Deus naturae putitur, aut mundi machina dissolvitur, or, as it is given by Syngelus in his Life, Ὁ ἀγνωστος ἐν σαρκὶ πάσχει Θεός, κ.τ.λ., is not found in the Dionysian writings themselves. The eighth letter, to a monk Demophilus, is on the duty of gentleness and forbearance; and the topic is illustrated by the recital of a dream which St. Carpus had once had in Crete. The passage in which the dream is related is one of the most striking in all Dionysius, and may be found, in an English dress, in Mr. Westcott's Essay, referred to below. The ninth, also a long letter, addressed to Titus, bishop of Crete, refers to the matters treated of in the Symbolic Theology. Many points are discussed in what to some would appear a strangely neologic spirit. The anthropomorphism of the Old Testament, the bold metaphors of the Song of Songs (τὰς τῶν ἀσμάτων προσόλους καὶ ἑταιρικούς πολυπαθείας), and the like, can only be understood, he says, by the true lovers of holiness, who come to the study of divine wisdom divested of every childish imagination (πᾶσαν τὴν παιδαριώδη φαντασίαν ἐπὶ τῶν ἱερῶν συμβόλων ἀποσκευασμένοις). In this letter we seem to see before us a disciple of Philo. The tenth, and last, is a mere fragment, addressed to St. John the Divine, an exile in Patmos, foretelling his approaching release from confinement.

(3) Theories as to date and authorship.—After what has been said before, it may seem hardly necessary here to recapitulate the arguments against the genuineness of these works. The absence of all mention or quotation of them by early writers, especially Eusebius and Jerome; the inflated style of language, very far removed from apostolic simplicity; the developed state of church ritual and government described in them; the allusions to later persons or events, as the martyrdom of Ignatius (Div. Nom. iv. § 12), and "Clement the Philosopher" (ib. v. § 9), who can hardly be any other than Clement of Alexandria; the alleging of "ancient tradition" (πρὸς τῆς ἀρχαίας μνηθέντες παραδόσεως, Eccl. Hier. vii. § 11) in his account of infant baptism; and the use of theological terms, compounds of ὄσια, and the like, which did not come into circulation till after the council of Ephesus; these and similar reasons have been adduced by writers of opposite religious schools, and possess a cumulative force which would seem irresistible. Yet some minds are still found unconvinced by them. The late ill-fated archbishop of Paris prefixed to his translation of the writings an elaborate defence of their Dionysian origin. Still later writers have followed his steps with arguments that must sometimes provoke a smile. What can be thought of reasoning like that of the editors of the Histoire Universelle de l'Église Catholique (tom. iii. 1868, p. 26), who try to obviate the conclusion drawn from the writer's use of long compound words, by pointing out that in the Vulgate version of the Lord's Prayer we may find a similar one: "panem nostrum super substantialiam da nobis hodie!"

Passing briefly in review some other theories, in the order of the time to which they point, we may notice (1) that of Baumgarten-Crusius, who places the writer in the 3rd century, and thinks he took the name of Dionysius, as other hierophants took the name of their special divinities, to introduce the spirit of the Dionysiac mysteries into Christianity; (2) that of Baratier, who thought the author was Dionysius of Alexandria. Lequien briefly disposes of this by observing that Dionysius of Alexandria died A.D. 260, while Manicheism, which did not spring up till 277, is plainly attacked in cap. iv. of the Div. Nom.; (3) Pearson, influenced by a belief that a passage from these writings, and not, as is commonly thought, from Athanasius, is cited by Gregory of Nazianzum (Orat. xxxviii.), places the writer in the latter part of Eusebius's time, i.e. before A.D. 340; (4) Laurentius Valla has left it on record that some Greek scholars among his contemporaries thought the writer to be Apollinaris. This opinion is quoted by Ussher and Cave, without its being settled which Apollinaris is meant. Lequien shews that he could not have been Apollinaris the elder (c. 360), as he denied a proper human soul to Christ; nor yet the younger (c. 370), who advanced millenarian theories: both of these being at variance with the teaching of Dionysius; (5) La Croze, comparing such expressions as the πηγαίαν θεότητα of Dionysius with the πηγή πηγῶν ἀπασῶν of Synesius (c. 410), concluded him to be the philosophical bishop of Ptolemais. This opinion is refuted by Brucker; (6) Lequien, after demolishing various other theories, propounds as his own the identification of him with Peter Gnapheus, or Fullo, who was made patriarch of Alexandria in A.D. 485. One of his reasons is drawn from the prominence given to the recitation of the Creed in cap. iii. of the Eccl. Hier., compared with what Peter Fullo is known to have ordained with regard to such recitation in his own see; (7) lastly, Mr. Westcott, observing that the name of Hierotheus came into prominence at Edessa towards the end of the 5th century, through the abbat of a monastery there, Bar Sadaili, composing or quoting some writings under that name, thinks that the present works "were composed A.D. 480-520, either at Edessa or under the influence of the Edessene school." The coincidence of name is, perhaps, too precarious a support to rest much upon. But the conjecture of Edessa receives some countenance from the acquaintance with Persian learning, implied in what Dionysius says about Mithras (Ep. vii. § 2). Gieseler pronounces the writings to have been composed in Egypt towards the close of the 5th century. Whether Alexandria or Edessa were the place, there would seem little doubt that the author was one of that philosophical band whom the edict of Justinian drove for ever from their haunts, and who had learned in the Christian faith a truer philosophy than Proclus or Damascus could teach him.

(4) Influence on later Authors.—To follow out this subject thoroughly would require a volume. A few brief indications must suffice. In one sense Dionysius may be called the father of scholasticism, from the influence he exercised on John of Damascus in the Eastern, and on Aquinas in the Western, church. As regards the latter, more particularly, Corderius has filled several columns (Op. ed. Migne i. pp. 88-96) with references only to the passages of Dionysius cited by Aquinas; adding that the angelic doctor "totam fere doctrinam theologiam ex purissimis Dionysii fontibus hausisse." The Abbé Darboy goes so far as to say that, if the writings of Dionysius were to be lost, they might be recovered piecemeal from the various works of St. Thomas. By Peter Lombard (c. 1170) he is quoted as the chief authority for the angelic orders. Hugo of St. Victor (c. 1120) wrote a commentary upon him, as did our own Robert Grosseteste a century later; the libraries of Lincoln and Corpus Christi colleges, Oxford, still possessing many of the bishop's writings on Dionysius which have never seen the light. His name was invoked by Thomas à Becket in his dying moments. Albertus Magnus, who commented upon him in the 13th century, Dionysius Carthusianus in the 15th, who calls him "theologorum principem," Tauler, Savonarola, Ficino, Pico della Mirandola—these, and many other great ones, occur to the memory at once as his disciples. In our own country, besides Grosseteste, Colet, dean of St. Paul's, was so struck with these writings that he has left a full abstract of two of them; and Grocyn, probably at his instance, lectured on them in St. Paul's Cathedral. But it is chiefly through the great poets of modern times that the influence of Dionysius is now felt. How they should come under the spell is not difficult to see. His speculations on the host of heaven would have a charm for the loftiest imagination; and so Dante sang of "That taper's radiance, to whose view was shewn, Clearliest, the nature and the ministry

Angelical."—Par. c. x.

More especially was this effect increased by the blending in men's minds of his theory of the angelic orders with the once commonly accepted one of the concentric spheres. That these ideas did become so blended is shewn by many indications; by their sequence in the account of creation with which the great Nuremberg Chronicle begins, or by the woodcuts which adorn the Utriusque Cosmi Historia of the Englishman Robert Fludd. Starting, as Pooceke thinks, from the Sabaens, caught up by Plato, and from him transmitted through Philo and Macrobius and a long line of others, the belief prevailed that the heavenly orbs were the seat of intelligences, easily identified with the angelic orders of Dionysius. And thus a correspondence was established between the revolving spheres of mediæval astronomy and the ninefold hosts,

"Who in broad circle, lovelier than the rainbow, Girdle this round earth in a dizzy motion."

Spenser, when he connected the "mighty shining christall wall," in his Hymne of Heavenly Beautie, with the angels who

"in their trinal triplicities About Him wait, and on His will depend," bears witness to the same blending of ideas; as did that still greater poet, when, in what Hallam considers "the most sublime passage, perhaps, in Shakspeare," he described the orbs of heaven

"Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims."

But the name of Milton may suffice as one last example, patent to all, of the enduring influence of the angelic conceptions of Dionysius. Whatever other power may be exercised on modern theology by that "Tenebrio," and "Lucifuga," as Brucker and others contemptuously call him; whatever effect (and some think a great effect is to be looked for) may still ensue from these speculations of the early Greek church; there can be no doubt that the thoughts of Dionysius have been brought home to myriads who never heard his name, through him who wrote of

"Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Virtues, Pow'rs."

DIONYSIUS (2) ST., apostle of France, and first bishop of Paris. Concerning his identity and era there are three principal opinions.

1. That he was Dionysius the Areopagite, formerly bishop of Athens, who came to Rome and was sent by Clement, bishop of Rome, to preach in Gaul. This is the tradition of the Greek church, and of the churches of Gaul, Germany, Spain, and Italy. The corresponding legend, shortly narrated in the Paris Martyrology, states that the companions of Dionysius were Rusticus a presbyter and Eleutherus a deacon, and that all three were put to death by the sword under Sisinnius Fescenninus, prefect of Gaul. This is the opinion of Flavius Lucius Dexter, who died in 444 (Chronicon, Patrol. Lat. xxxi. 270); of Hilduinus the abbat, who died in 840, and at the request of Louis the Pious wrote the life of Dionysius (Patrol. Lat. civ. 1327, cvi. 9); of the writer of the Passio SS. Dionysii, Rustici, et Eleutherii, which has been attributed wrongly to Venantius Fortunatus of Poitiers, the contemporary of Gregory of Tours, and is printed with his works (Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. 578); and of Hrotswitha the Nun of Gandersheim, in her poem entitled 'Historia Passionis S. Dionysii' (Patrol. Lat. cxxxvii. p. 1117). She died in the 10th century, and is only quoted to shew the popular opinion of her time.

2. That, although he was not the Areopagite, he was sent by Clement or the successors of the apostles. This opinion adopts the other details of the legend. It is that of the writer of a poem in honour of Dionysius which is attributed with some probability to Venantius Fortunatus of Poitiers, who had written a poem on the same subject committing himself to no opinion (Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. 72, 98). It is also supported by Petrus de Marca, archbishop of Toulouse and Paris, and by Pagius in his notes on Baronius.

3. That he was sent from Rome in the 3rd century, and suffered martyrdom about A.D. 250. This is the account of Sulpicius Severus, who died A.D. 410, and of Gregory of Tours who died in 595. Sulpicius says, "Under Aurelius, son of Antoninus, raged the fifth persecution. Then first were martyrdoms seen in Gaul, for the religion of God was late in coming over the Alps" (Severi Chronicon, ii. 32, Patrol. Lat. xx.

147). Gregory, in the 28th chapter of the first book of his History of the Franks, speaking of the Decian persecution, quotes the Historia Passionis Sancti Martyris Saturnini: "Under the consulship of Decius and Gratus, as is held in faithful recollection, the state of Toulouse began to have a bishop, St. Saturninus, her first and chief. These were the men sent: to Tours, Gatianus the bishop; to Arles, Trophimus the bishop; to Toulouse, Saturninus the bishop; to Paris, Dionysius the bishop, etc. Of these the blessed Dionysius, bishop of the Parisians, afflicted with many pains for the name of Christ, ended this present life under the sword." It is probable therefore that he died under the emperor Aurelian in A.D. 272. (Cf. Gall. Christ. vii. 4.)

[W. M. S.]

DIONYSIUS (3) bishop of Corinth, probably the successor of PRIMUS in that see, placed by Eusebius in his Chronicle under the year 171, as a sacred man celebrated at that time (see also Eus. H. E. ii. 25, iii. 4, iv. 21, 23, 35; Hieron. Catal. 27). He is known as the writer of certain pastoral letters, which gained so much authority in his own lifetime that heretics, as he complains, found it worth their while to put into circulation copies falsified by interpolations and omissions. Eusebius mentions having met with eight of these letters, viz., seven which he calls "Catholic Epistles," addressed to churches which are enumerated as follows: Lacedaemon, Athens, Nicomedia, Gortyna and other churches in Crete, Amastris and other churches in Pontus, Cnossus, and Rome; and one to an individual, "his most faithful sister Chrysochora." It is likely that the letters had already been collected into a volume, and that they are enumerated by Eusebius in the order in which he found them there, else he would probably have mentioned the two Cretan letters consecutively. Nothing remains of these epistles, but the short account of their contents given by Eusebius, and a few fragments of the letter to the Roman Church which, though very scanty, throw considerable light on the state of the church at the time.

The titles of the letters sufficiently indicate the unity of the Christian community. Eusebius praises Dionysius for having given a share in his "inspired industry" to those in foreign lands, as well as to those under his own immediate charge. It might not surprise us that a bishop of Corinth should consider Lacedaemon and Athens as under his metropolitan superintendence, but that he should send letters of admonition to Crete, to Bithynia, and to Paphlagonia, not only proves the reputation of the writer, but shews that the Christian churches scattered over the whole world, formed a single body. And a still more interesting proof of this is furnished by the letter to the Roman Church, which would seem to be one of thanks for a supply of money, probably brought back by some of the Corinthians who had visited Rome; and in which he speaks of it as a hereditary custom of that church from the earliest times, to send supplies to the churches in every city to relieve the poverty of the needy, and to support the brethren who were condemned to work in the mines, "a custom not only preserved, but increased by the blessed bishop of Soter, who administered their bounty to the saints, and with blessed words exhorted the brethren that came up as an affectionate father his children." The epithet here added to the name of Soter, is usually applied to those deceased in Christ; but there are instances of its application to living persons, and Eusebius speaks of him as still bishop, when the letter of Dionysius was written. This letter is remarkable also as containing the earliest testimony that St. Peter, like St. Paul, suffered martyrdom in Italy, and at the same time.

The letters indicate the general prevalence of the episcopal form of government at the time when they were written. In the majority of them the bishop of the church addressed is mentioned with honour; Palmas in Pontus, Philip and Pinytus in Crete, Soter at Rome. The letter to the Athenians reminds them of a former bishop Publius, who had suffered martyrdom during persecutions which reduced that church to a very low condition, from which it was revived by the zeal of Quadratus, the successor of Publius. And this form of government was then supposed to date from apostolic times, for in the same letter Dionysius the Areopagite is counted as the first bishop of Athens. But the importance of the bishop seems to be still subordinate to that of the church over which he ruled. The letters, including that to Rome, are each addressed to the church, not to the bishop; and Soter's own letter, like Clement's former one, was written not in his own name, but that of his church (ὑμῶν τὴν ἐπιστολὴν). The letters indeed of Dionysius himself were written in his own name, and he uses the first person singular in the passage where he speaks of them, but as if to soften any appearance of assumption adds that his letters were written at the request of brethren. Eusebius has preserved the names of two, Bacchylides and Elpistus, at whose instance the letter to the churches of Pontus was written.

The letters also illustrate the value attached by Christians to their sacred literature. Dionysius informs the Church of Rome that the day on which he wrote, being the Lord's day, had been kept holy, and that they had then read the letter of the Roman Church, and would continue from time to time to read it for their instruction, as they were in the habit of reading the letter formerly written from the same church by the hand of Clement. In the passage where he speaks of the falsification of his own letters, which he says the "apostles of the devil" had filled with "tares," he adds "It is no marvel then that some have attempted to tamper with the scriptures of the Lord, since they have attempted it on writings not comparable to them (οὐ τοιαύταις)." Thus we learn that it was then customary to read sacred books in the Christian assemblies; that this practice was not limited to our canonical books, that attempts were made by men regarded as heretics to corrupt these writings, and that such attempts were jealously guarded against. It would seem that the value attached by Christians to writings was regulated rather by the character of their contents, than by the dignity of the writer; for while there is no trace that the letter of Soter thus honoured at Corinth passed beyond that church, the letter of Dionysius himself became the property of the whole Christian community. But we learn the pre-eminent authority enjoyed by certain books, called the Scriptures of the Lord, which we cannot be wrong in identifying with some of the writings included in our New Testament. The language of Dionysius in the very brief fragments remaining, shews traces of an acquaintance with the Gospel of St. Matthew, the Acts, the first Epistle to the Thessalonians, and the Apocalypse. There is, therefore, no reason for limiting to the Old Testament the "expositions of the divine scriptures," which Eusebius tells us were contained in the letter of Dionysius to the churches of Pontus.

In speaking of attempts to corrupt the Scriptures, Dionysius probably refers to the heresy of Marcion, against which, we are told, he wrote in his letter to the Church of Nicomedia, "defending the rule of truth." We are not informed in what way he dealt with this heresy, for we cannot lay much stress on a rhetorical passage where Jerome (Ep. ad Magnum, 83) includes Dionysius in a list of those who had applied secular learning to the refutation of heresy, tracing each heresy to its source in the writings of the philosophers. Dionysius had probably also Marcionism in view, when he exhorted the Church of Gortyna "to beware of the perversion of heretics," for we are told that Philip, the bishop of the church addressed, had himself found it necessary to compose a treatise against Marcion. And we may suspect that we see traces of the same heresy in the subjects treated of in the letter to the churches of Pontus (the home of Marcion), to which he gave instructions concerning marriage and chastity (marriage having been proscribed by Marcion), and which he also exhorted to receive back those who returned after any fall, whether into irregularity of living or into heretical error. But the rigorist tendencies here combated were exhibited also, not only among the then rising sects of the Encratites and Montanists, but also by men of undoubted orthodoxy. In his letter to the Cossians, Dionysius exhorts Pinytus the bishop, a man highly commended by Eusebius for his piety, orthodoxy, and learning, not to impose on the brethren too heavy a burden of chastity, but to regard the weakness of the many. Eusebius reports Pinytus as replying with expressions of high respect for Dionysius, which were understood by Rufinus to imply an adoption of his views. But it would rather seem that he persevered in his own opinion, for he exhorts Dionysius in return to impart to his people some more advanced instruction, lest if he fed them always with milk instead of with more solid food, they should continue to the end of their days in the state of children.

We are not told anything of the time or manner of the death of Dionysius. It must have been before the Paschal disputes in A.D. 198, when we find Palmas of Pontus still alive, but a new bishop (Bacchylus) at Corinth. The Greek Church counts Dionysius among martyrs, and the Menaea name the sword as the instrument of his death; but there is no earlier authority for his martyrdom than Cedrenus, who lived at the end of the 11th century. The Roman Church only counts him among confessors. The abbey of St. Denis, in France, claimed to be in possession of the body of Dionysius of Corinth, alleged to have been brought from Greece to Rome, and given them in 1215 by pope Innocent III. The pope's bull is given by the Bollandists under April 8th. [G. S.]

DIONYSIUS (4), ST., sixth bishop of Vienne. He is said by Ado (Patrol. Lat. cxliii. 24), bishop of Vienne, who died in 875, to have lived until the reign of Helvius Pertinax, A.D. 193. But great doubt is felt about the early bishops of Vienne, Ado being the only authority. The statements of Sulpicius Severus and Gregory of Tours that Christianity was not introduced into Gaul till the 3rd century are directly contradictory to Ado. Nothing can be determined. He is commemorated on the 9th of May, according to the Bollandists. According to the MS. Florarium Sanctorum he is commemorated on the 7th, according to Bede on the 8th. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 9; AA. SS. Bolland. May, ii. 361.) [W. M. S.]

(6) OF ALEXANDRIA. This "great bishop of Alexandria" (ὁ μέγας Ἀλεξανδρῶν ἐπίσκοπος, Euseb. H. E. vi.), Praef. and "teacher of the catholic church" (τῆς καθολικῆς Ἐκκλησίας διδάσκαλος, Athan. de Sent. Dion. 6), was born, apparently, of a wealthy and honourable family (Euseb. H. E. vii. 11, and Valesius ad loc.). The date of his birth may be fixed in the last decade of the second century. He was an old man in A.D. 265 (Euseb. H. E. vii. 27), and already ordained presbyter in A.D. 233 (Hieron. de Vir. III. 69). His parents were Gentiles, and he was himself led to examine the claims of Christianity by private study (Ep. Dion. ap. Euseb. H. E. vii. 7).^a His conversion cost him the sacrifice of "worldly glory" (δόξα κοσμική, ἔπαινοι ἡγεμονικοί καὶ βουλευτικοί, Euseb. H. E. vii. 11);^b but he found in Origen a teacher who was well fitted to direct and determine his inquiries (Euseb. H. E. vi. 29); and Dionysius remained faithful to his master to the last. In the persecutions of Decius he addressed a letter to him On Persecution (Euseb. H. E. vi. 46), doubtless as an expression of sympathy with his sufferings (c. A.D. 259); and on the death of Origen (A.D. 253), he wrote to Theotecnus, bishop of Caesarea, in his praise (Steph. Gob. ap. Phot. Cod. 232).

Dionysius, being then a presbyter, succeeded Heraclas as head of the Catechetical School, and, as the words of Eusebius imply, at the time when Heraclas was made bishop of Alexandria on the death of Demetrius, A.D. 232-3 (Euseb. l. c.). He held this office till he himself was raised to the bishopric, on the death of Heraclas, A.D. 247-8, and perhaps retained it up to his death, A.D. 265. His episcopate fell during troubled times. A popular outbreak at Alexandria (A.D. 248-249) anticipated by about a year (Euseb. H. E. vi. 41) the persecution under Decius (A.D. 249-251). Dionysius fled from Alexandria after a few days' stay; and, being afterwards taken by some soldiers, he was rescued by the timely courage of a friend, and escaped in an obscure retirement from further attacks.^c In the persecution of Valerian, A.D. 257, he was brought before the praefect, and banished; but he continued to direct and animate the Alexandrian church from the successive places of his exile. His conduct, on these occasions, exposed him to ungenerous criticism, and Eusebius has preserved several interesting passages of a letter (c. A.D. 258-9), in which he defends himself with great spirit against the accusations of a bishop Germanus (H. E. vi. 40; vii. 11). On the accession of Gallienus, A.D. 260, Dionysius was allowed to return to Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. vii. 13, 21), where he had to face fresh calamities, war, famine and pestilence, of which he has left a lively account (Euseb. H. E. vii. 22). In A.D. 264-5 he was invited to attend the synod at Antioch, which met to consider the opinions of Paul of Samosata. His age and infirmities did not allow him to go; and he died shortly afterwards (A.D. 265) (Euseb. H. E. vii. 27, 28; Hieron. de Vir. Ill. 69).

^a The Chronicon Orientale (p. 94, ed. 1685) mentions the epistles of St. Paul as leading him to embrace Christianity, and states that he received baptism from Demetrius.

^b He has been spoken of as "a rhetorician," from a confusion with another Dionysius of Alexandria. Comp. Dittrich, p. 2 n.

Dionysius took an active part in the controversies of his time, and in every case he bore himself with the same wise prudence which he shewed in meeting persecution. In this spirit he was anxious to deal gently with the "lapsed" (Euseb. H. E. vi. 42), and pressed upon Novatian^a the duty of self-restraint, for the sake of the peace of the church, A.D. 251 (Euseb. H. E. vii. 45; Hieron. l. c.); and, with better results, counselled moderation in dealing with the question of the re-baptism of heretics, in a correspondence with popes Stephen and Sixtus (A.D. 256-7) (Euseb. H. E. vii. 5, 7, 9). His last letter (or letters) in the matter of Paul of Samosata, would seem to have been written in a similar strain. He charged the assembled bishops to do their duty, but he did not shrink from appealing to Paul also, as still fairly within the reach of honest argument (Theod. Haer. Fab. ii. 8^e). In one instance at least the temperate measures of Dionysius met with immediate success. He has left under his own hand a remarkable narrative of a discussion which he held with a party of Chiliasts, in which he brought his opponents to recognise and abandon their error (Euseb. H. E. vii. 24). His own orthodoxy, however, did not always remain unimpeached. In controverting the false teaching of Sabellius, he laid himself open to the charge of tritheism, which was brought against him by some Sabellian adversaries, and entertained at first by his namesake Dionysius of Rome. The discussion which followed brought to light one ground of the misunderstanding in the ambiguity of the words used to describe "essence" and "person," which the two bishops took in different senses. Thus Dionysius of Rome regarded the word ὑπόστασις as expressing the essence of the divine nature; Dionysius of Alexandria as expressing the essence of each divine person. The former letter is referred by Eusebius to the later persecution under Valerian, but evidently by mistake. Comp. Vales. ad loc.

^a The text of Eusebius has here, by a common error, Novatus for Novatian, but the true name is preserved by Jerome, and by Eusebius himself, vii. 8. The notion of Rufinus that two letters were written in identical terms to Novatus and Novatian is a clumsy solution of the difficulty.

^e The long letter printed in the editions of the councils (Coleti, i. 874 ff.) is certainly not authentic.

therefore affirmed that to divide the ὑπόστασις was to make separate gods; the latter affirmed with equal justice that there could be no Trinity unless each ὑπόστασις was distinct. The Alexandrine bishop had, however, used other phrases, which were seized by Arians at a later time as favourable to their views. Basil on hearsay, as it has been supposed (Lumper, Hist. Patrum, xiii. 86 f.), admits that he sowed the seeds of the Anomoean heresy (Ep. i. 9), but Athanasius with fuller knowledge vindicated the perfect orthodoxy of his predecessor. One subsidiary question of interest is connected with the dispute. It has been the fashion to represent the Alexandrine bishop as recognising the supremacy of Rome in the defence which he made. He replied indeed to the written inquiries of his namesake (Athanasius, de Sent. Dionysii, ἐπέστειλε Διονυσίῳ δηλώσαι . . . for the use of ἐπιστέλλω see Euseb. H. E. vi. 46, &c.), but the fragments of his answer shew the most complete and resolute independence; and there is nothing in the narrative of Athanasius which implies that the Alexandrine bishop recognised, or that the Roman bishop claimed, any dogmatic authority as belonging to the imperial see. The synod which is said to have been held upon the subject at Rome is, as it appears, an imaginary and incorrect interpretation of the facts.^f

Dionysius was a prolific writer. Jerome (l. c.) has preserved a long but not exhaustive catalogue of his books, from which it appears that they were for the most part called out by special circumstances. Some important fragments remain of his treatises On Nature (Euseb. Praef. Ev. xiv. 23 ff.), and On the Promises, in refutation of the Chiliastic views of Nepos (Euseb. H. E. iii. 28, vii. 24, 25); of his Refutation and Defence, addressed to Dionysius of Rome, in reply to the accusation of false teaching on the Holy Trinity (Athanasius, de Sent. Dionysii; de Synodis, c. 44; de Decr. Syn. Nic. c. 25); of his Commentaries on Ecclesiastes and on St. Luke, and of his books Against Sabellius (Euseb. Praef. Ev. vii. 19). The fragments which have been referred to his treatise On Martyrdom are probably by a different hand. (Comp. Dittrich, p. 37 f.)

The fragments of the letters of Dionysius are, however, the most interesting memorial of his work and character which remains. These give a most lively picture both of the writer and of the time; and Eusebius, with a true historical instinct, has made them the basis of the sixth and seventh books of his history.

The following rough list will shew the wide ground which his correspondence covered:—

A.D. 251.—To Domitius and Didymus. Personal experiences during persecution (Euseb. H. E. vii. 11).

A.D. 251-2.—To Novatian, to the Roman Confessors, to Cornelius of Rome, Fabius of Antioch, ^f Comp. Athanasius, de Sent. Dionysii.

^g This treatise was addressed, Τιμωθίῳ τῷ παιδί (Euseb. H. E. vii. 26), and in the account of his escape from Alexandria Dionysius speaks of οἱ παῖδες (Euseb. H. E. vi. 40). It seems most natural to understand the word παῖς literally in both cases, and to believe that Dionysius was married. Comp. Tillemont, Mémoires, s. v., note 1. Dittrich, p. 4, maintains that the word simply describes "a scholar," and that some of his "scholars" may well have lived in his house.

Conon of Hermopolis; and to Christians in Alexandria, Egypt, Laodicea, Armenia, on the question of discipline and repentance, with pictures from contemporary history (Euseb. vi. 41, and vii. 45).

A.D. 253-7.—To Stephen of Rome, the Roman presbyters Dionysius and Philemon, Sixtus II. of Rome on Rebaptism (Euseb. H. E. vii. 4, 5, 7, 9).

A.D. 258-263.—To Germanus: incidents in persecution. Against Sabellians. A series of festal letters, with pictures of contemporary history (Euseb. vii. 11, 22 ff. 26).

A.D. 264.—To Paul of Samosata (vi. 40).

To these letters, of which in some cases only the titles remain, must be added an important canonical letter to Basilides, of uncertain date, in which Dionysius discusses various questions of discipline proposed to him, and especially points connected with the Lenten fast. (Comp. Dittrich, pp. 46 ff.)

All the fragments of Dionysius repay careful study. They are uniformly inspired by the sympathy and large-heartedness which he shewed in practice. His criticism on the style of the Apocalypse is perhaps unique among early writings for clearness and scholarly precision (Euseb. H. E. vii. 25).

Dionysius is commemorated in the Roman Church on Nov. 17 (other authorities give Dec. 27), and in the Greek Church on Oct. 3.

The fragments of Dionysius were collected by Simon de Magistris (Romae, 1796); but the most accessible and complete collection of the remains of Dionysius is in Migne's Patrologiæ Graeca, x. pp. 1233 ff., 1575 ff., to which must be added Pitra, Spicil. Solesm. i. 15 ff. A full monograph on Dionysius has been published by Dittrich (Freiburg, 1867), which supplements the articles in the general works of Tillemont, Marchal, Lumper, Moehler. [B. F. W.]

DIONYSIUS (7) bishop of Rome; a Greek by birth, consecrated July 22nd, A.D. 259, on the death of Xystus, in the persecution of Valerian.

Nothing is recorded of him, except his efforts against heresy. When Dionysius of Alexandria was accused of holding doctrines akin to those of Sabellius, the Roman Dionysius wrote to him, and extracted a defence of himself so satisfactory that he was declared purged of suspicion (Athanas. Ep. de Sententiâ Dionysii, Opp. i. 252). In A.D. 264, the Alexandrian and Roman Dionysii acted together with the council of Antioch, in condemning and degrading Paul of Samosata. Five years later (A.D. 269), when the same Paul was condemned again by a council at Antioch, we find a synodic letter addressed by the bishops present to the then occupants of the sees of Rome and Alexandria. The Alexandrian Dionysius had been succeeded by Maximus; Dionysius of Rome died at the end of this year (Dec. 26th, A.D. 269). [G. H. M.]

(8) One of the seven sleepers of Ephesus. (Men. Bas. Oct. 23.) [E. B. B.]

(9) Of Tripoli, martyr under Diocletian, one of the six young men, who, hearing of a great show at the amphitheatre of Caesarea, where Christians condemned to death were to fight, joined hands, came forward when the governor Urbanus was taking his place in the building, and confessed themselves Christians. They were thrown into prison, and beheaded with a second Dionysius and another, March 24, A.D. 304. (Euseb. lib. de Martyr. Palaestinae, cap. 3; Ceillier, iii. 6.) [W. M. S.]

DIONYSIUS (10), disciple of a certain Quadratus, and martyr at Corinth, probably in the Diocletian persecution. (Men. Basil. March 10.) [E. B. B.]

(11) Two of this name were martyred together at Caesarea, in the reign of Diocletian. (Men. Basil. March 15.) [E. B. B.]

(12) Fifteenth bishop of Mainz, succeeded Ignatius, and ruled the diocese twenty-six years, in the beginning of the fourth century. (Gall. Christ. v. 433.) [D. R. J.]

(13) A count, deputy of the emperor Licinius at the council of Tyre, A.D. 335. He was sent to keep good order, but domineered over the assembly, arranging everything his own way, and always in favour of the Arians. Accompanied by justices, apparitors, and soldiers, he kept the door to make the bishops come in, which was the office of the deacons. When he spoke, all were silent; all obeyed him. He prevented the exit of bishops who had no business to be there; and his soldiers forced to the council bishops who made a difficulty about coming. This is the account of Athanasius. (Athanas. Apol. cont. Arian., Patrol. Lat. xxv. 116, 147, 149, 156; Ceillier, iii. 450.) [W. M. S.]

(14) (ST.), succeeded Protasius as bishop of Milan, A.D. 346. He is connected with some obscure proceedings which took place at the council of Milan, A.D. 335. Through the urgency of the emperor Constantius, he was induced to sign a document partially condemnatory of St. Athanasius; but his name was afterwards erased, it is said by Eusebius, bishop of Vercelli. [EUSEBIUS.] His conduct was so little satisfactory to the emperor that he was banished to Cappadocia. There he died, A.D. 374; and it is said that his body was sent back to Milan, under the sanction of St. Basil, and there received with honour by St. Ambrose. (Athanasius, Ep. ad Solitarios; Lib. de Synodis; Ambrose, iii. 920, 18. 1129. 1130.) [J. L. D.]

(15) Bishop of Lydda or Diospolis, mentioned by Jerome as a confessor in his letter to Pamphilius (Epist. 61, § 75, ad fin.). He subscribed the acts of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381 (Labbe, Concil. tom. ii. p. 955; Le Quien, Oriens Christian. tom. iii. col. 584.) [E. V.]

(16) One of the monks in the monastery of Basil, archbishop of Caesarea. Basil sends him with a letter to his mother, a widow, that her son may persuade her to enter a convent on the banks of the river Iris; circ. A.D. 361. (Basil, Epist. 10, Patrol. Graec. cxxxii. 271; Ceillier, iv. 429.) [W. M. S.]

(17) Commander under the emperor Theodosius II. To him John bishop of Antioch sent for execution the law which he had obtained from the emperor, and according to which the four bishops Helladius, Maximian, Alexander, and Theodoret were summoned to choose either peace with John of Antioch or exile. (Concil. Append. p. 876; Ceillier, viii. 248.) Alexander of Hierapolis wrote to Dionysius, asking that if he must retire, the order might be given secretly, that he might depart without noise. (Fleury, lib. xxvi. Ecol. Hist. p. 879; Ceillier, viii. 380.) He is possibly the same as the Duke Dionysius, who commands in Egypt in A.D. 457, and expels Timotheus Aelurus from Alexandria after his seditious ordination to that see. (Evagr. II. viii.; Ceillier, x. 176.)

[W. M. S.]

DIONYSIUS (18), eleventh bishop of Tours, is said by Joannes Maan to have died in the year 513, but there has been much contention as to the exact year of his death. He is sometimes called Divinius, Dinisius, or Dinifrius. He was a native of Burgundy, and was appointed to the bishopric of Tours by king Clodomir, who, through Dionysius, richly endowed that church. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 17; Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. §§ 105, 123, 533, Patrol. Lat. lxxi.) [D. R. J.]

(19) Surnamed EXIGUUS, so called not from smallness in stature, but from humbleness of heart, was a Scythian by birth, who became a monk in the Western church. He flourished under the emperors Justin and Justinian in the 6th century, and to him we owe the custom of dating events from the birth of our Saviour. That birth, however, he is now acknowledged to have placed four years too late. He likewise laid the foundation of canon law by his collection of canons. He knew Latin and Greek fairly: though it is easy to see that neither was his vernacular: and as he never seems to have composed in Greek, we can only gather the extent of his acquaintance with it from his Latin translations, which indeed form the bulk of his extant works. His original Latin, to judge from the specimens we have, was strictly classical and of easy flow. Cassiodorus speaks of him in terms of praise, morally and intellectually, which he well deserves, as is shewn by his performances.

Of these we must now speak in order. It will be seen that in each case they were not original discoveries, but improvements on them.

I. The period called after him was borrowed from Victorius of Aquitaine, who flourished 100 years earlier, and is said to have been its inventor. It is a revolution of 532 years, produced by multiplying the solar cycle of 28, and the lunar of 19 years, together. It is called sometimes "recapitulatio Dionysii." A note to § 13 of the preliminary dissertation to L'Art de vérifier les Dates shews how he improved on his predecessor.

His cycle was published in the last year of the emperor Justin, A.D. 527. It began with March 25, now kept as the festival of the Annunciation, as December 25 is of the Nativity; and this is the epoch from which all the dates of bulls and briefs of the court of Rome are supposed to run (Butler's Lives of the Saints, Oct. 15: note to the Life of St. Teresa). His first year had for its characters the solar cycle 10, the lunar 2, and the Roman indiction 4, thereby proclaiming its identity with the year 4714 of the Julian period, which again coincided with the 4th year of the 194th Olympiad, and the 753rd of the building of Rome. It was this passage in his prefatory letter to bishop Petronius, that pleaded for its adoption in every Christian land.

"Quia verò sanctus Cyrillus primum cyclum ab anno Diocletiani centesimo quinquagesimo tertio coepit, et ultimum in ducesimo quadragésimo septimo terminavit, nos a ducesimo quadragésimo octavo anno ejusdem tyranni, potius quàm principis, inchoantes, noluimus circulis nostris memoriam impii et persecutoris innectere: sed magis elegimus ab incarnatione D. N. Jesu Christi annorum tempora prænotare: quatenus exordium spei nostræ notius nobis existeret: et causa reparationis humane, id est passio Redemptoris nostri, evidentius eluceret." (Migne, Patrol. lxvii. 20; comp. Hoffman's Hist. Cycl. Dion. § 10-12; ib. pp. 462-5.)

It was adopted in Italy soon after its publication: in France perhaps a century later: in this country between the 8th and 9th. Anyhow it was ordained A.D. 816, at the synod of Chelsea, that all bishops should in future date their acts from the Incarnation.

II. In his letter to bishop Stephen, to whom he dedicates his collection of canons, he admits the existence of an earlier Latin translation, whose defects he believes led to his being asked to undertake his own. Copies of this earlier version have been printed, and named, after his naming of it, Prisca versio by Justellus and others. We are not actually told by him, though his words may be held to imply, what is self-evident on comparing them, that his own was not a new, but a corrected edition of that earlier version, so far as it went. What he specifies as having been translated by himself are the 50 so-called canons of the Apostles, which stand at the head of his collection: which he admits were not universally received then. What he specifies as having been appended by himself are the Sardican and African canons, which he says were published in Latin, and with them his collection ends. The intermediate canons are those of the councils of Nicaea, Ancyra, Neo-Caesarea, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea, and Constantinople—165 canons in all—together with 27 of Chalcedon: all of them originally published in Greek: and all, with the exception of the Laodicean, already translated in the Prisca Versio. The Laodicean, it should be noted, are given in an abbreviated form, and not in full, like the rest. Again, the chronological order is interrupted to place the Nicene canons first. This collection of his as speedily displaced that of the Prisca, as his cycle displaced that of Victorius. Cassiodorus, his friend and patron, writes of it within a few years of his decease: "Quos hodie usu ecclesia Romana complectitur." He adds further: "Alia quoque multa ex Graeco transtulit in Latinam, quae utilitati possunt ecclesiasticae convenire . . . Et ut vobis in regulis fidei nulla possit nocere subscriptio, legitae quae habetis in promptu, synodum Ephesinam et Chalcedonensem, necnon et encyclica, id est, epistolas confirmationis supradicti concilii." (De Inst. Div. Litt. c. 23.) It is to be regretted that these several pieces have never yet been collected and published in a separate form: if it was only to distinguish what really belongs to Dionysius, from what has been attributed to Marius Mercator, a Scythian, and bilinguist likewise, but of inferior stamp. To say nothing of other pieces of minor interest, it seems certain from what Cassiodorus says, that Dionysius either translated or revised an earlier translation of the official documents of the 3rd and 4th Councils, as well as the canons of the 1st and 2nd.

111. Dionysius, finally, published all the decretal epistles of the popes he could discover from Siricius, who succeeded Damasus, A.D. 384, to Anastasius II., who succeeded Gelasius A.D. 496. Gelasius, he says himself, he had never seen in life: in other words, that he had never been at Rome up to Gelasius's death. By the publication of this work a death-blow was given to the false decretals of the Pseudo-Isidore, centuries before their appearance.

For this, and his frankness and integrity of purpose throughout, Dionysius has never been a favourite with the ultra-Romans, and it was an evil day for them that first saw him in print. His attestation of the true text and consequent rendering of the 6th Nicene canon they could not forgive: his translating the 9th of Chalcedon into plain Latin, after suppressing the 28th, which, as it was not passed in full council he could omit with perfect honesty, they could not understand. Worst of all, was his having been the first to give publicity to the canons against transmarine appeals in the African code, and to the stand made by the African bishops against the encroachments of pope Zosimus and his successors in the matter of Apiarius; to say nothing of the exposure of their misquotations by his previous exhibition of the Sardican canons in due form, in the language in which he avers they were published. Aloisius Vincenzi, the last writer on papal infallibility (De Sacra Monarchia, etc. 1875), is quite willing to throw overboard the Sardican canons, which he holds cheap: to be able to throw after them the African code, which is a thorn in his side. [E. S. Ff.]

DIONYSIUS (20), bishop of Ascalon, who attended the synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 536, and signed the sentence passed by Peter, bishop of Jerusalem, upon the Monophysite Anthimus (Labbe, Concil. tom. v. 286). Moschus mentions a discussion as to the validity of baptism with sand, in the absence of water, which he decided in the negative (Prat. Spirituale, c. 176; Le Quien, Oriens Christian. tom. iii. col. 600).

(21) Bishop of Selencia Pieria in the middle of the 6th century. He ordained Symeon Stylites the younger a presbyter, to gratify the wish of his disciples to receive the Eucharist at his hands. He was present at the oecumenical council of Constantinople, A.D. 553, when he gave testimony respecting Sergius bishop of Cyrus, who in his zeal for Nestorianism had placed Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodore and Diodorus of Tarsus, on the list of saints, and Nestorius himself on that of martyrs, for which acts Sergius was deposed (Labbe, Conc. tom. v. col. 417). He joined in the anathema against Theodore, Theodore, and Ibas (ib. col. 582). He is much commended in the Pratum Spirituale, c. 79 (Le Quien, Oriens Christian. tom. ii. col. 7791).

(22) Of Telmera in Caria, a writer of the 7th century. He composed a Syriac Chronicle. The Spicilegium Romanum (x. 223) contains some extracts from it on the ridiculous order of the emperor Phocas in A.D. 617, for the baptism of all the Jews. This order was carried out by the officers of Phocas and by Georgius, prefect of the province. (Ceillier, xi. 813.) [W. M. S.]

DIONYSIUS (23), an imaginary bishop of Jerusalem, who, according to Praedestinatus (i. 24), opposed the Melchisedeciani. [G. S.]

DIOPETUS, first bishop of Orleans, is said to have been represented by legates at the council of Cologne in the year 346, and to have laid the foundation of the church of St. Anianus; but many learned men doubt whether there was such a council, and the building of the church is also very doubtful. It is, however, pretty certain that Diopetus lived about the middle of the 4th century (Gall. Christ. viii. 1410).

[D. R. J.]

DIOPHANTES, correspondent of John Chrysostom; one of the four presbyters of Antioch to whom he addressed his 22nd, 62nd, 66th, 107th, 130th, and 222nd letters, in one of which praising their sufferings in defence of the truth at that town. (Joh. Chrys. Epist., Patrol. Graec. lii.; Ceillier, vii. 133.) [W. M. S.]

DIORA (DIERA, DEORA), the thirteenth bishop of Rochester. He subscribes charters from 775 to 781; he had several grants of land, which are recorded on the Textus Roffensis, especially at Bromley and in Rochester itself. (Kemble, C. D. Nos. 132, 135, cf. 143, 144; Ang. Sac. i. 331.) [S.]

DIOSCORIDES, one of three boy-martyrs of Rome. [CRESCENS.] [E. B. B.]

DIOSCORUS (1) patriarch of Alexandria, succeeded Cyril in the bishopric about midsummer, in A.D. 444, receiving consecration according to one report (Mansi, vii. 603) from two bishops only. He had served as Cyril's archdeacon. Liberatus says that he had never been married. It is difficult to harmonise the accounts given us of his character. On the one hand, Theodoret, whose testimony in its favour cannot be suspected, declared in a letter to Dioscorus, soon after his consecration, that the fame of his virtues, and particularly of his modesty and humility, was widely spread (Ep. 60); on the other hand, after he had involved himself in the Monophysite heresy, he was accused of having gravely misconducted himself in the first years of his episcopate. It was said that he had, by means of false charges, extorted money from the heirs of Cyril, in order to win popularity by lending money without interest to Alexandrian bakers and vintners, that they might "supply the people, at a low price, with the purest bread and the costliest wine" (Liberatus, Brev. c. 10; cf. Fleury, b. 27, c. 3). A deacon named Theodore complained, at the council of Chalcedon, that Dioscorus, on coming to the see, expelled him from his clerical office merely because he had been patronised by Cyril. "He made it his aim," said Theodore, "to expel from Alexandria, or even to put to death, not only the relatives, but even the friends of Cyril. He is a heretic—has all along been an Origenist" (in these words we catch an echo of the violence with which Theophilus, in St. Chrysostom's days, persecuted the Tall Brothers for the alleged offence of Origenism); "he has not kept clear of bloodshed, nor of cutting down trees, nor of incendiarianism, nor of destruction of houses; and he has all along led an infamous life, as I am ready to prove" (Mansi, vi. 1008). According to another deacon, Ischyriion, Dioscorus had laid waste property, inflicted fines and exile, bought up and sold at a high price the wheat sent by the government to Libya, appropriated and grossly misspent the money left by a lady named Peristeria for religious and charitable purposes, received women of notorious character into his house, persecuted Ischyriion as a favourite of Cyril's, ruined the little estate which was his only support, sent a "phalanx of ecclesiastics, or rather of ruffians," to put him to death, and, after his escape, again sought to murder him in a hospital; in proof of which statements Ischyriion appealed to six persons, one of whom was bath-keeper to Dioscorus (Mansi, vi. 1012). According to a priest named Athanasius, Cyril's nephew, Dioscorus, from the outset of his episcopate ("which he obtained one knows not how," says the petitioner), harassed him and his brother by using influence with the court, so that the brother died of distress, and Athanasius, with his aunts, sister-in-law, and nephews, were bereft of their homes by the patriarch's malignity. He himself was deposed, without any trial, from the priesthood, and became, perforce, a wanderer for years. According to a layman named Sophronius, Dioscorus hindered the execution of an imperial order which Sophronius had obtained for the redress of a grievous wrong. "The country," he said, "belonged to him rather than to the sovereigns" (τῶν κρατούντων). Sophronius averred that legal evidence was forthcoming to prove that Dioscorus had usurped, in Egypt, the authority belonging to the emperor. He added that Dioscorus had taken away his clothes and property, and compelled him to flee for his life; and he charged him, further, with adultery and blasphemy (Mansi, vi. 1029). Accusations of this sort were made with so much readiness in that age—as the life of St. Athanasius himself indicates—that some deduction must needs be made from charges brought against Dioscorus in the hour of his adversity, and that wrongs done by his agents may have been in some cases unfairly called his acts. Still, it is but too likely that there was sufficient truth in these denunciations to demonstrate the evil effects on his character of elevation to a post of almost absolute power; for such, in those days, was the great "evangelical throne." We find him, before the end of his first year, in correspondence with pope Leo the Great, who did not miss the opportunity of giving directions, as from the see of St. Peter, to the new successor of St. Mark. He wrote, on June 21st, 445, to Dioscorus, that "it would be shocking (nefas) to believe that St. Mark formed his rules for Alexandria otherwise than on the Petrine model;" therefore, what we know to have been observed by "our fathers we wish (voluntas) to be retained by you also," as to holding ordinations early on Sunday morning, and not at any other time, and repeating the eucharistic celebration on great festivals, in the church, as often as a fresh congregation might make it necessary (Ep. 11).

In 447 Dioscorus appears among those who were intimating their suspicion of the theological character of Theodoret, who had in the preceding controversy been so much mixed up with the party of Nestorius. It was rumoured that the bishop of Cyrrhos, preaching at Antioch, had practically taught Nestorianism; and this charge came to the ears of Dioscorus by means, says Theodoret, of "some three or four, or at the most fifteen, persons." The bishop of Alexandria, who, whatever might be his personal feeling as against Cyril's favourites, deemed himself the lawful inheritor, so to speak, of Cyril's position as guardian of anti-Nestorian orthodoxy, wrote to Dominus, bishop of Antioch, Theodoret's patriarch, to state what he had heard; whereupon Theodoret wrote to him in remonstrance (Ep. 83): "I was pained (excuse me, my lord, if my sorrow forces me to speak) that your godly excellence did not keep one of your ears inviolate" (from calumny). He went on to express his belief, in orthodox language; referred to Theophilus and Cyril as sanctioning the doctrine of two natures in the incarnate person of Christ; observed that "Cyril of blessed memory had often written" to him (a statement, by the way, which goes some way towards proving the spuriousness of the offensive letter about Cyril's death, which has been attributed to him), and had even desired John of Antioch to shew to him, among other Eastern theologians, certain of his own writings; whereupon, he added, "I read and admired them, and wrote to Cyril, who replied to me, bearing witness to my doctrinal accuracy and my good will." The letter ended by an anathema against all who should deny the holy Virgin to be Theotocos, call Jesus a mere man, or divide the one Son into two, and by a request that Dioscorus would pray for him and write back to him. Dioscorus did write back, but in no friendly tone; he assumed the truth of the charge against Theodoret, as if it had been proved by torture (Theod. Ep. 86). Theodoret rejoined in "gentle terms," but in vain. Dioscorus allowed Theodoret's enemies to anathematise him in open church, and even rose from his throne to echo the malediction; and, Theodoret adds, insisted on the dignity of the throne of St. Mark, as if Antioch did not possess "the throne of the great Peter." It appears also from this letter of Theodoret to Flavian of Constantinople, that Dioscorus frequently inveighed against the Eastern bishops for having accepted a letter of Proclus (whom Flavian had recently succeeded), and thereby compromised the rights of the sees of Antioch and Alexandria. At the same time, Dioscorus thought it well to send some bishops to Constantinople by way of supporting his quarrel with Theodoret.

So stood matters when, in the November of 448, the aged Eutycheus, an archimandrite of Constantinople, and a vehement enemy of Nestorianisers, who had recently written to pope Leo, and received from him a reply, on the subject of the revival of Nestorianism (Leo, Ep. 20), was arraigned before a council, of which Flavian was president, on the ground of maintaining an opposite error. He clung tenaciously to the phrase, "one incarnate nature of God the Word," which Cyril had used on the authority of St. Athanasius; but neglected the qualifications and explanations by which Cyril had guarded his meaning. Thus, by refusing to admit that Christ, as incarnate, had "two natures" (although he was brought to own that, as man, Christ was "coessential with us," and freely confessed that He was "made perfect man"), Eutyches appeared to his judges to have revived, in effect, the Apollinarian heresy—to have denied the distinctness and verity of Christ's manhood; and was thereupon deprived of his priestly office, and put under excommunication. He whispered to Florentius, the "patriarchian," after the council had broken up, "I appeal to the Roman, the Egyptian, and the Hierosolymitan councils" (Mansi, vi. 817). His patron, and Flavian's enemy, the emperor's chamberlain, Chrysaphius, applied to Dioscorus for aid: he would support him in all his designs, if he would take up the cause of Eutyches against Flavian (Niceph. xiv. 47). Eutyches himself wrote to Dioscorus, asking him "to examine his cause" (Liberat. c. 12), and Dioscorus, as officially zealous against all anti-Cyrrilline tendencies in theology, and also, doubtless, as nothing loth to strike a blow against the see of Constantinople, wrote to the emperor, urging him to call a general council, in which Flavian's judgment might be reviewed. Theodosius, influenced by his wife and his chamberlain—not by his sister Pulcheria—issued letters (March 30th, 449), ordering that each of the chief prelates (patriarchs, as we may call them, and exarchs) should repair with a certain number of their dependent bishops to Ephesus by the 1st day of August next (Mansi, vi. 587). On May 15 he wrote again, directing that an archimandrite, Barsumas, should sit in the council as representing all the Eastern archimandrites (ib. vi. 593), and in a third letter, premising that some Nestorianisers were trying to get Theodoret invited to the council (contrary to his intentions), he conferred on Dioscorus the presidency of the council (Mansi, vi. 600).

This council of evil memory—on which Leo afterwards fastened the name of "Latrocinium," or gang of robbers—met on August 8, 449, in St. Mary's church at Ephesus, the scene of the third general council's meeting in 431. The bishops present were 150 in number. Dioscorus presided, and next to him Julian, or Julius, the representative of the "most holy bishop of the Roman church," then Juvenal of Jerusalem, Domnus of Antioch, and—his lowered position indicating what was to come—Flavian of Constantinople (Mansi, vi. 607). The respective bishops had their notaries or clerks to take down the proceedings: and it was afterwards affirmed that the clerks of Dioscorus had cheated those of the bishop of Ephesus, had rubbed out their notes and wrenched away their inkstands (Mansi, vi. 621). Dioscorus is said to have peremptorily asked the bishop of Smyrna after his arrival at Ephesus, why he had signed the sentence against Eutyches? "I signed," said the frightened prelate, "what they offered me" (Mansi, vi. 689). The archbishop of Alexandria, in fact, shewed himself throughout a committed partisan. He did indeed propose the acceptance of Leo's letter to the council, a letter written at the same time as, and expressly referring to, the famous "Tome," a doctrinal letter to Flavian which, Tillemont thinks (xv. 559) was presented along with it (Leo, Ep. 44); he is said to have "sworn seven times" that it should be read; but it was only handed in, not read, Juvenal moving that another imperial letter should be read and recorded. The president then intimated that the council's business was not to frame a new doctrinal formulary, but to inquire whether what had lately appeared—meaning, the statements of Flavian and Eusebius on the one hand, those of Eutyches on the other—were accordant with the decisions of the councils of Nicaea and Ephesus,— "two councils in name," said he, "but one in faith. The Holy Spirit sat in those assemblies (συνήδρευσε); therefore whoever unsettles their decisions, makes void His grace." The council answered by plaudits—"Guardian of the Faith!" (Mansi, vi. 628). Eutyches was then introduced, and made his statement, beginning "I commend myself to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and the true verdict of your justice." After he had finished his address, Flavian desired that Eusebius, who had been his accuser, should be called in and heard. Elpidius, the imperial commissioner, vetoed this proposal on the ground that the judges of Eutyches were now to be judged, and that his accuser had already fulfilled his task, "and, as he thought, successfully:" to let him speak now would be a cause of mere disturbance (Mansi, vi. 645). This view of the case, however inconsistent with ordinary judicial instincts, was supported by Dioscorus. Flavian was baffled, and the council resolved to hear the acts of the synod of Constantinople which had condemned Eutyches. The episcopal deputy of Leo, with his companion the deacon Hilarus, urged that "the pope's letter" (probably including the "Tome" in this proposal) "should be read first, but this was overruled; Eutyches openly expressed his suspicion that Julius and Hilarus had been tampered with by Flavian; Dioscorus moved that the "acts" should be first read, and then the letter of the bishop of Rome. The reading began (Mansi, vi. 649). At one point Eustathius of Berytus interrupted the reader by observing that Cyril's letter to John of Antioch must be interpreted by his language on "one nature incarnate." (Mansi, vi. 676.) When the passage was reached in which Basil of Seleucia and Seleucus of Amasia had said that the one Christ was in two natures after the incarnation, a storm of wrath broke out. "Let no one call the Lord 'two' after the union! Do not divide the undivided! Seleucus was not bishop of Amasia! This is Nestorianism." "Be quiet for a little," said Dioscorus, "let us hear some more blasphemies. Why are we to blame Nestorius only? There are many Nestoriuses." (Mansi, vi. 685.) The bishop of Smyrna objected to the report of his words as given in the acts. The reading proceeded as far as Eusebius's question to Eutyches, "Do you own two natures after the incarnation?" Then arose another storm: "The holy synod exclaimed, 'Away with Eusebius, burn him, let him be burnt alive! Let him be cut in two,—be divided, even as he divided!'" "Can you endure," asked Dioscorus, "to hear of two natures after the incarnation?" "Anathema to him that says it!" was the reply. "I have need of your voices and your hands too," rejoined Dioscorus; "if any one cannot shout, let him stretch out his hand." Another anathema rang out. (Mansi, vi. 737.) Another passage, containing a statement of belief by Eutyches, was heard with applause. "We accept this statement," said Dioscorus. "This is the faith of the fathers," exclaimed the bishops. "Of what faith do you say this?" asked Dioscorus. "Of Eutyches": for Eusebius is impious" (ἀσεβής, Mansi, vi. 740). Similar approbation was given to another passage containing the characteristic formula of Eutychianism: "I confess that our Lord was of two natures before the incarnation; but after the incarnation (i.e. in Him as incarnate) I confess one nature." "We all agree to this," said Dioscorus. "We agree," said the council (Mansi, vi. 744). Presently came a sentence in which Basil of Seleucia had denounced the denial of two natures after the incarnation as equivalent to the assertion of a commixture and a fusion. This aroused once more the zealots of the Alexandrian party; one bishop sprang forward, shouting, "This upsets the whole church:" the Egyptians, and the monks led by Barsumas, cried out, "Cut him in two, who says two natures! he is a Nestorian!" Basil's nerves gave way; he lost, as he afterwards said, his perceptions, bodily and mental (Mansi, vi. 636). He began to say that he did not remember whether he had uttered the obnoxious words, but that he had meant to say, "If you do not add the word 'incarnate' to 'nature' as Cyril did, the phrase 'one nature' implies a fusion." Juvenal asked whether his words had been wrongly reported; he answered helplessly, "I do not recollect." (Mansi, vi. 748.) He seems to have been coerced into a formal retraction of the phrase "two natures;" but he added "hypostases" as explanatory of "natures," and professed to "adore the one nature of the Godhead of the Only-begotten, who was made man and incarnate." (Mansi, vi. 828.) Eutyches declared that the acts of the Constantinopolitan synod had been tampered with. "It is false," said Flavian. "If Flavian," said Dioscorus, "knows any thing which supports his opinion, let him put it in writing." Flavian answered, "You have debarred me from making any just allegation." Dioscorus answered that he had done nothing of the kind: "No one hinders you, and the council knows it." "We want you to speak," said the bishop of Ancyra. "Even now," said Juvenal, "let him say whatever he wishes." Flavian then said that the acts had been scrutinised, and no falsification had been found in them; that, for himself, he had always glorified God by holding what he then held. Dioscorus called on the bishops to give their verdict as to the theological statements of Eutyches. They did so, acquitting him of all unsoundness, as faithful to Nicene and Ephesian teaching. Domnus expressed regret for having mistakenly condemned him. (Mansi, vi. 836.) Basil of Seleucia spoke like the rest. Flavian, of course, was silent. Dioscorus spoke last, affirming the judgments of the council, and "adding his own opinion:" the result was that Eutyches was "restored" to his presbyteral rank and his abbatial dignity. (Mansi, vi. 861.) His monks were then released from the excommunication which they had incurred at Constantinople. The doctrinal decisions of the Ephesian council of 431, in its first and sixth sessions, were then read. Dioscorus proposed that these decisions, with those of Nicaea, should be recognised as an unalterable standard of orthodoxy: that whoever should say or think otherwise, or should unsettle them, should be put under censure. "Let each one of you speak his mind on this." Several bishops assented. Hilarus, the Roman deacon, testified that the apostolic see revered those decisions, and that its letter, if read, would prove this. No attention was paid to this suggestion. Onesiphorus, bishop of Iconium, whispered to the prelates who sat nearest to him that this decree was simply intended to promote the deposition of Flavian. "God forbid!" replied Epiphanius of Perga; "if any one is to feel the indignation of Dioscorus, it will be Eusebius. No one will be so mad as to attempt such a thing against Flavian." (Mansi, vi. 829.) But Onesiphorus was right. Dioscorus called in some secretaries, who brought forward a draft of a sentence of deposition against Flavian and Eusebius. The ground taken was, that the Ephesian council had enacted severe penalties against any one who should frame or propose any other creed than the Nicene. Flavian and Eusebius were declared to have constructively committed this offence by "unsettling almost everything, and causing scandal and confusion throughout the churches." The practical conclusion was, that they must be deposed. (Mansi, vi. 907.) When this document had been read, Flavian said briefly, "I decline your jurisdiction:" (one does not see, Tillemont observes, why he did not say so earlier). Hilarus uttered one word in his own tongue,—contradicitur. Onesiphorus, with some others, went up to Dioscorus, clasped his feet and knees as in supplication, and passionately entreated him not to go to such extremities. "No, by the feet of your Piety! he has done nothing worthy of deposition . . . if he deserves condemnation, let him be condemned . . . You have priests of your own, you will not for a priest's sake condemn a bishop." "Do not," said Basil, "condemn what the whole world thinks." "It must be," said Dioscorus in answer; "if my tongue were to be cut out for it I would still say so." They persisted, and he lost all self-command: starting from his throne, he stood up on the footstool so as to dominate the whole assembly by his voice and presence: "Are you getting up a sedition? where are the counts?" Military officers, soldiers with swords and sticks, even the proconsul with chains, entered at his call. He peremptorily commanded that the bishops should sign the sentence, and with a fierce gesture of the hand exclaimed, "He that does not choose to sign must reckon with me." A scene of terrorism followed. Those prelates who were reluctant to take part in the deposition of Flavian and Eusebius were threatened with exile, beaten by the soldiers, denounced as heretics by the partisans of Dioscorus, and by the crowd of fanatical monks (Mansi, vii. 68) who accompanied Barsumas, until they put their names, one after another, to a blank paper on which the sentence was to be written out; fifteen, who held out longest, were kept in the sacristy of the church until evening (Mansi, vi. 601 sq. 625, 637, 988). They afterwards protested that they had signed under terror and compulsion. Basil of Seleucia declared that he had given way because he was "given over to the judgment of 120 or 130 bishops; had he been dealing with magistrates, he would have suffered martyrdom." "The Egyptians," says Tillemont, "who signed willingly enough, did so after the others had been made to sign" (xv. 571; cf. Mansi, vi. 601).

Flavian's own fate was the special tragedy of the Latrocinium. He had lodged in the hands of the Roman delegates a formal appeal to the pope and the Western bishops (not to the pope alone; see Leo, Ep. 43, Tillemont, xv. 374). It was nearly his last act. He was brutally treated, kicked and beaten, by the agents of Dioscorus, and even, we are told, by Dioscorus himself. (See Evagr. i. 1; Niceph. xiv. 47.) Barsumas, it is said, stood over him and cried, "Stab him" (Mansi, vii. 68). The blows and kicks which he received were not immediately fatal; he was thrown into prison, and then sent into exile, but died while in the hands of his guards, from the effect of his injuries, three days after his deposition. "Dolore plagarum," says Liberatus, Brev. 19, "migravit ad Dominum," August 11, 449. He was regarded as a martyr for the doctrine of "the two natures in the one person" of Christ. (See Alban Butler, Lives of Saints, Feb. 17.) Anatolius, who had been the agent (apocrisiarius) of Dioscorus at Constantinople, was appointed his successor.

Dioscorus, desiring to obtain the acquiescence of Hilarus, tried to frighten him into attending a second session of the council. But the sturdy deacon (as he himself tells the story in a letter to Pulcheria, Leo, Ep. 46) succeeded in getting away from Ephesus and came "per incognita et invia loca" to Rome. Julius appears to have been less conspicuously steadfast, but to have refused assent to the deposition (Leo, Ep. 48). Dioscorus and his council—as we may well call it—proceeded to depose Theodoret and several other bishops; "many," says Leo, "were expelled from their sees, and banished, because they would not accept heresy." (Ep. 93.) Theodoret was put under a special ban. "They ordered me," he writes (Ep. 140), "to be excluded from shelter, from water, from everything." "The feeble Domnus of Antioch gained nothing by having retracted his former condemnation of Eutyches; he too was deposed, and Maximus was substituted for him by Anatolius (Leo, Ep. 104) without any decree of the clergy or people of Antioch." (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 723.) But as Leo and the council of Chalcedon afterwards recognised him (Domnus, probably, making no claim for himself), it was said in that council that his appointment was the only act of "the so-called synod"—the Latrocinium—which could be regarded as valid (Mansi, vii. 257).

The "confusion and scandal," if we may so apply Dioscorus's words in Flavian's case, which now pervaded the Eastern churches, and which might be summed up in Tillemont's phrase, "Dioscore règne partout" (xv. 589), led necessarily to efforts for a new oecumenical council. It was impossible to acquiesce in the proceedings of the "Latrocinium." Leo bestirred himself to get such a council held in Italy: the imperial family in the West supported his request, but Theodosius persisted in upholding the late council. It was in the spring of 450 that Dioscorus took a new step, which was regarded as exceptionally audacious; being at Nicæa, on his way to the court, he caused ten bishops whom he had brought with him from Egypt on this second journey, to sign a document excommunicating pope Leo (Mansi, vi. 1009, 1148; vii. 104), doubtless on the ground that Leo was endeavouring to quash the canonical decisions of a legitimate council. His cause however was ruined when the orthodox Pulcheria succeeded to the empire on the death of her brother, and gave her hand to Marcian; this event opened the way to the assembling of a new council at Chalcedon on the 8th of October, 451.

Dioscorus is named fourth among the bishops who attended. The deputies of Leo, as representing, come first, then Anatolius, then Dioscorus, then Maximus and Juvenal. At the outset of the proceedings, Dioscorus sat first among those bishops who were placed on the right hand of the chancel. (Mansi, vi. 580.) The Roman deputies came forward from their places on the opposite side, and desired in the name of Leo, and in virtue of his instructions, that Dioscorus should not sit in the council, but should forthwith go out. The magistrates, who acted as imperial commissioners (and were the effective presidents), asked what was charged against him? Paschasinus, the chief Roman delegate, answered, "When he comes in" (i.e. after having first gone out) "it will be necessary to state objections against him." The magistrates desired again to hear the charge. Lucentius, another delegate, said, "He has presumed to hold a synod without leave of the apostolic see, which has never been done." (Rome did not recognise the "second general council" of 381; which, in fact, was not then owned as general.) "We cannot," said Paschasinus, "transgress the apostolic pope's orders." "We cannot," added Lucentius, "allow such a wrong as that this man should sit in the council, who is come to be judged." "If you claim to judge," replied the magistrates sharply, "do not be accuser too." Then, instead of ordering Dioscorus to go out, they bade him sit in the middle by himself, and the Roman deputies sat down and said no more. Eusebius of Dorylaeum came forward and asked to be heard against Dioscorus. "I have been injured by him: the faith has been injured; Flavian was killed, after he and I had been unjustly deposed by Dioscorus. Command my petition to the emperors to be read." "Let it be read," said the magistrates. Eusebius sat down in the middle, near Dioscorus; his petition was read by Beronicianus, the secretary of the imperial consistory. It was to this effect: "at the recent council at Ephesus, this good (χρηστός) Dioscorus, disregarding justice, and supporting Eutyches in heresy,—having also gained power by bribes, and assembled a disorderly multitude, did all he could to ruin the Catholic faith, and to establish the heresy of Eutyches, and condemned us; I desire, therefore, that he be called to account, and that the records of his proceedings against us be examined." Dioscorus, preserving his self-possession, answered, "The synod was held by the emperor's order; I too desire that its acts against Flavian may be read." "This is my request too," repeated Eusebius. But Dioscorus added, "I beg that the doctrinal question be first considered." "No," said the magistrates, "the charge against you must first be met; wait until the acts have been read, as you yourself desired." The letter of Theodosius, convoking the late council, was read. The magistrates then ordered that Theodoret should be brought in, because Leo had "restored to him his episcopate," and the emperor had ordered him to attend the council. He entered accordingly. The Egyptians and some other bishops shouted, "Turn out the teacher of Nestorius!" Others rejoined, "We signed a blank paper; we were beaten, and so made to sign. Turn out the enemies of Flavian and of the faith!" "Why," asked Dioscorus, "should Cyril be ejected?" (i.e. virtually, by the admission of Theodoret.) His adversaries turned fiercely upon him: "Turn out Dioscorus the homicide!" Ultimately the magistrates ruled that Theodoret should sit down, but in the middle of the assembly, and that his admission should not prejudice any charge that might be brought against him. The storm, however, was not abated until the magistrates said, in grave reproof, "These outcries do not befit bishops, nor help either side. Allow everything to be done in due order." (Mansi, vi. 592.) The reading went on; at the letter giving Dioscorus the presidency, he remarked that Juvenal, and Thalassius of Caesarea, were associated with him, that the synod had gone with him, and that Theodosius had confirmed its decrees. Forthwith, a cry arose from the bishops whom he had intimidated at Ephesus. "Not one of us signed voluntarily. We were overawed by soldiers." Their attendant clerics swelled this cry; and the Egyptians answered, "These men signed before we did; this is a council of bishops, not of clerics; turn out those who have no place here" (τοὺς περισσοῦς). Stephen of Ephesus told how insolently the friends of Eutyches had treated him. Thalassius pleaded that he had urged moderation. Another bishop described the scene of coercion. The Egyptians scornfully interrupted: "A Christian, a Catholic, fears no one." Dioscorus coolly said that if the bishops had not understood the merits of the case, they ought not to have signed. The reading was resumed. Flavian being named, his friends asked why he had been degraded to the fifth place? and further altercation followed as to whether the "screaming" came from the clerks of Dioscorus—who, he said, were but two,—or from others. "Read on," said the magistrates. The next interruption was in reference to the suppression, at the Latrocinium, of Leo's letter. Aetius, archdeacon of Constantinople, said it had not even been "received." "But," said Dioscorus, "the acts shew that I proposed that it should be read. Let others say why it was not read." "What others?" "Juvenal and Thalassius." "No, answer for yourself." "I have said already that I proposed that it should be read." Juvenal, on being questioned, said, "The chief notary told us that he had an imperial letter; I answered that it ought to come first; no one afterwards said that he had in his hands a letter from Leo." Thalassius (evidently a weak man, though holding the great see of St. Basil) said that he had not power, of himself, to order the reading of the letter (Mansi, vi. 617). At another point, the "Orientals," the opponents of Dioscorus, objected to the way in which the acts of Ephesus had represented their words. "We did not say that." Dioscorus replied, "Each bishop had his own secretaries: I had mine; Juvenal had his, &c. There were many other secretaries of bishops, taking down the speeches." Stephen of Ephesus then narrated the violence done to his secretaries; Acacias of Ariarathia described the coercion-scene. When the reader came to Dioscorus's words, "I examine the decrees of the fathers" (councils), Eusebius said, "See, he said, 'I examine;' and I do the same." Dioscorus caught him up: "I said, 'examine,' not 'innovate.' Our Saviour bade us examine the Scriptures; that is not innovating." "He said, Seek and ye shall find," retorted Eusebius (Mansi, vi. 629). One bishop objected to the record of "Guardian of the faith" as an acclamation in honour of Dioscorus, "No one said that." "They want to deny all that is confessed to be the fact," said Dioscorus; "let them next say they were not there." At the words of Eutyches, "I have observed the definitions of the council," i.e., the Ephesian decree against adding to the Nicene faith, Eusebius broke in on the reading: "He lied! There is no such definition, no canon prescribing this." "There are four copies," said Dioscorus calmly, "which contain it. What bishops have defined, is it not a definition? It is not a canon: a canon is a different thing." The bishop of Cyzicus referred to the additions made in the council of 381, to the original Nicene creed (e.g. "of the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary"). The Egyptians disclaimed all such additions. (Cyril, in fact, had never acknowledged that revised version of the Nicene formulary.) There was some further criticism of the profession of faith made by Eutyches; whereupon Dioscorus said, and the words are to be remembered, "If Eutyches has any heterodox opinion, he deserves not only to be punished, but to be burnt! My only object is to preserve the Catholic faith, not that of any man. I look to God, and not to any individual; I care for nothing but my own soul and the right faith" (Mansi, vi. 633). Basil of Seleucia described what had taken place as regarded his own statements. "If you taught in such a Catholic tone," said the magistrates, "why did you sign the deposition of Flavian?" Basil, as we have seen, pleaded the compulsory authority of a council of bishops. "See," said Dioscorus, "you are condemned out of your own mouth; on your own shewing, you betrayed the faith for fear of men." Others who had given way with Basil cried out piteously, "We all sinned; we all ask pardon." "But," said the magistrates, "you said at first that you had been forced to sign a blank paper." The "peccavimus" was reiterated (Mansi, vi. 639). When the reader came to the failure of Flavian's attempt to get Eusebius a hearing, Dioscorus threw the responsibility on Elpidius: so did Juvenal; the unfortunate Thalassius only said, "It was not my doing." "Such a defence," said the magistrates, "is no defence when the faith is concerned." "If," said Dioscorus, "you blame me for obeying Elpidius, were no rules broken when Theodoret was brought in?" "He came in as accuser." "Why then does he now sit in the rank of a bishop?" "He and Eusebius sit as accusers," was the answer; "and you sit as accused" (Mansi, vi. 649). Afterwards the magistrates recurred to this topic: "Eusebius, at Constantinople, when he was accusing Eutyches, himself asked that Eutyches should be present. Why was not a like course taken at Ephesus?" No one answered (Mansi, vi. 656). Further on, after Cyril's letter to John of An-tioc, "Laetentur coeli," had been read as part of the acts of Ephesus. the bishops of Illyricum cried out, "We believe as Cyril did! Cyril's memory is eternal!" Theodoret, by way of clearing himself, anathematised the assertion of "two Sons." All the bishops—so the acts of Chalcedon say expressly—cried out, "We believe as did Cyril; we did so believe, and we do. Anathema to whoever does not so believe." The opponents of Dioscorus then claimed Flavian as in fact of one mind with Cyril, as clear of Nestorianism. The "Easterns" added, "Leo believes so, Anatolius believes so." There was one universal protestation of agreement with Cyril; the very magistrates joined in the shouting, and answered, as it were, for Marcian and Pulcheria. Then came a fierce outcry against Dioscorus, his opponents having thus, as they thought, established their own orthodoxy. "Out with the murderer of Flavian—the parricide!" His suffragans tried to mend matters by a loyal shout, "Many years to the senate, to the emperors!" The magistrates asked, "Why then did you receive to communion Eutyches, who holds the opposite to this belief? why condemn Flavian and Eusebius, who agree with it?" "The records," answered Dioscorus, "will shew the truth." Presently, in regard to some words of Eustathius of Berytus, adopting Cyril's phrase, "one incarnate nature," as Athanasian, the Easterns cried, "Eutyches thinks thus, so does Dioscorus." Dioscorus replied in words which shewed that he was careful to disclaim, even with anathema, all notions of a "confusion, or commixture," of Godhead and manhood in Christ. The magistrates asked whether the canonical letters of Cyril, recently read (i.e. his second letter to Nestorius, Mansi vi. 660, and his letter to John, ib. 665, not including the third letter to Nestorius, to which the 12 anathemas were annexed) bore out the language cited as from Eustathius, Eustathius himself stepped forth into the midst of the church, and held up the book from which he had taken Cyril's language. "If I spoke amiss, here is the manuscript: let it be anathematised with me!" He repeated Cyril's letter to Acacius by heart, and then explained: "One nature" did not exclude the flesh of Christ, which was co-essential with us; and "two natures" was a heterodox phrase if (i.e. only if) it was used for a "division" of His person. "Why then did you depose Flavian?" "I erred" (Mansi, v. 677). Flavian's own statement, that Christ was of two natures after the incarnation, in one hypostasis and one person, &c., was then considered; several bishops, in turn, approved of it, including Paschasinus, Anatolius, Maximus, Thalassius, Eustathius. The Easterns called "archbishop Flavian" a martyr. "Let his next words be read," said Dioscorus; "you will find that he is inconsistent with himself." At this point Juvenal, who had been sitting on the right side, went over to the left, and the Easterns welcomed him. Peter of Corinth, a young bishop, did the same, owning that Flavian held with Cyril; the Easterns exclaimed, "Peter thinks as does" (St.) "Peter." Other bishops spoke similarly. Dioscorus, undaunted by seeing them go over from right to left, said, "The reason why Flavian was condemned was plainly this, that he asserted two natures after the incarnation. I have passages from the fathers, Athanasius, Gregory, Cyril, to the effect that after the incarnation there were not two natures, but one incarnate nature of the Word. If I am to be expelled, the fathers will be expelled with me. I am defending their doctrine: I do not deviate from them at all: I have not got these extracts carelessly, I have verified them." (Mansi, vi. 684. On this see the note in Oxf. ed. of Fleury, vol. iii. p. 348.) After more reading, he said, "I accept the phrase 'of two natures,' but I do not accept 'two'" (i.e. he would not say, "Christ has now two natures"). "I am obliged to speak boldly (ἀναισχυρεῖν); I am speaking for my own soul." Being accused of putting Eusebius in peril of his life, he replied that he would answer that to God. "Nay, but to the laws also; why else have I come here? why have you come, if not to meet charges?" "Was Flavian," asked Paschasinus, "allowed such freedom of speech as this man takes?" "No," said the magistrates, significantly, "but then this council is being carried on with justice" (Mansi, vi. 692). Some time later, the Easterns denied that the whole council at Ephesus had assented to Eutyches's language; it was the language of "that Pharaoh, Dioscorus the homicide." Eustathius, wishing, he said, to promote a good understanding, asked whether "two natures" meant "two divided natures." "No," said Basil, "neither divided nor confused" (Mansi, vi. 744). Basil afterwards, with Onesiphorus, described the coercion used as to the signatures (Mansi, vi. 827). The reading went on until it was necessary to light the candles (Mansi, vi. 901), at last they came to the signatures; then the magistrates proposed that as the deposition had been proved to be unjust, Dioscorus, Juvenal, Thalassius, Eusebius of An-cyra, Eustathius, and Basil, as having been of chief authority in the late synod, should be deposed; but this, it appears (Mansi, vi. 976, 1041), was a provisional sentence, to be further considered by the council. It was received with applause, "A just sentence! Christ has deposed Dioscorus! God has vindicated the martyrs!" The magistrates desired that each of the bishops should give in a carefully-framed statement of belief conformable to the Nicene "exposition," to that of the 150 fathers (of Constantinople, in 381), to the canonical epistles and expositions of the fathers, Gregory, Basil, Athanasius, Hilary, Ambrose, and Cyril's two canonical epistles published and confirmed in the first Ephesian council, adding that Leo had written a letter to Flavian against Eutyches. So ended the first session (Mansi, vi. 935).

The second session was held October 10 (Mansi, vi. 937); Dioscorus was absent. After some discussion as to making an exposition of faith, which led to the reading of the creed in its two forms—both of which were accepted—and of Cyril's "two canonical epistles," and of Leo's letter to Flavian (the Tome), which was greeted with "Peter has spoken by Leo; Cyril taught thus; Leo and Cyril have taught alike," but to parts of which some objection was taken by one bishop, and time given for consideration, the usual exclamations were made, among which we find that of the Illyrians, "Restore Dioscorus to the synod, to the churches! We have all offended, let all be forgiven!" On the other hand, the enemies of Dioscorus called out for his banishment, and the clerics of Constantinople said that he who communicated with him was a Jew (Mansi, vi. 976). In the third session, Saturday, Oct. 13, the magistrates not being present, a memorial to the council from Eusebius of Dorylaeum, setting forth his charges against Dioscorus, was read (Mansi, vi. 985). It then appeared that Dioscorus had been summoned, like other bishops, to the session; and had sent word that he was willing to come, but that his guards prevented him. Two priests were thereupon sent to search for him, but he could not be found in the precincts of the church. Three bishops were then sent, with a notary. They found him and said to him, "The holy council begs your Holiness to attend its meeting." "I am under guard," said he; "I am hindered by the officers" (magistrariani, the subordinates of the "master of the offices," or "supreme magistrate of the palace," see Gibbon, ii. 326). At last, after consideration, he said he would not come unless the magistrates were present; if they were to be present, he would come and reply to Eusebius. This being reported in council, Eusebius said that Dioscorus (who is still called "the most pious bishop") was resorting to evasion. A second synodical summons was then sent by the hands of three other bishops. He pleaded that he was not well, and that he must stipulate for the presence of the magistrates; he had requested the emperor to grant this. "But," said the envoys, "this is a canonical question that is raised, and laymen have no business with it. To put off coming is to strengthen your accusers." "Let other bishops," said Dioscorus, "come with me; Eusebius attacks what we did in common." "No, he accuses you individually." When the envoys returned, the council resolved to hear the petitions framed against Dioscorus by the persons referred to, at the beginning of this article, as having complained of him (Mansi, vi. 1005). Then a third summons was sent to Dioscorus; but he positively and finally refused to come. He had nothing more to say than what he had said to former envoys. They begged him to reconsider it. "If your Holiness knows that you can answer the charges of Eusebius, and of those who have to-day presented charges against you, come and rid God's holy church of a blot." "The Catholic church," said Dioscorus sternly, "has no blot; God forbid!" "But if your Holiness knows that you are falsely accused, the council is not far off; do take the trouble to come, and refute the falsehood." "What I have said, I have said; it is enough." They desisted, and reported their failure. "What will your Holiness do?" asked Paschasius, addressing the council. "Do you order that we proceed to ecclesiastical penalties against him?" "Yes, we agree." One bishop said bitterly, "When he murdered holy Flavian, he did not adduce canons, nor proceed by church forms." "Again I ask," said Paschasius, as chief president, "what is your pleasure?" "Whatever your Holiness pleases," said Maximus: "we will vote with you." Whereupon the Roman delegates proposed a sentence, to this effect: "Dioscorus has received Eutyches, though duly condemned by Flavian, into communion. The apostolic see excuses those who were coerced by Dioscorus at Ephesus, but who are obedient to archbishop Leo" (as president) "and the council;

but this man glories in his crime. He prevented Leo's letter to Flavian—(the acts of Ephesus say the letter to the council, v. supra) from being read. He has presumed to excommunicate Leo. He has thrice refused to come and answer to charges. Therefore Leo, by us and the council, together with St. Peter, the rock of the church, deprives him of episcopal and sacerdotal dignity" (Mansi, vi. 1045). Anatolius, Maximus, and the others, expressed their agreement. A letter was written to Dioscorus, announcing that he was deposed for disregarding the canons and disobeying the council; his clerics, in attendance on him, received information to the same effect, and were bidden to take charge of the property of the Alexandrian church until a bishop could be appointed. Dioscorus at first made light of the sentence, and said that he should soon be restored; the council, hearing of this, put forth a declaration that the sentence was irrevocable. They wrote to the two emperors, reciting his misdeeds: (1) he had hindered Leo's letter to Flavian from being read at Ephesus; (2) he had restored the heterodox and justly deposed Eutyches to his office, in contempt of Leo's letter on Eutyches's case; (3) he had done injury to Eusebius; (4) he had received to communion persons lawfully condemned; (5) he had endeavoured to excommunicate Leo himself; (6) he had disobeyed the citations of the council (Mansi, vi. 1097). There is little more to be told. The deposition of Dioscorus was confirmed by the emperor; he was banished to Gangra in Paphlagonia, and died there in 454. Proterius, archpriest of Alexandria, who adhered to the council of Chalcedon, was placed in the see of St. Mark, but never gained the good will of his people as a body; they regarded Dioscorus, though de facto deposed, as their legitimate patriarch; and his deposition inaugurated the great schism which to this day has divided the Christians of Egypt, the majority of whom, bearing the name of Jacobites, have always disowned the council of Chalcedon, and venerated Dioscorus as "their teacher" (Lit. Copt. St. Basil), and as a persecuted saint (see Neale, Hist. Alex. ii. 6). As to his theological position, there is, perhaps, little or nothing in his own words—even including those which Le Quien cites as decisive against him—which might not be so interpreted as to be consistent with orthodoxy. He might have rejected the formula, "two natures after the incarnation," not only as then deficient in authority, but as, to his mind, suggestive of Nestorianism; he might not, after all, have advisedly rejected the great doctrine which since 451 it has enshrined, i. e., that the Son of God, as personally incarnate, exists in two distinct spheres of being. He might have sympathised with Eutyches for his fidelity to a dictum of Cyril; and knowing, as he well did, the manifold persistency of Nestorianisers, he might have been honestly anxious lest Cyril's work should be undone; lest the belief in the one Christ, God and Man, should be virtually superseded by the notion of a close alliance between two Christs. But it is not his theological mistakes, whatever they were, which have determined his reputation. And even as to his conduct, the charges brought by the Alexandrian petitioners at Chalcedon are too deeply coloured by passion to command our full belief: a mere profligate oppressor would not have secured so largely the loyalty of Alexandrian churchmen; nor do we know how Dioscorus would have answered his accusers, had the magistrates come to the third session of the council to ensure order and fair play. But when we look at his public acts in 449, we cannot but see in them the perversion of considerable abilities—of courage, resolution, clear-headedness—under the temptations of excessive power and the promptings of a tyrannous self-will. The brutal treatment of Flavian, which he practically sanctioned, in which perhaps he personally took part, has made his memory specially odious; and his name is conspicuous on a tragical but admonitory list, the list of the "violent men" of church history. [W. B.]

DIOSCORUS (2), one of the presbyters of Alexandria whom Dionysius, bishop of that see, sent secretly from his enforced retreat to his episcopal city to watch over the faithful under the Valerian persecution, circ. A.D. 258. (Euseb. vii. 11; Ceillier, ii. 398; Patrol. Graec. xx.)

[W. M. S.]

(3) A lad of fifteen, who was brought before the governor of Alexandria in the Decian persecution, A.D. 251, with Hero, Ater, and Isidore. He tried the lad first, and sought to deceive him with fair speeches as easy to bring over, and to compel him with torments as one who would readily give in. But Dioscorus neither was persuaded nor did yield. The governor sacrificed the others most cruelly, and as they held out, delivered them to the fire; but Dioscorus, who had done brilliantly in public, and made answer most wisely to his private inquiries, he admired and let go, saying he granted him a reprieve for repentance by reason of his youth. "And now," says Dionysius, "he is with us, waiting for a longer combat and a triumph more complete" (Dion. ad Fab. ap. Eus. H. E. vi. 41).

This may possibly be the same as the presbyter DIOSCORUS (2), the subject of the preceding article. [E. B. B.]

(4) The eldest of the four Nitrian monks, Dioscorus, Ammonius, Eusebius, and Euthymius, known from their stature as the "Tall Brethren," who became so conspicuous in the early stages of Chrysostom's troubles. They were reluctantly induced by Theophilus, the patriarch of Alexandria, to leave the desert and to submit to ordination. Eusebius and Euthymius became presbyters, and Dioscorus was consecrated bishop of Hermopolis. Weary of city life and uncongenial duties, and shocked by the avarice and other vices which a closer acquaintance had discovered in Theophilus, Dioscorus and his brethren returned to their solitudes, to the great indignation of the patriarch, who endeavoured to deter them by violent menaces (Soer. H. E. lib. viii. c. 12). As depositaries of dangerous secrets, the brethren had become formidable to Theophilus, who resolved to wreak his vengeance upon them. A pretext was afforded by their adherence to the mystic views of Origen on the Person of the Deity, and their decided opposition to Anthropomorphism, which Theophilus had originally shared with them. On this ground Theophilus had them ejected from their monasteries, and treated them with the utmost contumely and violence on their having ventured to Alexandria to appeal against their expulsion (Pallad. p. 54). Having procured their condemnation at a packed synod at Alexandria, A.D. 401, Theophilus personally headed a night-attack on their monastery, which was burnt and pillaged, and Dioscorus himself treated with violence and indignity (Pallad. p. 57). Driven from Egypt, the "Tall Brethren" took refuge in Palestine, but being pursued by Theophilus's untiring animosity, they resolved to appeal for protection to the emperor and to Chrysostom in person. Chrysostom manifested much sympathy with their sufferings, but exhibited a wise caution in not attempting any authoritative interference in their behalf, contenting himself with writing to Theophilus, and urging him to be reconciled with them. Theophilus's only reply was an angry remonstrance against his harbouring heretics and interfering in matters relating to another see. He also sent emissaries to Constantinople to denounce Dioscorus and his brethren as magicians, heretics, and rebels. The monks then announced their intention of appealing to the secular power for a judicial investigation of the charges against them, and demanded that Theophilus should be summoned to answer for his conduct before a council. The superstitious reverence of the empress Eudoxia, all-powerful with the feeble Arcadius, secured for them what they desired, and Theophilus was ordered to appear at Constantinople. This appeal to the civil authority was displeasing to Chrysostom, who declined to interfere any further in the controversy.

The manner in which Theophilus turned the tables on Chrysostom, becoming the accuser instead of the accused, and securing his deposition, is detailed in other articles (CHRYSOSTOM; THEOPHILUS). His main object having been accomplished in the overthrow of his great rival, Theophilus no longer made any difficulty about reconciliation with the Nitrian monks, whom he publicly restored to communion on their simple petition. It was too late, however, for Dioscorus and Ammonius to profit by this act of grace, both having been removed by death not long before. (Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 16; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 17; Pallad. p. 157.)

DIOSCORUS (5), a wealthy resident at Cucusus, perhaps a former acquaintance of Chrysostom's, who gave up his house as a residence for the exiled bishop on his first arrival, going to so considerable an expense to render it suitable for his delicate health, especially in the winter, that Chrysostom had to remonstrate against his liberality (Chrysost. Epist. 14, § 4).

[E. V.]

(6) Bishop of Armenia, at whose request Chrysostom is said to have pronounced an eulogy on St. Gregory the Illuminator at Cucusus (Ceillier, x. 345).

[E. B. B.]

(7) Wrote to Augustine, enclosing a number of questions on Cicero and philosophy. Augustine, who was just recovering from an illness, and overwhelmed with business, wrote him a long letter, first refusing his request, and telling him such questions are obsolete, as Christian heresies are now engaging men's thoughts. But he proceeds to give him the principles of his own philosophy, much as in his letters to Coelestinus and Consentius.

This Dioscorus is probably the same as the chief physician of that name whose conversion and baptism one Easter are related by Augustine to Alypius (Ep. 227 [67]). [E. B. B.]

DIOSCORUS (8) Presbyter of the church of Alexandria, with Chæremon, deacon, presented a request to the legates of pope Anastasius II. at the end of the 5th century, at Constantinople, to receive their church back into communion (Labbe, Conc. iv. 1283). [E. B. B.]

(9) Deacon, legate of pope Hormisdas at Constantinople, A.D. 519, with others (Labbe, Conc. iv. 1417). [E. B. B.]

(10) Antipope to Boniface II., Oct. 15, A.D. 530, died Nov. 12 the same year. The anathemas against him, published by Boniface, were burnt by Agapetus, A.D. 535 (Ceillier, xi. 114, 118). [E. B. B.]

(11) A bishop of Crete, imagined by Prædestinatus (i. 26) as an opponent of the Archontici. [G. S.]

DIRAIDH (DEORAIDH). This name assumes several forms in Irish, and as it is latinised. According to Dr. Reeves (Adamnan, 366) it signifies an "exile," "outlaw," "pilgrim," and in the last sense is commonly found in connexion with the saints. Yet, probably in the first sense, we find it applied to St. Carthage Mochuda. In both Ireland and Scotland it has long been used as a proper name, Durie, Dewar.

(1) Of Eadardruim. Jan. 13, July 27. Among those who are given as sons of Bracan or Brychan, an Irish prince who settled in Brecknock and gave his name to the district, and thus among those who are called brothers of St. Canoc (Feb. 11) of Gallen, and St. Dabheog (Jan. 1) of Lough Derg [CANOC and DABHEOG], one is called Diraidh of Eadardruim in the diocese of Elphin, where, Colgan (Acta SS. 313 n.¹²) says, there was formerly a monastery and now a parish church, as he has been informed by his friend bishop Egan of Elphin from the list of churches in his diocese. But Lanigan (Ecll. Hist. Ir. i. c. 8, § 15) doubts both the relationships and the monastery, and Diraidh's name does not appear in Rees's Account of Brychan of Brycheiniog. At July 27 O'Clery's opinion is divided between Diraidh bishop of Ferns, and Diraidh of Eadardruim, as to the person commemorated on that day. The latter appears to have lived about the close of the 5th century. Eadardruim is now Drum, a parish in the barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, but no remains of a monastery exist. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 15, 205; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 193, Jan. 13; Rees, Cambr. Brit. Saints, 602-8.)

(2) Bishop of Ferns, July 27. He succeeded Maldogar as bishop at Ferns, A.D. 677, and died according to the Four Masters (by O'Donovan, i. 295) in A.D. 690, but Tighernach and the Annals of Ulster erroneously place his death in A.D. 493. (O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 217; Lanigan, Ecll. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 18, §§ 12, 13; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 295; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 564 n.²; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 205.) [J. G.]

DIRDAN, Welsh saint of the 5th century, but no churches are ascribed to him. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 162.) [C. H.]

DIRUVIANUS (Stubbs, Regist. 153), supposed bishop of Winchester. [DUVIANUS.]

[C. H.]

DIRYNIG, son of Caw, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, and brother of several other Welsh saints. It is said that there was a church dedicated to him at York. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 228.) [C. H.]

DISCIPLINA ARCANI. [DICT. OF CHR. ANT. s. v.]

DISIBODE or DISEN. [DYSIBOD.]

DIUCHOLL. This is a name of many forms, such as Dicholl, Dichuill, Dichullus, Dicull, Diucholl, Duchoill, and Duichuill: probably also as Deicola and Deicolus (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 115 n.¹⁴⁸, and Acta SS. 91 n.⁶; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, Index).

(1) Dicholl, son of Neman, Dec. 25. Colgan (Acta SS. 92 n.⁶) says he was venerated at Killmhic-Nemain, now Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal. But like Dicoll of Rath (Nov. 1), Dichuill son of Maeldubh, of Airidh-mult on Loch Erne (Feb. 28), Dichuill of Achadh-na-cro (June 12), Diucholl C. of Inis-eoghain (Inishowen in Donegal) and Hermit (Dec. 18), Diucholl (Nov. 21), and Duichuill or Mo-Dichu (Nov. 17), who are given in the calendars and noticed by Colgan, there is nothing further known of him.

(2) [DICUL.]

(3) [DICULLUS.]

(4) Diucholl, of Cluain-braein, May 1. Joceline (in his Life of St. Patrick, c. 140) tells, in a very simple form, of a bell being lost in a particular place by one of St. Patrick's servants, and then of St. Patrick's prophesying that it would not be found till a church was being built there; after a long time a church was built there by a religieux named Dicullus, and the bell was found and placed in the new church, where many miracles of healing were wrought by it. This story is very much amplified and embellished in the Tripartite Life (cc. 94, 95), and Dicullus is called "Abbas Ernatiensis." Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 96, 115 n.¹⁴⁸, 166) thinks that this "Dicullus Abbas Ernatiensis" is most likely to have been the saint of Cluain-braein, which was near the church of Louth, but of his date or life we know nothing farther than that it was "emerso multo tempore" after St. Patrick (Lanigan, Ecll. Hist. Ir. i. c. 7, n.⁸⁴).

(5) Diuchoill Derg, son of Nessian, of Inis-faith-lenn, Mar. 15. O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 77) calls him one of the three sons of Nessian, prince of the royal family of Leinster; and of these three with their brethren Colgan (Acta SS. 609) gives a very short account [BEAN (1)]. While the other brothers had each a church or monastery for himself, these three, Muinissa, Nesslugh, and Diuchoill Derg abode together, the last-named being apparently chief among the three. The Life of St. Maedhog of Ferns says St. Diuchoill was one of his disciples and abbat of a monastery, which was called Cluain-Dicholla Gairbh, or Dicholla Gairbir; it is now Clonmore, a parish in the baronies of Bantry and West Shelmaliere, in the county of Wexford. The three brothers flourished in the end of the 6th and beginning of the 7th centuries, and were specially venerated at Inis-mac-Nessan, or Inis-faithlenn, now Ireland's Eye, off Howth, co. Dublin. (Colgan, Acta SS. 92 n. 6, 211, 217 n. 24, 609; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 10; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 95-6; Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 177-8; *Book of Obits C. C. DIUMA (DWINA), first bishop of the Mercians, was a Scot (Irish) by birth, and was under bishop Finan at Lindisfarne; his name assumes a great variety of forms, like Dina, Duina, Dwina, Diuma, and Diurna. When Peada, eldest son of Penda, pagan king of the Mercians, had come to the court of Oswy the Northumbrian king, embraced the Christian faith, and married Alchfleda, Oswy's daughter, he carried back to Mercia four priests, three being Saxons, and the fourth Diuma a Scot. Afterwards when Penda was overthrown on the banks of the Aire, A.D. 655, and Peada ruled over Mercia under Oswy his liege-lord and father-in-law, the gospel spread, and Diuma was consecrated bishop of the Mercians, of the people of Lindsey, and of the Middle-Angles, by bishop Finan. During the short time he lived as bishop, and had his seat at Repton, the capital of Mercia, he wrought zealously and with great success, though of his special acts we have no information. He died shortly after (A.D. 655) among the Middle-Angles, "in the country called Feppingum," and was buried there, being succeeded by Cellach, another Scot. (For the notice of Diuma, the chief authority is Bede, Ecol. Hist. iii. c. 21-24; see also Montalembert, Monks of the West, iv. 112-5, 121, Edinb. 1861; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Scot. i. 208-9; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 165.) Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 489 n. 46) places him among the monks of St. Columba, and notices the great variety in his festival, Ferrarius putting it on 16 Nov., Hugo Menard on 19 June, Dempster on 22 Feb., Martyrol. Anglic. on 19 July, and Camerarius on 1 Aug. [J. G.]

DIUS (1), the 31st bishop of Jerusalem, c. A.D. 190. He succeeded Narcissus when he had left Jerusalem and concealed himself in the deserts, on account of the slanderous charges brought against him. He held the see but a short time, and was followed by Germanion (Euseb. H. E. lib. vi. c. 10; Epiphanius, Haer. 66, p. 637; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. iii. p. 147.) [E. V.]

(2) Presbyter of Alexandria, martyred with bishop Peter, in the Diocletian persecution (Eus. H. E. viii. 13). [E. B. B.]

(3) Commemorated in the Menology, July 19, as a monk of Antioch, who founded a monastery at Constantinople, and when visited at the point of death by the patriarchs ATTICIUS and ALEXANDER, A.D. 413-421, recovered for fifteen years. [E. B. B.]

DIVINITY OF CHRIST. [CHRISTOLOGY.]

DIVITIANUS, ST., bishop of Soissons. The church of Soissons is said to have been founded by St. Sixtus, first bishop of Rheims, who constituted St. Sinicius as his coadjutor. To St. Sinicius succeeded his grandson Divitianus, of whose life there is no record further than has been already stated. He is thought to have died a confessor, and the Sammarthani state that his body was buried in the basilica of St. Crispin Major, or rather perhaps in the place where the basilica was afterwards built. That basilica and the abbey of the order of St. Benedict, vulgò St. Crispin the Great, are situate above the city of Soissons on the river Aisne. Divitianus lived about the beginning of the 4th century, and is commemorated on the 5th of October (AA. SS. Boll. Oct. iii. 28; Gall. Christ. ix. 334; Floardi Historia, Patrol. Lat. cxxxv.) [D. R. J.]

DIZYAS. A church in Alexandria was dedicated to him (Epiphanius, Haer. 69, p. 728). [G. S.]

DOBAN—April 12. He is invoked in the Litany of Dunkeld among the confessors and monks, and said by Camerarius and Dempster to have been a companion of St. Bonifacius the apostle of Germany, but Camerarius calls St. Boniface, instead of Doban, 'Episcopus Trehetensis.' In Willibald's Life of St. Boniface he is called the fellow-soldier and chorepiscopus of St. Boniface, whom he aided in preaching, baptizing, &c., and who, when feeble with age, associated St. Doban with himself in the episcopate of the city of Trehet (Treves). Dempster places him in A.D. 751, which cannot be far from the truth, and on Dec. 23; Camerarius on April 12. (Dempster, Hist. Ecol. Gent. Scot. i. 220; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 129; Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, pp. lx. 224, 324; Canisius, Theos. Mon. Ecol. ii. 246.) [J. G.]

DOBDA (DUBHDA)—April 15. This saint is entered in the Martyrologies of Donegal and Tullagh, simply as Dubhda and Dubta, and there we have no further means of tracing his history. But there is one of the same name and race, and it may be the same person, who calls for our attention. In the Life of St. Fergal or Virgilius, bishop of Salzburg in Upper Austria, it is related that when St. Fergal became bishop, he concealed his own orders for two years, and had an Irish bishop with him to discharge all episcopal functions. (See FERGAL, for the probable explanation of the arrangement.) This Irish bishop is called Dobda, also Dobbdagreus, and Dobbdagrecus, or Dobbdan the Greek. He had probably been monastic bishop in the monastery of Salzburg, when St. Fergal was abbat, and received the name of "Greek" from a misinterpretation of the Irish "Dubhda-chrich," a name we find in the Four Masters, or of "Dubh-da-erich," that is, Dubh of the two countries, as he may have been called when he went to Germany. The Bollandists give the name of Dubta among the praetermissi of April 15. (Todd, St. Patrick, 64-7; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 12; Reeves, Adumnan, 340 n.; Ussher, Sylogoe, Ep. 16, wks. iv. 462; Mabillon, Acta SS. O.S.B. tom. iii. 331; Bolland. Acta SS. April. tom. ii. 367.)

Lanigan adds that, according to some accounts, Dobda was placed as bishop at Chiem (Chiemsee in Upper Bavaria) by the Duke Otilo, and established there a school, which was frequented by a great number of students, but as this must have taken place before A.D. 748, and St. Fergal was appointed bishop of Salzburg in A.D. 756, he questions whether this was done at least by Otilo.

DOCETAE. (The word is written δοκταί by the oldest authorities, Clem. Alex. and Hippolytus, followed by later writers in such a way as to shew that the itacism was not introduced by transcribers, but existed from the first.) The tenet that Christ's body was not real flesh and blood, but merely a phantom body, was held in some of the earliest heretical sects and was, common to a great many of them; but the use of the name DOCETAE as the common appellation of those who held it does not appear to be earlier than Theodoret, who speaks (Ep. 82, iv. 1142) of "Marcion Valentinus Manes and the other Docetae." We consider this doctrine under the title DOCETISM; in this article we confine ourselves to the name Docetae regarded as the recognised appellation of a separate sect. Very numerous as are the heretical teachers to whom the name Docetae, as we understand it, may be correctly applied, the use of the name as the distinctive title of a sect is very rare. Epiphanius, Philaster, and their followers, though they seem to have delighted in multiplying the names of heretical sects, have not the name Docetae in any of their lists. Yet there was at the end of the second century a sect which had assumed this name. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vii. 17, p. 900) classifying the names of heretical sects according as they were derived from those of their founders or otherwise, mentions as one of the sects called from their peculiar dogmas, that of the Docetae. Elsewhere (Strom. iii. 13, 552) he calls JULIUS CASSIANUS the founder of Docetism (δ τῆς δοκῆσεως ἐξάρχων), and as the thing Docetism was certainly more ancient than Cassianus it would seem that we are to understand that it was the name Docetism which Cassianus first adopted to denote the characteristic doctrine of his sect. Serapion, bishop of Antioch about A.D. 190, in a fragment preserved by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 12) mentions the Docetae, and states that there was in use among them a gospel called that of Peter, containing passages which favoured their erroneous opinions. Clement bears testimony to the use by Cassian of a gospel different from our four, but gives the name of the "Gospel according to the Egyptians," to one which contained the passages quoted by Cassian. The fullest account of the Docetae of the second century is in the Refutation of Hippolytus (viii. 8, 262; x. 16, 324). The difference deserves to be remarked that whereas Serapion describes them as "those whom we call Docetae," Hippolytus twice mentions that these sectaries gave this name to themselves. It is remarkable that Hippolytus gives no indication that he knew on what grounds they assumed this appellation. He himself sarcastically derives it from the beam (δοκός) in the eye of these false teachers unconscious of their blindness. In the account of Hippolytus no prominence is given to their doctrine concerning our Lord's body and that doctrine, as he expounds it, is not, in our sense of the word, docetic. These are the grounds on which we have separated the articles DOCETAE and DOCETISM; not thinking ourselves entitled to assume that it was their doctrine concerning the Lord's body from which these heretics derived a name which may be explained by more than one other hypothesis. But whatever the name Dokesis may have meant in the intention of those who used it as the distinctive title of their doctrine, the consequence was drawn from it by the orthodox that it imputed unreality to our Lord's person and work; and so the name seems to have conveyed the same idea in the controversies of the second century as at the present day. (Irenaeus IV. xxxiii. 5, 271: V. i. 2, 292; Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 17, 558.) We proceed now with the account which Hippolytus gives of the system of those whom he calls Docetae. The question suggests itself whether the docetic author whom he abstracts may not be Julius Cassianus; but as far as the scanty materials for comparison enable us to form a judgment, our answer is in the negative; the docetic author of Hippolytus being more mystical than the Cassianus of Clement, and certainly not a person from whom a sober work on chronology might be expected. We are inclined to pronounce the Docetist of Hippolytus to be a comparatively late writer (that is to say, who wrote about the beginning of the last quarter of the second century), who combines elements from more than one earlier system: but there is always some uncertainty when, in the absence of external evidence, we attempt to make a history of the growth of any of the Gnostic systems, or to assign their relative priority. The docetic writer in his account of the origin of the universe reminds us first of the system of Basilides as described by Hippolytus. That system commences with a non-existent God, who deposits the seed of the world: in the docetic system the God who is the first principle of all existence though not actually non-existent, is described as infinitesimally small, and is himself the seed of the fig-tree, diminutive in size, but containing within it infinite potentialities. The mention of the fig-tree suggests to the writer various scripture allusions, to the tree which furnished the leaves wherewith our first parents clad themselves, to the tree which our Lord cursed, to the tree to which the keeper of the vineyard came three times, vainly seeking for fruit. He goes on to expound that the seed when it began to develop itself necessarily did so in three forms, stem, leaves and fruit; and so he teaches that the next stage in the progress of the universe was the production of three aeons who served as the principles of further growth; but these aeons are not, as the illustration would suggest, beings different in their character and properties. They are said to differ from each other in nothing but position; that which was nearest the primal seed Deity having the greatest productive power, the second having less, the third, as most removed, having least of all. The comparison of the growth of the universe to that of a tree is to be found also in the system of Simon (Hipp. Ref. vi. 9, p. 164). The doctrine which the Docetist grounds on it as to the triplicity which reigns through nature is to be found also in the system of the Naassenes (Ref.

v. 6, p. 95), that of the Peratae (v. 12, 124) and other kindred systems. But the closest contact in this respect is with that of those whom Hippolytus calls Sithians; and it seems on other grounds likely that the book which Hippolytus describes under the name of the paraphrase of Seth was used and esteemed by the docetic author. At least there is common to the two an argument on which two persons could not have hit independently—viz. the doctrine of triplicity just mentioned is proved from the fact that Moses (Deut. v. 22) mentions three "words of God," darkness, gloom, and tempest (σκοτος, γνόφος, θύελλα), and "he added no more," that is to say, according to the Docetist, God added not to the three aeons. We consider that the docetic system as here compared with the related systems has marks of posteriority. In the Ophite systems the threefold division has its explanation in the theories of the systems themselves. It expresses the result of a philosophic speculation, which discovers in man or in nature, three elements distinct in character (such for instance as the νοεόν, ψυχικόν and χοικόν), and refers their origin to three unlike principles. But it is quite arbitrary that the mutually resembling aeons of the docetic system should be exactly three: for anything in the system itself they might as well have been ten or thirty, and the number three seems to have been adopted from previously current theories. To proceed with the docetic theory; the three aeons go on to develop themselves and arrive at perfection. Perfection consists in the number ten, and so the three aeons become thirty. Further, that which, as nearest the primal Deity, had the greatest productive power, the "immeasurable one," measured himself ten times in greatness, so becoming a hundred; the second, "the incomprehensible," comprehended himself sixfold, thus becoming sixty; while the third or external aeon being removed to an infinite distance by the growth of his brethren, considered himself in thought three times, and thus becoming thirty, bound himself as an eternal* bond of union. No title is given to the third aeon, but analogy would lead us to conjecture his title to be some such name as Anenoetus, a name which we find with Acataleptus (Irenaeus, I. xi. 5, 56) in the terminology of one of the Valentinian systems. Although in the preceding we have a set of thirty aeons divided into three tens, yet later on (p. 268) we have the quite inconsistent Valentinian division into a more excellent ogdoad an intermediate decad and a lower dodecad. In fact, in this docetic system of aeons, all like each other, little stress is laid on their number, and presently we find their development proceeding to an infinity of bisexual aeons. The writer goes on to lay a foundation for his Christology by teaching that the aeons being all in harmony and union, coalesced into a single aeon in the midst, and there begat of one virgin a joint offspring, the Saviour of all; and this offspring is described as having a right to the title Monogenes, and as being coequal in power with the fig-seed, that is to say with the primal Deity, in every respect save that he was begotten, the latter unbegotten. In other words the docetic writer agreed with the orthodox in making the Saviour equal with God. It has been already remarked that this docetic system is clearly post-Valentinian, and the account of the birth of the joint offspring of the aeons completely agrees with the Valentinian account of the birth of the joint fruit of the Pleroma (Irenaeus, I. ii. 6, 12); see Irenaeus's account of the controversy on this point among the Valentinians (I. xii. 4, 58). Except that in the docetic system the harmony of the aeons does not contrast with any preceding discord.

The account of the development of the universe as thus far given has found no place for the material world. The aeons whose genesis has been related, are objects not of sense but of intelligence (ἡ νοητὴ φύσις). We refer to the article GNOSTICISM for a discussion of the theories concerning a supersensible world common to several Gnostic sects, merely remarking here that in order to understand such speculations it is necessary to know what account the system of philosophy which the speculators received gave concerning the meaning of general terms; what answer, for instance, it gave to the question what is the relation between that which is denoted by the word man or animal and the actually existing Socrates or Diogenes. In this docetic system the origin of the material world is ascribed to the action on the underlying darkness of the kingdom of light, and especially of its outside member, the third aeon. The light sends forth innumerable ideas of various living creatures; these being caught by the chaos beneath give it form and assume consistence, and so are the cause of all that has come into being here. It was in order to check the dragging down into the darkness of the forms (χαρακτῆρες) of light that the third aeon, knowing the power of the darkness and the simple and bountiful nature of light, placed the firmament to separate between the light and darkness, and "He called the light which was above the firmament day, and the darkness He called night." But not only had the innumerable ideas of the third aeon been caught by the darkness, but the figure of the third aeon himself similarly impressed, had given origin to the "Great Archon" (a name found also in the Basilidian system); that which in the aeon had been pure light becoming in the archon fire. It is to be noted that in the Clementine Homilies light and fire are always opposed in the same manner as good and evil. This fiery god is He who spoke to Moses from the bush (ἄδτος), by which it is explained we are to understand the dark air, the medium through which the ideas of light had passed downwards, and through which all sounds and savours are still transmitted. This fiery god is the Demiurge who made the world, as Moses has told; and up to our Saviour's coming he had ill-used the characters of light detained in the darkness, causing a continual wandering of souls. For the souls (ψυχαι) are the ideas (ἰδέαι) which had cooled^b down in the darkness (ἀποψυγεῖσθαι), and

* The word αἰώνιος seems to be used more than once with designed ambiguity.

^b This derivation is given in Plato's Cratylus, and is also mentioned by Aristotle, De Anima, I. 2, 34. Origen entertained the same idea of the soul having cooled down from the heat of a previous existence (De Princ. II. 8, 3), for which notion he is censured by Epiphanius. (Haer. 64, 5, 528, and Ep. ad Joan. Hier. II. 314.)

these souls are constrained to abide in the darkness wandering from body to body under the guardianship of the Demiurge. In scripture proof of this are quoted, Job ii. 9, LXX, and Matt. xi. 14. This transmigration continued till the Saviour's Incarnation, since when faith is preached for the remission of sins. The Saviour desiring to liberate these prisoned souls, and knowing that the aeons could not abide the sight of Him who was the fulness of all the aeons, contracted himself into a small body. Just as the light of vision contracted under the eyelids goes forth as far as the stars of heaven and returns under the eyelids when it wills; and though thus going everywhere and traversing all things is invisible to us who see only the outward organs of vision; so the only begotten Son contracted himself and arraying himself after the form of each of the aeons [compare the account given of the descent of our Lord in the Ascent of ISAAH], passed into this lower world unseen, unknown, and not believed on. And in order that he might array himself here in the outer darkness also, that is to say in flesh, an angel who accompanied him from above made the annunciation to Mary, as it is written in the gospels. And from this point the docetic story of the Saviour's earthly life, which ought to be compared with the Basilidian story (Ref. vii. 27, 243), goes on in full conformity with the gospels. But it adds that our Lord at His baptism received in the water a form and impress of the body born of the Virgin. [It is probable that we are here not to understand Mary, but that the reference is to the birth from the Virgin mentioned in the earlier part of this myth.] The Saviour received this body in order that when the Archon had condemned to death the flesh which was his own formation, the Saviour's soul having stripped off the fleshy body and having left it nailed to the cross, triumphing thereby over principalities and powers, might yet not be found naked, being arrayed in the body received at the baptism. Thus we find that the Docetism of this system applied only to our Lord's resurrection body. It was admitted that during His earthly life He had a body of flesh, but it was denied that this body of flesh was exalted to heaven. And so Hippolytus tells of the system of Basilides (v. 27, 244), that it represented the Saviour's work to be the making separation between elements previously mingled together, His own bodily part given back to the formlessness whence it had sprung, and the higher elements of His nature returning to the regions whence they had taken their origin. With this should be compared the doctrine of the Sethites (v. 21; see also Irenaeus, I. xxx. 13, 112); and that of Apelles (Hipp. vii. 38, 260). There does not seem any ground for asserting that the doctrine of Casianus was more docetic than that which has been described, or that however low his views concerning matter, he denied that the Saviour temporarily inhabited a body of flesh.

It remains to mention one other point of the docetic doctrine which seems intended as the foundation of a theory of conciliation of different sects. It was taught that the Saviour had arrayed himself in the ideas of each of the thirty aeons, appearing in one of each, each of the thirty years he was on earth. Now the prisoned souls whom he came to liberate included ideas from each of the thirty aeons; each of these souls then recognises in Jesus a kindred nature in which the only begotten had arrayed himself. But these forms are different; and this is why so many sects emulously seek Jesus, for He is indeed related to all, but each believes that that is the only one who is related to themselves; Him they recognise as a brother and deem all the rest as bastards. And those who derive their nature from the lower aeons cannot see the Saviour's ideas which are above them; but those who spring from the highest aeons, the middle decad or the most excellent ogdoad, whence these Gnostics claimed to derive their own descent, know the entire Jesus, and are the only ones who, as being from above, are perfect, all the rest having but partial knowledge. It seems a mark of lateness, that whereas the older Gnostics divided mankind into three classes, corresponding no doubt to the unconverted world, ordinary Christians, and the instructed Gnostics, this theory recognises a subdivision of each of these classes into a variety of sects.

Möller (Kosmologie, 334), who gives a full account of these Docetae, and Lipsius (Gnosticismus in Ersch and Gruber, 290) consider that the name Docetae is to be accounted for by this theory concerning the different seeming aspects of Jesus to different souls. But this appears to us very doubtful, though we have not confidence to put forward any other conjecture as better: such, for instance, as that the theory represented the whole material world as seeming compared with the supersensible realities. The fact is that the attention of Hippolytus does not seem to have been caught by that part of the theory on which the name is founded, and so he has not supplied us with information to justify any positive assertion on this point. [G. S.]

DOCETISM, the doctrine that our blessed Lord had a body like ours, only in appearance, not in reality. The rise of this notion was very early. St. Jerome scarcely exaggerates when he says (Adv. Lucif. 23) that "while the apostles were still surviving, while Christ's blood was still fresh in Judaea, the Lord's body was asserted to be but a phantasm." Not to speak of New Testament passages, such as Eph. ii. 9, Heb. ii. 14, which have been used in confutation of this assertion, but which do not bear clear marks of having been written with a controversial purpose, it appears from 1 John iv. 2, 2 John 7, that at the time when these epistles were written there were teachers stigmatised by the writer as prompted by the spirit of anti-christ, who denied that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh, a form of expression implying that these teachers maintained a Docetic theory. As soon as Christianity included among its disciples men of culture who sought to frame for themselves a theory of the universe, combining what they were willing to adopt from the gospel with the philosophy in which they had been brought up, one of the questions to which they first addressed themselves was that of the origin of evil. And the solution which found most favour with men of this class was that evil resulted from the inherent fault of matter; and they represented the deliverance of men's souls from the dominion of matter as the great work which the Saviour came to accomplish. They found it then impossible to believe that the Saviour could be himself under the dominion of that evil from which he came to deliver men, and they therefore rejected the church's doctrine of a real union of the divine and human natures in the person of our Lord. But it is remarkable, as shewing how generally a belief in our Lord's pre-existence and superhuman nature was regarded as an essential part of Christianity, that it was on the doctrine of his perfect humanity that the main assaults were made, the opinion that he was mere man holding a very subordinate place in Gnostic teaching. This is said to have been the doctrine of the Ebionites, a sect which did not extend beyond the limits of Judaism; but with two exceptions, or perhaps even only one, all the sects known as Gnostic ascribed to the Saviour a superhuman nature, some however separating the personality of that nature from his human personality, others reducing our Lord's earthly part to mere appearance. The exceptions are JUSTINUS, who is only known to us from the account of his system given by Hippolytus at the end of his fifth book, and who of all the Gnostics teaches the lowest doctrine concerning our Lord. With him Jesus is but an ordinary shepherd-boy until at the age of twelve he receives and obeys the message of an angel; and even then it is not stated that any higher nature was communicated to him. Among the Gnostics described by Irenaeus, the only one who is said to have held that our Lord was a man like others, is CARPOCRATES. It is even doubtful whether we are not to understand in a technical sense the statement that he taught that "power" from the Father had descended on our Lord; that is to say, whether it was not his doctrine that one of the heavenly powers had united itself to the man Jesus. Teaching of this kind is unequivocally attributed to CERINTHUS, whose other doctrines, as reported by Irenaeus, have great resemblance to those of Carpocrates. It is possibly on account of this resemblance of doctrine that Irenaeus, followed in this respect by later heresiologists, places Cerinthus out of chronological order next after Carpocrates. Cerinthus is said to have rejected the doctrine of the miraculous conception, and to have taught that Jesus was, according to the ordinary course of human birth, the son of Joseph and Mary; that he differed from other men only as being unusually righteous and wise; that on his baptism Christ had descended on him in the form of a dove; that he had been thereby enabled to preach the supreme God and to work miracles; that before his crucifixion Christ withdrew himself, leaving Jesus to suffer and to rise again, while Christ, as being a spiritual being, remained impassible. It is in opposition to the theory which makes our Lord's claim to be Christ date, not from his birth, but from some later period, that Irenaeus (iii. 16) uses the argument, shewing his belief in the inspiration of the gospels, that Matthew might have said, "the birth of Jesus was in this wise," but that the Holy Spirit, foreseeing and guarding against the deprivation of the truth said by Matthew "the birth of Christ was on this wise." Baur (Christliche Gnosis, p. 258) makes Docetism common to all the Gnostics, holding that the theory which has just been described is in a certain sense Docetic; inasmuch as while holding Jesus to be a real man, visibly active in the work of redemption, it teaches that this is but deceptive appearance, the work being actually performed by a distinct personality, Christ. But it is more usual and more natural to use the word Docetism only with reference to those other theories which refuse to acknowledge the true manhood of the Redeemer. For example, we are told (Irenaeus, i. 23) that, according to the system of SIMON, the Redeemer (who, however, is not Jesus, but Simon himself) "had appeared among men as man, though he was not a man, and was thought to have suffered in Judaea, though he did not suffer." According to the system of SATURNINUS (Irenaeus, i. 24), the Saviour was without birth, without body, and without figure, and appeared a man in phantasm, not in truth. And according to BASILIDES, as reported by Irenaeus (i. 24), Christ or Nous is not distinguished from Jesus, but is said to be an incorporeal power, who transfigured himself as he willed; that he appeared on earth as man and worked miracles, but that he did not suffer; that it was Simon of Cyrene, who, being transfigured into the form of Jesus, was crucified, while Jesus himself, in the form of Simon standing by, laughed at his persecutors, and then, incapable of being held by them, ascended up to Him who had sent him, invisible to them all. The Docetism here described is in several places strenuously combated in the Ignatian Epistles in their Greek form. It suffices to refer to two of the strongest passages (Ad Trall. 9, 10, and Ad Smyrn. 2). In these the writer emphasises the statements that our Lord was truly born, did eat and drink, was truly persecuted under Pontius Pilate, was truly crucified, and truly rose from the dead; and he expressly declares that these statements were made in contradiction of the doctrine of certain unbelievers, or rather atheists, who asserted his sufferings to be but seeming. This polemic is absent from the Syriac Ignatius, and an argument has hence been derived against the genuineness of the Greek form. But in order to make the argument valid, there ought to be proof that the rise of Docetism was probably later than the age of Ignatius, whereas the probability seems to be quite the other way. Without entering into controversy as to the date of John's Epistles, or of the activity of Simon, Saturninus holds such a place in all heretical lists, that he must be referred to the very beginning of the 2nd century, and as he taught in Antioch, he may very possibly have been encountered by Ignatius. Polycarp also in his Epistle (7) uses the words of St. John's Epistle (iv. 3) in such a way as to shew that Docetism was in his time troublesome.

In the forms of Docetism thus far described, there is no evidence that there was involved any more subtle theory than that the senses of the spectators of our Lord's earthly life were deceived just in the same way as in the Book of Tobit (xii. 19) Raphael is made to say, "All these days I did appear unto you, but I did neither eat nor drink, but ye did see a vision." The Docetism of VALENTINUS was exhibited in a more artificial theory. According to him (Irenaeus, i. 7) our Lord's nature was fourfold: (1) He had a ψυχή or animal soul; (2) he had a πνεῦμα or spiritual principle derived from Achamoth; (3) he had a body, but not a material body, but a heavenly one, formed according to a special dispensation with unspeakable art, so as to be visible and tangible and capable of suffering. This body, according to the report of Irenaeus, was psychical, that is to say, framed of the same substance as the animal soul; but Hippolytus (vi. 35) states that this was only the doctrine of the Italian school of Valentinians, and that there was an Eastern school which held that the body was spiritual. In either case the body came from heaven, and was not formed from the substance of the Virgin; she was but the channel through which it was conveyed into the world (καθ' ἑνερ ὕδωρ διὰ σαλῆνος); (4) the pre-existent Saviour descended on him in the form of a dove at his baptism. When our Lord was brought before Pilate, this Saviour as being incapable of suffering withdrew his power; and the spiritual part which was also impassible was likewise dismissed;^b the animal soul and the wonderfully contrived body alone remaining to suffer, and to exhibit on the cross on earth a representation of what had previously taken place on the heavenly Stauros. It thus appears that Valentinus was only partially docetic. He conceded to Jesus the possession of a real body capable of really affecting the senses; but he held that that body was made of a different substance from ours, and also that it was peculiar in its relation to sustenance by earthly nutriment (Letter to Agathopus, ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 7, 451). Irenaeus, on the other hand (v. 1, 2, and more fully iii. 22), insists that the Valentinian doctrine did not practically differ from pure Docetism; for that if our Lord had not taken substance of flesh in the womb of the Virgin he could not have been the real man who suffered hunger and thirst and weariness, who wept, at the grave of Lazarus, who sweat drops of blood, from whose wounded side came forth blood and water.

* Perhaps it is not correct to say "not Jesus," for Simon held a theory of the transmigration of souls, and may have claimed to be identical with Jesus. If this were so, however, he must have been later than the Simon of the Acts.

The Docetism of MARCION differed from that of preceding Gnostics. With them the great stumbling-block had been the sufferings of Christ, and accordingly it is the reality of Christ's passion and death that their antagonists were most solicitous to establish. Marcion, on the contrary, was quite willing to acknowledge the proof of our Lord's love exhibited in his sufferings and death, but it was repulsive to him to own his human birth, which according to his view would have made our Lord the debtor and the subject of the Creator of the world. Accordingly, while Basilides had admitted a real birth of the man Jesus, Valentinus at least a seeming birth in which the body elsewhere prepared was ushered into the world, Marcion would own no birth at all, and began his gospel with the sudden announcement that in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Christ came down

(by which we are to understand came down from heaven) to Capernaum, a city of Galilee (Tert. adv. Marc. iv. 7). And he appealed to the question "who is my mother?" as proving that Jesus had refused to own a human birth. His interpretation of Luke xxiv. 39 is worth quoting: "A spirit has not flesh and bones, and you see that I have them only in such wise as a spirit has them" (Tert. adv. Marc. iv. 43). On this subject, in addition to the books of Tertullian entitled against Marcion, his tract de Carne Christi ought to be consulted. Marcion's disciple Apelles so far modified his master's doctrine that he was willing to own that Jesus had a solid body, but denied that there had been a birth in which he had assumed it (Tert. de C. C. 6); and he held that of this body our Lord made only a temporary use, and that when he had shewn it to his disciples after his resurrection he gave it back to the elements from which he had received it (Hipp. Ref. vii. 38, 260). Something of this kind seems to have been also the view of the sect known as DOCTÆTÆ.

The fourth book of the dialogue against the Marcionites [ADAMANTIUS] (Origen, i. 853) contains a polemic against Docetism which is represented as defended by Marinus the disciple of BARDESANES, who adopts the Valentinian notion that our Lord had come διὰ Μαρίας, not ἐκ Μαρίας, and who maintains that his earthly body was only such as the angels had temporarily assumed who ate and drank with Abraham. One argument used on the orthodox side ought not to be passed over, because it is common to several of the Fathers, and because the form of words in which each has expressed himself has been much discussed in the interests of modern controversy. It occurs here in the form "If Christ were without flesh and blood, of what sort of flesh and blood are the bread and wine, the images (εἰκόνας) with which he commanded that the memorial of him should be made?" (compare Ignatius ad Smyrn. 7; Irenaeus, adv. 18, v. 2; Tertullian, adv. Marcion. iv. 40). Of later heretics, the most considerable who maintained a docetic theory are the Manichæans. In the controversy with them the orthodox had exactly the same points to establish as in the controversy with Marcion, viz. that Christ had come into the world, not merely as sent by the Father, but as really born of the Virgin; that he was truly incarnate, and did not assume the form of a body merely as did the angels whose appearances have been recorded; that he was circumcised, baptized, tempted; that his death was a real one, as was necessary in order that his resurrection also should be real (see in particular the disputation between Augustine and Faustus). With regard to the disputes in the 6th century concerning our Lord's body, see JULIAN OF HALICARNASSUS, CORRUPTICOLÆ, PHANTASIASTÆ. It is well known that Mahomet also adopted the docetic account of our Lord's crucifixion.

Besides formal heresies which have been tainted with Docetism, the same imputation has been cast on more than one of the Fathers. The charge seems to be groundless in the case of Barnabas (7); but it is very strongly brought ^b Neander (Church History, ii. 91) asserts that it was held that this was done in the words, "Father, Into Thy hands I commend my spirit;" but we cannot find that he has authority for this detail.

^c There is a well-recommended various reading,

"Deum" instead of "eum"; but Epiphanius (Haer. 42, p. 312) would scarcely have passed this over in silence had he found it in his Marcion.

by Photius (Bibl. 109) against the hypotyposes of Clement of Alexandria. This book has not survived, but there is no doubt from his extant writings that Clement ascribed to our Lord a real body. He held, however (Strom. vi. 9, 775), that as it would be ridiculous to suppose that that body which was maintained by the Divine power needed food or drink for its support, we must believe that our Lord only partook of them for the sake of those with whom he lived, lest they should deem, as some afterwards did, that his body was not real. In a fragment, probably from the lost Hypotyposes preserved in a Latin translation (p. 1009), he quotes from "the traditions" that when St. John handled the body of our Lord the flesh offered no resistance, but yielded place to the disciple's hand. Redepennyng contends (Origenes, i. 444) that we are to understand this, not as describing the permanent condition of the Lord's body, but as what took place on a single occasion, probably at an appearance after the resurrection. And his conclusion (ii. 391) is that Clement's doctrine deviated from that subsequently recognised as orthodox, not in respect of our Lord's body, the reality of which he acknowledged, but in holding that this body was directly united to the divine logos without the intervention of a human soul capable of feeling pain or suffering. In the place last referred to will be found a discussion how far Origen is chargeable with Docetism, on which may also be consulted Huet's Origéniana, ii. Qu. iii. 10, 11.

The traditions referred to by Clement have been identified with the contents of a work of Leucius Charinus, purporting to relate travels of the apostles, of which an account is given by Photius (Bibl. 114), and from which extracts are also quoted in the acts of the second council of Nicea (Actio v.) In this work, which Grabe seems to have correctly regarded as Marcionite, it was taught that the Son was not man, but only seemed to be so; that he shewed himself to his disciples sometimes young, sometimes old; sometimes a child, sometimes an old man; sometimes great, sometimes small; sometimes so great as to touch the heavens with his head; that his footsteps left no trace; and that he was not really crucified, but, according to Photius, another person in his place. The account given in the Nicene extracts of a vision seen by St. John on the mount of Olives, at the time of the crucifixion, teaches that the form crucified was not really our Lord, but does not suggest that it was any other person. DOCHDWWY, Welsh saint of the 6th century. He accompanied Cadfan to Bardsey, where he was ordained a bishop. He does not appear to have been appointed to any particular see, but is recorded to have administered the diocese of Llandaf during the absence of Teilo at Bardsey. He is perhaps the founder of two churches in Glamorganshire, named Llandoch, or Llandochoa, or Llandough. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 220.)

[C. H.]

DOCHONNA is only another form of Dachonna and Mochonna, and frequently interchanged with them [DACHONNA, and MOCHONNA]. Among others of this name, the Mart. Doneg. has Duchonna, son of Odhran, Feb. 17. In the Life of St. Attracta, or Athracht (Aug. 11), given by Colgan (Acta SS. 279, c. 7), a saint called Dachonna was employed by St. Conall, brother of St. Attracta, to try and prevail upon her not to build a monastery, as she intended, near St. Conall's [CONALL (3)]. The church belonging to this Dachonna or Dochonna is said by Colgan (ib. 281 n. 12) to be now a parish church in the diocese of Clonfert, named from him, and not far from Kill-conaill. If he was a brother or even a contemporary of St. Attracta, he belongs to the 6th century. [J. G.]

DOCTRINA ADDAELI. [ACTS OF APOSTLES, p. 31.]

DOCTRINA APOSTOLORUM. [ACTS OF APOSTLES, p. 21.]

DOCUS. [CADOC.]

DOCWINUS (CUNGARUS, CYNGAR), Welsh saint of the 5th century, founder of a monastery named Docunnus in the diocese of Llandaff, but the situation of which is at present unknown, though its abbats ranked with those of Llancaerfan and Lantwit, and all three of them exercised great influence in the diocese. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 183 and Index.) [C. H.]

DODDO (DODO), a duke of Mercia, who flourished in the reigns of the Mercian kings Ethelred, Coenred, and Ethelbald. In conjunction with his brother Oddo, another duke of Mercia, he is stated to have founded the monastery of Tewkesbury, A.D. 715. They built it on their own estate near the Severn, where the hermit Theokus resided, after whom it was named Tewkesbury, endowing it with the manor of Stanwey, with its members, and other smaller possessions; but only four or five monks inhabited it at that early period, and the authority states that they observed the rule of St. Benedict. These Mercian dukes were also great benefactors to Pershore abbey, where they are said to have been buried, and Doddo is said to have lived in the monastic habit. They had a brother Almaric, or Amalric, buried at Deerhurst, in a little chapel over against the priory gate, which had once formed part of a royal palace, but was converted by Doddo into a church, and consecrated (Monast. Anglic. ii. 53). The authority for this account is a Cotton MS. called Chronica de Tewkesburie, which is printed in Monast. Anglic. ii. 59, and of which a translation appears in Atkyns, Hist. of Gloucestershire, ed. 1768, 331, ed. 1712, 725. [C. H.]

DODO, abbat of St. Genulfus of Bourges. He obtained privilege and immunity from tribute both from Pepin and from Charles the Bald in the fourth year of his reign. He was succeeded by Mainardus, about the year 850. (Gall. Christ. ii. 145, 146.) [D. R. J.]

(2) Called also Odo, abbat of St. Martial at Limousin. He lived during the middle of the 9th century. Charles the Bald called a council of the archbishops and princes of Aquitaine, at which Ainardus, superior of the monastery of St. Martial, and the canons of that church, prostrated themselves before Charles on his throne, and petitioned that a habit might be given them so that they might become regular monks. The king granted their petition, overcoming by gifts the opposition of Stodilus, bishop of Limousin. The monks were unwilling to appoint one of themselves for their abbat, and chose Dodo, who had been abbat of St. Savinus, Poitiers. After two years' rule at St. Martial's, Dodo returned to the monastery of St. Savinus, and in 853 was present at the synod of Soissons. (Gall. Christ. ii. 555.) [D. R. J.]

DODO (3) 21st bishop of Toul, enriched his church with many possessions, the names of which are now unknown, and dedicated the church of St. Martin. He died in the beginning of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 965.) [D. R. J.]

(4) Mercian duke. [DODDO.]

(5). [DIDO.]

(6) Abbat of the monastery of St. Denis, Paris, in the reign of Clotarius, father of Dagobert I., in the early part of the 7th century (Gall. Christ. vii. 338). [D. R. J.]

(7) 14th bishop of Beauvais. In most catalogues of the bishops of Beauvais, Dodo is placed between Radingus and Ercambertus, as if he had been bishop in the reign of king Chilperic II. But as he in conjunction with the abbat Ebrulfus (who was a contemporary of queen Fredegundis) restored the abbey of St. Lucian, he must have held his see under Chilperic I., and preceded Marinus, who was bishop in the year 640 (Gall. Christ. ix. 695). [D. R. J.]

DODOLINUS, ST., bishop of Vienne, called also St. Dodolenus, Laudolenus, Dolinus, and Landalenus, and possibly even St. Bobolinus I. An additional difficulty is that Landolenus is certainly the same as Syndulphus. Can all these names mean one man? The synod of Châlons-sur-Saône was held under Clovis II., but it is uncertain in what year, though it is supposed by Sirmondus to have been in 650 or 658. To that synod Landalenus (i.e. Dodolinus), bishop of the church of Vienne, subscribed second. In an ancient document on the antiquities of Vienne, he is said to have been made Pontifex Viennae, "Leone vel Leontio Romanis imperante, et Theoderico Francis, ac Sergio Papa." This would bring him down to about the year 688, leaving out of the reckoning Leontius, who began to reign some years after the death of king Theoderic. Dodolinus died, and is commemorated on the 1st of April. (AA. SS. Boll. April, i. p. 30; Ado, Vienn. Chronicon, Patrol. Lat. cxxiii.; Gall. Christ. xvi. 33; Decretum Burgundofaronis Meldensis Episcopi; Labbe, Concilia V. ann. 636.) [D. R. J.]

DOGED, DOGED FRENHIN, i.e. Doged the king, Welsh saint of the 6th century, founder of the church of Llanddaged in Denbighshire. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 209.) [C. H.]

DOGFAEL, Welsh saint of the 6th century, founder of four Pembrokeshire churches, St. Dogmael in Cemmaes, St. Dogwel in Pebidiog, Monachlog Dhu, and Melinau; as well as patron of Llanddogwel, subject to Llanrhyddlad, in Anglesey. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 211.) [C. H.]

DOGFAN, Welsh saint of the 5th century, slain by the pagan Saxons at Merthyr Dogfan in Dyfed or Pembrokeshire, where a church was consecrated to his memory, the particular situation of which is at present unknown. He was also the patron saint and founder of Llanrhaidr ym Mochnant in Denbighshire; commemorated on July 13. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 145.) [C. H.]

DOGMAEL (TEGWELL), patron saint of an abbey in Pembrokeshire, died c. A.D. 500; commemorated on June 14. (Acta SS. June ii. 957; Cressy, Ch. Hist. of Brit. x. 21.) [C. H.]

DOKIE. In Forfarshire, in the parish of Monieth, is Chapel Dokie. It probably takes its name from St. Murdoch, who has a chapel some miles northward at Inverkeillor (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 325, 416-7; Proc. Soc. Ant. Scotl. ii. 446; Jervise, Epitaphs, i. 318-19). [J. G.]

DOLGAN AB GILDAS, a saint of the college of Cattwg Ddoeth at Llancarvan, in the 6th century. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 257.) [C. H.]

DOLGAR, Welsh saint of the 6th century, daughter of Gildas ab Caw. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 258.) [C. H.]

DOLICHIANUS or DULICHIANUS, succeeded Valens as 29th bishop of Jerusalem. His exact date is unknown, but he may be placed in the last quarter of the 2nd century. He was followed by Narcissus (Euseb. H. E. lib. v. c. 12; Caronicon, a° 2199; Epiphani. Haeres. 66, p. 637; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. iii. p. 147). [E. V.]

DOMHAINGEN, bishop of Tuaim-Muscraige, April 29. By O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 113) he is called "son of Fionnluigh, (and) brother of Brenainn, son of Fionnluigh, who was of the race of Ciar, son of Fergus, son of Ros, son of Rudhraighe" [BRENDAN (2).] In the Life of St. Carthage Mochuda, from which Colgan quotes in his Memoir of St. Gobban (Mar. 17), St. Carthage is said to have built a church in Muskerry, in Munster, and to have placed there St. Domhaingen with twelve disciples, among whom were the three sons of Nasca or Nescainn—Gobban, Straphan, and Laseran; while these afterwards founded monasteries for themselves, St. Domhaingen continued to reside at Tuaim-Muscraige, which Lanigan believes to be the same as Tome, a place marked as in Muskerry in Smith's map of the county of Cork (Colgan, Acta SS. 631; Lanigan, Éccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 15). There is a Domhaingen mentioned by Colgan (ib. 305, c. 3) as a cousin of St. Etchen (Feb. 11), but if this be the same person, he must have been much younger than St. Etchen to be a disciple of St. Carthage Mochuda, who was born A.D. 570, while St. Etchen of Clonfad ordained St. Columba about A.D. 550. They are, however, probably not the same, and the bishop of Tuaim-Muscraige flourished in the beginning of the 7th century. [J. G.]

DOMHANGORT (DOMANGART, DONARD). (1) Son of Eochaidh, bishop, of Rath-muirbuilg and Slieve Donard, March 24. He is sometimes called Dominicus, and is on this account to be distinguished from Domhno, Modomnocus, or Dominicus (Feb. 13). [DOMHNOG.] He was son of Eochaidh, son of Muiredhach Muinderg (red-necked), king of Ulster, and of the race of Fiatach Finn, monarch of Eriinn, and of the seed of Heremon. His mother was Derevilla or Derinill, surnamed Cethuir Chicheach, that is, of the four paps, or, more probably, of the four provinces; through her he was brother of St. Mura (Mar. 12) of Fathain (now Fahen, in Enishoven), and others (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 85; Reeves, Ecol. Antiq. 154, 236). Eochaidh appears to have done his utmost to thwart the teachers of the Christian faith, and is said to have even put two virgins to death, but his pious queen tried to make amends, and both Joceline and Evinus in their Lives of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thom. 94, c. 130, 114 n. ¹³¹, 161, cc. 64-5. 187 n. ⁹⁴) relate how she besought mercy for her unborn infant, and how St. Patrick was the means of imparting the blessing which conveyed, not an earthly, but a heavenly sceptre, to her son, who was named Domhangort, or by contraction Donard. But this story connecting him with the age of St. Patrick is extremely doubtful, and is simply impossible, if St. Domhangort was brother of St. Mura who flourished in the first half of the 7th century; O'Clery's date of A.D. 506 for his death is unquestionably wrong in any view of the matter, and he could not have flourished at the end of the 5th century as Colgan (Acta SS. p. 327 n. ⁴) imagines. The beginning of the 7th century is more likely to have been the time when he lived, though it is uncertain, but in this case he could not have been grandson of Muiredhach Muinderg, who died A.D. 479. He was founder and patron of two churches; one was called Rath-Murbhuilg in Dalriada (properly Dalaradia), at the foot of Sliabh Slainge, which was afterwards called Slieve Donard from this saint, and the other was on the top of the mountain at a long distance from all human dwellings. The former was afterwards called Rath and Machaire-Ratha, and is now Maghera, a parish in the barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, and situated on Dundrum Bay, where also we find the ancient Murbhuilg in Murlough, a townland in Maghera parish (Reeves, Ecol. Antiq. 27-8, 154-5); at this church his bell called Ghunan was long preserved, and also one of his shoes in a reliquary of gold and silver. Of the latter church there are still remains, and a very interesting account of them was given by Harris (Down, 121) in the last century. Of the time of his death we have no knowledge. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. 24, tom. iii. 481) give a memoir from the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick and from that by Joceline, but their conclusion is that his cultus is certain and everything else uncertain; while his relationship to St. Mura "non ita liquidum, ut sit extra suspitionem falsitatis." (Lanigan, ii. c. 14, § 5; Colgan, Acta SS. 742 sq.; Giralduus Cambrensis, Top. Hib. Dist. iii. c. 2; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 207-8; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 104; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 137-39; O'Hart, Irish Pedigrees, 188 n.) [J. G.]

DOMHANGORT (2) Besides the foregoing, there was another Domhangort in Ireland, who was son of Saran, and brother of St. Domhnog, Dominicus, or Modomnocus (Feb. 13 and May 18); he must have flourished with his brother about the end of the 5th century (Colgan, Acta SS. 326, c. 1, 327 n. ⁴; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 5). [J. G.]

DOMHNOG, son of Saran, of Tiprat-fachtna, in the west of Osraighe, Feb. 13, May 18. On the former day Colgan (Acta SS. 326-7) gives a memoir, Mart. Doneg. has the feast of Modhomhnog, and Mart. Tall. that of Modimoc; at the latter Mart. Tall. has the feast of Modomnoc, and Mart. Doneg. that of Domhnog. Modomhnoc is simply the honorific form of Domhnog, and means 'My Domhnog.' He is also known by the latinised forms of Dominicus, and Dominic of Ossory. Colgan has collected the acts attributed to the saint, and from him we learn that he was son of Saran, son of Tighernach, of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall. For a stricter life and greater perfection he left Ireland, and was under St. David at Menevia, where he progressed so favourably in learning and piety, and especially in the virtue of obedience, that he became St. David's greatest favourite, and was miraculously saved from death by St. David, as we read in the Life of St. David. But that for which he is best known, is the transporting of bees from Menevia to Ireland. To attest the fact of his taking bees to Ireland Colgan quotes several authorities, such as St. Aengus the Culdee, and Peter Lombard of Armagh, yet he does not contend for more than the introduction of a better breed by St. Domhnog, and, perhaps, a more careful system of culture. But, according to the legend, the bees swarmed about the vessel as he was leaving Wales, and after two ineffectual attempts to depart without them, he had to sail to Ireland with this strange convoy, and this is made the first introduction of bees into Ireland. Llann-beachaire, that is, the church of the bee-man, where St. Molaga (Jan. 20) of Tulach-min was venerated, and which is identified by Joyce with "the ruined church and cemetery in Bre-more, a little north of Balbriggan, now nameless, but which, in the Reg. Alani of the see of Dublin, is called Lambeecher," is said to have received its name from a swarm of St. Domhnog's bees, which St. Molaga placed there. St. Domhnog settled at a place called Tiprad-fachtna, in Ossory, near the river Suir (now Tibberaghny or Tipheraghny, in the barony of Iberk, co. Kilkenny). As a disciple of St. David he must have lived at the end of the 6th century; he was very greatly venerated in Ossory, and had a double dedication. (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 5, iii. c. 18, § 3; Giralduus Cambrensis, *Top. DOMINAE. In the parish of Barr, in Ayrshire, there is a chapel called Kirk Dominae, probably the church of Our Lady (New Stat. Acc. Scot. Ayrshire, 409; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 324). [J. G.]

DOMINIC of Ossory. [DOMHNOG.]

DOMINICA, wife of the emperor Valens, suffered from dreadful dreams the night her husband had imprisoned Basil the Great (Soer. iv. 21). [E. B. B.]

DOMINICUS (1), ST., bishop of Cambray. He acted as vicar to St. Vedastus for the churches of Arras and Cambray, and succeeded him in his see, about A.D. 540. (Gall. Christ. iii. 4.)

[D. R. J.]

DOMINICUS (2), bishop of Carthage, sent an epistle by bishops Donatus and Quodvultdeus, deacon Victor, and notary Agilegius to congratulate Gregory the Great on his election (Greg. Ep. ii. 47, p. 610, vol. iii. 586). Gregory afterwards congratulated him on his zeal against the heretics, but reproved him for his too great severity in stripping of their episcopal dignity and estates those who were negligent in seeking them out (Epp. v. 5, p. 731; vi. 19; viii. 33; xii. 1 are the same). [E. B. B.]

(3) Bishop of Civita Vecchia, A.D. 601 (Greg. Magn. Ep. i. 13, p. 499). [E. B. B.]

(4), 11th bishop of Carpentras, ruled his diocese from the year 640 to 645, and was succeeded by Licorius (Gall. Christ. i. 898). [D. R. J.]

(5) 16th bishop of Amiens, was present at the translation of St. Lambert, A.D. 721 (Gall. Christ. ix. 1156). [D. R. J.]

(6) Seventh bishop of Sion (Sedunum), occurs in the catalogue of Agaunum (St. Maurice) towards the year 516, in succession to St. Protasius I. (Gall. Christ. xii. 735). [D. R. J.]

DOMINIUS, third bishop of Geneva, lived in the first half of the 5th century. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 378.) [D. R. J.]

DOMITIANUS (1) A.D. 81-96. This emperor, though placed by Lactantius (de Mort. Persecut. c. 3) and others in the lists of the persecutors of the church, can hardly be considered as having made any systematic effort to crush Christianity as such. Through the greater part of the empire the disciples of Christ seem to have been unmolested. The traces of persecution, such as they are, seem rather to belong to his general policy of suspicion and cruelty. Indirectly they have the interest of shewing in what way the new religion was attracting notice and to what extent it was spreading.

1. What Suetonius relates (Domit. c. 12) as affecting the Jews of Rome must indirectly, probably chiefly, have involved the Christians. Some, he says, who led a "Jewish life," neglected to register themselves as Jews, and so evaded the payment of the tax which, after the destruction of Jerusalem, had been imposed on all Jews throughout the empire, in lieu of the didrachma which they had formerly contributed to the Temple. Others again, though Jews by birth, tried to conceal their origin. They were dragged before the procurator and examined, that it might be seen whether they were or were not circumcised. It is obvious that the first class may have included many converts from Heathenism to Christianity, whose mode of life was popularly identified with that of the Jews; and that the latter may have embraced others, who being converts from Judaism, no longer thought themselves bound to register their names as belonging to a religion which they had renounced.

2. Vespasian, before his death, had given orders (Euseb. H. E. iii. 12) that inquiry should be made for all who claimed to be descendants of the house of David, seeking in this way to cut off all who might on the strength of that claim incite the Jews to a fresh revolt. The fears of Domitian led him to continue the search, and Hegesippus (in Euseb. H. E. iii. 19, 20) records one striking incident connected with it. The delatores whom the emperor's policy called into activity, found out the grandchildren of Judas the brother of the Lord, gave information to Evocatus, the prefect of Judaea, and they were taken by him to Rome and brought before the emperor's presence. They acknowledged, on being questioned, that they were of the kingly line, but when required to give an account of their possessions, declared that they had but 9000 denarii between them, and that not in cash, but in land which they tilled with their own hands, and on which they paid the legal dues. They stated further that the only kingdom they looked for was one spiritual and angelic, to be manifested at the end of the world. The emperor, Hegesippus goes on to say, thought them beneath his notice, released them, and allowed them to go back to Judaea, and put a stop to the persecution against the church which he had begun. In the mouth of such a writer the persecution of which he speaks was probably that caused by the very inquiry of which they had all but been the victims. The Judæan followers of the Christ, whom they habitually spoke of as of the seed of David, would inevitably come under the suspicion which was restlessly on the watch against any appeal to the hopes of the conquered population.

3. Towards the close of Domitian's reign we find the record of a domestic tragedy, which reminds us in part of the case of Pomponia Graecina [CLAUDIUS], and which there is good reason for connecting with the progress of Christianity. The emperor had a cousin of the name of Flavius Clemens, whom at one time he held in high favour. He gave him his niece Flavia Domitilla in marriage, changed the names of his sons to Vespasian and Domitian, and designated them as heirs to the empire. Finally he nominated him as his colleague in the consulship. Suddenly, almost within the year of his consulship, he put him to death. His wife was banished to Pandataria, his daughter, bearing the same name as her mother, to Pontia. It would seem as if revenge for these acts of tyranny had no small share in bringing about the emperor's death. Among the conspirators who were concerned in his assassination the most prominent was an agent and freedman of the banished widow of Clemens, of the name of Stephanus. So far we have the story as told by Suetonius (Domit. cc. 15 and 17). It remains to see on what grounds church writers like Eusebius (H. E. iii. 18) claim the three members of the Flavian house as among the first illustrious martyrs of royal rank. (1) Flavius Clemens himself is described by Suetonius (l. c.) as "contemptissimæ inertiae." One who sought to lead a Christian life would naturally be so described by men of his own rank and by the outer world, just as Tertullian complains that the Christians of his time were stigmatised, when other charges failed, as "infructuosi negotiis" (Apol. c. 42). (2) The specific charge against Clemens and the two Domitillæ is reported by Dio Cassius (lxvii. 14) and Xiphilinus (p. 766) to have been that of atheism. The same accusation, the latter adds, was brought against many others who shewed a bias towards Jewish customs. This again agrees with the general feeling of the Roman world towards the Christians at a later period, and may fairly be looked on as the first instance of what was afterwards so common. (3) The evidence of later tradition comes in to confirm these inferences. Jerome tells us (Ep. 27) how Paula visited the island of Pontia, on her way to Jerusalem, as already an object of reverence, and saw the three cells in which Domitilla and her two eunuchs Achilleus and Nereus had lived during their exile. They were said to have returned to Rome and suffered martyrdom under Trajan. A church on the Coelian Hill at Rome dedicated to St. Clement, in which a tablet was discovered in 1725 to the memory of Flavius Clemens, martyr, and described by Cardinal Albani (T. Flavii Clementis Viri Consularis et Martyris Tumulus illustratus, 1727) seems from the fact just mentioned to have commemorated the consul and not the writer of that name. Even the name of Clement of Alexandria, Titus Flavius Clemens, may fairly be regarded as an indication of the honour in which the martyr's memory was held. On the whole, everything seems to indicate that the received tradition is true, and that the Christian church was almost on the point, even before the close of the 1st century, of furnishing a successor to the imperial throne.

4. With the reign of Domitian is also connected the legend of St. John's presence at Rome, and of his being thrown, before the Porta Latina, at the command of the emperor, into a caldron of boiling oil, and then banished to Patmos. Tertullian (de Praescript. c. 36) is the first writer who mentions it. If we were to attach any historical value to the narrative, it would probably connect itself rather with the story told by Hegesippus than with the tale of Clemens and Domitilla. The apostle, as known to have been the chosen friend of the Son of David, may have been pointed out by the delatores of Ephesus as the descendants of Judas were in Judaea. Tertullian, in speaking elsewhere (Apol. c. 5) of Domitian's conduct towards the church, describes him as only attempting a persecution, and then, thinking better of it, himself recalling those whom he had condemned to exile. In other accounts (Euseb. H. E. iii. 20) the decree of recall was connected with the accession of Nerva. [E. H. P.]

DOMITIANUS (2), ST., a doubtful bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, supposed to have lived in the 4th century, and commemorated on the 9th of August. (A.A. SS. Boll. Aug. ii. p. 413.) Gams (Series Episc. p. 534) mentions him under the year 344. [D. R. J.]

(3) A prefect, assassinated by orders of the Caesar Gallus, for which crime the prince himself was punished by Constantius, A.D. 354 (Greg. Nyss. Con. Eunom. lib. i., Pat. Gr. xlv. 263 A.). [E. B. B.]

(4) An offender whom Basil the Great entreats duke Andronicus to pardon (Bas. Ep. 112). [E. B. B.]

(5) The 'oeconomus' of the church of Constantinople. Chrysostom, hearing of his want of funds to supply the necessities of the widows and orphans after his deposition, wrote to his intimate friend Valentinus, requesting him to supply him (Chrysost. Epist. 217). He visited Rome in Chrysostom's behalf, A.D. 405, and communicated to Innocent the vindictive judicial proceedings against Olympias, Pentadia, and others of Chrysostom's friends (Pallad. 28). [E. V.]

DOMITIANUS (6) Quaestor, wrote to Helladius of Tarsus and to Theodoret, publishing a certain law obtained by John of Antioch, and entreating them to re-enter into communion with that patriarch (Labbe, Conc. iii. 829, 859). [E. B. B.]

(7) One to whom Nilus writes (Ep. ii. 233) to point out how the Holy Communion presupposes the Resurrection of the Lord. [E. B. B.]

(8) ST., abbat of the monastery of Bebrrou, or St. Rambert de Joux or St. Rambert-le-Jouy (St. Ragnebertus Jurensis), in the diocese of Lyon. Period, 4th or 5th century. Commemorated on the 1st of July. The first mention of him is by Ado, archbishop of Vienne (A.D. 875), in his Martyrologium. The legend preserved in the ancient MSS. of the monastery is full of inaccuracies and anachronisms. (Gall. Christ. iv. 254; Ado Vienn. Martyrolog. p. 295; Patrol. Lat. cxliii.; AA. SS. Boll. July, i. pp. 46-55.) [D. R. J.]

(9) Bishop, by whom Leo writes to Marcian, Aug. 17, A.D. 458 (Leo, Ep. 133). [E. B. B.]

(10) I. Seventh bishop of Geneva, about the year 470. In the church of St. Victor, which was built in Cevennes in the 5th century, by queen Sedelenba, the eldest daughter of Chilperic, the following inscription was discovered: "Acta sunt haec regnante Domitiano episcopo Genevensi, quo tempore etiam castrum Solodurense episcopatu Genevensi subditum erat," whence it has been supposed, but without sufficient reason, that Domitian ruled his diocese in the time of Sedelenba, who in the year 486 was driven into exile by Gundebaldus. The best authorities apply to Domitian I. an earlier date than the time of queen Sedelenba, and place him amongst the first bishops of the diocese of Geneva. (Fredegarius Scholasticus, Chronic. c. 22, Patrol. Lat. lxxi.; Ier. Gallic. Script. ii. 398; Gall. Christ. xvi. 379, and xii. 777.) [D. R. J.]

(11) Bishop of Cologne, was the seventh in succession, coming between Simonius and Charentinus. He subscribed to the council of Auvergne, which was held in the year 535: "Domitianus in Christi nomine episcopus ecclesiae Coloniensis consensit et subscripsit." In some codices, as Jacobus Sigmundus tells us, the reading is, "Episcopus de Colonia." In the Pithoean codex we read, "Episcopus Ecclesiae Tungrorum," from which Le Cointe infers that Domitian ought not to be reckoned amongst the bishops of Cologne; but against this we have the superior authority of the Codex Fossatensis and others. The name of Domitian is also to be found in the synodic epistle written to king Theodebert. (Gall. Chr. iii. 624.) [D. R. J.]

(12) 12th bishop of Angers, was present at the third council of Paris in the year 557. In the acts of that council, a Domitianus is mentioned without reference to his see, and he is thought to have been bishop of Angers. About the year 563 he subscribed to the epistle written conjointly by the bishops of the province of Tours, "about paying tithes, reconciliation with enemies, and dissolving incestuous marriages." Domitianus is also reckoned amongst the bishops who sat in the second council of Tours, A.D. 567, after which, it seems, he subscribed to the letter of Eufro-nius to Radegundis, the wife of king Clotharius. In the year 568 he was present at the consecra-tion of the church of Nantes, a fact referred to by Fortunatus in the following couplet:—

Domitianus, item Victorius, ambo columnae, Spes in utrisque manens pro regionis ope.

Domitianus was held in great esteem by Fortu-natus, who was never tired of singing his praises. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 548; Claudius Menardus in Peplo Andegavensi; Rivetius, Hist. Franciae Litter. iii. 280.) [D. R. J.]

DOMITIANUS (13) ST., bishop of Maes-tricht, was born of a good family in Gaul about the middle of the 6th century, and is com-memorated on the 7th May. He succeeded St. Eucharius in the bishopric, but it is not known in what year. He was very zealous in preaching, in almsgiving, and in converting the pagans, of whom there were many in his diocese. He took an active part in the general council of Orleans for the suppression of Arianism, and distin-guished himself above all the other bishops by his eloquence, on which account he was elected by them to the special work of resisting heresy. He was also present and subscribed at the synod of Clermont in the reign of Thudbertus, king of Austrasia, A.D. 535.

Among the tales associated with his name, occurs the legend how in the neighbourhood of Huy in his time there was a certain well which was said to be infested by a dragon, in conse-quence of which many people were afflicted with dreadful diseases, and beasts and cattle drinking thereof died. At the request of the people Domitian went to the well, and having said a prayer exorcised the dragon, who immediately descended from the well into the depths of the earth and never more appeared. The saint then struck his pastoral staff into the ground, and thereby miraculously produced a fresh spring of pure water, which cured all kinds of diseases.

In the council of Orleans, which was held in the 38th year of the reign of Childebert (A.D. 547 or 549), Domitian subscribed 15th in order. He died on the 7th May, and was buried in the church of St. Mary of Huy. (Migne, Encycl. Theolog. xl. 767; AA. SS. Boll. May, ii. 146.)

[D. R. J.]

DOMITIANUS (14) ANCYRANUS bp. of Ancyra and metropolitan, one of the Acephali, and an eager advocate of Origenism. He was an intimate friend of Theodore Ascidas, who, though made bishop of the Cappadocian Caesarea, usually resided at Constantinople, and aided him in his intrigues to secure the favour of Justinian for their party. He was the author of a treatise On the Origenian Controversy addressed to pope Vigilius, A.D. 545, quoted by Facundus in his Defence of the Three Chapters (lib. i. c. 2; lib. iv. c. 4; Migne, lxvii. 532, 627), in which he frankly states that the Origenists had adopted the device of raising a controversy about "the Three Chapters" in order to divert public atten-tion from their own dogmas (Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 523). [E. V.]

(15) Bishop of Melitene and metropolitan of Roman Armenia, born of Christian parents of wealth and rank, near of kin to the emperor Maurice in the time of Justin II. (c. A.D. 564), was well taught in sacred and profane literature, took a pious and faithful wife, was soon left a widower, and gave himself to virtue and the fear of God, and gained so high a character, that he was not only made bishop, but by his fame drew Chosru Parviz, king of Persia, to love him, and brought him into allegiance to the emperor Maurice. For the Persian wrote to the Roman: "If you send Domitian, and he carry me along with him, I am not only your friend, but your slave." This mission was A.D. 589 or 590. His fellow envoys were Narses and Gregory of Antioch. All obstacles to the alliance were smoothed over, but Chosroes was not converted. As Gre-gory the Great says, in congratulating Domitian, A.D. 593 (Ep. iii. 67), "An Ethiopian comes black out of the bath, but the bathman gets his pay." Domitian had sent Gregory for his con-solation an allegorical interpretation of the story of Dinah, which was not Gregory's own, and is congratulated for finding time amid his states-manship and missionary labours for the study of Scripture. He must have been a main supporter of the orthodox doctrine in the controversies with Eutychianism, then rife in the East. Eulo-gius, patriarch of Alexandria, dedicated to him his books against Severus and Timotheus (Photius, Cod. 225). He is probably the same as the Domi-tian reproved, along with Peter and Elpidius, by Gregory in A.D. 596 for crying out, "This is the day that the Lord hath made" at the appointment of Cyriacus to the see of Constantinople (Greg. Ep. vii. 7, p. 854, vol. iii. 860; in Ep. v. 15, for Datian some copies have Domitian). When Mau-ricius fell ill, he made a will appointing Domitian to be tutor to his sons, which was discovered in the first year of Heraclius (Theophyl. Sim. viii. 11). But Domitian died at Constantinople Jan. 10 or 11, A.D. 502, and his funeral in the church of the Holy Apostles was attended by all the senate. His relics were afterwards transferred to his own eastern see, and there said to work miracles. (Men. Basii, Jan. 10; Theoph. p. 410, 438; Evagrius, vi. 16-18; Theophyl. Sim. iv. 14; Ceillier, xi. 494, 590.) [E. B. B.]

DOMITILLA FLAVIA, the niece of the emperor Domitian, married to her cousin Flavius Clemens (CLEMENS FLAVIUS), who, with her hus-band, was condemned on a charge variously re-presented as "atheism" and "Judaising" (Sueton. Domit. c. 18; Dio Cassius, lxxvii. 14). Clemeut suffered capital punishment, and she was banished, A.D. 96, to the island of Pandateria, where, ac-cording to Jerome (ad Eustoch. Epist. 86), she remained many years in exile. Jerome states that he himself had seen the cells in which she dragged out her existence, and praises Paula for taking the voyage thither "to behold the monument of so noble a confessor." Domitilla's place of banishment, however, according to Jerome, was Pontia, not Pandateria. The acts of martyrdom of Nereus and Achilleus also bring before us a Domitilla, of whom they were the "cubicularii" or "grooms of the bed-chamber," also banished to Pontia. This Domitilla is represented as being the virgin daughter of Plautilla, an assumed sister of Flavius Clemens, and therefore the niece of the other Domitilla, who with her mother is asserted to have been baptized by St. Peter. Eusebius also, quoting from the heathen historian Brutius, agrees with the above "Acts" in making Domitilla the niece, not the wife, of Clemens, and the place of her banishment Pontia, not Pandateria (Euseb. H. E. iii. 18; Chron. p. 382 (Mai), sub anno 95). Hence many writers, including Tillemont (Mém. Eccl. ii. 124 ff.), and Imhoff (Domitianus, p. 116), make two Domitillas, aunt and niece, both banished for the faith to a Mediterranean island. The improbability of this is great, and we may safely affirm with Lightfoot (Philippians, p. 22, note 1), that "it can hardly be doubtful that one and the same person is intended in these notices. Pontia and Pandateria are neighbouring islands, and the different accounts of her relationship may be explained very easily by the carelessness of Eusebius or some early transcriber." Tillemont allows that the "Acts of Nereus and Achilleus" are a manifest forgery, probably of a Manichean origin, containing only a germ of truth. All he ventures to assert of these supposed martyrs is that they were beheaded at Terracina, and buried on the Ardeatine Way, where one of the earliest of the Roman Christian burial vaults, or catacombs, evidently from its construction and decoration belonging to the imperial times, still exists, under the joint appellation of "Coemiterium Domitillae" and "Coemiterium Nerei et Achillis" (Northeote, Roma Sotterranea, p. 69 sq.). The primitive date of this tradition is proved by the cemetery having been restored by John I., A.D. 525 (Anastas. p. 89), and by the fact of Gregory the Great having delivered a Homily on the festival of SS. Nereus and Achilleus in the Basilica bearing their name (Homil. in Evangel. 28).

[E. V.]

DOMITIUS (1) professor of rhetoric at Clermont, whom Sidonius (Poem. 18, p. 1271) invites to his country house at Avitae, describing his tennis court.

[E. B. B.]

(2), ST., Confessor. Lived before the middle of the 8th century, and is commemorated on October 23. He was an ecclesiastic of unknown degree, who lived near Amiens. By one writer he is called presbyter and canon. By others he is thought to have been only a deacon. No one except Molanus calls him a bishop. He resigned his preferment, whatever it was, and turned hermit. In his time lived St. Ulphia, virgin, whom at her earnest request Domitius adopted as his spiritual daughter, he being very old at the time, and she quite young. He was accustomed to resort every night for prayer to the church of St. Mary, where the monastery of St. Acheolus subsequently arose, and to return to his cell at six in the morning. His relics, together with those of SS. Firminius and Ulphia, were translated in 1279 to the cathedral church of Amiens, and placed under the high altar (AA. SS. Boll. Oct. x. 143; Migne, Encycl. Théolog. xl. 753).

[D. R. J.]

DOMNEVA (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 648), queen. [EORMENBURGA.]

DOMNINA. [CLAUDIUS (4).]

(2) A lady of Antioch, who at the outbreak of the Diocletian persecution fled to Edessa with her daughters, Berenice and Proscodia, but her husband came with soldiers to fetch her back. On the road the ladies seized an opportunity to drown themselves; dreading the outrages that might await them. The fact is recorded by Eusebius (H. E. viii. 12); but he does not give their names. For our knowledge of these we are indebted to a sermon of Chrysostom on their festival, within twenty days of the festival of the Cross (Chrys. t. 1, Hom. 51). Both these fathers highly applaud the deed. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, i. 26) supposes it must have been justified by special revelation.

This Domnina is not known to the Menology, but only the martyr of Anazarbus in Cilicia, under Lysias (see CLAUDIUS (4) and ASTERIUS) in the beginning of the Diocletian persecution; commemorated Oct. 12, and a hermitess of Cyra Feb. 28. The latter was contemporary with Theodoret, who wrote her life, and assures us she never spoke without tears. (Theodor. Hist. Rel. p. 814; Ceillier, x. 64.)

DOMNINUS (1) Martyr at Thessalonica under Galerius, who was building a palace in that town, and was affronted to find that there could still be an avowed Christian in his immediate neighbourhood. When Dominus confessed, he bade them cut his mouth with scourges, and, as he persisted, he commanded them to take him outside the city, break his legs, and leave him. In that state he lingered on for seven days without food, giving thanks to the last (Men. Basil. Oct. 1).

[E. B. B.]

(2) Martyr, brought before Maximin at Caesarea, Nov. 5, A.D. 307, with Theotimus, Timotheus, Philotheus, Dorotheus, Carterius, Silvanus, and others. Eusebius tells us that he had shone in many other confessions, and was well known throughout Palestine for his great freedom of speech at such times, and that he alone on that day was condemned to the flames. See PAMPHILUS. (Eus. Mart. Palaest. vii.)

[E. B. B.]

(3), ST., bishop of Digne, lived in the 4th century, and is commemorated on the 13th February. He came with St. Marcellinus, or Marcellus, and Vincentius from Africa to preach the gospel in Gaul. Dominus and Vincentius were co-disciples, and they first went with their master Marcellinus to Rome when St. Eusebius was pope and Constantine emperor, about the year 310. When after they had been with him for some time in Alpine Gaul, Marcellinus sent them on a mission together, telling them that they were to go like the disciples of old, who went in pairs, and that although absent in body, he would be with them in spirit. Dominus settled at Digne, which was at that time given up to idolatry. Here, though he at first met with some opposition, his labours were crowned with signal success, for the people forsook their idols in crowds, and as many as five hundred were baptized in one day.

After a time he was enabled to build a church in honour of the blessed Virgin, and then Marcellinus came and consecrated him bishop. Meanwhile the church in the East was beginning to suffer from the Arian heresy, and the council of Nicea was held. But Dominus kept his flock uncontaminated by the new heresy. At length, when he felt that he was about to depart, he appointed Vincentius his successor, and died on the 13th February, in the reign of Constantine.

During their mission Dominus and Vincentius traversed the greater part of the Maritime Alps. (AA. SS. Boll. Feb. ii. pp. 660-61. Petrus Gassendus, In Ecclesiam Diniensem, quoted in Gall. Christ. iii. 1109.) [D. R. J.]

DOMNINUS (4), bishop of Marciianopolis, in the province of Moesia Inferior, circ. A.D. 360. He interested himself, together with the Arian bishop Valens, for the recall of Eunomius, the opponent of Basil of Caesarea. (Philostorg. ix. viii.; Patrol. Graec. lxxv. 575; Ceillier, vi. 261.) [W. M. S.]

(5) Bishop of Gratianopolis (Grenoble), attended the council of Aquileia, and joined in the condemnation of Palladius and Secundianus (Ambrose, iii. 821-843). He is also known as St. Dominus (Gall. Christ. xvi. 219; Labbe, Concil. t. iii. col. 999.) [J. L. D.]

(6) A young man of the 4th-5th century, of noble birth, in answer to whom Nilus of Sinai wrote a very long letter on temptations and the means of surmounting them. (Nilus, Epist. lib. iii. 43, Patrol. Graec. lxxix. 407; Ceillier, vii. 220.) [W. M. S.]

(7) Presbyter of the 4th-5th century, to whom Nilus of Sinai wrote three letters on toleration, patience, and prayer. He appears to have been a man of hasty, ardent, and contemptuous disposition. (S. Nil. Epist. iii. 144, 145, 146, Patrol. Graec. lxxix. 449.) [W. M. S.]

(8) Bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, who was consecrated by Praylius, bishop of Jerusalem, though a "digamus." (Theodoret, Epist. 110; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. iii. col. 567.) [E. V.]

(9) and CYRIACUS, the deacons appointed to summon the bishops to the sessions of the council of Chalcedon (Labbe, Conc. iv. 381.) [E. B. B.]

(10), ST., 22nd bishop of Vienne, succeeded St. Julian, according to Ado and others, towards the middle of the 6th century; the precise year is not stated. His name, however, does not occur in the acts of any council. In the chronicle of Ado, referred to above, he is said to have distinguished himself as much in divine as in secular arts; to have been a lover of the poor, a redeemer of captives, and most upright in his life. His learning and manners made him very popular among the clergy of Vienne. According to the Martyrology of Ado he was commemorated on the 3rd November. Flavius Lacanius, an illustrious man, built a chapel in honour of him and a tomb with a poetical epitaph under the following heading: "Dominus papa, in nomine Christi pauper episcopos." The word "papa" is perhaps worthy of note, as customary in the 6th century. We may compare the common use amongst bishops of the phrase "Your Holiness," in addressing each other (Gall. Christ. xvi. 23; Le Blant, Inscript. Christ. ii. 56; Adonis Martyrologium, Patrol. Lat. exxiii. 9.) [D. R. J.]

DOMNIO, a presbyter of Rome towards the end of the 4th century, to whom Jerome sent his notes on the twelve Minor Prophets, which no longer exist, accompanied by an introductory letter. (Hieron. Ep. ad Pammachum, p. 243.) There exists a second letter from Jerome to Domnio, in answer to a letter in which Domnio had asked him to reply to certain criticisms on Jerome's book against Jovinian. The letter of Domnio shews that the critic was a young monk. Jerome treats him with great contempt. (Hieron. Ep. ad Domn. p. 244.) In A.D. 394 Domnio received at Rome Paulinus, presbyter of Barcelona, afterwards bishop of Nola. (Paulin. Ep. 3 and 5, Patrol. Lat. lxi.) Paulinus, in a letter to Alypius, gives him the title of Father. Domnio was canonised, and is celebrated on Dec. 28. (Migne, Encycl. Théolog. xl. 771; Ceillier, vii. 603, viii. 52; August. Epistol. Classis, i. 29; Patrol. Lat. xxxiii. 100.) [W. M. S.]

DOMNITIUS, a friend to whom Sidonius describes how king Sigismar, on his way to wed the daughter of the king of the Visigoths, made his entry into the city, where he himself then was (Sidon. Ep. iv. 20.) [E. B. B.]

DOMNOLENUS, ST., confessor, Auxerre. Is commemorated on October 21, but there is no certainty as to who he was or when he lived. He is supposed to have been the Domnolenus whom St. Vigilius mentions in his will—"Do ad unam cappam villam Leodebardo meas portiones, quas de Sperio et Domnoleno presbytero habere videor"—in which case he must have lived towards the end of the 7th century, as St. Vigilius died about 685.

(2) Ganfredus Vosiensis wrote in 1184:—In the church of St. Gregory (Limosin), near the monastery of St. Andrew, is seen the tomb of St. Domnolenus, concerning whom nothing is known except the report that he was prince of Limosin, and his festival is on July 1. His body was translated outside the city in 1534.

St. Domnolenus of Auxerre, however, and his namesake of Limosin are thought to be two distinct persons. The former is commonly known as St. Andelain, the latter as St. Damppolet, St. Anolet, St. Tonnolein, St. Ounoulé (AA. SS. Boll. Oct. ix. p. 324; Gall. Christ. xii. 432, ii. 539.) [D. R. J.]

DOMNOLUS (1), ST., 10th bishop of Le Mans, brother of St. Audoinus bishop of Angers. "In the time of king Clothaire," says Gregory of Tours, "he was abbat of the monastery of St. Laurence at Paris. During the life of king Childebert the elder, he had been signally faithful to Chlothaire, often concealing his spies; accordingly, when Clothaire was king, he looked out for him a bishopric. When the bishop of Avignon died, Clothaire thought that see would suit him. But Domnolus, hearing of this, repaired to the church of St. Martin, where Clothaire had come to say his prayers, and after spending the whole night in watching, persuaded the attendants of the king to suggest that he did not wish to be banished from his sight like a captive; let not the king suffer his simplicity to be taxed by sophistical senators and philosophical judges at Avignon; the place would be for his abasement, not for his honour. The king agreed. So when Innocens, bishop of Le Mans died, he appointed Domnolus to that see." This must have been in 559 or 560, as Gregory says that Domnolus died in the 7th year of king Childebert, which was the 21st of Chilperic and Guntchramn, or A.D. 581, after an episcopate of 22 years. This passage of Gregory has been rejected by Le Cointe (ad ann. 545) and by Papebrochius; but their objections have been sufficiently met by Bouquet.

The acts of Domnolus state that he was returning from Rome, when elected by the people and clergy of Le Mans. The first mention of his episcopate is apparently in 566, in a charter falsely attributed to the abbat Gallus; and in the same year in another charter by which St. Germain is thought by some to grant a privilege to the abbey of St. Cross; by others it is rejected. In 567 he was present at the second council of Tours.

His virtues soon acquired him the reputation of one of the greatest prelates of his age. His friends were the most illustrious of his order, among them St. Germain of Paris. Part of the night he passed in prayer, and during his meals he read books which placed before him the religious ideal. His faith in his creed was so great that he could not officiate at the Eucharist without shedding tears. To the poor he disbursed enormous sums; he founded the abbey of St. Vincent du Mans, finished that of St. George, and founded a monastery and a hospital between Beaugé and La Sarthe.

In his old age he desired to nominate a successor, and proposed abbat Theodulph, but the choice was not accepted, and fell upon Baldégisile, mayor of the palace to Chilperic.

Domnolus died shortly after, Dec. 1, 581. His body was interred, at his desire, in the abbey of St. Vincent. His relics were kept there till 1793; but his head was at the church of Chaume-en-Brie, where his feast was celebrated under the name of St. Dôme. His days are May 16 and Dec. 1. His will exists, and is given in vol. lxxii. of the Latin Patrology, p. 629. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 345; Le Cointe, ad ann. 545; AA. SS. Bolland. May, iii. p. 603; Migne, Encycl. Théolog. xl. 771.) [W. M. S.]

DOMNOLUS (2), ST., bishop and confessor, Vienne. He was the twenty-ninth archbishop of Vienne, lived in the beginning of the 7th century, the period assigned to him being 617, and is commemorated on June 16. In the time of the emperor Phocas and Clovis king of the Franks, he afforded great assistance to Gregory the Great in the conversion of Britain. He succeeded St. Desiderius, and was succeeded by St. Aetherius. St. Domnolus displayed much zeal in redeeming Christian captives. He also distinguished himself by his bold defence of St. Rusticula, abbess of the monastery of St. Caesarius at Arles, who had been condemned and imprisoned on false charges. St. Domnolus went to the king and told him he was sinning against God in having unjustly condemned a servant of Christ. The king and queen listened to him with great reverence, and ordered the prisoner to be released. (AA. SS. Bolland., June, iii. p. 145; Gall. Christ. xvi. 29.) [D. R. J.]

(3) 12th bishop of Mâcon. At the beginning of his episcopate his city is said to have been besieged by the Arabs. Le Cointe says that he was bishop in 732, and may have lived till the time of king Pippin, from which prince, who was then mayor of the palace, he obtained for his church of Mâcon a charter,

A.D. 743, dated January 1, in the 2nd year of his rule. (Gall. Christ. iv. 1043.)

[D. R. J.]

DOMNULUS (1), imperial quaestor, a pious man, accustomed to retire to the monasteries of the Jura, is informed by Sidonius (Ep. iv. 25) of a provincial council held for the election of a bishop of Châlons, at which Patientius bishop of Lyons presided, and as the popular vote was equally divided, joined with Euphronius in appointing a certain John, who had been a reader from childhood, then archdeacon, then presbyter, to the vacant see. [E. B. B.]

(2) Placed by Honoratus, bishop of Marseilles, with Salvius (or Silvius) and Eusebius as a doctor of the church in the 7th century, celebrated by his excellent writings. Nothing of his work remains. (Honoratus, Vita Hil. cap. xi.; Patrol. Lat. l. p. 1232; Ceillier, viii. 452.) [W. M. S.]

DOMNUS (1) succeeded Theoctistus as bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, A.D. 257 or 258 (Euseb. H. E. lib. vii. c. 14.) [E. V.]

(2) I. Bishop of Antioch, appointed by the council that assembled at Antioch A.D. 269 to consider the heretical teaching of Paul of Samosata, on the condemnation and deposition of that infamous man. Domnus was the son of Paul's predecessor, Demetrianus. He was appointed by the sole authority of the council, without any reference to the clergy and people, the assembled bishops evidently fearing that if the power of choice were allowed them Paul would be re-elected (Euseb. H. E. lib. vii. c. 30). Paul, relying on the support of Zenobia, retained possession for two years of the episcopal residence and the church connected with it. The orthodox section appealed against this usurpation to Aurelianus after he had conquered Zenobia and taken Antioch, A.D. 272. The emperor decided that the right of occupation should belong to the party which was in communion with the bishops of Italy and the see of Rome. This decision was enforced by the civil powers, and Paul was compelled to leave the palace in disgrace (Euseb. H. E. u. s.) The episcopate of Domnus was not a long one. It is variously reckoned at five or three years, according as the terminus a quo is the deposition of Paul in A.D. 269, or his expulsion from the episcopal residence A.D. 272. Domnus died A.D. 274, and was succeeded by Timaeus (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. tom. iv. p. 302; Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. i. p. 193, Clark's translation; Neale, Patriarch. of Antioch, pp. 52-57.) [E. V.]

(3) One of the forty-three solitaries who in the 4th century lived at Raithu, not far from Sinai, in separate caverns, under the rule of the abbat Paul. About A.D. 373 they were attacked by the Blemmyes. One of them hid himself, and after the retreat of the enemy discovered Domnus, Andreas, and Orion still alive. But Domnus died shortly of his wounds. They are celebrated on January 14. (Ceillier, iv. 285; Ex Actis Gracis Combesisii, ed. Paris, A.D. 1660, pag. 95, etc.; AA. SS. Bolland. Januarius, i. ad diem xiv. p. 966.) [W. M. S.]

(4) II. Bishop of Antioch, the second of that name, the friend of Theodoret. He was nephew of John, bishop of Antioch, and was brought up under Euthymius, the famous anchorite of Palestine. He was ordained deacon by Juvenal of Jerusalem, on his visit to the Laura for the purpose of consecrating the church of the community in A.D. 429. Two years afterwards, on learning that his uncle, the bishop of Antioch, had become entangled in the meshes of the Nestorian heresy, he besought Euthymius to allow him to go and extricate him. Euthymius, with a clear insight into the weakness of the young man's character, counselled him to remain where he was; telling him that God could take care of his uncle without him; that solitude was safer for him than the world; that if he persisted in his design it would not turn out to his ultimate advantage; that he might not improbably succeed to his uncle's dignity, but would become the victim of clever and unprincipled men, who would avail themselves of his simplicity, and then accomplish his ruin. But the old man's sage counsels were thrown away. Domnus left the Laura without even saying farewell to Euthymius, whose predictions were only too truly fulfilled (Vita S. Euthymii, cc. 42, 56, 57). He obtained such popularity at Antioch that on the death of his uncle, A.D. 441, he was appointed his successor, and at once took rank as the chief bishop of the Eastern world. In A.D. 445, Domnus summoned a synod of the Syrian bishops to settle the question of the deposition of Athanasius of Perrha, which had remained for some time open, in consequence of his refusal to appear before the assemblies to which he had been summoned to answer the charges against him. Athanasius was condemned in default, his deposition was confirmed, and Sabinius was consecrated in his room. In A.D. 447 he consecrated Irenaeus to the see of Tyre, although he had been twice married (Theodoret, Epist. 110; Labbe, Concil. tom. iii. col. 1275). Theodosius having commanded that the appointment of Irenaeus should be annulled, both as a digamus and as a favourer of the Nestorian heresy, Domnus, notwithstanding all Theodoret's remonstrances, shewed the weakness of his character by yielding to the imperial will (Theodoret, u. s.; Epist. 80). We next find him taking a leading part in the question of the orthodoxy of Ibas, bishop of Edessa, destined to become so notorious. Having visited Hierapolis for the purpose of enthroning the new bishop Stephen, two of the priests of Edessa, Cyrus and Eulogius, took the opportunity of presenting accusations against their bishop, who was charged with promulgating Nestorian doctrines (Labbe, Concil. tom. iv. col. 658). Domnus summoned a council to take cognizance of these charges, which met at Antioch, in A.D. 448, and decided in favour of Ibas, and deposed his accusers (Labbe, tom. iv. col. 639 sq.). Domnus's sentence, though revoked by Flavian, to whom the deposed presbyters appealed, was confirmed by the three episcopal commissioners, to whom he and the emperor Theodosius had committed the matter, who arranged a concordat between the parties. Domnus was one of the earliest impeachers of the orthodoxy of Eutyches, in a synodical letter to Theodosius, about A.D. 447 (Facundus, lib. viii. c. 5; lib. xii. c. 5). When it became evident that Eutyches's demand to have the charges against him heard by a general council would be granted, through the all-powerful influence of the eunuch Chrysaphius, Domnus wrote to apprise Theodoret of it. Theodoret replied by warning Domnus of the dangers to the church he apprehended from such a synod, and counselling him as to the measures he should take to prevent his being crushed by the faction of Dioscorus, and being forced as president of the assembly (a position which as the premier bishop of the East he could not fail to occupy) to give his sanction to the anathematizations of Cyril (Theod. Epist. 112). The advice he gave that Domnus should be very careful what bishops he brought with him to the proposed council, and should select none but those whose strength of character and zeal for the truth could be depended upon, was rendered nugatory by the dominant secular influence. The council, infamous as "the Council of Robbers," or the Latrocinium, held at Ephesus, Aug. 8, A.D. 449, was packed with the grossest unfairness, and its proceedings were characterised by tumult and violence. In virtue of an imperial rescript Domnus found himself deprived of his presidential seat, which was occupied by Dioscorus, the Roman legate took the second place, while by a reversal of the recognised order of the sees, precedence over the patriarch of Antioch was given to Juvenal of Jerusalem, Flavian of Constantinople being degraded to the fifth place (Labbe, Concil. tom. iv. col. 115, p. 251). The weakness of Domnus's character soon made itself evident. Cowed by the dictatorial spirit of Dioscorus, and unnerved by the outrageous violence of Barsumas and his band of brutal monks, he consented to revoke his former condemnation of Eutyches, and gave his voice for his restoration to the dignity of presbyter and abbat (Labbe, ib. col. 258). This cowardly act of submission was followed by a still baser proof of weakness, the condemnation of the venerable Flavian (ib. col. 306). Dioscorus, having thus by sheer intimidation obtained his ends, revenged himself for their former opposition to his wishes, upon those whose cowardice had made them the instruments of his nefarious designs, and proceeded to mete out to them the same measure they had dealt to Flavian. Domnus was the last to be deposed. The charges alleged against him were his reported approval of a Nestorian sermon preached before him at Antioch by Theodoret on the death of Cyril (Mercator, tom. i. p. 276), and some expressions in letters written by him to Dioscorus condemning the perplexed and obscure character of Cyril's anathematizations (Liberatus, c. 11, p. 74). Indisposition, the fruit of self-condemnation and the loss of all self-respect, kept Domnus away from the synod that day, and he was condemned to deposition and banishment in his absence. The remainder of his days appear to have been spent by Domnus in endeavouring to atone for his fatal weakness, by a complete retirement from the public scenes for which he had proved so little fitted. He was the only one of the bishops then deposed and banished who was not reinstated after the council of Chalcedon. At that council Maximus, his successor in the see of Antioch, obtained permission to assign Domnus a pension from the revenues of the church, the sum being left to his discretion (Labbe, ib. col. 681; append. col. 770). Finally, on his recall from exile Domnus returned to the monastic home of his youth, and ended his days in the Laura which his master St. Euthymius had rendered so celebrated, where in A.D. 452, according to Theophanes, he afforded a refuge to the bishop by whom he had been ordained, Juvenal of Jerusalem, when driven from his see by the usurper Theodosius (Theophanes, p. 92). [E. V.]

DOMNUS (5) Bishop of Apamea, a member of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Labbe, Concil. tom. iv. p. 373), who, leaving before its conclusion, had his signature to its acts affixed by Mellitus of Larissa (ib. col. 787). The 87th letter of Theodoret is addressed to him, complaining of his silence in his time of trial, when so many calumnies were heaped upon him by his enemies from Osrhoene. Towards the middle of the 6th century Domnus's name was erased from the diptychs by Peter, an heretical successor (Le Quien, Oriens Christian. tom. ii. p. 912). [E. V.]

(6) III. Bishop of Antioch, the third of the name, succeeded Ephraim in A.D. 546. He was a Thracian by birth, and had presided over an almshouse at Lychnis in Illyricum. Having visited Constantinople on business, he had an interview with Justinian, who was so much charmed with him that he at once nominated him to the vacant see of Antioch. He was present at the oecumenical council of Constantinople, A.D. 553 (Labbe, Concil. tom. v. p. 416, 419 sq.). He occupied the see 14 years, and was succeeded in A.D. 461 by Anastasius Sinaita. (Vita Sim. Stylit. Jun. No. 76; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. ii. f. 734.) [E. V.]

(7) Bishop of Elne (episc. Helenensis—Helena, Helna, and Elna). The Sammarthani say that he ruled the church of Elne before the year 568, and he is supposed to have been the first bishop of that diocese. He was distinguished for the sanctity of his life, the candour of his manners, his profound knowledge of Holy Scripture, and his uncompromising hostility to heresy. In an ancient chronicle occurs the following notice of him: "Domnus Helenensis ecclesiae episcopus clarus habetur." (Gallia. Christ. vi. 1031; Joann. Biclarens. Chronicon, Patrol. Lat. lxxii. 860.) [D. R. J.]

(8) Or DONUS, bishop of Messina, in the 7th century. Pope Gregory the Great, in sending him the pallium, tells him only to use it at the times at which his predecessor had used it, and to add to the external ornament the practice of virtue. In another letter pope Gregory forbids him to exact any money for the burial of the dead. (Greg. Epistolar. lib. vi. num. 9; lib. viii. num. 3, Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. 798, 896; Ceillier, xi. 504, 510.) [W. M. S.]

(9) Pope. [DONUS.]

(10) Forty-first bishop of Avignon, lived in the time of pope Gregory II. and king Chilperic II. In an ancient codex he is described as elected by the people and clergy to succeed St. Veredemius when abbat of St. Peter and St. Paul; he was an illustrious prelate who ruled the church with signal success, and gave an example of good life. It is not known on what day or in what year he died, but the year 743 is mentioned as the most probable. (Gall. Christ. i. 870.) [D. R. J.]

DOMO or DROMO, twenty-ninth abbat of Chartres, succeeded Deodatus in the 7th century (Gall. Christ. viii. 1101.) [D. R. J.]

DONA, Welsh saint of the 7th century, founder of Llanddona church in Anglesey; commemorated on Nov. 1. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 302.) [C. H.]

DONADEUS, 12th bishop of Gap, known from the synod of Narbonne, held in the year 788 under the presidency of Daniel the metropolitan. There was also present at that council Elifantus, archbishop of Arles, who was accompanied by many bishops, amongst whom was Donadeus. (Gall. Christ. ed. 1870, t. i. p. 458.) [D.-R. J.]

DONALD (DONEVALDUS), July 15. St. Donald or Donevaldus, and his nine daughters, are commemorated by Kal. Brev. Aberdeen., Adam King, and Dempster on July 15, and by Camerarius on July 12. St. Donald and his daughters are said by local tradition to have led a religious life in the glen of Ogilvie, in Forfarshire, where they are still remembered as 'The Nine Maidens,' and their dedications are found throughout Forfarshire [MAZOTA]. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 208; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 163; Leslaeus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. lib. iv. 157; Boethius, Hist. Scot. lib. ix. c. 25; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 157, 205, 324.) The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jul. tom. iv. 60) give a memoir of St. Donald and his daughters at July 10, and place them, as the Scotch authorities do, under king Eugenius VII. in the 8th century. [J. G.]

DONANUS (Acta SS. April, ii. 487), Irish saint. [DONNAN.] [C. H.]

DONARD. [DOMHANGORT.]

DONATA (Carthaginian refugee?). Christian at Rome, Cyp. Ep. 22. See MACARIUS. [E. W. B.]

DONATDEUS, deacon in Numidia A.D. 602, deposed by his bishop Victor, appealed to Gregory the Great. (Conc. v. 1612; Ceillier, xi. 910.) [E. B. B.]

DONATIANUS (1), ST., martyr, Nantes. The date assigned to this saint by the Bollandists is 299, and he is commemorated on the 24th of May.

SS. Donatianus and Rogatianus were two brothers of good family at Nantes. Diocletian and Maximian, when they were persecuting the Christians at Rome, sent letters to the Roman governor in Gaul, who is thought to have been Rictiovarus, commanding him to set up images of Jupiter or Apollo in his province, and to compel all the people to worship them. Donatianus and Rogatianus not only refused to comply with the injunctions as to pagan worship, but were accused of making Christian converts, in consequence of which they were arrested and taken before the Roman governor. Donatianus was considered the most important, and was examined first. As they refused to retract, they were first tortured and then ordered to be beheaded, which sentence was carried out, although the executioner, before beheading them, first pierced their throats with his lance. Their bodies were buried at the place of their martyrdom, near Nantes.

In the reign of Constantine an oratory was raised over their tomb, and towards the end of the 5th century a church. Their relics were subsequently translated to the cathedral of Nantes.

[D. R. J.]

DONATIANUS (2) Bishop of Claudii Forum, at the council of Rome A.D. 313. (Labbe, Conc. i. 1404.)

[E. B. B.]

(3) ST., bishop and confessor, cir. 346 (Gams, Series Episc. p. 532), of Châlons-sur-Saône, commemorated on the 7th of August. His name appears among those appended to the council of Cologne, A.D. 346. (Gall. Christ. iv. 861.)

[D. R. J.]

(4) African catechumen, imprisoned with LUCIUS A.D. 359, and after having been baptized in prison, instantly expired. (Ruinart, 233; Ceillier, ii. 388.)

[E. B. B.]

(5) ST., bishop of Rheims, A.D. 360-390, commonly called St. Donas. He was by birth a Roman, his father's name being Cornelius, his mother's Lucina. He succeeded St. Materianus, and was succeeded, according to Baillet, by Viventius. He is either the 7th or 9th bishop. Nothing is known of this saint, but he became very celebrated by the translation of his relics in the 9th century, first to Turnhout or Turholt, then to Bruges, where they were placed in the church of the Virgin, which afterwards took the name of St. Donatian. He thus became the patron saint of Bruges, and tutelary saint of the maritime coast. He is commemorated, first on the 14th October, which is his principal festival, and then on the days of his translations, viz. 6th January, the 24th May, and the 30th August.

[D. R. J.]

(6) Bishop, at the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398. He subscribes as Donatianus Talabritensis primæ sedis, and signs second, after Aurelius bishop of Carthage. (Labbe, Conc. ii. 119.)

(7) Bishop of Telepte, the metropolis and prima sedes of the province of Byzacena, in Africa. He presided at the council at Telepte held A.D. 418. The only thing for which this council is known is the reading of a decretal letter from pope Siricius for the decision of a local dispute, an illustration of the deference felt in the African Church for the bishop of Rome. (Labbe, Conc. ii. 1577.)

[C. H.]

(8) Missionary to Britain. [DUVIANUS.]

DONATILLA, martyred with Maxima and Secunda at Tuburbum, in the province of Byzacena, July 30, A.D. 304, mentioned in the martyrdom of Crispina. (Ruinart, Act. Sinc. Mart. 450.)

[E. B. B.]

DONATISM. The Donatists were the first Christians who separated from the church on the ground of discipline. The church had hitherto been rent and torn by heresies, such as Gnosticism and Manichæism, which had affected doctrines; but the schism of the Donatists was due to objections to the discipline of the church, and became the parent and pattern of all schisms due to a similar cause. It is important to remember that Donatism was not heresy, as the word is ordinarily understood. All heretics are, in one sense, schismatics, but all schismatics are not heretics; and the Donatists themselves protested, with justice, against being considered heretics.

There was much in the religious atmosphere of the time, much in the peculiar locality (North Africa), which helps to explain the origin and development of this schism. The North African loved 'subjectivity,' as opposed to 'objectivity,' and he found it exemplified in a Tertullian, and reduced to a system in Montanism: he was a born mystic rather than a practical apostle, and he turned to Novatianism—that protest against the church which thought well to enfold within its pale believers and unbelievers, good and bad—as his refuge: he resented what he called the assumption of St. Cyprian, and he threw in his lot with Felicissimus or Novatus in that contest which has been described as the first protest of Presbyterianism against Episcopalianism. These were the precursors and predecessors of Donatism. Montanism, Novatianism, and this primitive Presbyterianism were storm signals full of omen of the coming crash, and North Africa was the land which seemed to attract into its bosom as its natural home the lightning-flash of destruction.

The principles underlying the intentions of these separatist bodies were principles which command respect. No one can blame systems which theoretically aim at the presentation and preservation among men of a church "without spot or wrinkle," an immaculate clergy, and a laity purified and strengthened by discipline; but the theory was not fulfilled in practice. The history of the Donatist schism adds another proof to the oft-proven fact that, whenever and wherever such principles are enforced in a rigid unbending manner by men who degrade enthusiasm into fanaticism, and distort Scripture language and church rule, the result is disastrous. Doctrine, as well as discipline, is discredited, unity is at an end, and the peace of the church is broken into fragments.

Mensurius was bishop of Carthage during and after the Diocletian persecution (A.D. 303). In common with his fellow-Christians, he had been required by the consul Anulinus to give up any copies of the Holy Scriptures in his possession. He had answered by hiding them in a safe place, and passing off heretical works in their stead. When the "pious fraud" was made known to the consul, the latter declined to take further action. Mensurius' step was open to censure and criticism, and there were not wanting those who applauded the rebuke administered by one Secundus of Tigisis—"I am a Christian and a bishop, but no 'traitor.'" The act was, however, venial to many in comparison with what followed later. Mensurius felt it his duty to check the growing and inordinate reverence for martyrdom. He saw clearly enough that there were too many would-be martyrs whose character would not bear close scrutiny. The cells were full of debtors unable to meet their creditors, of fanatics, of lazy loafers who were fed by injudicious devotees; and Mensurius, together with his archdeacon Caecilian, did his best to discountenance the mistaken reverence with which good but mistaken Christians regarded these undeserving men. This course of action naturally brought him into great odium with those who did not like to be told that they were mistaken, or that they should be careful how they applied their principles. To them martyrdom was the becoming conclusion of the Christian life; the subjective theory was everything, and mistakes in practice were of little account. If a man was in a martyr's cell, that and that alone was enough to make it incumbent upon them to ignore his personal shortcomings. A curious paper exists entitled, Fragments from the Martyr-history of the Holy Davitus, etc., and other African Martyrs, which, as written by a Donatist—though of later date than the time in question, and probably spurious—is interesting as giving the extreme conceptions current. In this paper, Mensurius and Caecilian are personally denounced, and their disapprobation is exaggerated into most frightful cruelty; while the virtues and sufferings of the martyrs are profusely dwelt upon, and even power to forgive sins is attributed to them.

During the lifetime of Mensurius the storm was brewing. It fairly broke out when Caecilian (see under the name) succeeded him (A.D. 311). That appointment was felt to be a blow to all who magnified martyrdom, and superstitiously revered martyrs' relics: it was rightly considered a rebuke to a purely theoretical and subjective conception of the church's discipline. But though personal pique and spiritual pride had much to do with the opposition raised to Caecilian, his opponents rested their principal objection on the fact that he had been ordained by a 'trahitor,' Felix.

Before briefly considering this objection, it may well be remarked that the charge was, in some respects, a strange one to be made by Caecilian's chief opponent, Secundus, bishop of Tigisis, for documents exist which prove that Secundus himself was a trahitor, in spite of his boast to Mensurius. At a synod held at Cirta (A.D. 305) under the presidency of Secundus, for the purpose of electing and ordaining a bishop, the fact became evident that not one present could claim to be free from trahitorship. One had thrown the gospels into the fire, another had offered incense to the gods, a third had delivered up small papers but kept his codices. A charge of murder was brought against bishop Purpurius: the members of the synod turned to him. In an agony of fury he broke out: "Do you wish," he cried to Secundus, "to frighten me, as you have frightened others? Not only have I killed, but I do kill all who thwart me. Take care not to provoke me too much, or I shall have to declare what you did when the curator demanded of you to deliver up the Scriptures." The terror of all was great, and the suggestion, that as God had not punished them they should not punish each other, made at an earlier period of the meeting, was adopted as the best escape from their difficulty. The decision of Secundus that each must account to God ('vos scitis et Deus') was greeted with the unanimous answer, "Thanks be to God!" One, Silvanus, was chosen and consecrated, a man who was afterwards (A.D. 320) proved by a judicial process, conducted by the consul Zenophilus, to have been "a trahitor and a thief." (See these documents in Ribbeck and Deutsch.)

These were the men who denounced the trahitorship of Felix of Aptunga, and proceeded to elect Majorinus as successor to Mensurius. The day that Majorinus was consecrated, the irrevocable step was taken which transformed opposition into schism. From that date Donatism, as it was afterwards called, had a separate and schismatical existence. The personal character of these men must not, however, be permitted to obscure the importance of the question connected with Felix. The trahitorship of the prelate of Aptunga was asserted so loudly at the time, and so frequently by the Donatists afterwards, that it is satisfactory to know that the whole matter was carefully sifted. A great principle was at stake. The opinion widely prevailed at the time, and was always a leading tenet with the Donatists, that the validity of all sacerdotal acts depended on the subjective character of the persons who performed them. Any sacerdotal act performed by an excommunicated person was considered invalid, and a 'trahitor' was, to a Donatist, as good as excommunicate. Hence, when the supporters of Caecilian and of Majorinus appealed to Constantine, the emperor at once subjected the alleged trahitorship of Felix to a thorough examination (A.D. 313). The point was decided in favour of Felix, his character was cleared, and consequently the ordination of Caecilian was declared valid. But nowhere was the subject more exhaustively discussed than before the consul Aelianus, who, at the bidding of Constantine, gave the Donatists, disgusted with the previous decision of the council at Rome, an opportunity (A.D. 314), at Carthage, of proving their charge against Felix. Claudius Saturianus (or Saturninus), the curator of the republic, who happened to be in Felix's city at the time of the persecution, a local magistrate, Alfius Caecilianus, and others gave such evidence that the finding of the tribunal was unanimous. "Felicem religiosum episcopum liberum esse ab exustione instrumentorum deificorum manifestum est, eum nemo in eum aliquid probare potuerit quod religiosissimas scripturas tradiderit vel exusserit."

Bishop Majorinus died in A.D. 315, but from the first he had been a leader of little consequence to his followers. They had called themselves, for convenience' sake, the party of Majorinus; but after his death, if not before, they took that name—Donatists—by which they are best known in ecclesiastical history. There were two bishops named Donatus; the first of Casae Nigrae, who took up the mantle of Secundus of Tigisis, and who, before Caecilian's elevation, had shewn his schismatical tendencies; the second, the successor of Majorinus and surnamed "the Great." It is difficult, and perhaps unnecessary, to decide from which of these two the sect took its name. The censure passed upon Donatus of Casae Nigrae by the synod of Rome under Melchisedes for his iteration of baptism and reordination of apostate bishops, was—it is true—a censure passed by adversaries: nevertheless, it may have been sufficient to induce so strict and idealistic a body as the Donatists to prefer tracing their name to one greater than his Numidian brother.

Donatus the Great succeeded Majorinus A.D.

315 as bishop of Carthage; and in him the various converging points of personal hostility to Mensurius and Caecilian, of irritation against the decisions of Rome and Arles (see under CAECILIAN), of Aelianus and Constantine, seemed first to centre, and thence again to issue in a more defiant attitude against both Church and State. The dissentients to Caecilian had, consistently enough, refused to his church the title of the Church of God, and appropriated that distinction to themselves. The Caecilianist clergy were condemned for their league with a traitor and their acts repudiated as invalid; hence those who followed Majorinus were rebaptized. But Constantine's edict (A.D. 316) took away from them their churches, and the heavy hand of Ursacius deprived them of their lives. The sectarians wanted a man bold enough to denounce the imperial power and to infuse vigour into their strife against the Caecilianists; and they found that man in Donatus.

This man was neither "the angel" his followers called him, nor "the fiend" his opponents described him. He was a man of unquestionable ability, eloquence and thoroughness—the Cyprian of his party, as St. Augustine called him; but also hard and unloving to foe, proud and overbearing to friend. Optatus and St. Augustine were justified in comparing with the proud "prince of Tyre" (Ezek. xxviii. 2) the man who in his lifetime permitted his followers to swear by his name and by his grey hairs, and could ask of the menial bishops, "What do you say to my party?" and who, after his death, was described by Donatists at the conference of Carthage as the miracle-worker, "the pride of the church of Carthage, the man with the reputation of a martyr."

When the soldiers of Ursacius appeared in North Africa Donatus was ready to resist them, and his courage infected the timid people and their prelates. His name became the rallying-point for every man who had real or imaginary grievances against existing ecclesiastical, civil, and social powers: and amongst those whom he attracted were the Circumcellions. "They were a class of men," says St. Augustine, "who followed no kind of useful occupation: they held their own lives in fanatical contempt, and thought no death too cruel for those who differed from them; they wandered about from place to place, chiefly in the country districts, and haunted the cells of the peasants for the purpose of obtaining food. Hence they were called 'Circumcelliones.'" It is charitable to consider many of these men and women affected by religious madness. They were the Camisards and Covenanters of Africa. The better class of Donatists turned away in horror from fanatics who imbrued their hands with the blood of the innocent as well as of the guilty; but the offer of partisanship having been once made and accepted, it was impossible to withdraw it altogether. Donatus, Parmenian, Petilian, and Cresconius were forced, in turn, to palliate as much as they could the actions of those allies who preferred to be called not Circumcellions but Agonistici, Champions of Christ, and who rushed into the battle with "Deo laudes" as their war-cry, and with a weapon dubbed "Israelite" as their war-club.

Constantine soon found that Donatism was not to be put down by the sword. In A.D. 317, Ursacius received his instructions to hold his hand, and Caecilian was exhorted to treat his opponents kindly, and leave vengeance to God. The emperor's letter was a mixture of truth and sarcasm: "All schisms," he wrote, "are from the devil: and these Separatists proceed from him. What good can you expect from those who are the adversaries of God and the enemies of the holy church? Such men must split off from the church, and attach themselves to the devil. Surely we act most wisely, if we leave to them what they have wrenched from us. By patience and kindness we may hope to gain them. Let us leave vengeance to God. I rejoice to think that you meet their brutality with gentleness and good temper. As I understand that these men have destroyed a church in Constantine, I have ordered my finance-minister to build you a new one. God grant that these mistaken Separatists may at last see their error and turn to the one true God!" It was not a letter calculated to soothe the Donatists. They presently replied to the emperor that he must distinctly understand that they would have nothing to do with his "fool of a bishop" (i.e. Caecilian), and that he might do his worst. With this mutual contempt and recrimination matters ended for the time. Constantine during the remainder of his life ignored the Donatists; and they held on their own way, increasing largely in point of numbers in their own districts—in A.D. 330 they held a synod, which was attended by 270 bishops—and establishing a few insignificant stations elsewhere.

Constans, the son of Constantine, succeeded to his father's North-African possessions; and, at first, endeavoured to conciliate the Donatists by kindness. He published (A.D. 340) an edict requiring the Donatists to return to the church, urging that "unity must now exist, because Christ was a lover of unity," and instructed his commissioners Ursacius (probably a different man to the Ursacius already mentioned) and Leontius to distribute money, as alms, in the Donatist as well as in the Catholic churches. The Donatist spurned it as gold offered by the devil to seduce men from their faith. The sword of persecution was then unsheathed to deprive the Donatists of their churches; and the victims who fell became martyrs to the survivors, and their graves the platforms from which to preach resistance. In A.D. 345 a second attempt to win submission was commanded and undertaken by Gregorius. He travelled through the province, offering not only alms but valuable church plate to all who would accept the imperial invitation. This roused Donatus; he issued circular letters through all the provinces, forbidding the acceptance of any presents; and, not content with that, wrote to Gregorius in a style which was simply scurrilous. Two years later (A.D. 347), a third commission, composed of Paul, Macarius, and Taurinus, entered the country. They came to Donatus himself, with their gold in their hands, and to explain their object. The bishop listened impatiently, and at length broke out: "What has the emperor to do with the church?" They were words which meant much at the time, but have meant more since. For they are words which have expressed the principle that Church and State are to be for ever distinct from, and independent of, each other; and that principle has found its supporters alike in the ranks of Presbyterianism and Ultramontaniam.

The language of Donatus was repeated right and left, and from every Donatistic pulpit preachers proclaimed the duty of separation from a church "which committed fornication with the princes of this world," and whose prelates were mere tools of an emperor who employed miserable hypocrites to spread his nets. Such furious obloquy served to madden the fanatics, even though it brought upon them furious persecution. The Circumcellions rose, and frightful bloodshed followed. These 'Christian champions' traversed the country, subverting everything. Slaves and debtors were brothers, to be welcomed with open arms; masters and creditors were tyrants, to be speedily brought to their senses. When resisted, the Circumcellion struck his victim to the earth, or gloated over his death-agonies; when summoned to resist, he attacked with the fury inspired by fanaticism the foe pointed out to him, and died doing battle for his church and discipline. Their excesses were so great, that even Donatus and his brother-bishops, who had started them in their mad career, were forced to appeal to Taurinus to check them. The Circumcellions kissed the hands which betrayed them, and turned their fury upon themselves. They hated life for themselves as well as in others: they longed only for martyrdom, as they understood it. The pagan temples were invaded that death might be found from the sword of some infuriated idolater: the courts of justice were entered, and the frightened judge compelled to order their instant execution; travellers were stopped in their journeys, and threatened with instant death if they did not slay the suppliants at their feet. Days, hours, and places were named that an admiring crowd might witness these unhappy, mistaken, men cast themselves headlong from some rock into the graves which their posterity would reverence as those of the martyrs.

Macarius did not think it necessary or possible to discriminate between the more moderate Donatist and the extreme Circumcellionist. With an iron hand he crushed both. Donatus himself was banished, and died in exile.

The church was triumphant. Optatus saluted Constans as the servant of God who had been privileged to restore unity, husbands to wives, children to parents, brother to brother; but there were many who regretted that unity had been won at such a price. When Donatists afterwards called Christians 'Macarians,' in scornful allusion to the persecutor of their sect, it was characteristic of St. Augustine to reply: "Yes, we are Macarians, for that name means 'blessed,' and Who is more blessed than Christ to Whom we belong?" but it was both natural in him and worthy of him to go on and add, "Don't let us call one another names. Don't cast at me the times of Macarius, and I won't remind you of the madness of the Circumcellions. Let us, as far as possible, work together, because we are all orphans."

It was probably soon after the cessation of the persecution that Gratius, Cæcilian's successor, summoned a synod at Carthage, which established, among other points, two conclusions of great value in matters of discipline:—(1) the non-iteration of baptism, when it had been duly administered in the name of the Trinity; (2) the necessary restrictions to be placed on reverence for martyrs, and on the assignment of that title to persons deserving it.

In A.D. 361 Julian became emperor. His edict "recalled all the bishops and clergy who had been banished in the reign of Constantius, and granted equal freedom to all parties of the Christian church." The Donatists were not included in this act. Two of their bishops, Rogatian and Pontus, waited on the emperor. They saluted him as the one man from whom they could expect justice, and they left his presence with full permission to return to their country. The act of mercy was just, but the Donatists had found it convenient to forget their watchword, "What has the emperor to do with the church?" The return of the sectaries was marked by acts of violence and murder. As soon as they obtained possession of their churches they treated them as places which had been profaned. They washed the walls and altars, tore the vestments to pieces, threw the holy vessels outside and the sacred elements to the dogs. Their next step was to introduce again and enforce their own rigorous discipline. Apostates were received only after the most humiliating penance, laymen were re-baptized, and clerics re-ordained. For two years Donatism was in the ascendant, and the church bearing the cross. One who had in him all the elements of a Separatist sat upon the imperial throne, and schism basked in the imperial sunshine. But the cry which went up from the dying Julian's lips (A.D. 363), "Galilaean, Thou hast conquered," was also the cry which told the Donatist that his day of triumph had ended.

Donatus had died in exile. He was succeeded by Parmenian, perhaps the ablest and least prejudiced of the Donatist episcopacy. A foreigner by birth, and actually ignorant of many of the saddest and cruellest episodes of Donatist history, he entered upon his duties at Carthage free from the passionate views which marked so many of his followers, and disposed to rate at a slight value much that to them was of great importance. His literary merit was great, and excited the admiration of Optatus bishop of Milevi and of St. Augustine, to both of whom the Christian church owes a statement of the current Donatist opinions. The theological disputations, for example, which took place between Optatus and Parmenian, are preserved in the great work of the former, and there is every reason to believe that Parmenian's opinions are honestly given. Optatus was a man of unquestioned piety, dialectical skill, and orthodoxy; perfectly indifferent to the threats of the Circumcellion, or to the temptations of bribery and corruption; he was animated by an earnest wish for the restoration of unity, provided it could be obtained without the sacrifice of principle; and few can read his arguments without the conviction that he is seeking as much common ground as possible, before he states unhesitatingly where he and his opponent must part. If the usual tone of kindness and courtesy is occasionally forgotten, if the title "brother" given to Parmenian is replaced by "Antichrist" when Donatus is mentioned, if cool argumentative reasoning is sometimes dropped for defiant passionate utterance, the difference is intelligible in a character full of both charity and zeal, and is explained by St. Augustine's remark: "Optatus is a second Ambrose of Milan."

A slight sketch of the passage of arms between these two men will be of interest. There were two points about which, theoretically, both were agreed: (1) That there was only one Church; and (2) that in that one Church there was only one baptism, and this not to be repeated. But disagreement began directly the theory upon these points was debated from the Catholic or Donatist point of view. "A church," said the Donatist, "in which traitors both existed and dispensed the sacraments was no church, and baptism administered by traitors was no baptism. Where, then, was the pure church? with the Catholic or Donatist? how far was the validity of the sacraments dependent upon the purity of the church and the personal character of those who dispensed them? These were old questions coming forward, but to be discussed between Optatus and Parmenian as they had never been discussed before.

Parmenian argues successively upon baptism, the unity of the church, the case of traitors, the acts of the imperial commissioners Paul and Macarius, unction, and the dispensation of the sacraments by and to sinners; and Optatus deals with these burning questions not exactly in the same order, but in an order which is for his purpose more logical. He first discusses the question of traitors and separatists, then the unity of the church, then the commissioners, then the case of sinners, then baptism, and lastly deals with the prejudices and errors of the Donatists.

Optatus prefaces his remarks upon traitors by a few words full of conciliatory power, and expressive of a truth which should never be forgotten in any discussion between Churchman and Nonconformist. "Remember," he says to Parmenian, "you Donatists have, in common with ourselves, the true sacraments." There was no such question between them as:—what is to be the attitude of the church towards heretics? The Donatists were not heretics, they were schismatics; and schism, however much to be regretted, was very far short of heresy. "Heresy is not only without truth, but has abandoned the truth it once knew; schism is like a child, which has indeed separated itself in its disobedience and hatred from the mother church, but it does not wish to do anything new or anything different from what it has learnt from its mother." Optatus then gives at length the whole history of the Donatist schism; however painful to Parmenian to know the facts, know them he must, that once known he might see how unjustifiable and self-condemnatory the acts of his predecessors had been. This history need not be repeated here. It was hoped that as Parmenian examined it, he would see two things: (1) not only that Caecilian and Felix were not traitors, and that consequently the church to which they belonged was the one true and pure church; but (2) that among the Donatists were traitors and those ordained by traitors, and that consequently the Donatists were schismatics, as well as inconsistent with their asserted principles when they appealed to the emperor.

In discussing the "unity of the church," both

Parmenian and Optatus had one grand tenet in common. They were neither of them men who could assert or approve the independency of religious bodies, and the existence of many churches. They both held fast to one visible church, the one body with its many members; and then they asked themselves the question: Where is the one church? Optatus answered with the Catholics, "who connect the holiness of the church with the presence of God's word and sacraments, unchangeable as God Himself," who consider the church "Catholic" or "universal" (Pss. ii. 8, lxxii. 8); whose members include "heathen and all people" (Ps. xvi. 1-3); which has received "gifts," and amongst these a knowledge of the doctrine of the Trinity (and other doctrines), "an unbroken succession of bishops from the time of St. Peter," and "a priesthood independent of the worthiness of the individuals." Parmenian definitely asserted the opposite to this. He insisted most strenuously upon personal worthiness. Such insistence probably proceeded then, as it frequently does still, from a confusion between "holiness" and "justification," between the "holiness" of the church as the church, and the "justification" of the individual as an individual; but it was most firmly held; and consequently so long as men were not what the Donatist asserted that they ought to be, so long they were not to be considered members of the one church; the church which retained them was not the church, but a body engaged in compassing land and sea to make men twofold more the children of hell, or staining itself with the blood of the saints. The one true church was to be found where the saints were, in that quarter of Africa where the Donatists lived. Parmenian either did not know, or had forgotten the fanaticism of the Circumcellions and the excesses perpetrated by those whom he called "saints." Optatus was obliged to remind him of this; and then he asked how a church could be called holy which applauded such personal worthiness as theirs.

This question of the personal holiness of men comes up again in the sections about sinners; but, like the question of the relations between Church and State (discussed by Optatus in the section in which he considers the conduct of the commissioners), the subject does not receive the ample treatment which it received when St. Augustine took it up. As Optatus examined it, the question took the form: "Suppose that a priest be a sinner (a wicked man), what then?" but his answer was not so much an answer to that question as a defence of the position, "If you Donatists refuse our administration of the sacraments because you consider our priests wicked men, then must you also reject your own, for your wickedness is much greater." Few cared then, any more than now, for that kind of argument; and, in fact, Optatus had supplied himself already with a far healthier and holier solution of the question when he had suggested "let us leave to God to say—who is a sinner. One Father has begotten us all, one Redeemer has saved us, one church has given us birth through the sacraments. We pray for you because we love to do so; you also pray for us, even though you wish it not, whenever you say the Lord's prayer; unless, indeed, you pray then, 'My Father which art in heaven. Give me my daily bread, Forgive me my trespasses.' Ah! there is one band which encircles us all, and nothing can rend it asunder."

The question of baptism was debated more as it affected re-baptism than as a new doctrine. Parmenian and Optatus both agreed in acknowledging one baptism, as they agreed in acknowledging one God, one Christ, one faith; but Parmenian insisted that there was a true and false baptism; to which Optatus replied that such a distinction was unnecessary: a false baptism, were such a thing possible, would be no baptism: "There is but one baptism, and that depends neither upon place nor person, but upon the Trinity. It is not man, but the Trinity, who give us baptism." In this he again rejected the Donatist opinion that the personal worthiness of him who administered baptism must enter into the question. The Donatist asked, "How can a man, who has nothing to give, give anything?" or to express it differently, "How can a sinful man, who has no goodness in him, give so great a blessing as the blessing of the sacrament of baptism?" and the question was answered then, as now; the sacraments are of themselves holy, and owe no element of holiness to man. If man gave this holiness and blessing, then would God be the giver of nothing. St. Paul once rejoiced that he had baptized but a few, lest any should say that he had baptized in his own name (1 Cor. i. 15). Another Donatist formula was equally specious and equally indefensible: "In baptism (of sinners) we must attach far more weight to the personal character of him who administers than to that of him who receives the sacrament." Optatus replied that the essential part of baptism was that it should be administered in the name of the Trinity; and then shewed, from such instances as the faith of the woman of Canaan (St. Matt. xv. 28), and that of the woman with the issue (ditto, ix. 20), that Christ, by putting Himself the giver, as it were, in the background, assigned the foremost position to the faith of the recipient.

The "errors and prejudices" treated in the following section are, amongst others, the Donatist treatment of those persons, especially young females, who had taken "vows;" their manner of proselytising; their bigotry; their cruelty to their fellow-creatures; and their treatment of the churches. It was perhaps this last point which, exhibiting more than any other the intense bitterness of the Donatist faction, drew from Optatus the remark which expresses the struggle to forgive what he cannot forget: "When you destroyed the altars, should you not have remembered the blessings which you and others had once received at those very altars?"

An appendix to these sections, dealing with points better discussed by St. Augustine, closes the work of Optatus. The actual result was at the time little or none; but the student of church history must ever be grateful to the man who has written for him the first chapter of sectarianism, and at the same time taught him to frame his answer to sectarian arguments upon that highest and most unsectarian of all grounds, "We are brethren."

The existence of Donatism was now threatened by the usual consequences of a "house divided against itself." "As Donatus," says St. Augustine, "sought to divide Christ, so was Donatus divided by the divisions which arose daily amongst his own followers." Rogatists and Maximianists, or individuals like Tichonius, arose to contest or moderate the views and opinions of the founders of the sect. Something must be said of these:

Rogatus was bishop of Cartennae in Mauritania about A.D. 370. The exact nature of the difference between the Rogatists and the Donatists it is hardly possible to tell; perhaps it was in some degree connected with the definition of the Catholic Church; at any rate, the Rogatists declined to allow that title to the Donatists, but appropriated it to themselves. They appear to have been marked by one element of humanity, in that they discouraged and repudiated the Circumcellions.

In point of date, Tichonius (c. A.D. 380) may be placed between the Rogatists and Maximianists. His history is the history of one who, "when a Donatist, wrote against the Donatists in a manner perfectly irrefutable, and yet was of so strange a disposition (absurdissimi cordis) as to refuse to leave them entirely" (Augustine). He was an African, deeply interested in church matters, learned in the Scriptures, and familiar with the historical events of his time. He has left some "rules" on the interpretation of Scripture, which St. Augustine has praised (De Doctrinâ Christianâ, iii. 30-37), and which exhibit his points of contact with Catholic doctrines and of difference from Donatist opinions. Thus, in his first rule, dealing with "the Lord and His Body" the church, his assertion that the church has for its mission, extension throughout the whole world and gathering all people into its bosom, is in direct opposition to the exclusiveness which the Donatist affirmed should be a characteristic feature in the church as a whole and in the individual members which formed the church. So, again, in his second rule, Tichonius spoke of the One Body (the church), as having two parts, those who tended to make the church what Christ would have it (Ephes. v. 27), and those who to all appearance members of the church do yet but draw near to Christ with their lips only and not with their hearts also; a mode of speech utterly incompatible with Donatist statements. Tichonius had, in fact, read the practice and the history of the Donatists with eyes unblinded by prejudice. He did not hesitate to tell them that their theory and their attitude towards the church was in plain words this: "what we will, is holy." He proved to them that their assumption of personal holiness was a farce, by reminding them of a certain synod held at Carthage when 270 of their bishops, after a session of 78 days, had come to the conclusion to hold communion with traitors if they refused to be re-baptized! Parmenian was roused by this attack, and wrote to Tichonius; not, however, meeting his arguments, but blaming him for tergiversation, warning him against the consequences, and exhorting him to cleave to those who had left the traitor-church and had suffered persecution in behalf of the truth. The letter had no effect, and Tichonius was excommunicated. He had gone too far. In his seventh rule he had maintained that only at the last day would the separation of the good and the wicked in the church take place. It was the church's doctrine; why could he not go farther, and take the logical step of joining the church? History does not give the answer. Tichonius had said and held strongly that the church had done many disgraceful things since the time of Caecilian; but according to his own shewing, this need not have kept him from joining it. Yet for some reason he preferred to remain aloof from the Catholic whom he had avenged, and the Donatist who had excommunicated him. He found with neither what he wanted, and died an isolated eclectic.

The fiercest blow hitherto given to Donatism was, however, given by the Maximianist schism. Parmenian died A.D. 392, and was succeeded by Primian. Primian, for some unexplained cause, felt himself obliged to impose penance on one of his deacons, named Maximian; the deacon protested, and was excommunicated. There was pride at work on the one side, and Lucilla-like intrigue (see CAECILIANUS) on the other. Maximian appealed to some neighbouring bishops, who took up his cause and respectfully solicited Primian to give them a hearing or to meet them. Primian declined. In A.D. 393 the malcontent bishops assembled in synod at Cabarsussis to the number of more than 100: they summoned Primian before them; and, on his again refusing to notice them, they recited his misdeeds in an elaborate document, excommunicated him, and elected Maximian, procuring his consecration at Carthage. The Donatists of Carthage were now divided into Primianists and Maximianists, and that body had, in its turn, to experience the misery of altar set up against altar. "God," says St. Augustine, "was repaying to them the measure they had paid to Caecilian." Primian and his party were, however, much the stronger. The bishops of Numidia and Mauritania to the number of 310 sided with him; and at the council of Bagai (A.D. 394), presided over by Primian himself, Maximian, his ordainers and coadjutors were reviled in the strongest language, the first-named was excommunicated, and the latter commanded to repent and return to the Primianist party before a certain date. The Maximianists shewed little disposition to acquiesce in this decision, and persecution began. Maximian's church was levelled to the ground, and his house handed over to a heathen priest. The proconsul Seranus was asked to assist in carrying out the judgment of the council on the refractory. The followers of Maximian were hunted from place to place, and the treatment of the aged and beloved bishop of Membresa, Salvius, was scandalous and cruel beyond measure. The misery which ensued brought back, however, but a few Maximianists to the main body; the majority held aloof and struggled on as martyrs; re-baptizing and re-ordaining those who came over to them. Donatism had received a mortal wound from which, to a certain extent, it never recovered.

The action of the Catholic Church and the State during this period further combined in checking the extension of Donatism. Many Donatists, priests as well as laymen, had become disgusted with party squabbles and cruel excesses; and they turned their eyes to the church. They were met with kindness and forgiving love. In A.D. 393 a council met at Hippo under the presidency of Aurelius, bishop of Carthage. The first object of the council was to revive such necessary church discipline as had fallen into disuse, and thereby purify thoroughly that body to which they might next proceed to invite dissentients to return. The measures passed which concerned the Donatists were liberal in spirit and intention. In confirmation of a decision passed at the synod of Capua (A.D. 391), and which recited that "the repetition of baptism or of ordination, and the translation of bishops was not permitted"; the council of Hippo (1) allowed the returning Donatist clergy to retain their clerical position and functions, if they had not re-baptized, and if they brought their congregations with them; and (2) approved of the proposition that the children of Donatists, even if they had received Donatist baptism, should not be excluded from the service of the altar. The line adopted by the council was not only the most generous, but also the most conciliatory.

The action of the State had been more or less incisive according as political events had directed imperial attention to Donatists or removed it from them. Valentinian's edict (A.D. 373) deposing any clerical person who re-baptized, and Gratian's successive decrees—the first (A.D. 375) commanding the surrender of their churches; the second (A.D. 377) issued to the Donatist, Flavian, the imperial representative in Africa, enjoining further the confiscation of houses used by them; the third (A.D. 378) commanding the expulsion from Rome of one Claudian, who had gone there to propagate Donatist opinions—produced a good deal of misery; but the political disquiet connected with the murder of Gratian (A.D. 383), the wars between Maximus and Theodosius, the deposition of Maximus and restoration of Valentinian (A.D. 388) made it impossible to enforce these or similar injunctions, and for the time the Donatists enjoyed a comparative freedom from interference. In A.D. 392 Theodosius issued his laws against heretics generally, in which he fined all who performed priestly functions. This was not directed against the Donatists particularly, and was probably not enforced against them previous to the death of Theodosius (A.D. 395). That event was followed by Gildo's usurpation of power in Africa, and his alliance with one of the cruellest of the Donatist bishops, Optatus of Thamugas. The ravages committed by these men were only stayed by Honorius' victory over Gildo (A.D. 398); and Theodosius' penalty was enforced by Seranus against Optatus and his followers. The Circumcellions had also, during Gildo's temporary prosperity, begun again their fanatical ravages; and an edict of Honorius (A.D. 398) decreeing the punishment of death to all who dared to violate churches and maltreat the clergy, was evidently directed against them.

Yet, in spite of these checks, the condition of the Donatist body was better than that of the Catholic Church. The greater part of Africa was Donatist, and the church lay crushed and oppressed. As the end of the fourth century drew near, it seemed almost as if the place of the ancient, Catholic, and Apostolic church would be taken by the new usurping sect. At this juncture the good providence of God raised up the man, St. Augustine, whose piety and ability shielded then and since the true church of Christ.

The life and works of St. Augustine are discussed elsewhere (see under the name): in this article the relation of both to Donatism is all that need be considered, and that briefly. But it must never be forgotten how much this man's previous life prepared him for the line he took as regards Donatism. He was for many years a Separatist; not only did he, as a Manichean, take up the Separatist's cry, "my church is the only pure and true church," but he was compelled to learn the tendencies and consequences of Separatism. No one, humanly speaking, but the man nursed, bred, and living in an atmosphere vitiated by Manichaeism, Pelagianism, and Donatism could have been competent to understand, analyse, and describe the poisonous nature of the air others were compelled to breathe. He who could say of his early belief: "I had nothing certain, nothing fast when I thought of Thee (O God): an empty phantasy and mine error—that was my God," was the fitting as well as the chosen vessel, led by the mercy of God from "rioting and wantonness, strife and envying," himself to find, and help others to find, in God's word and Christ's Catholic Church, the "putting on the Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. xiii. 13), which was and is the only solution of his and man's harassing doubts.

In A.D. 391 St. Augustine came to Hippo, and the popular vote at once pointed him out as the future successor of the aged Valerius. In A.D. 395 he was consecrated coadjutor bishop. Hippo was a hot-bed of Donatism; fanaticism carrying its pettiness so far as to prohibit the Donatist making bread for the Catholic. In a letter (Ep. 33) to Proculianus the Donatist bishop of Hippo, St. Augustine pathetically asks, "What has Christ done to us, that we rend His members asunder? Consider how sad a division reigns in Christian households and families. Husband and wife, who—in their married life—know no division, separate themselves at the altar of Christ! Children live with their parents in the same dwelling, but that dwelling is not also God's dwelling." St. Augustine, full of zeal, threw himself at once into the thick of the fight. His sermons attracted Donatists as well as Catholics; and the sectarians not only called him names, but threatened his life. He was the preacher before the already-mentioned council of Hippo (A.D. 393), and his sermon was afterwards enlarged into the work, De Fide et Symbolo. What share, if any, he took in drawing up the decision of the council it is impossible to tell now; but it was in that year that he wrote his Abecevirium. This was a metrical composition, divided into verses corresponding with the number of letters in the alphabet, in which the history and mistakes of Donatism were recited, and the attitude of Catholics towards Donatists depicted. Just as Gregory of Nazianzum met by popular songs the doctrinal errors of Apollinarius, so did St. Augustine by a similar device place in the hands of unlearned and simple men a true statement of the difference between Catholicism and Donatism. Two verses will describe the general cast of the whole. St. Augustine speaks of the Donatists as breaking asunder the net (the church, St. Matt. xiii. 43), and gives their character:—

"Homines multum superbi, qui justos se dicunt esse,
Sic fecerunt scissuram, et altare contra altare.
Diabolo se tradiderunt, cum pugnant de traditione,
Et crimem quod commiserunt, in alios volunt transferre:
Ipai tradiderunt libros, et nos audent accusare.
Ut pejus committunt scelus, quam commiserunt et zente."

Again, he alleges the example of Christ and His treatment of Judas in defence of the practice of the Catholics as opposed to that of the Donatists:—

"Hunc inter bonos ferebat, hunc misit et predicare, Malus servus praedicabat, sed Christus erat in fide.
Quia qui iudice credebant, non curabant de praecone.
Quando dedit sanctam coenam, nec tunc illum exclusit inde,
Sed nobis exemplum datum est malos fratres tolerare,
Et quando non possunt excludi, solo separentur corde."

In his correspondence, whether with bishops or laymen, and in his conferences with leading Donatists, the features characteristic of these verses may be continually noticed: there is always the fearless exposure of the fault, and the loving effort to point out the remedy.

Among the letters of this period, that to Honoratus (Ep. 49) gives that view of the church as an external, visible, and organically constituted church proper to it as the church of all people, which was so frequently pressed by him in later stages of the controversy; and those to Generosus, afterwards consul of Numidia, are models of letters which a "spiritual father" would write to a layman tempted by Donatist proselytisers to abandon the faith of the church.

St. Augustine's sermons, letters, conferences, and hymns, led naturally to those more elaborate works by which his fame in this dispute is established: and it will be convenient to refer to some of these here, though to do so is somewhat to anticipate the dates at which they were actually written.

(a) "Three Books against Petilian's Letter." Petilian was the Donatist bishop of Circa, who, upon his elevation to the see, had written a pastoral letter against the Catholic Church. Originally an advocate and a very able man, he appears to have become a Donatist somewhat against his will; but having once joined the sect he became one of the most thorough supporters of their views; and flattered by their applause, assigned to himself the title of Paraclete. Petilian's letter had a great reputation amongst the Donatists, but it was very difficult to obtain a copy. It appears to have been a fact that not only did the Donatists do their best to conceal from the Catholics what they wrote; but, in St. Augustine's case, they were especially careful to prevent his seeing them, so much did they dread his eloquence and logic. St. Augustine, while at Circa, procured a copy of the first part of Petilian's letter, and (circa A.D. 398) wrote his "First Book" against it. Petilian's positions, summarily stated, were these: Catholics blame us for re-baptizing; but inasmuch as we hold that the working of baptism depends on the character of the baptizer, and that, for example, baptism by a traditor is not true baptism, therefore we baptize again those who come to us. We consider ourselves the true church because we have suffered persecution. Our inconsistency as regards the Maximianists is to be excused as an act of kindness on the part of the strong towards the weak. Petilian expressed these views in passionate and defamatory language. St. Augustine's reply was thorough. It is couched in a vein in which loving regret at the prejudice of his opponent is at times relieved by a happy irony; and the sadness with which he reads the Donatist conclusions often gives place to a rallying good humour as he marks the absurdities by which those conclusions are reached. The quondam-advocate had met his match in the quondam-professor: and the Donatist was taught by the Catholic that saintly "charity" was the only weapon to use in theological dispute. Briefly, St. Augustine shews his readers that if (as Petilian had admitted) there were bad men in the Donatist body, then baptism administered by them must be open to objection; baptism, in fact, never could be valid according to them unless they were unerringly convinced of the personal holiness of the baptizer, and of that not man, but God alone, could be the judge. In practice, moreover, they were not consistent with their theory about what constituted the true church. The Donatists had persecuted the Maximianists; therefore the Maximianists and not the Donatists deserved the name of "true church." Lastly, if Donatists asked to be excused for their conduct to Maximianists, why could they not go a step further, and extend their wish to forgive and forget to that Catholic Church which was only too willing to love and receive them?

Somewhere about A.D. 401, the second part of Petilian's letter came into St. Augustine's hands. It was, in substance, an elaboration of the points stated previously, and was written in the same tone. Traitors were the doubles of a Judas Iscariot, as unclean as he was, as bereft of the grace of baptism, and their administration of baptism consequently impure and false. The so-called Catholic Church was not the true church, but the church of Separatists; not Jesus Christ, but Judas Iscariot had died for Catholics. Donatists had put on Jesus Christ, but the church had put on Judas Iscariot: Donatists were in the "narrow" way, Catholics in the "broad." The constraint put by Catholics on the kings of the earth, or the appeals made to them had originated in a party spirit. These kings had been taught lies, and prevented becoming true Christians. They, the Donatists, however, found it better to trust in the Lord than to put any confidence in princes. Petilian concluded by exhorting his people: "Come out from among them (the Catholics), come to the church of the people of God, and flee the traitors, lest ye perish together with them." St. Augustine begins his "Second Book" by remarking that he feels it necessary to answer this part of the letter for the benefit of his people, though it contains few fresh arguments. Baptism, he reminds them, does not obtain its power from man, but from Christ: no man, not even the most immaculate, can make another immaculate, for he is not God. The citation of such cases as that of Judas Iscariot is altogether beyond the question. Christ, by permitting Judas's presence at the Last Supper, evidently meant men to understand that the impurity of one affected that one alone, and did not reflect upon the purity of the others. As regards the church, if, according to the Scripture, the whole world belongs to the church, and the church, like a city set on a hill cannot be hid, then how can the Donatists say that Catholics are but a part of the church when the Catholic Church extends throughout the whole world?

Or how can the Donatists say that they are the church when they are limited to a little corner of the world, and very few know of their existence? Lastly, St. Augustine deals with the relations between Church and State, the right of the church to employ force, and the case of true and false martyrdom as it arose in consequence of the employment of force. It was easy to shew from Old Testament examples how much and variously God had permitted the kings of the earth (the State) to affect His people: and not less easy to shew that the Donatists, by their appeals to Constantine and Julian, did not hesitate to avail themselves of imperial (or State) interference whenever it suited them. Again, the action of Jesus Christ in purifying the temple with His scourge, furnished St. Augustine with a proof that the church might and should, where necessary, use force. Combining these precedents, St. Augustine affirmed that where the Church and State could thus work together for the furtherance of what was good and the restriction of what was bad, there they were justified in their co-operation, and even in employing force. There was a time indeed, when St. Augustine had thought differently; but experience had long shewn him that nothing but the strong arm of ecclesiastical and civil law could secure obedience from those who were sectarians first and Christians next, or who rated fanaticism higher than citizenship. In the same spirit, he readily granted the title of martyr to those who deserved it, but he denied it to those who had sought it by means of suicide, or as the result of fanatical madness.

Petilian, in the meantime, had been requested to examine and answer St. Augustine's "First Book." He did so, and his reply elicited St. Augustine's "Third Book." Petilian's reply consisted chiefly in abuse: he abused not only the Catholic Church generally, but St. Augustine personally. The bishop's skill in argument was simply "lying;" his previous life as a Manichaean was raked up; his consecration as a bishop called in question; his cloisters, and the monks who occupied them, denounced as immoral. Petilian cleared up a few sentences in his pastoral letter which might have been better expressed, but substantially maintained his previous opinions. St. Augustine put the abuse on one side: in simple touching language he confessed that he repented every day the faults and follies of his life when a Manichaean; and then he asked his readers to study Petilian's letter for themselves: they would see that Petilian had misquoted Scripture, had misstated historical facts, and had not met one of his (St. Augustine's) arguments. He stated again, as if never tiring of stating the truth, his two fundamental propositions as regarded baptism and the church: (a) The former is, so far as validity is concerned, quite independent of the baptizer: (b) The latter is that field the world, whose harvest is not in Africa, whose end is not the age of Donatus. "We cannot separate ourselves, while in the body, from the wicked; but we must use all the greater diligence in heart and will to separate ourselves from their mode of life. It is our duty to recognise this, and not to imperil love by passionate division, or dissever unity by pride. Let us be diligent to hold the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; for he who gathers outside this unity, gathers not with Christ; and he who gathers not with Christ, destroys.

(b) "Against Parmenian's letter." The controversy between this Donatist bishop and Optatus of Milevi, and his letter to Tichonius have been already mentioned. Parmenian had died since, but the influence of his name and the effects of his letter were still sufficiently great to make St. Augustine feel it his duty to consider it controversially. This he did about A.D. 405. The especial aim of Parmenian had been to expose and denounce as sinful, the commixture of believers and unbelievers in the church. St. Augustine, for his part, considers and answers in the negative the question: "In the unity and communion of the same sacraments do the evil contaminate the good?" His treatise consists of three books, the first of which is occupied in refuting historically the numerous mis-statements made by Parmenian, and in giving a correct if short summary of the origin and progress of Donatism. The second and third books discuss scripturally the theological differences between the Catholics and their opponents.

Parmenian, says Ribbeck (to whom students are indebted for an exhaustive analysis of this and St. Augustine's other letters, etc. referring to Donatism), like all Separatists, laid stress upon the letter rather than upon the spirit of Holy Scripture. He attached greater importance to external than to internal marks of separation between the church and the world: and from his peculiar mode of interpreting texts which referred to holiness, Parmenian inferred that men could not know for certain whether there were in the church good Christians or not. Donatus, he said, had asserted with justice: "Through our separation have the tares been separated from the wheat; and the tares are in the church." Amongst his own party, Parmenian continued, were not only no unbelievers, but "we (are they who) are no longer sinners and need no repentance; we have no impure, false, priests; my colleagues have no stain and are guilty of no iniquity." Parmenian urged, with greater development than his predecessors, and with copious quotation from Scripture, the usual opinion, "any blessing connected with the ministerial office and the sacraments depends upon the personal character of the priests;" even going so far as to render Almighty God powerless, by asserting that He could not work when His agent was an unbelieving priest or bishop.

St. Augustine, in his second book, points out how faulty was Parmenian's interpretation of the texts concerning the church, and then throws his strength into the affirmation of the position; "the sacrament is independent of the person of the dispenser; we must separate the person and his act." He urges, on scriptural grounds, that the worthiness of the ministerial office is quite independent of the person of him who exercises it. We may, and should, heartily regret when one ordained to any holy function is wicked or unbelieving, but those defects do not alter what he does as God's minister; above all earthly priests, subject to human infirmities, we have one great High Priest Who alone does all. He, and not bishop or priest, sitteth at the right hand of God and ever maketh intercession for us: He, and not they, is the propitiation for our sins. The wicked and unbelieving priest harms himself only: the sacrament remains the sacrament whether conferred by traitor or faithful priest: no man can give, and no man can take away, God's promises.

In his third book, St. Augustine discusses at length the text 1 Cor. v. 13, which Parmenian specially urged in defence of the line of action adopted by himself and his party: and points out from the language used and the context, that it was not a question of putting away what was evil (malum), but evil men (ut homo malus auferatur ex hominibus bonis), a matter which was best left to church discipline and kind loving treatment, such as that employed by St. Cyprian. And then he asked; Were there no evil men among the Donatists? Let them but consult their own history; perhaps that would teach them not to consider themselves righteous and despise others. While true and good men sighed and lamented over the wickedness they saw around them, they yet trusted to God's promises. It was best to hold fast to these promises, and not sever themselves from each other, even though they (the Catholics) did not cast out the wicked from among them.

(c) On Baptism. St. Augustine had announced in his second book against Parmenian his intention of writing at greater length on this subject. This he now did, in a work which discusses in seven books three principal points:—(a) What is the baptism of the Separatists? Is it valid or not? (b) Can the Donatists cite, with justice, the practice of St. Cyprian as a precedent in their favour? (c) What did the council of Carthage, under St. Cyprian, decide about heretical baptism?

With reference to the baptism of Separatists, St. Augustine defends the opinion that it was valid, and for the same reasons as he had elsewhere alleged, viz. that the sacrament was not to be considered as dependent upon persons or upon the church, but upon the word of the Lord. But he then goes on to assert that baptism would be of little profit to wicked men, and to Separatists as such, because they had lost by sin the grace which they had received. He and the Donatists agreed that regeneration took place in baptism, but for Donatists to abide in their schism was indicative of want of love; and where there was no love, there was no forgiveness of sins. Baptism would only be profitable to Separatists for the forgiveness of sins, when they returned to the unity of the church.

St. Cyprian's actions and the council of Carthage are then discussed, and St. Augustine proves that the Donatist practice was anything but similar to that followed by the bishops of that council. St. Cyprian, while he gave as his own opinion—an opinion confirmed by the council—that heretics who came to the church should be baptized with the baptism of the church, distinctly allowed to his brother-bishops the power to think and act differently. Many of his colleagues did think and act differently; but St. Cyprian neither separated himself from them nor they from him. Had the Donatists behaved in a similar manner, their sect would never have existed.

In the course of his remarks, St. Augustine's views about the church are very forcibly stated.

While he laid down the fundamental maxim that the word of God, as contained in the canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, was sufficient for all guidance on this subject, he did not refuse to Apostolic tradition, a healthy and agreeable, though inferior, influence. In his estimate of the church, external organic unity and episcopal succession were of the highest importance. "Unity or oneness is the first and most necessary predicate of the church," and by "unity" he meant Catholic communion. Proceeding upon the principle "ubi Spiritus, ibi ecclesia," he maintained that when Christ breathed upon His disciples, those disciples represented the church, and He spake to them as to the church. Consequently it followed that the Lord having given His salvation to the church, outside the church there was no salvation. Heretics and schismatics must come within the church and receive peace and that love which is a peculiar gift of Catholic peace and unity. The peace of the church remitted sin, and wilful alienation from that peace was the retention of sin. This peace was, indeed, only in the good who strove to live a life of godliness, and was not to be found in the wicked whether baptized or not, whether in the church or outside it. St. Augustine admitted, and with deep sorrow, that in the church were tares as well as wheat, and outside of it wheat as well as tares; but he looked forward to the time when this, so difficult now, would be made clear, and God would know them that were His. His was a higher and holier view than that which he combated: "we Donatists have no wicked persons amongst us, and in the church there are no children of God!" and it is a view which is supported and expanded in another treatise "on the unity of the church," which there is every reason to believe St. Augustine's.

These works of St. Augustine and his active interference in all matters connected with the Donatist schism, produced naturally great effect. Men like Petilian were silenced; priests, laymen, and even whole communities came back to the church. The time had arrived for Church and State to unite in protecting the Catholics from the still dominant Donatists, and for the church to take such steps as should secure to her flocks properly-qualified pastors. Twice in the year A.D. 401 did a council meet at Carthage to consider this latter point. Donatist enticement or persecution had reduced so much the number of the Catholic clergy, that in many churches there were no deacons, and therefore no future means for supplying the higher offices as they fell vacant. The decisions of the council at Hippo had imposed restrictions upon Donatist clergy exercising, when they returned to the church, their office as clergymen. Appeal was therefore now made to pope Anastasius to remove these restrictions, and the appeal was allowed. St. Augustine set the example of receiving Donatist-ordained deacons, though he appears to have declined to receive again—in an official capacity—those who had previously passed from the church to the sectarians.

These measures, though accompanied by loving words of greeting, roused the Donatists. They were still the majority and as powerful as persistent. Not only did they open their arms to men, clergy and laity, who came to them from the church fretting under the discipline which the revived Catholic strictness had imposed upon them for the laxity of their lives, but they called to their aid the brutal fanaticism of the Circumcellions. Once again fire and the sword levelled churches and destroyed altars. The furious madness of these men directed itself principally against apostate Donatists and the Catholic clergy. St. Augustine was threatened, tracked, and surrounded: Catholic priests were stopped in the road, and the choice offered them: "Promise to preach no more, or prepare for ill-treatment." Moderate-minded men among the Donatists looked on in horror, but were powerless to check the barbarity their brothers had roused. The Catholics, before appealing to the State for aid, made an attempt (A.D. 403) to come to an understanding with the Donatists by means of a conference. The Donatist bishop, Primian, repelled their advances with insult: "The sons of the martyrs and the brood of traitors can never meet," and forbade his colleagues to do what would make them participate in the sins of the Catholics. Attempts were also made by individuals like St. Augustine and Possidius to confer with leading Donatist bishops, but they were equally unsuccessful. At last things had reached such a pass that a council at Carthage (A.D. 404) determined to appeal to Honorius to enforce the laws of Theodosius against the Donatists, and restrict the excesses of the Circumcellions. But before the deputation reached the emperor, his anger appears to have been kindled by the accounts which his own officers transmitted to him. The cruelty of the Donatists to two Catholic bishops, Servus and Maximinian of Bagai, made him little disposed to accept the milder, gentler measures, proposed by the council of Carthage; and in A.D. 405 he issued an edict, fining those who had inflicted the ill-usage, and threatening the Donatist bishops and clergy with banishment. In the same year imperial laws forbade re-baptism, condemned the Donatists as heretics, confiscated their meeting-houses and the goods of those who re-baptized, excluded them from testamentary inheritance, and proclaimed to all "that the one and true Catholic faith of Almighty God was to be received."

These and similar imperial edicts brought to the church many who had been wavering. The Catholics received them with love and forgiveness; and in some cities, as in Carthage, union between Catholics and Donatists was openly asserted and celebrated. But these same edicts also exasperated still further the more extreme Donatists. St. Augustine's own city, Hippo, and its neighbourhood suffered fearfully from the Circumcellions. In A.D. 409 St. Augustine complained bitterly (Ep. 111) of their plundering and ravages, their revengeful acts and cruelties to the Catholic bishops and laity. Letters to Donatist bishops or to imperial commissioners were, however, of little practical use when the men to whom they referred would slay themselves if balked of their prey, or cast themselves into the flames of the fire they themselves had kindled. They heard of Stilicho's death (A.D. 408). Rightly or wrongly they had looked upon him as the originator of the stern decrees lately issued against them, and they hailed the news by joining hands with the heathen, and slaying, ill-using, or putting to flight the hated Catholic bishops. Fresh deputations went to Rome; St. Augustine wrote letters to the chief minister, Olympius; and fresh edicts to proconsul and prefect enforcing previous laws, fines, and punishments were sent to Africa.

It was about this time that St. Augustine issued those other works which throw so much light on the Donatist controversy; and to which reference, however brief, must here be made.

(a) "On the One Baptism." This, written between A.D. 406 and 411, was an answer to a tract of Petilian's bearing the same title. Petilian had maintained that amongst Donatists alone was "the one baptism" to be found, and believed his opinion confirmed by the fact that the Catholics did not re-baptize those who went over to them. Then followed the usual recrimination against the baptism of the church, the defence of re-baptism, and an exhortation to his readers to leave the corrupt church and join the Donatists. St. Augustine's answer was framed on the same lines as those of his greater treatises. The perversity of Separatism and the dignity of the sacrament are emphatically pressed; and the necessity of distinguishing between the sacrament and him who administered it as emphatically repeated. He reminded the reader of St. Cyprian's communion with those from whom he differed strongly, and urged that as the example to be followed in preference to schism. He recommended him to bring before Christians that spiritual and internal separation within the church, always possible between the good and the bad, which would be more productive of good results than exhortations to leave and rend asunder the visible church of Christ.

(b) "Against Cresconius." Cresconius was a layman, who wrote in answer to St. Augustine's "First Book against Petilian," but the work did not come into St. Augustine's hands till some time after it was written. In A.D. 409 St. Augustine's answer was issued. It consists of four books, of which the first three deal specially with Cresconius's arguments, and the fourth enters at length into the history of the Maximianist separation.

Cresconius modified some of Petilian's affirmations about the personal holiness of the baptizer; but he held, as strongly as his predecessor, that the working of baptism was dependent upon the baptizer's character. The views of absolute sinlessness asserted by some modern Perfectionists find their earliest shape in the teaching of the Donatists as illustrated by Cresconius; and he even makes the less presumptuous teaching of the church on this point an item of accusation. The Catholics allowed that they were sinners; therefore, urged Cresconius, they wrongly permitted to themselves the right to baptize; and he quoted the baptism by St. Peter of men already baptized with Moses' baptism in defence of the Donatist habit of re-baptizing. Cresconius treated with ridicule St. Augustine's view that, in the church, believers were not contaminated by unbelievers: in his opinion the church had committed a great sin in not condemning sinners, and was—for that reason—abiding in schism. He warned St. Augustine to come out of such a church, and not make himself partaker with its sin. Cresconius objected to his party being called Donatists: "Not Donatus, but Christ was their founder. They were not heretics; it was not heresy but schism which separated them and the Catholic Church; and it was not they who were living in schism but the Catholics; who thereby had lost church and baptism: they (the Donatists) had remained in the perfect and Catholic Church. In the Donatist communion every member was both a believer and holy, but among the Catholics every member was both an unbeliever and unholy."

St. Augustine, in his reply, abides by his former views as regards baptism. Baptism was a sacrament, let who will administer it, Donatist or other: but it was not now so much a question in what body or party baptism was found, as what blessing followed baptism, what profit was made of baptism. Baptism, by itself, would not take a man to heaven. St. Peter's example, above cited, was not to the point: neither St. Peter nor any of the Apostles re-baptized heretics. The fearlessness with which Cresconius and his party could affirm "we are not sinners" pained, and almost frightened St. Augustine: "I do not know," he said, "whether any one can really be found to say this. It exhibits such great and heretical pride. I can hardly conceive it possible for any man to permit such a thought to possess him, so full of blindness is such arrogance." St. Augustine's remarks about the church are full of beauty, and are descriptive of what the church is, rather than an answer to the strongly-coloured antagonism of Cresconius: "The Church is the holy Body of Christ. In it alone is the Holy Spirit; and therefore love can only be his who is in the church. It is not, however, every member of the church who has received the Holy Ghost, but only he who is truly bound to the members of the church. This church is visible, and known to all. It is the city set on a hill, which cannot be hid. Through His Church Christ reigns from one sea to another and to the ends of the earth. The church is the seed of Abraham, multiplied fourfold, like to the stars of heaven and to the sand on the sea-shore in multitude; and through which all families of the earth are blessed. The church grows and cannot perish, even though wicked men are mixed in it with the good; for this mixture does not make the church lose its character. When there are wicked men in the church, men who are spiritually dead, I must not, for that reason, separate myself from those who are living members of the church. It is not men who have founded the church. Men exist and are in the church, like good wheat if they are good, or like weeds if they are bad. I must try to improve these bad men so far as I can, and if I cannot improve them, I must bear with them. The Apostles took no part in the thefts of which Judas was guilty, though to all appearance they belonged to the same company, listened to the same Master, and received the same sacraments. They were his companions in one sense, but separated from him by dissimilarity of spirit."

St. Augustine had been at one time disposed to allow such a distinction as Cresconius had maintained between heretics and schismatics; but he seems now to have come to the conclusion that practically there was very little difference. While he assented to Cresconius's definition:

"Heresy is the characteristic of those who depart from the faith of the church, schism is that of those who hold the same faith as the church;" he pressed it to its logical conclusion, and pointed out that to re-baptize a person already baptized was heresy, and that therefore they who practised it were heretics rather than schismatics. There was a heresy indeed, which would be pardoned if they returned to the church, and St. Augustine exhorted the Donatists to do this.

In this letter St. Augustine again defends the position that under certain circumstances persecution is justifiable. State and Church had united in taking measures to suppress Donatism; and these measures, when enforced by imperial agents, had involved misery, oppression, and persecution, however much the church might have desired them to have been carried out in the loving spirit of a mother, wishful only to recall her disobedient children. His arguments are the usual ones on this subject, clearly and forcibly put; but also leaving the impression, as such arguments always do, that the man who puts them forward has ceased to be, in that respect, generous and large-hearted, and has become narrow-minded and the half-unwilling apologist of a system he secretly despises. What, in fact, St. Augustine defends in this letter, was so much in contrast to his usual way both of speaking of and acting towards Donatists, that—whether inspired by this letter or not—a bishop named Vincentius wrote to him, asking him if it was indeed true that he had changed his hitherto friendly attitude into one of hostility. St. Augustine's reply was a letter (Ep. 93) which may be summed up in the quotation he made from St. Luke (xiv. 23): "It is written: Compel them to come in." Little did he forebode to what fearful results his now celebrated maxim would afterwards lead. It was one thing to call for the interference of the State when Donatist pride and brutality defied civil laws; it was another to permit to ecclesiastical powers a similar interference when a man's religious convictions were under consideration. St. Augustine's own previous remark to Petilian, "I would have no man compelled to believe against his will," exhibited a truer appreciation of the noble maxim attributed (rightly or wrongly) to him: "In necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas."

The invasion of Rome by Alaric king of the Goths took place A.D. 408, and the rumour got abroad that the Donatists of Africa were ready to give the invader their support. The emperor Honorius was induced, chiefly by political considerations but partly also by his own kindness of heart, to rescind his extreme decrees against heathen and schismatic. In A.D. 410, however, a deputation of four bishops from Carthage waited upon him to bring once more to his notice their complaints against the Donatists. The deputation was charged to petition for a conference in which Catholic and Donatist might meet under imperial presidency, and discuss their differences. The Donatists themselves seem either then or a little later to have expressed a desire for such a conference, and in October, A.D. 410, the proconsul of Africa, Marcellinus, received instructions from Honorius to make all necessary preparations within a time not exceeding six months from that date, and to act as president at the debates. Marcellinus, a soldier, an under-secretary of State, and a well-informed man, was in many ways fitted for this post. He began by issuing an edict (Jan., A.D. 411) inviting Catholic and Donatist bishops to meet in June at Carthage and elect representatives, promising to all concerned safe-conduct to and fro, and suspending for the time all processes against Donatists.

Both parties entered eagerly and readily into the scheme: 286 Catholic and 279 Donatist bishops came to Carthage in May; and Marcellinus issued another edict indicating the order of proceedings. The baths of Gargilian, a convenient place in the middle of the city, was selected as the place of debate, and June 1 as the date. Each party was to be represented by seven disputants, to whom alone was granted the permission to speak, and by seven assistants who might act as counsellors to the speakers. The court officials and four clerical notaries, assisted by four bishops from each side, were to take down the proceedings, which would be countersigned by the president and the members of the conference. Each speaker would also be required to sign his name to the report of any speech made by him. The conference would last three days, and the second day would be occupied in affirming and subscribing the protocols, which would then be sealed by the president and the eight assistant-bishops.

The Donatist bishops, on receiving this edict, protested especially against that part of it which required the signature of the speaker to his speech, and then elected their seven representatives, Primian, Petilian, Emeritus, Protasius, Montanus, Gaudentius, and Adeodatus, to whom they committed "the cause of God's congregation, and appointed them their defenders against the traitors and persecutors." The Catholic bishops, after sending two letters to Marcellinus—in the first of which they assented to everything in his edict, and in the second, regretted the protest of the Donatists—elected as their representatives, Aurelius, Alypius, Augustine, Vincentius, Fortunatus, Fortunatian, and Possidius; and placed in their hands a document which gave a short sketch of the history of the schism, and added a defence of their view of the church, its sacraments and attitude to unbelievers, in substance, a summary of the arguments of St. Augustine.

These documents were countersigned by all the bishops of each party.

The first day of the conference (June 1) ended in no results. The whole time was occupied in verifying the identity of the bishops who had signed; and the dishonesty of the one party, and the irritation of the other augured ill for any practical conclusions. The second day (June 3) was equally wasted, difficulties being made about signing the proceedings of the first day; and the session was adjourned to June 8. On that day, after much dispute, in which president, Catholic, and Donatist all joined, as to what was the precise or what should be the first point debated, matters were at last brought to a crisis by St. Augustine. He proposed an alternative: either to go into the matter historically, if it was the wish of those present to consider their differences as a historical question, or to discuss it Scripturally if it was their wish to examine what and which was the true church; and the president ordered the recital of the acts from the State archives which bore upon the subject. This point was only attained after many attempts on the part of the Donatists to create delay ("quanta agantur ut nihil agatur," says St. Augustine); and before it could be fairly discussed two interruptions took place.

The one was caused by Petilian's personalities. Turning upon St. Augustine, who was then taking the lead of his party, he asked, "Who ordained you a bishop?" This was to revive an old scandal, and an insult to revive it; and for some moments the interruption was so great that the president was forced to interfere. At last for the sake of peace, he requested that Petilian's question might be answered. "It is superfluous to do so," replied St. Augustine, "yet answer I will;" and in simple but nervous language, he narrated all the events connected with his ordination, and shattered to atoms the charge of immorality implied in Petilian's question. "We must cease these personalities," urged the president. "Then let us leave out of court Caecilian's case," replied Emeritus. "The life of a pastor must be blameless. Whether this is the case with the Catholics or not is easily proved; let this explanation which we have written of our separation from the church be read." This was the second interruption. A document was handed in, which had emanated not from the entire Donatist party, but from the seven representatives.

Objection being taken to this, Emeritus explained that the paper being based on Holy Scripture, the attestation of all the bishops was not considered necessary; and at St. Augustine's especial request it was handed to a Donatist to read. This document, though containing nothing absolutely new, was of the greatest importance; had it been presented sooner, all the previous waste of time and exhibition of temper might have been avoided. The paper, after some prefatory remarks, objected to the Catholic belief that, according to Holy Scripture, the church must contain to the end of time good and bad mixed together. This belief was fatal to their own conception, which they supported by Scripture, that the church must be pure and without spot. The Donatists objected also to the examples drawn from the times of the prophets as inapplicable to their own day, and refused their assent to the Catholic appreciation of the case of Judas Iscariot, and to the Catholic interpretation of special texts (e. g. St. Matt. xiii. 24, etc.; Rom. i. 18, 23). They maintained the necessity of separating themselves entirely from sinners, defended their apparent inconsistency, in this respect, towards the Maximianists, and asserted themselves persecuted by the Catholics and by those kings and consuls who had been swayed by Catholic misrepresentation.

The conference listened to this paper respectfully and without interruption. St. Augustine rose to reply to it. After expressing his sincere regret that it had not been produced sooner, he proceeded to deal with its two main propositions; (a) The testimony of Holy Scripture to what was the church; (b) The accusation brought by the Donatists against the church. His speech, so far as it is recorded, was a defence of the Catholic interpretation of Scripture, and based upon the same line of reasoning as that with which his already quoted works have made the reader familiar. He was interrupted frequently by the Donatists; and he had to appeal not only to them to extend to him that courteous silence which the Catholics had awarded to the reading of their paper, but also to the president to secure him a fair hearing.

The president at length closed these interruptions and this portion of the debate, by insisting upon the consideration of the question: What were the original causes of the schism? By dint of perseverance, he procured the reading of those acts, which familiarised him at once with the events coupled with the names of Caecilian, Felix of Aptunga, Majorinus, Melchisedes, etc. He was then in a position to give his judgment. The deputies, at his request, left the hall while the judgment was considered and written down. On their return that judgment was read to them. The official acts and the testimony of Holy Scripture were taken to have proved respectively the unsoundness of the accusations against Caecilian, and of the view that one man, through the sinfulness of another, became therefore a partaker in that other's guilt. "I therefore," said Marcellinus, "warn all men . . . to hinder the assembling of Donatists in towns and villages, and to restore the churches to the Catholics. Every bishop of the community of Donatus must, on his return to his home, return to the one true church, or at least not impede the faithful execution of the law. If they have Circumcellions about them, and do not restrain and repress the excesses of these men, they shall be deprived of their places in the state."

Marcellinus was strictly within the terms of his appointment when he thus assumed the attitude of a judge rather than that of the presidents of a debate; and the conduct of the Donatists throughout it will fairly explain his assumption of the former character. Their unreasonableness, quibbling, personalities, and pride, estranged from them a man who, at the opening of the conference, had no other wish than to be impartial, but who at the close of it felt that summary proceedings could alone secure peace and order.

The conference had been carefully followed, and its results anxiously awaited, by thousands. It will be readily conceived that the historical facts and the Scripture arguments thereat adduced came to many Donatists with all the novelty and power of convincing truth, while they angered and irritated many who could not deny them. These last, among whom were the principal bishops, smarting at their defeat, reviled Marcellinus and appealed to the emperor. The reply came (A.D. 412), terse and stern, and classed them as heretics. It bade them return to the church, fined them in various sums according to their rank and station, and in the event of contumacy confiscated their houses and goods.

This edict was followed by the usual consequences. Many Donatists obeyed it, others scorned it. Whole communities, as at Cirta, bishops and laymen everywhere, returned to the church; some glad to do so, their convictions having radically changed since the conference; others, induced by baser views of expediency and comfort. The Circumcellions, on the other hand, broke out afresh. They fired churches and destroyed houses. They cast into the flames those Scriptures which had been found to tell against them, and cruelly maltreated and even murdered those ecclesiastics who expounded them. The less violent proclaimed with a sneer that the chests of the church and the imperial coffers were enriched with the gold of the Separatists, and pointed to the death of Marcellinus (A.D. 413) as a divine judgment upon their unrighteous judge. But that death, mysterious still to the historian and divine, and regretted by both emperor and St. Augustine, brought no relief to the Donatist. In A.D. 414 a yet sterner decree than the former announced that all Donatist church-buildings were to become the property of the Catholic Church, and all Donatist clergy to be suspended and banished. Fines were doubled; confiscation and banishment stared the Separatists in the face; their testimony in courts of law was disallowed; their social condition was degraded to the lowest; nothing but the penalty of death was wanting to their cup of bitterness. To St. Augustine, as much as to any one, did they owe their immunity from this last extreme. He could not himself push his "Compel them to come in" to its last and bitterest conclusion; and he strove, and successfully, as with Marcellinus, to prevent others from imbruing their hands with the blood of mistaken fanatics.

The church, to its credit be it recorded, strove by kindness and gentleness to make the pain of defeat less bitter to its foes, while it did not neglect to avail itself of the new advantages resulting from victory. As the Catholic bishops returned to their homes they spread everywhere the knowledge of what had happened, and in the following Lent publicly proclaimed it in their churches. Short summaries of the conference, of its acts, and of the judgment, were prepared and circulated, one being by St. Augustine himself. These were intended principally for Catholics; others, as St. Augustine's "ad Donatistas post collectionem," were addressed to the Sectarrians who might be swayed by the one-sided reports circulated by Donatist bishops respecting the conference, or by their slanderous abuse of Marcellinus and the Catholics.

In A.D. 418 a council was held at Carthage, at which certain resolutions were passed regulating the order of proceedings, when Donatist bishops, clergy, and congregations came back to the church. Nothing could prove more clearly to what a large extent this had taken place. The church was no longer suppliant, but triumphant; and the change is observable not only in these resolutions, but in some letters and acts of St. Augustine which belong to this period, and which may be said to be his last words on the great Donatist controversy.

His work, De Correctione Donatistarum, is addressed to a soldier, Bonifacius, and is written in a style and language almost military in its stern enforcement of discipline. Bonifacius had asked him to tell him the difference between the Arians and Donatists. The juxtaposition of these names and their temporary alliance was due to political far more than to any other considerations; the Goths being Arians, and like the Donatist, opponents of the Church Catholic. St. Augustine, after answering the question of Boni-facius, went on to speak of Donatists as "rebels against the unity of the church of Christ." The conference at Carthage and the emperor had laid down laws. When men disobeyed those laws, as did some of the Donatists, they disobeyed laws which were passed in the service of truth, and they deserved punishment (Dan. iii. 29). The church was therefore justified in enforcing those laws, though she would do this without that shedding of blood which marked the Circumcellion. The church would enforce them in a loving spirit; for the Lord had commanded His disciples to compel the resisting to come to the marriage-feast, and that marriage-feast was the unity of the Body of Christ. The church was that Body; so long as a man lived, God, in His goodness, would bring him to repentance, and lead him to that church which was the temple of the Holy Ghost; but outside that Body, the church, the Holy Ghost gave no man life.

The same strong statement recurs in his exhortation to Emeritus the Donatist, bishop of Caesarea. The majority of Emeritus' congregation had returned to the church. St. Augustine pleaded with the bishop: "Outside the church you may have everything except salvation. You may have Offices, Sacraments, Liturgy, Gospel, belief, and preaching, in the name of the Trinity; but you can only find salvation in the Catholic Church."

The last letters of St. Augustine were addressed to a Donatist bishop, Gaudentius. Marcellinus had been succeeded by Dulcitus, who endeavoured to carry out the strong laws against the Donatists with all possible mildness, and specially interested himself in restraining the fanaticism of the Circumcellions. Unfortunately, some words of his were taken to mean that he would punish them with death unless they returned to the church. Gaudentius and his congregation assembled themselves in their church, determined to set fire to it and perish in the flames. Dulcitus contrived to stop this by a letter to Gaudentius, who in two letters defended his proposed action and the views of his party. Dulcitus, in despair at what he should do with such people, appealed to St. Augustine. As soon as he could find time, St. Augustine answered Gaudentius's arguments. His work, contra Gaudentium, in two books, goes once more over the old ground, in addition to exposing the folly and crime of suicide. The views of the church on baptism, the worthiness of ministers, discipline, and compulsory powers are stated as honestly and as emphatically as before; and they are closed with one of those loving sentences which take the sting out of reproofs both fierce and dogmatic.

Donatism had now lived its life. No new champions appeared to defend it, and no St. Augustines were needed to expose it. Once again only did the schism lift up its head. Towards the end of the 6th century there was a momentary revival of energy and proselytism; but popes such as Leo and Gregory the Great and imperial laws were irresistible. The movement at once died out. The Donatists lingered on till the invasion of Africa by the Mahomedans swept them away or merged them into some other schismatical body.

DONATULUS, African bishop. Cyp. Ep. 56. [AHIMNIUS.] Bishop of Capsa (P. Byzac.), suffr. 69 Conc. Carth. sub Cyp. vii. No doubt then it was for his consecration that the five bishops had met.

[E. W. B.]

DONATUS (1) African bishop, Cyp. Ep. 57, Ep. 70, in Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. de Bapt. i.; Sentt. Epp. in Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. 3, de Bapt. No. 55. bishop of Cybaliana (in Prov. Proc. (?) Morcelli).

(2) Alius in Epp. 57 and 70.

(3) Presbyter of Carthage, and one of the party who pressed Cyprian to relax the rule as to readmitting the lapsed, but could not induce him to decide apart from the presbytery and laity (Ep. 14). With him were FORTUNATUS, NOVATUS, GORDIUS. These were four of the five presbyters who originally opposed the election of Cyprian. See PRIVATUS. (Cf. Neander, i. 312.) There can be no question about Novatus being one of the first five if we weigh the emphatic words of Ep. 52, ii. 13.)

(4) Immediate predecessor of Cyprian in the see of Carthage, condemned Privatus of Lambæse of heresy in council of ninety bishops, as is commonly stated. The words perhaps more exactly mean that Privatus was condemned at such a council, and that Donatus, as well as Fabian, bishop of Rome, gave letters condemnatory of him (Cyp. Ep. 59, xiii.).

(5) The friend and fellow-convert to whom Cyprian addressed his first treatise De Gratia Dei. He was possibly a rhetorician also.

(6) Mart. Carth. A.D. 250. [ARISTO.]

[E. W. B.]

(7) the Great, bishop of Carthage. [DONATISM.]

(8) Bishop of Casae Nigrae. [DONATISM.]

(9). [SECUNDUS.] [E. B. B.]

(10) Bishop of Arezzo about A.D. 350; martyr in 362. (Gams, Seri's Episc. 741; Gregory the Great, Diad. i. 7; Ep. xiv. 7, 13; v. Acta S. Aug. 7.) [E. B. B.]

(11), AELIUS. A celebrated grammarian, who taught Jerome rhetoric (Hieron. ad ann. 358; Patrol. Lat. xxvii. 687). Smaragdus, abbat of St. Michael-on-the-Meuse (A.D. 819), has a commentary on Donatus in the form of a grammar; of this there are two MSS. in the library at Corbia. (Patrol. Lat. cii. 10; Honorius, lib. iv. De Script. Eccl. cap. vi.; Patrol. Lat. clxxii. 230.) Remigius, monk of St. Germain d'Auxerre, also has a commentary on Donatus (Patrol. Lat. cxxxi. 49; Ceillier, iv. 325, xii. 2 6, 759). Lindemann has edited the treatises of Donatus as one book:—(1) "De literis, syllabis, pedibus et tonis"; (2) "De octo partibus orationis," "De barbarismo," "De solecismo," "De coeteris vitiis," "De metaplasmo," "De schoematibus," "De tropis." These works were widely spread in the schools of the middle ages, so that the name Donat became proverbial, and synonymous with any kind of lesson. Bishop Pecocke entitled one of his works The Donat (introduction) into Christin Religion; and another the Follower to the Donat. An old French proverb says, "Les diables estoient encore à leur Donat" (the devils were still at their rudiments). (See Warburton, Hist. Engl. Poetry, sect. viii.)

Besides the Ars Grammatica, we have Introductions (Enarrationes) and Scholia on five of the six plays of Terence. Some think that these are collected from his pupils' notes. The notes on Virgil, cited by Servius from a Donatus, are probably by Tiberius Claudius Donatus.

In the early days of printing a prodigious number of editions of the Ars Grammatica were printed. They have given rise to more discussions amongst bibliographers than any other book except Holy Scripture. (Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale.) [W. M. S.]

DONATUS (12), son of Ninus, and Primus son of Januarius, two Catholic deacons, whose murder by Donatists is related by Optatus (De Schism. Donat. ii. cap. 18, Patrol. Lat. xi. 970; Ceillier, v. 115.) [W. M. S.]

(13) ST., bishop of Euroea in the province of Vetus Epirus, circ. A.D. 587; his life was translated into Latin by Anastasius, the librarian, who died circ. A.D. 888. Sozomenus gives us a legend of the slaughter of a dragon by Donatus, and also of a copious spring of water which was granted to his prayers. He says that a splendid church was built over his remains. (Sozom. vii. 26, Patrol. Graec. lxxvii. 1498; AA. SS. Boland. Aprilis, iii. ad diem 30; Ceillier, xx. 715.) [W. M. S.]

(14) A deacon of the church of Carthage, circ. A.D. 393. One of the charges brought at the council of Cabarsussis in that year against Primianus, Donatist bishop of Carthage, was that he had engaged certain presbyters in a conspiracy against the deacon Maximianus, and against the deacons Rogatianus, Donatus, and Salgaminus. (Augustin. Enarr. in Psal. xxxvi. 2, Patrol. Lat. xxxvi. 378; Ceillier, iv. 658.) [W. M. S.]

(15) A bishop of Tysedis in Numidia, in the 4th century, violently deprived of his see by the Donatist bishop Felix, although he had led an irreproachable life, and was 70 years old; this account is given by Optatus. (De Schism. Donat. ii. 19, Patrol. Lat. xi. 973; Ceillier, v. 115.) [W. M. S.]

(16) Donatist bishop of Bagaia in the 4th century, who, according to Optatus, excited the Circumcellions against Paulus and Macarius, who had been sent by the emperor Constans to procure reunion of the schism. (Optat. Contr. Donat. iii. 1, Patrol. Lat. xi. 989; Ceillier, v. 116, 117.) [W. M. S.]

(17) Proconsul of Africa, addressed in A.D. 408 by Augustine of Hippo. The law of the emperor Honorius against Donatists and Jews was designated in particular to Donatus the proconsul; Augustine therefore wrote asking him to let the Donatists know that the laws against them were in force, but to be merciful in the execution of them, and not to put any to death, however violent they had been against the church; both on other grounds, and because ecclesiastics would not bring complaints before him if the result was likely to be the capital punishment of those whom they accused. About A.D. 410 Augustine again addresses Donatus, on his retirement from office. Donatus had filled his place with great honour and perfect probity; Augustine exhorts him to humility and true greatness. (Aug. Epp. 100, 112, Patrol. Lat. xxxiii. 366, 427; Ceillier, ix. 17, 104, and 110.) [W. M. S.]

DONATUS (18) Presbyter of the Donatist sect, arrested for Donatism about A.D. 416; would not use the mule provided for him, but dashed himself to the ground and injured himself severely. Augustine writes to remonstrate with him (Ep. 173 [204]; Migne, ii. 753). [E. B. B.]

(19) Bishop of Nicopolis, metropolis of the province Vetus Epirus (circ. A.D. 425-433, etc.) He is addressed by Cyril of Alexandria in A.D. 433, on the subject of the negotiations for peace between the Egyptian and Syrian parties at the council of Ephesus. Cyril thinks it necessary to send details, for fear of false reports. He also sends copies of the letter he had written to the Oriental party, and of the reply he had received. (Cyril, Ep. 155, Patrol. Graec. lxxvii. 250; Ceillier, viii. 295.) [W. M. S.]

(20) ST., was twenty-fifth bishop of Avignon, and lived about the middle of the 5th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 863.) [D. R. J.]

(21) VICTOR, RUSTICUS, and PARDALUS, the four African bishops at the council convened at Rome, March 14, A.D. 487, to consider the treatment of those who had fallen in the Vandal persecutions (Ceillier, x. 720). [E. B. B.]

(22) Addressed by FULGENTIUS. He was a young man, who, after having applied himself to classical studies, devoted his time to religious reading. Finding himself in the company of Arians, he did not know what to say to their argument that the Father is greater than the Son. So he wrote to Fulgentius, and the reply is preserved. (Fulgent, Ep. 8, ad Donat. p. 197, Patrol. Lat. lxx. 360; Ceillier, xi. 32.) [W. M. S.]

(23) ST., hermit, near Sisteron in Provence, died about the year 535, and is commemorated on the 19th August. He was a native of Orleans, and was distinguished in his childhood for the brightness of his intellect. He had read the whole of the Bible, Old and New Testaments, before he was ten years old, and the bishop was so pleased with him that he dedicated him to the diaconate when he was only twelve. He subsequently turned hermit, as it is said, in Mount Jura. His legends relate to serpents, demons, and a terrible dragon. (AA. SS. Boll. Aug. iii. p. 735; Ado, Martyrolog. p. 333, Patrol. Lat. cxxiii.; Usuard, Martyrolog. p. 377, Patrol. Lat. cxxiii.) [D. R. J.]

(24) ST., bishop of Besançon, was born in 592 or 594, and died in 651. He is commemorated on the 7th of August. According to the contemporary record of abbat Jonas, he was the son of Waldeleus, who was duke of a part of Burgundy bordering on the Jura. Flavia, the mother of the saint, is said to have been barren, and to have gone with her husband to St. Columbanus, then abbat of Luxeuil, to ask him to pray that they might have a child. St. Columbanus promised to comply with their request on condition that they promised that if his prayer should be answered they would dedicate the child to the service of God. This they willingly promised, and in due time a son was born to them. The mother immediately sent the child from their home at Besançon to St. Columbanus at Luxeuil, and he at once baptized it under the name of Donatus, as being a gift of heaven. The abbat then sent it back to its mother to be nursed, and when it was old enough it was again entrusted to him to be educated for the holy office for which it was destined. St. Donatus became a monk in the monastery at Luxeuil under St. Columbanus, and about the year 624 he was consecrated bishop of Besançon. In 625 he was present at the council of Rheims, over which Sonnatius presided, and in 646 at the council of Châlons-sur-Saône. St. Donatus founded the monastery of St. Paul (Palatius) at Besançon, for "regular canons," and placed it under the Rule of St. Benedict and of St. Columbanus of Luxeuil. His mother Flavia, after the death of her husband, also founded a monastery for women, called St. Joussan, which was placed under the Rule of St. Caesarius, and she herself, together with her daughter, retired into it. St. Donatus may, however, be looked upon as the actual, though not the nominal founder of St. Joussan as well as of St. Paul's. He was buried in his own monastery, and his mother in hers. In his life, as given by the Bollandists, it is stated that he died after the year 656, but most French writers give 651 as the date of his death. (AA. SS. Boll. Aug. ii. p. 197; Mabillon, AA. SS. V. St. Ben. ii. 14; Gall. Christ. xv. 15; Histoire Littéraire de la France. iii. 570; Jonas Monachus Elnonensis, Patrol. Lat. lxxxvii.; Floardus, Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii., Patrol. Lat. cxxxv.) [D. R. J.]

DONATUS (25), probably the latinised form of the Irish Donagh, is the name of two saints who belonged to Ireland by birth, were foreign bishops, and are often confounded, though there must have been nearly two centuries between them: the one was St. Donatus, bishop of Lupia, and brother of St. Cathaldus, in the 7th century [CATHALDUS], and the other, St. Donatus, bishop of Fiesole in Tuscany, in the ninth. Both were commemorated on Oct. 22. The former accompanied his brother St. Cathaldus to Italy, where St. Donatus became the first bishop of Lupia or Aletium, now Lecce, in Naples, and the two brothers are said to have lived together as hermits for some time, near a small town, now called San Cataldo. In his usual way Dempster credits him with the authorship of two books, which no other one ever heard of. (Colgan, Acta SS. 547, c. 11, 556 n. 13; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 16, wks. vi. 308; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 212-3; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 18, § 11; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 88. For the bishop of Fiesole, in the middle of the 9th century, see Colgan, ib. 236, in the Life of St. Brigida, sister of St. Andrew, the deacon of Fiesole; Lanigan, ib. iii. c. 21, § 4.) [J. G.]

(26) Abbat of Hy. [DUNCHADH.]

DONATUS (27), patriarch of Grado, A.D. 717—circ. 730. Addressed by pope Gregory II. in a letter which warns him of the encroachments on his prerogatives made by Serenus patriarch of Aquileia. (Greg. II. Pap. Epist. xvi., Patrol. Lat. lxxxix. 527; Ceillier, xii. 25.) [W. M. S.]

DONDAN, of Little Berneray, is one of the saints of the Lewes, mentioned by Martin (West. Isles, 27). It is probably the same name as Donan and DONNAN (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 468). [J. G.]

DONIDIUS, born at Ebreuil, a little town in Auvergne. He resided at Arverna (Clermont) as a cleric, and was a man of note. He was a friend of Sidonius, who, in a letter addressed to him about A.D. 471, tells him that pious books, such as Augustine and Prudentius, are proper for women, while Varro and Horace belong to men. (Sidon. Ep. ii. 9.) Sidonius afterwards requests Hypatius to let this Donidius buy back the other half of his patrimony at Ebreuil (ib. iii. 5). [E. B. B.]

DONNAN. The fullest and most accurate account of the saints of this name is to be found in Dr. Reeves's Adannan, 303-9, with immediate reference to St. Donnan of Egg, and his companions in martyrdom. But in his treatment of them he accepts as a fact, without discussing it as a matter worthy of dispute, that St. Donnan, the patron of Auchterless, was the same as Donnan of Egg, and not a saint of the 12th century. In the Bollandists (Acta SS. Apr. tom. ii. 483, 491), there are two notices of St. Donnanus, and both on April 17. On the former page is an account of St. Donnan and his fifty-two companions, who were slain on the Scotch island Egg, about A.D. 600; and on the latter is an account of St. Donnan, abbat in Scotia, who lived under king Machabius, "anno 640, imo 1046, aut circiter," and by Camerarius is called "Abbas Tanglandiæ," A.D. 1044, and by Dempster is identified with St. Donnan of Auchterless, and said to have lived or died A.D. 640. It is evident that the Bollandists wish to separate the two, and are willing to rectify imagined errors in authorities, in order to make the patron of Auchterless the special friend and favourite of king Duncan. But there is so much confusion in the chronology, and the authorities quoted for the separation are so weak, that it seems best to regard the saints as in reality only one. Dempster in his Menolog. Scotie. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 197) gives a double dedication, "April 17 Donani abbatis patroni in Achterles, cujus baculus circulatoris cuilibet languari medebatur. April 18. In Buchania Donani ejusdem abbatis elevatio."

(1) Abbat of Egg, April 17. (Donanus, Acta SS. Boll. Ap. ii. 487.) Like so many others in the 6th and 7th centuries, this saint came over from Ireland to evangelise the West of Scotland; he was younger than St. Columba and probably followed him, as he is not found in the list of his companions. According to the Felire of Aengus, he went to St. Columba to make him his "soul's friend" or spiritual director, but St. Columba declined, on the plea that he could not be "soul's friend" to the heirs of red martyrdom, that is, to St. Donan and his companions. And this fate came to them in their own monastery on the island of Egg. It is said to have been on Easter day, A.D. 617, that the bloody deed was consummated, when the queen or female chief of the island sent her agents, who, according to some accounts, are called the pirates, to murder the saint and his fifty-one companions for their settlement on her property: mass was begun when the murderers arrived, apparently on Easter Eve, and on the request being made to the queen's agents to wait till mass was ended, they did not molest the saints for the time, but so soon as the Holy Mysteries were celebrated, the whole company of monks was put to the sword. St. Donnan had many dedications in the west and north of Scotland, and one at Auchterless, in the north-east, where his bacul or pastoral staff was preserved up to the time of the Reformation, and was used for curing diseases. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 324-26, 467; J. H. Burton, Hist. Scot. i. 277-78; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 207; Innes, Orig. Par. passim; Montalembert, Monks of the West, iii. 227, Edinb. 1861; Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 105; View Dioc. Mart. Aberd. 505-6; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 132.)

DONNAN (2) Son of Liath and priest of Inis-aingin, in Loch Ribh, Jan. 7. This St. Donnan was nephew and disciple of St. Senan (Mar. 8), and successor of St. Ciaran (Sept. 9) of Clonmacnoise, at his monastery of Inis-aingin, now Hare Island, in Loch Ree, on the Shannon. St. Ciaran is said, in his life, to have left St. Donnan "the island, and also his gospel and its true bearer, i.e. Maelodhrain" (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 9). In the Life of St. Senan, given by Colgan (Acta SS. 535, c. 35), a story is related of St. Donnan's working a miracle, by the instructions of St. Senan his uncle, on two boys who were drowned. His chief feast was Jan. 7, but he was also commemorated on April 29 and Aug. 11. From his contemporaries we must infer that he flourished about the middle of the 6th century. (Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi., Ind. Chron. A.D. 548; Reeves, Adannan, pp. xl. 303; Colgan, Acta SS. 191, A.D. 548, 535, c. 35, 540 n. 23, 542, c. 2; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 99.)

(3) Deacon, Aug. 11. He was son of Beoadh, and brother of St. Ciaran (Sept. 9) of Clonmacnoise [CIARAN (5)]: he was at Cluain along with his brother (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 217, 243; Reeves, Adannan, 303). [J. G.]

DONNELL. There was probably an ecclesiastic of this name in the west of Scotland, who has given his name to Kildonnell in Kilchousland, in the present parish of Glassary, Argyshire, but the person himself is unknown (Innes, Orig. Par. ii. 19; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 327). [J. G.]

DONUM GRATIAE. [BAPTISM.]

DONUS, bishop of Messana. [DOMNUS.]

DONUS or DOMNUS, pope, was elected successor to Adeodatus in August, 676, and consecrated on the 2nd of November of that year. Of his life and actions little is known, except that he was by birth a Roman, and that he completed certain ecclesiastical buildings in Rome. He died and was buried in St. Peter's on the 11th of April, 678. For the chronology, see Jaffé, Regesta Pontificum. [T. R. B.]

DORBENE FODA (the Tall), A., Oct. 28. O'Clery (in Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 287) calls him son of Altaine, of the race of Conall Gulban, and abbat of Ia Coluincille; Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 480, col. 2) gives a more extended genealogy, in which Dorbene is sixth from Conall Gulban, but this is, probably, by omitting one or two links. The Annals of Ulster (O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Script. iv. 73 and note) have at A. D. 712 "Dorbein Kathedram lae obit, et quinque mensibus peractis in Primatu, V. Kal. Novembris die sabbati obit," but the true year is A. D. 713, as in 713 the Sunday letter was A, and Oct. 28 was on "die sabbati" or Saturday; this is also the year given by Tighernach and the Four Masters. How he was abbat at Iona that year is not easily explained, unless we suppose that as St. Dunchadh was elected abbat, possibly tanist or coadjutor abbat, in A. D. 707, during the life of abbat Conamhail, so St. Dorbene may in the same way have been chosen during the primacy of St. Dunchadh, and again St. Faelchu, two years after this, and two years before St. Dunchadh's death; or else we must suppose that after St. Adamnan's death there was a schism in the monastery for some years, which is, in itself, improbable, and has no authority in the annals [DUNCHADH] (Reeves, Adamnan, p. clxxii.; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 19, § 4; Grub, Ecol. Hist. Scot. i. 114; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 326). At the close of St. Adamnan's Life of St. Columba there is the colophon, "whoever readeth these books on the virtues of St. Columba, let him pray to the Lord for me Dorbene, that after death I may possess everlasting life." There is every reason to believe that this Dorbene the scribe is the same as Dorbene the Tall, who outlived St. Adamnan by nine years, and was the writer of the MS. which is now called Codex A of St. Adamnan's Vita S. Columbae, and is preserved in the public library of Schaffhausen, having formerly belonged to Reichenau (Reeves, Adamnan, pp. xiii.-xv. 242, n. k; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. p. 372 n. k). The Bollandists (Acta SS. Oct. 23, tom. xii. 623-5) give a sylloge upon this abbat of Hy, and a list of the different abbats, placing Dorbene in A. D. 713. [J. G.]

DORMITANTES. [NYCTAGES.]

DOROTHEA. Virgin, martyred with Theophilus the Advocate, and two other women, Christa and Callista, at Caesarea, in Cappadocia. Some doubt is entertained about these names, as they occur in no Greek menology or martyrology; but they are found in ancient Roman accounts; and details are given by the monk Usuard, the bishop Ado, and Rabanus. They are celebrated on the 6th of February. Baronius, Bollandus and Tillemont agree in placing the death of Dorothea in the persecution of Diocletian.

Dorothea was a young girl of Caesarea, in Cappadocia, famed so widely for Christian piety that when the governor Fabricius, Sappirius, or Apricius arrived at that place he had her brought before him and tortured. Unable to persuade her to marry, he sent her to Christa and Cal-lista, with orders that they should induce her to give up her faith. She converted them; whereupon the governor put Christa and Callista to death in a boiling caldron.

Dorothea was again tortured, and shewed her joy for the martyrdom of Christa and Callista, and for her own sufferings. The governor, insulted and enraged, ordered her head to be cut off.

On her way to the place of execution, an advocate named Theophilus laughingly asked her to send him some apples and roses from the paradise of her heavenly bridegroom. The legend states that these were miraculously conveyed to him, although Cappadocia was covered at the time with snow. Theophilus was converted, tortured, and decapitated.

Dorothea's body is said to have been taken to Rome, and preserved in the church which bears her name, across the Tiber. On her festival there is a ceremony of blessing roses and apples. (Migne, Dict. Hagiographique, i. 779; Bollandus, Acta Sanct. Februar. i. p. 771; Tillemont, Hist. Eccles. v. 497 (Paris, 1702). [W. M. S.]

DOROTHEUS (1), ST., was the first abbat of Lyons, under bishops Aelius, Faustinus, and Verus, in the 3rd century (Gall. Christ. iv. 222). [D. R. J.]

(2) Bishop of Tyre, placed by Le Quien (Or. Christ. ii. 803) after Methodius the martyr, at the close of the 3rd century. Theophanes (41, p. 19) records his sufferings for the faith under Diocletian and Licinius, reporting that he was banished, and returning at the cessation of the persecution, was again driven into exile to Olyssopolis on the accession of Julian, at the hands of whose officers he suffered death, at the age of 107. The whole story rests on late evidence, and has been overthrown by Tillemont (vol. v. p. 657, note 8) and Cave (Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 163), who have shewn the inconsistencies of the account, and called attention to the improbability of its having been passed over in silence by both Eusebius and Jerome, if true. Theophanes says that Dorotheus wrote much on ecclesiastical history. A spurious tract on the twelve apostles and seventy disciples, attributed to him, is given by Cave (u. s.) and in the Bibl. Patr. Lugd. 1677, vol. iii. See also appendix to Chronicon Paschale, ii. 120, Bonn edition. [E. V.]

(3) A presbyter of Antioch, ordained by Cyril of Antioch (Hieron. Chron.) c. A. D. 290, who with his contemporary, Lucian, may be regarded as the progenitor of the sound and healthy school of scriptural hermeneutics, which distinguished the interpreters of Antioch from those of Alexandria. Eusebius speaks of him with high commendation, as distinguished by a pure taste and sound learning, of a wide and liberal education, well acquainted not only with the Hebrew scriptures, which Eusebius says he had heard him expounding in the church at Antioch, with moderation (μετρίως), but also with classical literature. He was a congenital eunuch, which commended him to the notice of the emperor Constantine, who placed him at the head of the purple-dye-house at Tyre (Euseb. H. E. lib. vii. c. 32; Neander, Ecol. Hist. vol. ii. p. 528, Clark's trans.; Gieseler, Ecol. Hist. vol. i. p. 247, Clark's trans.) [E. V.]

DOROTHEUS (4), a deacon of the church of Antioch, attached to the communion of Meletius, who in A.D. 371 was the bearer of two letters from Basil to Athanasius, entreating him to use his influence with the Western church to interpose to heal the schism of the church of Antioch, by inducing all orthodox Christians to unite with Meletius and his adherents, and of Athanasius's reply (Basil, Epist. 48, 50, 52). At the close of the same year Basil again despatched Dorotheus to Athanasius, with letters to pope Damasus and the Western bishops, entreating him to aid him with his counsels and his prayers, and strengthen his cause by deputing some of his clergy to accompany him (ib. 52). He spent the winter in Italy, in fruitless negotiations, and returned in 372 to Athanasius and Basil, with letters from Damasus bearing witness to the community of their faith, but offering no effectual help (ib. 61, 62, 273). Basil then sent him to Meletius before Easter, with the request that he would draw up more urgent letters to the Western bishops, which were sent to Rome, not by Dorotheus, but by Sabinus (ib.). Tillemont distinguishes him from the subject of the next article. [E. V.]

(5) A presbyter deputed by Basil and the orthodox Eastern bishops in A.D. 373 to carry their application for assistance to Rome and the Western bishops. He is highly commended by Basil for his zeal for the faith, his knowledge, intelligence, and skill in managing difficult business (Basil, Epist. 321, 342). To give additional weight to his mission, it was arranged that Gregory Nyssen should accompany him, and Basil advised him to defer starting till the spring of A.D. 374, and go by sea, to avoid the perils to be dreaded from the open or concealed enemies who would beset the land route (Epist. 250). We are ignorant of the further details. Dorotheus returned in 375, reporting very little success (Epist. 10). He was again despatched to Rome by Basil three years later, with no better results. In an interview with Damasus and Peter of Alexandria, his indignation was roused by hearing his master's beloved friends, Meletius and Eusebius of Samosata, ranked among the Arian heretics, and he appears to have expressed himself with an intemperate warmth, for which Basil apologises in a letter to Peter, A.D. 378 (Epist. 321). [E. V.]

(6) (or THEODORUS, Soz. H. E. lib. vi. c. 37), an Arian bishop of Antioch during the Melitian schism, in succession to Euzoius, A.D. 376. He had previously been bishop of the metropolitan see of Heraclea in Thrace, and was instrumental, through his influence with Valens, in placing his friend Demophilus in the then suffragan see of Constantinople (Philostorg, H. E. lib. ix. c. 10). He was translated from Heraclea to Antioch on the death of Euzoius (Soz. H. E. lib. vi. c. 37; Socr. H. E. lib. iv. c. 35; v. c. 3). In consequence of the decree of Theodosius, A.D. 381, prohibiting Arian religious assemblies in cities, he left Antioch, and returned to his native country of Thrace (Philostorg, H. E. lib. ix. c. 19); but he was in Antioch again in A.D. 386, when the Arians of Constantinople invited him to become their bishop, in the place of Marinus, who had been chosen on the death of Demophilus (Socr. H. E.

lib. v. c. 12, 23; Soz. H. E. lib. vii. c. 14, 17), but who held unorthodox views, according to the Arian standard, on the paternity of God, which he held to be eternal, in opposition to Dorotheus and the main body of the Arians, who regarded it as coeval with the existence of the Son. A schism was thus formed among the Arians at Constantinople, Dorotheus and his followers retaining possession of the buildings.

DOROTHEUS (7), bishop of Martianopolis in Moesia Secunda, and metropolitan. He was a zealous supporter of the doctrines of Nestorius, and a determined enemy of the title θεοτόκος. Preaching in Constantinople not long before the council of Ephesus, he uttered the dictum that "if anyone asserted that Mary was the mother of God he was anathema" (Epistol. Cyrill. apud Baluz. Concil. col. 402). He attended the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, where he naturally took part with the Easterns against Cyril, signing the remonstrance against commencing the council before the arrival of John of Antioch (Baluz. 697), and the appeal to the emperor against the tyranny of the dominant party (ib. 701). He joined also in the documents warning the clergy and people of Hierapolis, and of Constantinople, against the errors of Cyril, and announcing Cyril's excommunication (ib. 706, 725). It is needless to say that Dorotheus was himself deposed and excommunicated in his turn by Cyril and his friends. This deposition being confirmed by the imperial power he was ordered by Maximian's synod at Constantinople to be ejected from his city and his throne. His influence, however, with his people was so great, that they refused to receive his successor, Secundianus, and drove him from the city (Epist. Dorothei ad Cyrill. Baluz. 750), whereupon he was banished by the emperor to Caesarea in Cappadocia. Two letters of his to John of Antioch are preserved in the Synodicon (Nos. 78, 115; Baluz. 781, 816), expressing first the anxiety he felt at Paul's setting out to Egypt, and then his distress at hearing that terms had been come to with Cyril, and a third (No. 137; Baluz. 840) to Alexander of Hierapolis and Theodoret, proposing a joint appeal to the emperor. [E. V.]

(8) Abbat of a convent of nuns in the town of Atribia in Egypt. Palladius, bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia (circ. A.D. 431), relates that Dorotheus, who succeeded Elias in this post, shut himself up in the highest story of the house, where none could enter nor in any way intrude upon his solitude; and that through a window, which opened on the convent, and which he could close at pleasure, he spoke to the nuns and kept peace amongst them. (Patrol. Lat. lxxiii. 1136, § 735; Pallad. Hist. Laus. cap. 36; Ceillier, vii. 489.) [W. M. S.]

(9) A monk of Alexandria, c. 502, was the author of a lengthy work in defence of the decrees of the council of Chalcedon, entitled Tragœdia Prophetica, which was put into the hands of the emperor Anastasius by his brother's wife Magna, in the hope of weaning him from the Eutychian heresy. But he treated the book with contempt, and banished the author to the Oasis (Theophan. Chronogr. ann. 502, p. 131; Cave Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 492.) [E. V.]

DOROTHEUS (10) Bishop of Thessalonica (A.D. 515-520). He wrote on April 28, A.D. 515, to pope Hormisdas, urging him to labour for the peace of the church. He testifies respect for the see of Rome, and wishes to see the heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches everywhere condemned. The pope in reply praises his zeal, and exhorts him to the same labours for peace.

But in the spring of A.D. 517 we find Dorotheus in the character of a Eutychian schismatic, endeavouring to exercise over the province of Thessalonica the rights which belonged to that metropolis when in communion with the Catholic church. In particular he persecuted John bishop of Nicopolis, employing the secular arm, and persuading the emperor Anastasius to countenance his faction. Complaints were brought to pope Hormisdas, who pointed out to him that he might regain his rights if he rejoined the Catholic church; at the same time the papal legates Ennodius and Peregrinus were to bring the affair before the emperor, if bishop Dorotheus should persist. The emperor Anastasius refused the message of the legates, tried to corrupt them, and wrote a letter to the pope saying that he could suffer insults, but not commands. (July 11, 517.)

The death of the emperor Anastasius almost exactly a year afterwards altered the balance against the Eutychians. Justin I., the Thracian, wrote on his accession to the pope, expressing his own wish and that of the principal Eastern bishops for the restoration of peace between East and West. Hormisdas, with the advice of king Theodoric, sends a third legation to Constantinople, Germanus, bishop of Capua, John a bishop, Blandus a presbyter, and others. When these men had done their business at Constantinople, Hormisdas wrote to them to inquire personally into the doings of the Eutychians at Thessalonica, and to cite bishop Dorotheus and his abettor Aristides the presbyter to Rome, that they might give account of their faith and receive resolution of their doubts. Two days before the arrival of the legates, Dorotheus baptized more than 2000 people, and distributed the eucharistic bread in large baskets, so that multitudes could keep it by them. On their arrival, the populace of Thessalonica, excited, as the legates thought, by Dorotheus, fell upon them, and killed John, a catholic, who had received them in his house. News of these outrages arriving at Constantinople, the emperor Justin promised to summon Dorotheus before him. The pope wrote to his legates, saying that they must see Dorotheus deposed, and take care that Aristides should not be his successor.

Dorotheus was cited before the emperor at Heraclea; he appealed to Rome, but the emperor thought it unadvisable to send him there, as his accusers would not be present. He was suddenly sent away from Heraclea, and the pope's legates, bishop John and the presbyter Epiphanius, who had remained at Thessalonica in his absence, wrote in alarm to the remaining legates who were at Constantinople lest Dorotheus and others should re-establish themselves in their sees by liberal use of money, of which they had abundant supply.

Dorotheus was now obliged by the emperor to send deputies to Rome to satisfy the pope. He accordingly wrote an agreeable letter, saying that he had exposed his life in defence of bishop John, when the populace had fallen upon him. Pope Hormisdas wrote back, saying that the crime was known to all the world, and required clearer defence: he remitted its examination to the patriarch of Constantinople. (Hormisd. Epp. Patrol. Lat. lxxiii. pp. 371, 372, 408, 445, 446, 452, 468, 473, 481, 499, etc.; Ceillier, x. 616, 618, 619, 625, 626, 628, 632, 633.)

[W. M. S.]

DOROTHEUS (11), or DROCTOVAEUS, a monk of great virtue, appointed by Germanus bishop of Paris (circ. A.D. 576) abbat of the monastery of St. Cross, sometimes called St. Vincent, afterwards St. Germain-des-Prés, attached to a church built by kirg Childebert in A.D. 559. Dorotheus had been disciple to Germanus when abbat of St. Symphorien d'Autun. He was canonised, and is celebrated on May 26. (Gallia Christiana, vii. 419; Aimoinus Monachus, ii. 36, iii. 16, 56; Fortunat. Pictav. Miscell. ix. carm. 2; Greg. Turon. Appendix, § 1370; Patrol. Lat. lxxi. 1188; Ceillier, xi. 307.) [W. M. S.]

(12) Archimandrite, at the beginning of the 7th century. Twenty-four Discourses and Eight Letters bearing the name of Dorotheus are to be found in Gatland, xii. 369; and thence reprinted in the 88th volume of the Patrologia Graeca, coll. 1611-1846. An account of the MS. sources as well as of previous editions is given by Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. xi. 133, ed. Harles.

It has been disputed what Dorotheus is the author of these writings. Palladius in his Historia Lausiaca mentions two archimandrites Dorotheus who lived in the 4th century. (Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca, Patrol. Lat. lxxiii. 709, 710, 735, 767, 943, 985.)

A third archimandrite of the name was disciple of John the Prophet, who had himself been disciple of Barsanuphius, near Gaza in Palestine, circ. A.D. 540-550. This Dorotheus quitted the monastery of the abbat Seridus, and built one for himself and his followers. He was an adherent of Severus, one of the chiefs of the Eutychians. (Evag. iv. 33.)

A fourth is mentioned by Allatius; he was called the "Younger," because he lived towards the beginning of the 11th century. This last lived with 1000 monks under his rule, the ordinary monastic life. The third also lived in common with his followers. The first two were really eremites, living in separate cells.

An anonymous Greek writer, who gives the prologue to the Twenty-four Discourses, asserts that they are by one of the two earlier archimandrites, arguing that their doctrine is too sound for them to have been by Dorotheus the Severian. But as they are written for monks living in common, they could not be written by an eremite. They cannot on the other hand be as late as the 11th century. It is more probable therefore to refer them to Dorotheus the Severian.

The following are the subjects of some of the Twenty-four Discourses:—1. Self-renunciation; 2. Humility; 3. Conscience; 4. The fear of God (in this he says he had lived in the monastery of abbat Seridus). 5. (In this he calls himself the disciple of abbat John.) 15. The Lenten fast of eight weeks; 17. On the government of monasteries; 18. Charge of monastic temporalities; 22 and 23. Certain hymns of Gregory of Nazianzum. The Eight Letters of Dorotheus are addressed to different monks in circumstances of temptation or affliction. (Patrol. Graec. lxxxviii. col. 1611-1846; Ceillier, xi. 695.) [W. M. S.]

DOROTHEUS (13), the deacon addressed in the 5th letter ascribed to DIONYSIUS THE ARO-PAGITE. [E. B. B.]

DORULF, bishop, attests a charter of Offa A.D. 777, marked spurious or doubtful by Kemble (C. D. No. 130). [C. H.]

DORUS, bishop of Beneventum, A.D. 447 or 8, to 450. Pope Leo the Great writes to reprimand him for setting at the head of his presbyters Epicarpus, newly-ordained. Epicarpus ought to have remained last until another ordination. Two of the senior presbyters had basely complied, but another named Paul complained to the pope. The pope entrusted the execution of his orders to a bishop named Julius. (Leo Mag. Epist. xix., Patrol. Lat. liv. p. 709; Ceillier, x. 210.) [W. M. S.]

DORYMEDON, a convert of Trophimus, martyred with him at Synnada under Probus, Sept. 19. (Men. Basil.) [E. B. B.]

DOSITHEUS (1). The earliest ecclesiastical writers attest the existence of a sect of Dositheans, which, though it never spread far outside the district of Samaria, seems to have had some considerable duration in that quarter. It is rather to be counted a Jewish sect than a Christian heresy, for Dositheus was regarded rather as a rival than as a disciple of our Lord, but trustworthy information as to his history and his doctrines is very scanty. The name, but nothing more than the name, of himself and his sect occurs in Hegesippus's list of heresies, preserved by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22). He is there placed next after Simon and Cleobius. The earliest detailed account of him is given in the Clementine writings, and this deserves the more attention, as it is not unlikely that their account of this Samaritan teacher was derived from the treatise on heresies of Justin Martyr. The Recognitions (ii. 8) and Homilies (ii. 24) agree in making Simon Magus a disciple of Dositheus, and the Recognitions would lead us to suppose that Dositheus was clearly the elder. They represent him as already recognised as the prophet like unto Moses, whom Jehovah was to raise up; when Simon with difficulty and entreaty obtained, on the occurrence of a vacancy, election into the number of his thirty disciples. The account of the Homilies is that Simon and Dositheus were fellow disciples of John the Baptist, to whom in several places the author shews hostility. As our Lord, the Sun, had twelve apostles, so John, the Moon, had thirty disciples, or even more accurately answering to the number of days in a lunation, 29½, for one of them was a woman. On John's death Simon was absent studying magic in Egypt, and so Dositheus was put over his head into the chief place, an arrangement in which Simon on his return thought it prudent to acquiesce. Origen, who was acquainted with the Recognitions, probably had in his mind the story of the thirty disciples of Dositheus, when he says in one place (contra Celsum, vi. 11), that he doubts whether there were then thirty Dositheans in the world, and (ib. i. 57) that he doubts if there were then thirty Simonians. Recognitions and Homilies agree in stating that Simon after his enrolment among the disciples of Dositheus, by his disparagement among his fellow disciples of their master's pretensions provoked Dositheus to smite him with a staff, which through Simon's magical art passed through his body as if it had been smoke. Dositheus in amazement thereat, and conscious that he himself was not the Standing one as he pretended to be, inquired if Simon claimed that dignity for himself, and, being answered in the affirmative, resigned his chief place to him and became his worshipper. Soon after he died. Elsewhere (i. 54) the Recognitions represent Dositheus as the founder of the sect of the Sadducees, a sect which according to their account had its commencement only in the days of John the Baptist.

Next in order of the early witnesses to the activity of Dositheus is Hippolytus, who, as we learn from Photius (Cod. 121), commenced his shorter treatise on heresies with a section on the Dositheans. We gather the contents of this treatise from the use made of it by Epiphanius (Haer. 13), Philaster (4), and Pseudo-Tertullian, and it is to be remarked that the opening sentence of the latter, which relates to the Dositheans, is almost exactly reproduced by St. Jerome (adv. Luciferianos, iv. 304). It would appear that the first section of the work of Hippolytus contained a brief notice of pre-Christian sects, the foremost place being given to the Dositheans. Hippolytus seems to have adopted the account of the Recognitions that the sect of the Sadducees had its root in the teaching of Dositheus, and to have also charged Dositheus with rejecting the inspiration of the prophets. A statement that Dositheus was a Jew by birth was understood by Epiphanius to mean that he had deserted from the Jews to the Samaritans, a change which Epiphanius attributes to disappointed ambition. Origen mentions Dositheus in several places (cont. Celsum ut supra, tract 27 in Matt. vol. iii. 851; in Luc. iii. 962; in Johann. iv., vol. iv. p. 237; De Princ. iv. 1-17); but it is only in the last two passages that he makes any statement, which clearly shews that he had sources of information independent of the Clementine Recognitions; viz. in the commentary on John he speaks of books ascribed to Dositheus as being then current among his disciples, and of a popular belief among them that their master had not really died; and in De Princ. he asserts that Dositheus expounded Exod. xvi. 29, so as to teach that persons were bound to remain to the end of the sabbath as they found themselves at the beginning of it; if sitting, sitting to the end; if lying, lying. Epiphanius, who may have read Dosithean books, adds, from his personal investigations, to the details which he found in Hippolytus. He describes the sect as one still existing in his own time, the members of which observed the sabbath, circumcision, and other Jewish ordinances, abstained from animal food, and many of them from sexual intercourse either altogether, or at least after having had children; but the reading here is uncertain. They are said to have admitted the resurrection of the body, the denial of which doctrine is represented as an addition made by the Sadducees to the original teaching of Dositheus. Epiphanius adds a story that Dositheus retired to a cave, and there, under a show of piety, practised such abstinence from food and drink as to bring his life to a voluntary end. This story appears, in a slightly different shape, in a Samaritan chronicle, of which an account is given by Abraham Ecchellensis ad Hebed Jesu, Catal. lib. Chald. p. 162, Rom. 1653, the story there being that it was the measures taken by the Samaritan high-priest against the new sect, measures especially prompted because of their use of a book of the law falsified by Dositheus (there called Dousis), which compelled Dositheus to fly to a mountain, where he died from want of food in the cave in which he had concealed himself. The notes of Ecchellensis are not given in Assemani's republication of Hebed Jesu (Bibl. Or. iii.). This account is taken from Mosheim (v. infra), and from De Sacy's Chrestomathie Arabe, i. 337.

Finally, it appears that the sect of Dositheans long continued to maintain a local existence. In Hebed Jesu's catalogue of Chaldee books (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. iii. 42) we read that Theophilus of Persia, who was later than the council of Ephesus, wrote against Dositheus. And Photius (Cod. 230) reports that he read among the works of Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria, who died A.D. 608, one entitled Definition against the Samaritans, the argument of which is that the people of Samaria being divided in opinion as to the meaning of the prediction of a "prophet like unto Moses," some holding that it was fulfilled in Joshua, others that the predicted prophet was Dosthes or Dositheus, Eulogius held a synod there (in the 7th year of Marcianus according to the MSS.; if we correct this to the 7th year of Maurice, it gives A.D. 588), and taught them the divinity of our Lord. And though this account raises a suspicion that we have here a rhetorical exercise, and not an account of a real fact, yet the independent notices of the continued existence of the sect make it not incredible that Eulogius may have encountered it. Mosheim conjectures that he may have been commissioned by the emperor to settle the dispute between parties who would not voluntarily have submitted to his arbitration. This writer, who appears to have really used Dosithean books, reports that Dositheus exhibited particular hostility to the patriarch Judah, and it is intelligible that if he claimed to be himself the prophet who was to come, he would be anxious to exclude the belief that that prophet must be of the tribe of Judah. The form Dosthes given by Eulogius for his name is a closer approach than Dositheus to the Hebrew Dosthai, which it probably really represents. Drusus (de Sectis Hebraeorum, iii. 4, 6) and Lightfoot (Disquis. Chorograph. in Johann. iv.) give proof that this was according to Jewish tradition the name of one of the priests who was sent (2 Kings xvii. 27) to teach the manner of the God of the land, and that the same name was borne by other Samaritans more or less distinguished.

There seems no ground for Reland's conjecture

(De Samaritanis, v.) that Dositheus was the author of the Samaritan book of Joshua, since published by Juynboll, Leyden, 1848. Juynboll, p. 113, quotes the testimony of an Arabic writer, Aboulfatah, given more fully (De Sacy, p. 335), shewing that the sect was still in existence in the 14th century. This writer places Dositheus in the time of John Hyrcanus, that is to say, more than a hundred years before Christ. Jost (Gesch. des Judenthums, i. 66) refers to Beer (Buch der Jubiläen) as giving evidence that the sect left traces in Abyssinia.

Several critics who have wished to accept all the statements of the above-mentioned authorities, and who have felt the difficulty of making the founder of the sect of the Sadducees contemporary with John the Baptist, have adopted the solution that there must have been two Dosithei, both founders of Samaritan sects. But we may safely say that there was but one sect of Dositheans, and that there is no evidence that any ancient writer believed that it had at different times two heads bearing the same name. Considering that the sect claimed to have been more than a century old when our earliest informants tried to get information about its founder, we need not be surprised if the stories which they collected contain many things legendary, and which do not harmonise well together. It seems likely that the Dositheans were a Jewish or Samaritan ascetic sect, something akin to the Essenes, existing from before our Lord's time, and that the stories connecting their founder with Simon Magus and with John the Baptist may be dismissed as merely mythical. The fullest and ablest dissertation on the Dositheans is that by Mosheim (Institutiones Historiæ Christianæ majores, 1739, i. 376). [G.S.]

The Samaritans possess two Arabic chronicles, the "Book of Joshua" (12th or 13th c. A.D.), and the Chronicle of Aboulfatah (14th c.). (Cf. Petermann, s. n. Samaria, pp. 377, 387 seq. in Herzog, R. E.) The latter (v. S. de Sacy, Chrest. Arab. i. 344 seq.) speaks of a Samaritan sect—the Dostan or "Friends"—which assumed independence probably about the time of Antiochus Epiphanes; but the manner in which Aboulfatah confuses names and periods renders it difficult to state this with certainty. They differed from their fellow-countrymen and co-religionists in rejecting the festivals established by law or tradition. They carried to excess rules restricting the use of certain kinds of food, and adapted to the purification of man, woman, and habitation. They rejected the use of the formula ברוך אלהינו לעולם and the Jewish and Samaritan pronunciation of יהוה, adopting in its stead the pronunciation אלהים. They claimed to be the possessors of a book of Moses in which it was written that men used to honour the name of God in the land of Zawila, before the institution of worship on the Mount Gerizim. They put aside the astronomical tables, and counted thirty days to every month; adopting, moreover, the Jewish and not the Samaritan mode of reckoning the Pentecost. They observed the Sabbath with great strictness, preparing the food for their cattle on the Friday, and permitting nothing to be eaten or drunk on that day out of vessels which would require cleansing, such as vessels of glass or metal. At their head was one Zara, who was expelled from the Jewish synagogue for immorality. He assumed the title of Imam, and composed a work for his followers (cf. Herzfeld, ii. 601-603).

Still later, according to Aboulfatah is to be placed the origin of another sect whose founder is known by the name of Dusis (or Dositheus), and of Arabian descent. Dusis had been convicted of immorality, but was spared from death on his pledging himself to go to Nablous and cause division among the Samaritans by founding a sect. The Chronicle recounts at length how, to produce this result, Dusis ingratiated himself with a devout and learned sheik of the Samaritans. He watched his opportunity, and accused his benefactor of unchastity. Presently he fled for his life, found refuge with the widow Amentu, read and wrote; and then, beaten and foiled, concealed himself in a cave, died of hunger, and was eaten by dogs. Dusis left his writings with the widow, charging her to let no man read them till he had previously undergone the purification of the bath. In course of time a band of seven pursuers, headed by Levi the wise and devout son of the high priest's brother, came to Amentu. The widow shewed the papers and named the conditions. One of the seven plunged into the pool, and as he stepped forth he cried, "I believe in Thee Jehovah and in Dusis Thy servant." Levi's sword cut him down. A second, a third, a seventh followed. The same cry was followed by the same death. Levi stood alone. "I must disprove this," he said, and plunged into the bath. As he rose the same words sprang from his lips: "Woe be to us if we deny Dusis the Prophet of God." The precious writings were examined and found to contain a number of alterations in the Thorah more numerous than those made by Esra. Levi returned to Nablous and explained away the failure of his mission. The day of the Passover came round and the duty of reader fell to Levi. As he read Exod. xii. 21-22 he altered the word אֲזַיֵּב (E.V. "hys-sop") into צִעְתָּר. He was corrected, but persisted. "The right word," he expostulated, "is 'צ' as God hath spoken by His prophet Dusis. Ye are all guilty of death because ye have altered the festivals, falsified the great name of Jehovah, and persecuted the second prophet of God promised at the Mount of Sinai. Woe to you because ye reject Dusis and follow him not." The speech was listened to with horror. "Kill him," shouted the high priest; and the place where he fell is still called the "Hill of Levi's grave." Levi's adherents dispersed in confusion, but gradually collected again in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. They retained the writings of Dusis, and bade all who would read them prepare for so solemn an act by fasting seven days and seven nights. They kept their festivals on the Sabbaths only, and the Sabbaths themselves in the strictest manner. On the death of one of their members they girded the body with a girdle, placed a staff in his hand, and shoes on his feet; they believed that a man was no sooner laid in the grave than he arose and went to Paradise. A comparison of these accounts will shew that Aboulfatah did not associate the followers of Dusis with the Dostan previously described.

The question now arises: is it altogether impossible to extract from these traditions the features they have in common, and shape the historical Dositheus? If the MSS. lying in the St. Petersburg library, not indeed lost to sight but sealed to criticism, were available (cf. Zeitschr. d. Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch. xix. 603, xxi. 169) the task would be easier. It is, moreover, hardly advisable to appeal too strongly to the "Book of Jubilees" as a work of the Dosithean sect. (Beer, Das Buch d. Jubiläen, p. 58 seq.; cf. agst. Beer, Dillmann, Zeitschr. d. D. M. G. xi. 161; Largen, Das Judenthum in Palästina zur Zeit Christi, p. 90, 1866.) Nevertheless certain broad outlines are clear, and may serve as guiding marks to critical deductions. The Dositheans of the fathers and the Dostan of the chronicler are but two forms of the same name, and this tempted Epiphanius to borrow tenets from the latter and ascribe them to the former. His history of Dositheus has so much in common with that given by Aboulfatah of Dusis, that the same facts or the same traditions may be assumed to have served as the common base of their narratives. Dusis may thus be brought down to a later period than that assigned to him by the chronicler, and made to synchronise with the Dositheans of Origen. He lived in the first or at the latest in the second century of the Christian era. The religious schism shadowed forth in the whole history is one natural to a time when men's minds were strongly agitated and divisions frequent: it is distinguished only by what gives to it its own peculiar application to the people amongst whom it worked. Dositheus appears as the Messiah: he rests his claims upon his identification of himself with the prophet foretold by Moses; rejected by the Jews he turns to the Samaritans. He is not the founder of a Christian sect, but simply a Pseudo-Messiah who accepts or rejects whatever in the Jewish or Samaritan systems opposes or suits his scheme. He is followed by thirty men, a number corresponding to the thirty days he has allotted to each month in his calendar. His own title, "Hestós," is an assertion of the durability of the fixed invariable month; "Helena," the title of the month (Luna) he has intercalated, as it is that of the one female pupil who adheres to him (Hilgenfeld, Zeitschr. d. wissenschaftl. Theologie, xi. 371 seq., 1868). He meets with but little success, and dies the death of a starved recluse.

The fabulous additions of the Arabian writers in later centuries may be set aside (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenthums u. seiner Secten, i. 65), but the sect still existed in the 6th century. The Dositheans and Samaritans were then engaged as of old in disputing over the interpretation of Deut. xviii. In a synod presided over by Eulogius (A.D. 588) the arguments of both sides were listened to with patience: judgment was given, no doubt to the satisfaction of all concerned, in the following form:—not these disputants were in the right, but they only who affirmed Jesus to have been the prophet foretold (Photius, Bibl. § 230, vol. ii. 285, ed. Bekker).

DRACONTIUS, BLOSSIUS AEMILIUS, a Latin poet who flourished about 425, in the reign of the younger Theodosius. Early tradition describes him as a Spanish presbyter, the author of a Hexaëmeron in heroic verse. This poem was first published in 515 lines, along with the Genesis of Claudius Marius Victor at Paris, 8vo, 1560, and was variously edited in this form until 1619. In 1619 an enlarged edition was published by Sirmond, from a MS. in the royal library of Paris, together with the Opuscula of Eugenius of Toledo, who flourished two centuries after Dracontius. This prelate, somewhere between the years 642-672, revised the Hexaëmeron for Chindasuindus, king of the Spanish Goths. In a letter which is extant (Sirmond's works, Ven. 1728, vol. ii. p. 890), addressed to this prince upon the conclusion of his task, he says that his work had not been confined to revision and supplement, but that, finding certain errors in the poem, he had also removed what he deemed superfluous. Extraneous authority for this story is to be found in Idefonsus (Script. Eccles. ch. xiv.). The Hexaëmeron was thus extended to 634 lines, in which shape it was edited by Sirmond. From the same MS. he also published an elegiac fragment, which he describes as an elegy addressed to Theodosius II., in which the author implores forgiveness of God for certain errors in his greater work, and excuses himself to the emperor for having neglected to celebrate his victories. This version of the poems of Dracontius was adhered to until 1791, when Arevali published a new 4to edition at Rome, based upon the discovery of two new MSS. in the library of the Vatican. The first of these was found to contain a poem in three books, entitled 'Aurelii Augustini de Deo,' the 116th line of which answered to the commencement of the Hexaëmeron of Dracontius, which occupied the remainder of the first book. Although the MS. was not of great antiquity, it appeared from the frequent lacunae to have been transcribed from one of much older date, of which several words and letters had perished. It can hardly be doubted that, although this poem is inscribed with another name, it is the original work from which the Hexaëmeron was extracted. The latter bears the marks of being a mere fragment, both from its abrupt commencement, without any statement of the argument,

"Prima dies lux est terris, mors una tenebris," which in the Vatican MS. reads

"Prima dies nam lucis erat," &c., as well as from its closing lines, in which the author, who is manifestly in some distressing situation, prays the Deity for relief:

"Ut valeam memorare tuas hoc carmine laudes Quas potero"—(i. 747).

But, in fact, the connexion of the several parts of the poem, De Deo, and the similarity of sentiment, and phraseology throughout it, furnish incontestable evidence of its being the work of one hand, and it is next to impossible that those writers who speak of the Hexaëmeron as being the work of Dracontius, one of whom, St. Isidore, quotes a line of this poem (Etyim. lib. xii. c. 2), should have been mistaken. St. Augustine, moreover, held the allegorical interpretation of the six days of creation, which view is inconsistent with the whole tenor of the present work.

The other MS. discovered by Arevali was found to contain the elegy of Dracontius in 158 couplets, whereas that published by Sirmond consisted only of 99. It has no title prefixed, but at the end of the poem, in the same hand as the text, are added the words, "Explicit Satisfactio Dracontii ad Guthamundum regem Guandalorum dum esset in vinculis." Sirmond was thus seen to be mistaken in his conjecture, that the elegy was addressed to Theodosius; nor was the newly discovered portion of the poem found to support his idea that it was written as an apology for the longer work. In both poems as now edited, the author describes himself as languishing in prison on account of some grave fault he had committed (Satisfactio, 49, 283, 311; De Deo, iii. 576, ff. 602, 648), and the language of the elegy implies that this fault consisted not only in having neglected to celebrate the triumphs of some prince whom he calls "dominus," but in having also bestowed praise upon some enemy of his master (Satisf. 19, 93, 105). The poet's object seems to be to appease the anger of this prince, and to obtain his release from prison. Apart from the note above quoted, it is evident from (Satisf. l. 30)

"Ut qui facta ducum possem narrare meorum Nominis Asdingui bella triumphifera,"

compared with Dio Cass. lxxi. and Jornand. de Reb. Get. c. 22, that some Vandal prince is alluded to. There remains the question of identification. The Vatican MS. gives "Guth-amndum," which is corrupt. We know, however, from history that about the year 425 Guntharic, the brother of Genserich, and his Vandals crossed from Galicia into Baetica, the supposed home of Dracontius (Idacius, Olymp. 299). This prince's name is variously written Gontharis, Guntharis, Guntharius, Gundericus; and Arevali conjectures with much plausibility that in using the plural 'duces' Dracontius refers to Guntharic and his brother, Genserich, who together succeeded their father Godigisidus; and that by 'dominus' he intends the former of the two. This view is supported by comparing certain lines of the elegy (211-214), which imply that, whoever was the prince addressed, his arms had been crowned with success in Africa through the instrumentality of others, and that he himself was not a warlike character, with Procopius's description of Guntharic (Hist. Vand. lib. i.) as being of inactive habits, while Genserich, on the other hand, is represented as versed in the arts of war. Whether or no, at the time the poet wrote, Guntharic was as unworthy of his panegyric as he afterwards became (Idac. ad ann. 428; Isidor. Reg. Goth. et Vand. 131); it is certain that the names of both Genserich and Guntharic were subsequently held in abomination by the Goths, and it is not improbable that the respectful sentiments of Dracontius towards a Vandal prince may have led to the mutilation of his poems even before Eugenius laid his hand upon them. The only other Vandal prince to whom the note appended to the Vatican MS. can refer is Guntamund, the great-grandson of Genserich, who reigned at Carthage 484-496; but the warlike character of this prince, as depicted by Procopius (Hist. Vand. lib. i.), is hardly in keeping with the allusions of the elegy (Satisf. 211, ff.). Moreover, St. Columban, at the beginning of the 6th century, mentions Dracontius's poems "inter vetera," which would scarcely have been the case had he flourished as late as 484.

A fresh contribution has recently (1873) been made to the recovery of the works of Dracontius by the publication of a MS. long since (1827) described in a catalogue of Cataldus Jannellius as existing in the Museo Borbonico, at Naples. (Dracontii Carmina Minora plurima inedita ex codice Neapolitano, edidit Fridericus de Duhn, Lipsiae, Teubner: 1873, 16mo.) From this MS. we derive for the first time the full name of the author; in it are contained the following poems in heroic verse:—(1) Ilylas, with a trochaic preface addressed to one Felicianus, styled 'Grammaticus.' (2) Herculis verba cum videret Hydrae serpentis capita pullulare post cades. (3) Controversia de statua viri fortis, quam dixit in Gargilianis Thermis Blossius Aemilius Dracontius vir clarissimus, et togatus fori proconsulis almae Karthaginiis apud proconsulem Pacidegium, the subject of which is a curious case of conscience. (4) Epithalamium in fratribus dictum. (5) Epithalamium Joannis et Vitulae. (6) Raptus Helenae, previously edited by Cardinal Mai at Rome. (7) Deliberatio Achillis an corpus Hectoris vendat. (8) Medea. The similarity of style between these poems and the two which have been already discussed is sufficient in itself to prove the identity of authorship; but confirmatory evidence is furnished by the second Epithalamium (118-136), in which the writer describes his captive condition in similar terms to those employed in the De Deo and the Satisfactio. Although there is nothing in the newly discovered poems of Dracontius which directly contradicts the tradition of his Spanish origin, it will be seen that the title of (3) connects him immediately with Carthage. It is hardly likely that he should have returned to mythological subjects after writing the De Deo; hence it is probable that we have in these effusions the essays of his youth.

One other question remains. On the supposition that Dracontius was a Spaniard carried prisoner into Africa by some Vandal prince, how are we to account for the discovery in Italy of the original MSS. of his poems? To this question no certain answer can be given, but the ingenious conjecture of Arevali is worth mention. Sidonius, in his Excusatorium ad Felicem (l. 9), commends three poets who had been companions of his own and of his friend's father in their youth. The name of the third poet is not mentioned, but he is thus alluded to:

Undosae petit sitim Ravennae," and a statue is said to have been erected to him in the Forum of Trajan. Sirmond, without much reason, supposes this poet to have been Merobaudes: Arevali suggests that it was Dracontius, who, if he regained the freedom for which he pleads in his elegy, may not improbably have migrated to the north of Italy to seek the "secura quies" for which he prays (De Deo, iii. 64). This idea derives some confirmation from the fact that St. Columban, the founder of the monastery of Bobbio, had read the poem of Dracontius in its entirety, for in his own poem addressed to Hunaldus (255, ff.) he borrows certain lines from it. Moreover, Raphael of Volaterra speaking of the same monastery (Comment. lib. iv. p. 140), says that in the year 1491, among other works was discovered Dracontii varium opus, and that this MS. was carried to Rome by his "municeps," Thomas Phaedrus. Whether the varium opus was the MS. now in the library at Naples, or whether it still lies hid in some corner of the Vatican, must be left for the determination of future investigators.

With regard to the merits of Dracontius as a poet, critics, as usual, differ. Isidore praises the style of that portion of the De Deo with which he was acquainted for its lucidity (Script. Eccles. c. 24), a merit which is conspicuously absent from this poem, and from all the works of Dracontius. There is, however, considerable vigour in his expression, and traces of his classical erudition are by no means wanting even in his sacred poem.

The full text of the De Deo and the Satisfactio was first published by Cardinal Arevali, Rom. 4to. 1791, whose edition is reproduced in vol. lx. of Migne's Patrologia. The earlier version of the Hexæmeron first appeared in Paris, 8vo, 1560. The most important edition is that of Weitzius, Franc. 8vo, 1610. The Eugenic version was first published by J. Sirmont, Paris, 8vo, 1619. The Carmina Minora are edited in the Teubner series, Lipsiae, 16mo, 1873.

[D. R. J.]

DRAUSIUS, ST. (DRAUTIUS or DRAUSCIO), 22nd bishop of Soissons, and confessor, was born in the reign of Chlotharius or of Dagobert, and is commemorated on the 5th of March. His parents were of noble rank, his father's name being Lendomar, his mother's Rachildis. She is said to have been a very holy woman, and to have abstained from wine from the time of the conception of her son. Drausius was much beloved as a boy by the bishop St. Ansarius, whose pupil he was, and he served under his successor Battolenus or Bettolenus, as archdeacon. The Sammarthani say that he was made bishop in 654 at the age of thirty. He founded two monasteries, one for monks, the other for nuns, the latter at the instigation and with the help of Ebroinus, mayor of the palace to the king of the Franks and his wife Leutrudis, Aetheria being appointed abbess. The dates of his various subscriptions are 658, 860, 663 and 666; he died in 667. He was buried in the church of the nunnery. (AA. SS. Boll. March. i. p. 404; Gall. Christ. ix. 338; Drausci's Snession. Charta, Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. 1183.)

DREGMO, a pious man near Hagulstad (Hexham), who, according to a legendary account in Simeon of Durham (Gest. Reg. Ang. in M. H. B. 665), had a vision of bishop Alchmund directing his bones to be removed to within the church.

DRITHELM (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1554, in M. H. B. 783), visionary. [DRYTHELM.] [C. H.]

DROCTIGISILUS, fifteenth bishop of Soissons, towards the end of the 6th century. He is thus referred to by Gregory of Tours, lib. ix. cap. 37: "In the 14th year of king Childebert, A.D. 589, there was at Soissons Droctigisilus, who four years later lost his senses through too much drinking. So they say. Many of the citizens, however, asserted that this calamity befell him by the bad practices of his archdeacon, whom he had degraded: and that this madness afflicted him most within the walls of the city; when he was abroad he was better. When king Childebert came to Soissons, and Droctigisilus was more sane, he was not allowed to enter the city on account of the presence of the king. Now although he was voracious of food, and an immoderate wine-bibber, nobody ever accused him of adultery. Next year a council of bishops was held at Sourci, and he was allowed to enter his see." (Gall. Christ. ix. 336.) [D. R. J.]

DROCTOALDUS, ST., fourteenth bishop of Auxerre, succeeded St. Optatus, and died in the month of November about A.D. 532. (Gall. Christ. xii. 66.) [D. R. J.]

DROSERIUS, the Valentinian interlocutor in the dialogue against the Marcionites (Sect. iv.). [ADAMANTIUS (2).] [G. S.]

DROSIS, a young virgin burnt for the faith, probably at Antioch. There is a homily on her festival, by Chrysostom (ii. 688), who descants on the miracles performed by her relics.

DROSTAN, Dec. 14. According to the Scotch legend given by Fordun (Scotichron. iii. c. 38), and Brev. of Aberd. (pars hyem. fol. xix.) St. Drostan belonged to the blood royal of Scotia (Ireland), being son of Fyn Wennem, daughter or grand-daughter of Aedan, king of Scotia (Ireland) by Conanrodus, the king of Demetrius's son. According to the legend in the Brev. of Aberdeen, he was son of Cosgrach, of the royal family of the Scoti, and having shewn an early disposition towards learning and piety, was given in charge to his uncle St. Columba (June 9) by whom he was instructed till he received the monastic habit at Dalquhongale (Holywood). He became abbat there, and afterwards went north to Glenesk, Forfarshire, where he built a church, led an eremitic life, wrought some miracles, and died. His greatest foundation was that at Deer, Aberdeenshire, as we read in the first memorandum in the Book of Deer, the most ancient document of Scotland extant. (This MS. dating, it is supposed, from the close of the 9th century, belongs to the Univ. Library, Cambridge, and has been published by the Spalding Club, Scotland, 1869, with a learned preface by John Stuart, LL.D.) According to it, St. Columba and St. Drostan came first to Aberdeen on the coast, and then to Deer in the interior, and having received lands from the Mormaer of the country, founded at the latter a famous monastery, which received the name of Deer or Deer from the tears shed by St. Drostan at the departure of St. Columba. He has many dedications, for the most part in the north and north-east of Scotland. To be a contemporary of St. Columba he must have flourished at the end of the 6th century. His feast is Dec. 14, though not uniformly, and his name assumes the forms of Drustan, Dunstan, Dustan, Throstan, and the honorific form of Modrustus. The Bollandists (Acta SS. July 11, tom. iii. 190-91) give a memoir culled from Camerarius and other Scotch authorities, and say he flourished about A.D. 600. (Book of Deer, passim; Joan. Major, de Gest. Scot. lib. ii. c. 7, p. 68; Leslaeus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. lib. iv. 146, 163; Boethius, Hist. Scot. lib. ix. 171; Dempster, Hist. Eocl. Gent. Scot. i. 206; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 163, July 11, forming the Bollandists' authority for placing St. Drostan on that day; Innes, Scotland in the Middle Ages, 321-25; Montalembert, Monks of the West, iii. 80-1, Edinb. 1861; *Ant. DRUCTEGANGUS (1), third abbat of Gorzia, a monastery founded A.D. 749 by Chrodegangus bishop of Metz within his diocese. He succeeded Gundelardus and was followed by Theutmarus, dying A.D. 769 (Gall. Christ. xiii. 875). The name Druetegangus occurs among the numerous variations of that of Chrodegangus (ibid. 705). [C. H.]

(2) Eighth abbat of Jumièges in Normandy. He is occasionally confounded with the abbat of Gorzia and also with Chrodegangus, bishop of Metz. When pope Stephen III. (A.D. 753) first applied to Pippin, the latter sent an abbat Rodigandus to assure him of his good will, and subsequently two other envoys, bishop Rodigangus and duke Antcharius, to conduct the pope into France. This is the statement of Mabillon, who identifies bishop Rodigangus with Chrodegangus bishop of Metz, and the abbat Rodigandus with Druetegangus abbat of Jumièges, thus in part differing from Le Cointe, who considered the abbat to have been Druetegangus abbat of Gorzia. Le Cointe also notices that some have confounded Druetegangus the abbat with Chrodegangus the bishop. That there should have been two abbats Druetegangus contemporary in Gaul, and contemporary with bishop Chrodegangus, to say nothing of the variations in all their names, has made great confusion. Mabillon's reason for preferring the abbat of Jumièges to the abbat of Gorzia for Pippin's first envoy rests on a point of chronology. The monastery of Gorzia, founded by bishop Chrodegangus A.D. 749, was, he considers, scarcely finished in 753, and if not finished, then without an abbat. But there are certainly examples of abbats being appointed to a fraternity, Ceolfrid for instance, at the time of the founding of their monasteries. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. t. v. pp. 415, 416; Mabill. Ann. Ord. Bened. ii. 145, 146, 162.) [C. H.]

DRUGEN—March 6. She was one of the daughters of Leinin, son of Gannchu, of the race of Aengus, son of Mogh Nuadhat: she thus was sister of SS. Brigida, Luigen, Luicell, Macha, and Riomhtach, the daughters of Leinin, and with them was at the church of Cill-Inghen-Leinin (now Killiney), in Ui-Briuin-Cualann, "a territory," as is said by O'Donovan (Four Mast. 340 n. "b"), "comprising the greater part of the barony of Rathdown, in the present county of Dublin, and some of the north of the county of Wicklow." (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 69; Colgan, Acta SS. 104, c. 2, and Tr. Thaum. 612, col. 2; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 303, 545, 3rd ed.) [J. G.]

DRYCTHELM, DRYHTHELM (DRITHELM), a paterfamilias dwelling at Incueneningum (supposed to be Cuningham, Mon. Hist. Brit. 260, and Stevenson, note on Bed. II. E. v. 12), who is related by Bede to have died in the beginning of the night, and to have revived at dawn. While separate from the body he had visions of purgatory, gehenna, the place of imperfect happiness, and the vicinity of the celestial kingdom. He afterwards took up his abode in a cell by the monastery of Mailros, where he lived in great austerity, and where he related his visions to the monk and priest Haemgils, and to king Aldfrid. The story, to which Bede devotes a whole chapter (II. E. v. 12) has an interest, as illustrating the popular belief of the period on those subjects, as well as exemplifying the homiletic side of Bede's History. There immediately follows it, by way of contrast, the case of king Coenred and the impenitent officer. [COENRED.] His death is recorded in the Saxon Chronicle (A.D. 693). He is also mentioned in Gaimar (Estorie, v. 1554, M. H. B. 783). [C. H.]

DUACH. [DUBHTHACH.]

DUALISM. [MANICHAISM; GNOSTICISM.]

DUBHAN (1), Priest, Nov. 11. O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 305) says he was of the Laginians, and brother of Daman (Feb. 12), of Cluain-foda [DAMAN], and is further of opinion that this is the same Dubhan who went alone with Moling (June 17) to ask for the remission of the Borumha. By Colgan (Acta SS. 626, col. 1), he is given among the sons of Mella, brothers of St. Daman, and nephews of St. Coemgen (June 3), but as St. Coemgen died A.D. 617 (618), and St. Moling, A.D. 696 (697), there is some difficulty in supposing the contemporary of the latter to have been sister's son of the former, who died in extreme old age (Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. ii. 558-59).

(2), the Pilgrim, at Rinn Dubhain, Feb. 11. Colgan (Acta SS. 314) has a short memoir of St. Duban, confessor, at Feb. 11: his father was Bracon or Brychan of Brycheiniog, the Welsh chief, and his mother Din or Digna, daughter of the Anglo-Saxon king. He was born in Britain, but after arriving at manhood, he accompanied his brothers, SS. Canoc, Mogoroc, Caeman, Dabheog or Mobeog, &c., to Ireland, where following the teaching and example of St. Patrick and his disciples, they became perfect in virtue, and were put each over a monastery. St. Dubhan's monastery was called Rinn-Dubhain-aillthir (the promontory of Dubhan, the pilgrim), now identified with Hook Point, co. Wexford: he is said to have been brother of Gladusa, the mother of St. Cadoc (Jan. 24). But Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 8, n. 197) throws a doubt on the whole story, or at least on so much of it as makes Duban one of the sons of Bracon, and brother of Canoc, and he is not mentioned in Rees's Account of Brychan of Brecknock. But scarcely two of the lists extant of Brychan's family agree in the names and number. [CANOC, and DABHEOG.] Colgan says he flourished about A.D. 492, but his date is uncertain. (Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. ii. 559 n.; Journ. Kith. Arch. Soc. 1 ser. iii. 194-99; Rees, Cambro-Brit. SS. 602 sq. 605 n.) [J. G.]

DUBHIDA. Irish saint. [DOBDA.]

DUBHDALETHE (1), of Armagh. There were three of this name abbats or archbishops of Armagh, two in the 10th and 11th centuries, and one in the 8th. This last was Dubhdalethe, son of Sinach, who succeeded, apparently with difficulty, on the deposition or resignation of Foendelach, A.D. 771, and is said by the Four Masters, A.D. 778 (recte 783) to have taken part in the promulgation of St. Patrick's law at Cruachain, now Rathcroghan, near Belagunagare, co. Roscommon. The Four Masters and Ann. Ult. give his death in A.D. 792, which Ware corrects into 793, but Lanigan gives him a rule of fifteen years, and says he died in 786 (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 20, § 6; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 385, 399, 403; O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Script. iv. 116; Stuart, Armagh, 95. [J. G.]

DUBHDALETHE (2), Dubhdalethe na Graiffe (of the Writing), was abbat of Cill-scire, now Kilskeery, co. Meath, and died in the year 750 (Ann. Tigh.). O'Donovan is of opinion that this is the Dubhdalethe whose writings are referred to in the Annals of Ulster at A.D. 962 and 1021, but the opinion of O'Connor and Ware seems preferable in regarding the writer as Dubhdalethe, son of Maelmuire, bishop of Armagh, who died A.D. 1065. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 348 n. 2, 349; O'Connor, Epist. Nuncupat. 16, 103, Prolegomena, ii. 133, and Ann. Ult. 290, 313; Ware, Bps. 49, 50; Stuart, Armagh, 124; Colgan, Acta SS. 784 n. 6.) [J. G.]

DUBLHITIR, abbat of Finniglaisi-Cainnigh, near Ath-Cliath (now Finglass, in the barony of Castleknock, near Dublin), May 15. Mart. Doneg. and Four Mast. give his obit in A.D. 791, but O'Donovan says it is really A.D. 796: Finglass has Cainnigh attached to it, as it was first the monastery of St. Cainneoc or Cainnech (May 15). [J. G.]

DUBHTHACH [DUACH] (1) Son of Dubhan, son of Maeluidhir, Feb. 5. He was of the race of Conall Gulban. When Corman, bishop of Armagh, died A.D. 497, he was succeeded by Dubhthach or Duach, who is also called "of Drum-dhearbh," which Lanigan suggests and O'Donovan accepts as probably Derver, in the county of Louth. He is honoured as "the venerable Duach, the famous archbishop of St. Patrick's see," and his death took place in the year 513. After two of the name of Alidus had ruled, another Dubhthach or Duach, of the family of Colla-Uais, was bishop from A.D. 536 to A.D. 548. Little however is known of the history of either of them. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 293, col. 2, 480, n. 19, and Acta SS. 62. c. 7, n. 10, 190-1; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 437 and Ind. Chron. A.D. 497, 513; Stuart, Armagh, 91-2; Ware, Bps. 37-8; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 168, n. m, 169; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. c. 8, § 14, ii. c. 10, §§ 1, 13.)

(2) Oct. 7. O'Clery (in Mart. Doneg. 269) thinks that "this is he whom Moling mentions as having gone with himself to seek a remission of the Borumha from Finnachta, king of Erin" [MOLING].

(3) Mac Ui Lugair. When St. Patrick had come to Tara and was preaching before king Leogaire, we are told that the only one who rose on the saint's approach and respectfully saluted him was Dubhthach, the king's poet, who was the first to embrace the Christian faith in that place; and as Joceline says, "being baptized and confirmed in the faith, he turned his poetry, which in the flower and prime of his studies he employed in praise of false gods, to a much better use; changing his mind and style, he composed more elegant poems in praise of the Almighty Creator and His holy preachers." This was Dubhthach Mac Ui Lugair, descended from Cormach Caech, son of Cucorb, in Leinster. His name occupies a large space in ancient Irish hagiology as being himself a famous poet, and also the ancestor of many well-known saints. He was the teacher of St. Fiacc (Oct. 12) of Sletty, and recommended him to St. Patrick for the episcopate [FIACC]. In the compilation of the Seanchus Mor, which is said to have been carried on under the auspices of St. Patrick, St. Dubhthach was one of the nine appointed to revise the ancient laws, and we have no good reason to question the probability of his being engaged in a work of this character. Colgan says he had in his possession some of the poems of St. Dubhthach (Tr. Thaum. 8 n. 5): the Poems of St. Dubhthach are given, with translations and notes, in Shearman's Loca Patriciana, and they are also in O'Donovan's Book of Rights. His dates are uncertain, but his birth is placed after the year 370, his conversion in 433, and his death perhaps after 479. (See Loca Patriciana, by the Rev. J. F. Shearman, in Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. vols. ii., iii., with Mr. R. R. Brash's papers in the same Journal, traversing several of Shearman's assertions; Ware, Irish Writers, 1; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 409-12, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 433; Book of Rights, by O'Donovan, pp. xxxv. 234 sq.; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 7 n. 2, 8 n. 5, 44-5, c. 44, 126, c. 61; O'Reilly, Irish Writers, 26-8; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. p. vii.; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. c. 5, § 5, c. 6, § 5; Todd, St. Patrick, 130, 424, 446; O'Connor, Epist. Nuncup. 59, 101, 106, and Prolegomena, i. 89 sq. ii. 68.) [J. G.]

DUBRICIUS, DUBRIC (DIBRIC, DYFRIG), archbishop of Caerleon. This is one of the most distinguished names in the story of king Arthur as related by Geoffrey of Monmouth. Arthur makes him archbishop of the city of Legions (Galf. Mon. Hist. viii. 12); he crowns king Arthur (ix. 1); makes an oration to the British army prior to the battle of Badon (ix. 4); and is the director of all the ecclesiastical pomp of the court. He was the grandson of Brychan king of Brecknockshire, and two localities, rather vaguely described as the banks of the Gwain near Fishguard and the banks of the Wye in Herefordshire, are claimed for his birthplace. Rees considers the weight of evidence in favour of the latter for the following reasons. In the district of Erchenfield, in the county of Hereford, are a church (Whitechurch) and two chapels (Ballingham and Hentland, subject to Lugwardine) dedicated to Dubricius, and all of them near the Wye. At Henllan (i.e. Old-church, now Hentland) he is said to have founded a college, and to have remained seven years before removing to Mochros much further up the Wye, supposed to be the present Moccas. In corroboration of this tradition there were lately remaining, says Rees, on a farm called Lanfrother in Hentland traces of former importance. This author further suggests whether St. Devereux, seven miles to the west of Hereford, might not be a Norman rendering of Dubricius. Rees grants, in support of Ussher, that he may have been appointed bishop of Llandaff about A.D. 470, and that he was raised by Ambrosius Aurelius, the brother of Uther and uncle of Arthur, to the archbishopric of Caerleon on the death of Tremouous or Tremorius, A.D. 490. It does not appear that Wales was in this age divided into dioceses, or that there were any established bishops' sees. The only exception was Caerleon, from the importance which the Roman occupation had given to that town. The jurisdiction of its archbishop, according to the rule observable in other parts of the empire, would be co-extensive with the Roman province of Britannia Secunda, and his suffragans were so many chorepiscopi, without any settled places of residence. The influence of Dubricius and the liberality of Meurig ab Tewdrig king of Glamorgan, were the means of making the see of Llandaff permanent; whence Dubricius is said to have been its first bishop. It appears, however, that after his promotion to the archbishopric of Caerleon he still retained the bishopric of Llandaff, where he mostly resided, and from which he is called archbishop of Llandaff; but that the title belonged rather to Caerleon is clear from the circumstance that upon his resignation David became archbishop of Caerleon and Teilo bishop of Llandaff. Dubricius is distinguished as the founder of colleges; and besides those on the banks of the Wye already mentioned he founded, or concurred in founding, the collegiate monasteries of Llanccarvan, Caergerworn, and Caerleon. In his time the Pelagian heresy, which had been once suppressed by St. Germanus, had increased again to such a degree as to require extraordinary efforts for its eradication, and a synod of the whole clergy of Wales was convened at Brefi in Cardiganshire. The distinction earned by David on that occasion gave Dubricius an excuse for laying down his office, and being worn with years and longing for retirement he withdrew to a monastery in the island of Enlli or Bardsey, where he died. Rees, who puts the chronology of Dubricius and David early, gives A.D. 522 for the date. He was buried in the island, where his remains lay undisturbed till A.D. 1120, when they were removed by Urban bishop of Llandaff and interred with great pomp in the new cathedral which had been rebuilt a short time before from the foundations. His death was commemorated on Nov. 4, and his translation on May 29. The bones of the saint were with great difficulty discovered at Bardsey, and the oldest writings had to be searched in order to help out the inquiry, as recorded in the Liber Landavensis (ed. Rees, 1840, p. 329). From this circumstance Rees argues that for six centuries the body of the great archbishop Caerleon, whose reputation for sanctity was almost equal to that of St. David, lay unenshrined, and that therefore the Britons of the primitive church, in whatever esteem they may have held the memory of their holy men, could not have worshipped their relics. Such in the main is Rees's account of Dubricius (Essay on the Welsh Saints, 171-193). Of ancient materials an anonymous Vita in Wharton (Angl. Sac. ii. 667) is important as having been evidently compiled from earlier sources before the fables of Geoffrey of Monmouth appeared. Benedict of Gloucester wrote his Vita (Angl. Sac. ii. 656) after Geoffrey. Capgrave has also a Life (N. L. A. f. 87). For others see Hardy, Des. Cat. i. 40-44. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 146, 147, should be consulted on Dubricius's Llandaff bishopric, and on his connexion with Archenfield or Erchenfield; likewise Stubbs (Registrum, 154, 155) for the early and legendary successions to Llandaff and Caerleon. See also Usher, Brit. Eccl. Antiq. Works, t. v. 510; Chron. Index, sub ann. 490, 512, 520-522.

In regard to the period of Dubricius, authorities differ within limits similar to those assigned to St. David. The Annales Cambriae under A.D. 612 give the obit of Conthigirnus and bishop Dibric, whom the editors of the Monumenta, with an "ut videtur," name bishops Kentigern and Dubricius (M. H. B. 831). The Liber Landavensis also (80) gives this date, and it is adopted in Haddan and Stubbs (i. 146). Hardy (Des. Cat. i. 41) refers to Alford's Annales, A.D. 436, ss. 2, 3, 4, for some critical remarks on the probable chronology of the life of Dubricius.

[C. H.]

DUD, abbat, attesting a grant of land to Glastonbury Abbey, A.D. 744, marked spurious or doubtful (Kemble, C. D. No. 92; Birch, Pastor. Monast. 63). An epistle of Boniface (editorial date A.D. 736) is addressed dilecto filio Duddo, begging him to send some treatises on St. Paul's epistles, using the language of a father and an old friend. (Ep. No. 41, ed. Würdtwein, also No. 41 in Migne, Patrol. vol. 89, p. 740.) [C. H.]

DUDD, the eleventh bishop of Winchester. If he is rightly placed in the lists his date falls between 781 and 785, but nothing else is known of him. (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. p. 8; Wharton, Ang. Sacr. i. 195.) [S.]

DUILECH (DOULACH), of Clochar, commemorated Nov. 17. He was son of Amalgadh, son of Sinell, of the race of Conmac, son of Fergus, son of Ross, son of Rudhraige, &c. He lived at a place called Clochar-Duiligh, near Swords, in the barony of Coolock and district of Pingall, near Dublin. In the martyrologies he is called bishop and confessor, but beyond his connexion with Clochar beside Dublin, and his leaving his name at the ancient church of St. Doolagh in Dublin, and perhaps at St. Tullan's chapel, in the parish of Kilrane, and barony of Forth, county Wexford, nothing is known of him. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 129; Colgan, Acta SS. 598, c. 3, col. 2; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 22 n. 62; Reeves, Church of St. Duilech, pass.; Book of Obits C. C. Dublin, pp. xlvi. lxxx. 71, sq. 179.) [J. G.]

DUINSECH, virgin, on Loch Cuan, in Uladh (Ulster), Aug. 5. This saint has given its name to Dunsy Island, in Loch Cuan, now Strangford Lough; there is also Dunsy Rock near it. On Dunsy Island there are no ecclesiastical ruins, but the human bones indicate that on it had been a cemetery, and that the place was sacred, probably in honour of St. Duinsech, whose history however is unknown. (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 186, 379.) [J. G.]

DULAS, said to be a prefect of Cilicia, deposed from office for his Christianity and most horribly tortured to death under the procurator Maximus, June 15. (Men. Basil.) [E. B. B.]

DULCIDIUS, ST., 3rd bishop of Agen, in the province of Bordeaux, and confessor, successor to St. Phoeadius, called also DULCITIUS, DULCIUS, DULCISIMUS, DULCEDIUS, ST. DOUX, ST. DOULCET or DOUCIS. The reader is cautioned by the Bollandists that he is to be distinguished from Dulcidius of Tolosa. He was probably bishop in the beginning of the 5th century, and is commemorated on the 17th of October. Though said to be of royal blood (of the Franks), he was so attracted by the fame of Phoeadius, bishop of Agen, that he gave up all his worldly prospects and went there in order to become his disciple. The bishop taught him theology, and ordained him deacon.

He was very zealous in defence of the Catholic faith and in opposing all kinds of heresy, especially Arianism; and he was so good to the poor that he kept nothing for himself. He died at a good old age, and his relics were afterwards translated to Chamberet, in the diocese of Limosin. (AA. SS. Boll. Oct. viii. pp. 50-53; Gall. Christ. ii. 897.) [D. R. J.]

DULCIDIUS (2) I., 18th bishop of le Puy en Velay (Anicium, afterwards Podium Vellavorum). Dulcidius is scarcely known except from the acts of St. Agripanus, whose relics he translated from Viviers to le Puy, where they were placed in the subterranean oratory of St. Stephen whence they were afterwards translated to the church which Dulcidius had built at the foot of Rupes-Cornelia, called after the martyr in question. He succeeded St. Agripanus in the bishopric, and was succeeded by Higericus, according to Le Cointe, in the year 705. (Gall. Christ. ii. 691; Deschamps, Dictionnaire de Géographie, p. 1363.) [D. R. J.]

DULCITIUS (1). [IRENE.]

(2) Tribune and notary, charged with executing the imperial decrees against the Donatists, c. A.D. 420, to whom Augustine writes (Ep. 204 (61)), blaming him for proclaiming that "they were to be given up to the death they deserved," as the punishment of death was not decreed against them, and for being slightly too courteous to a Donatist bishop, but generally praising him, summing up very briefly his own former arguments against the Donatists on the nature of martyrdom, of liberty of conscience, &c.; claiming to mourn over their suicides as David over Absalom, and trying to refute the justification of suicide, which they attempted to find in the example of Razius, in the book of Maccabees (cf. Aug. Retract. ii. 59). [DONATISTS; GAUDENRIUS.] [E. B. B.]

(3) The notary, among the legates of pope Leo at the synod of Ephesus in 449 (Ceillier, x. 174). [E. B. B.]

(4) 10th bishop of Toul. Nothing is known of Dulcitus except his name, and the order in which he stands amongst the other bishops of that diocese, which he ruled between the years 532 and 549, though not during the whole of that time. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 962.) [D. R. J.]

DULIANI, a sect of Arians, so called from their using the word δοῦλος to describe the relation of the Son to the Father (Theodoret, Haer. Fab. iv. 4). [G. S.]

DULICHIANUS. [DOLICHIANUS.]

DUN, DUNNUS, the eleventh bishop of Rochester; consecrated, according to the A. S. Chronicle, in 741 (M. H. B. p. 329). He took part in the council of Clovesho in 747 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 362). If the charter mentioning his successor Eardulf, under the date 747 (Kemble, C. D. No. 96) be genuine, he must have died the same year. A charter of Ethelbert of Kent in 732, granting land at Liminae to

"abba presbyter Dun," may belong to the same person (Kemble, C. D. No. 77). [S.]

DUNANUS, DUNIANUS, DUMANUS, DUMIANUS, missionary to Britain. [DUVIANUS.]

DUNCHADH, son of Cennfaeladh, abbat of Hy, May 25. He was grandson of Maelcobha, of the race of Conall Gulban, and closely related to the preceding and contemporaneous kings of Ireland. His name was latinised as Donatus, and he is first known as abbat of Kill-lochuir, or Kill-clochuir, on the east coast of South Ulster, where in Colgan's time he was annually honoured as the patron of the place and of sailors; Lanigan (Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, n. 48) thinks the place must be what is now called Killough in the county of Down. He then became abbat of Hy, first, according to the Annals of Ulster, in A.D. 706 (707), probably as coadjutor to Conamhail, and then as his successor, when he is said to have ruled for seven years, A.D. 710-717; but this can only be by supposing either that a schism had occurred in the brotherhood, as Dorbene is said to have been elected to the chair in A.D. 713, dying the same year, and Faelcu in A.D. 716, who survived and succeeded Dunchadh; or, as is much more probable, that these were elected as Tanist abbats or coadjutors on account of Dunchadh's age or infirmity (see O'Connor's important notes, in his Rer. Hib. Script. iv. 72, n. 1, 78 n. 3, and DORBENE FODA). Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 139) says he was ten years in the abbacy, a statement which is true, if we include the time between his election and his entrance upon the full discharge of his abbatial duties at Conamhail's death. Camerarius may have felt the difficulty, and says that Duumchadus or Dunichadus (Mar. 24), abbat of Hoy, the most fertile island of saints, was over the monastery of Hoy for many years, not without the fame of sanctity and miracles. That for which his abbacy is most notable is the adoption, by the Columban monastery, of the Roman Easter and tonsure, under the influence of a Northumbrian priest named Egbert or Egberct, according to Bede (Ecol. Hist. iii. c. 4). This was after they had clung to their own calculation for a hundred and fifty years, appealing to the authority of their founder, and had refused compliance even to St. Adamnan. Their last celebration according to the Scotie usage was at Easter, A.D. 715 [EGBERT]. The Felire of Aengus calls him "Duncad of cold Iae," and in the Litany of Dunkeld he stands among the abbats as Dunichad. (Colgan, Acta SS. 744-6, at March 24, which is sometimes marked as his festival, and Tr. Thaum. 480 n. 18, 499; Reeves, Adamnan, 379-80; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 4; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. c. 15, wks. vi. 244-5, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 717; Bede, Ecol. Hist. iii. cc. 4, 27, v. c. 22; Grub, Ecol. Hist. Scott. i. 113-14, 118; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 328; Butler, Lives of the Saints, v. 378, May 25.) [J. G.]

DUNGAL was a not uncommon name among the Irish saints (Colgan, Acta SS. 257 n. 15), but the most famous person bearing this name was one in the beginning of the 9th century, who called himself an exile from Ireland, "and was one of the most learned men of his time, an excellent theologian, poet, and scholar." We first find him living as a recluse in the monastery of St. Denis, A.D. 811, but soon after, he became a public teacher in France, and then in Italy. When the double eclipse of the sun happened, in the year 810, Charlemagne the emperor made special application to the Irish learned men in his kingdom for an explanation of the unusual occurrence, and in the following year Dungal provided a deeply learned treatise in reply. (O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Scriptor. iv. 140, 175, and Prolegomena, ii. 136.) We do not know the exact date of his going into Italy, or the occasion of his journey, but he was chief teacher in the school at Pavia, when Lothaire II., in his endeavour to revive learning in Italy, selected him to superintend the whole system of the universities in the eight principal cities of Italy, in A.D. 823; and when Claudius had been made bishop of Turin by Louis I. of France, in A.D. 821, and had declared open war with the use of crosses, images, and invocation to saints, Dungal came forward as one of the most learned apologetes on their behalf, in a work entitled, Responsa contra perversas Claudii Turonensis episcopi sententias, in A.D. 827. All his works bear the marks of a deeply learned mind on all theological and scientific subjects. His treatise written for Charlemagne upon the solar eclipses, is given by D'Achery (Spicileg. tom. x.), and for his other works see the Hist. Littéraire de la France, by the Benedictines, tom. iv. 'Dungal.' He probably spent his closing years in the Irish monastery of Bobbio, to which he left his large and valuable library, of which a catalogue is given by Muratori (Antiq. Ital. tom. iii. Diss. 43); a great part of this library is now in the Ambrosian library at Milan. (For Dungal and his time, see Fleury, Hist. Eccl. xiv.-xlviii.; Mosheim, Eccl. Hist. cent. ix. ch. 1, § 7, ch. 3, § 17; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 20; Schröckh, Kirchengeschichte, xxiii. 407-21; O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Scriptor. iv. 175-76; Reeves, Adannan, xxiii.; Prim. Ch. Hist. Ir. i. 394 sq.; Ware, Irish Writers, 17.) He is greatly praised by Muratori, Mabillon, Bellarmine, and others, for his solid learning, and he was valued both in France and Italy for his deep and varied acquirements.

[J. G.]

DUNNA, DUNNE. A nun to whom Ethelred, king of Mercia, gave land to found a monastery at Withington, which afterwards came to the cathedral of Worcester (Kemble, C. D. No. 82). [BUGGA.] [S.]

DUNNIUS. Joceline, in his Life of St. Patrick, relates that St. Patrick built at Sabhall or Saul a famous monastery, which he gave in charge to one of his disciples, Dunnyus, whom he made its abbat, and to it he often returned and stayed. This Dunnyus is nowhere else mentioned, by this designation, but the general opinion seems to be that he is the saint who is venerated as Modune or Modunius on May 29, the Mo being prefixed "honoris et singularis observantiae causa." (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 72, c. 32, 100 n. 33, 265, col. 2; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 19, 222; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, works, vi. 405-6.) [J. G.]

DUNSTAN is spoken of by Leslaeus as an abbat in Scotland, in the reign of king Aidan (i.e. in the end of the 6th century), and a contemporary of other two learned men, Hebrudus and Convallus, or Divinicus and Coganus (Leslaeus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. lib. iv. 146, 163). From this basis Dempster has a short memoir of St. Dunstanus in his History, and in his Men. Scot. at Jan. 28, says he was abbat in Levinia (now Lennox), and confessor to the excellent king Aidan. Camerarius (June 18) and others commemorate him, while the Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. 28, tom. ii. 807) place "Dunstanus, Abbas Scotus," among their Praetermissi. But Dunstan is in all likelihood only another form of Drostan, Drustan, Dustan [DROSTAN]. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 468; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 207; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 159; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 191, 219.)

[J. G.]

DUNUWALD, a "minister" of Ethelbert, king of Kent (ob. A.D. 760). Being about to go to Rome ad limina apostolorum to take a sum of money as a present from his late royal master, he bestows his villa in case of death on the church of St. Peter and St. Paul, where Ethelbert was buried. This villa was a gift of the king to him, situated in the market by Queen-gate, Canterbury (ad Cuenegatum urbis Dorouernis in foro) in the neighbourhood of the church. The document is dated A.D. 762, and is attested by archbishop Bregwin (Kemble, C. D. No. 109). The gate, in later times written Quenigate, and reckoned one of the minor gates of the city (more likely therefore to have been ancient), has long disappeared, but Somner identified its situation, as standing almost but not quite opposite the chief gate of St. Augustine's monastery. He considered it to have been named after queen Bertha, who might have frequently passed through it in going to St. Martin's church. "A remanent of Britthish bricks laid and couched arch-wise at a place in the wall a little northward of the postern shews the very place." (Somner, Antiqq. of Canterbury, 1703, p. 16, where also a reference to Dunwald's vill.)

[C. H.]

DURDAN, Welsh saint of 6th century, companion of Cadfan, settled in Bardsey, and reckoned one of the presiding saints of that island. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 224.) [C. H.]

DURIOTORUS, 6th bishop of Rennes, is said to have subscribed, through his procurator Bertulfus, to the acts of the first council of Châlons, about the middle of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 741.) [D. R. J.]

DUTHERIUS, third bishop of Nicaea in the south of France, said (Gams, Series Episc. 588) to have been slain by the Vandals, A.D. 483 or 493. He lived about the end of the 5th century, but nothing is known of his life. (Gall. Christ. iii. p. 1273.) [D. R. J.]

DUTHRACHT appears to be a name for male or female.

(1) Of Leamchoill, Oct. 25. O'Clery (Mort. Foneg. by Todd and Reeves, 283) thinks she may be the same as I-urach, daughter of Euna, son of Corbmae, who is of the race of Colla-dá-Chrioch. The same person is given by Colgan (Acta SS.

713, c. 4, n. 12) among the saints belonging to the family of the Oirghialla or Oriels, and of the race of Colla-da-Crioch, but is called "St. Dhracna, alias Ductracta, filia Endei," &c., and is said to be venerated on 29 (? 25) Oct. or 12 Nov.; on the latter day Mart. Doneg. has St. Duthracht, virgin, of Cill-muine.

DUTHRACHT (2), of Liathdruim, May 16. This Duthracht is thought by O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 131) to be Duthracht, son of Trichem, of Caoin-druim, brother of Dichu (Apr. 29), son of Trichem, of Sabhall, who is of the race of Faitach Finn, monarch of Erin [DICHU]; O'Clery further states that it is at Teamhair he is (buried or venerated), and that Liath-druim and Drum-caoin are names of Temhair (Tara). Colgan (Acta SS. 61, c. 2, 307, c. 2, and Tr. Thaum. 100 n. 35) give lists of the sons of Trichem, and places Duthracht third, calling him bishop of Aendrum (Nendrum), but Lanigan (Ecc. Hist. Ir. i. c. 7, n. 74) does not feel bound to give credit to Colgan's lists "of the pretended brothers of Dichu, St. Patrick's first convert." [J. G.]

DUUNCHADUS (Bede, H. E. v. 22). Abbat of Hy. [DUNCHADII.] [C. H.]

DUVANUS, said to have been sent by pope Eleutherius into Britain (Galf. Mon. Hist. iv. 19). [DERUVIANUS.] [C. H.]

DUVIANUS (1), said to have been sent by pope Eleutherius, on the application of king Lucius, as a missionary to Britain in company with Faganus. Both of them occur under many different forms, most of which, with the authorities for them, are given by Ussher, who prefers Duvianus or Dwywan and Faganus. The two missionaries, according to the Iolo Manuscripts, which call them Dyfan and Fagan, came to baptize the Cymri, the church of the former being Merthyr Dyfan in Morganwg. Other traditions connect them with Cornwall [DERWA], with the supposed see of Cornsbury [DERUVIANUS, DIRUVIANUS], and with the supposed see of Winchester [DUVIANUS]. Matthew of Westminster relates that in A.D. 186 the two "beati antistites" returned to Rome and obtained papal confirmation for all their proceedings, after which they resumed their mission with numerous assistants, causing Britain soon to shine bright with the Christian faith. Their names and acts, he adds, are written in the book of Gildas, concerning the victory of Aurelius Ambrosius. See also Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant., wks. ed. 1847, t. v. p. 75; E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 495. The varieties of the name, some of which are obviously due to the common confusion of the letters u and n, are DAMIANUS, DERUVIANUS, DERUVIANUS, DERUVANUS, DERWA, DIMANUS, DIMIANUS, DINAN, DIUCUANUS, DIVIANUS, DIVINIANUS, DIWANUS, DONATIANUS, DUMANUS, DUMIANUS, DUNANUS, DUNIANUS, DUUIANUS, DUVANUS, DWYWAN, DYFAN, DYVAN. [C. H.]

(2) Said to have been appointed bishop of Winchester by king Arthur. (Bened. Claudioc. de Vit. Dubric. in Wharton, Angl. Sac. ii. 659.) [C. H.]

DWYFAEL, early Welsh saint of uncertain date, the son of Pryderi ab Dolor of Deira and Bernicia. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 307.) [C. H.]

CHRIST. BIOGR.

DWYNWEN, female Welsh saint, of the 5th century, considered by Welsh bards the patron saint of lovers. She was the foundress of a church in Anglesey called Llanddwynwen or Llanddwyn; commemorated January 25. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 151.) [C. H.]

DWYWAW, Welsh saint of the 6th century, brother of Derfell, patron saint of Llanddwywau, a chapel subject to Llanenddwyn in Merionethshire. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 221.) [C. H.]

DWYWE, wife of Dunawd or Dinodus abbat of Bangor, reckoned among the Welsh saints of the 6th century, but having no churches dedicated to her. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 207.) [C. H.]

DYFAN (Rees, Welsh Saints, 81, 84), sent by Eleutherius to Britain. [DUVIANUS.] [C. H.]

DYFNAN, son of Brychan, Welsh saint of the 5th century, founder of Llandyfnan in Anglesey, where he was buried: three chapels were dedicated to him; commemorated April 23. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 142.) [C. H.]

DYFNIG, Welsh saint of the 6th century, one of those who accompanied Cadfan to Britain. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 224.) [C. H.]

DYFNOG, Welsh saint of the 7th century, probably the second saint of Dyfynog in Brecknockshire; which was originally founded by Cynog ab Brychan. Commemorated February 13. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 295.) [C. H.]

DYFRIG (Rees, Welsh Saints, 170), archbishop of Caerleon. [DUBRICIUS.] [C. H.]

DYMPNA. [DIMPNA.]

DYNAMIS [see POWER], in the system of Basilides as described by Irenaeus (i. 24), named together with Sophia as following Nous, Logos, and Phronesis in the series of emanations from the unborn Father. (See also Epiphanius, Haer. 24, p. 73; Theodoret, Haer. Fab. i. 4.) [G. S.]

DYNAMIUS (1) bishop, Angoulême. Nothing is certainly known of the bishops of this diocese between St. Ausonius (A.D. 260), who was the first bishop, and Dynamius (A.D. 450). Nothing is known of Dynamius except what is stated in Gregory of Tours. Quoting a certain Paulinus, a presbyter, he describes Dynamius of Ecolisma among a list of "sacerdotes" who are "worthy of the Lord." A certain Dynamius subscribed to the synodical epistle sent in the year 451 by the bishops of Gaul to pope Leo I., and some writers think that he was the same person as the subject of this article. After Dynamius the bishopric was again vacant till about the year 500. (Gall. Christ. ii. p. 977; Gregor. Turon. Hist. Franc. lib. ii. cap. 13; Patrol. Lat. lxxi. 210; Leo Mag. Epist. xcix.; Patrol. Lat. liv. 966; Gams, Series Episc. p. 490.) [D. R. J.]

(2) Third bishop of Béziers (Biterra), flourished about the middle of the 5th century, according to Gallia Christiana, but his history is involved in much obscurity. Tillemont mentions him as possibly bishop of Béziers. His name is omitted by the Sammarthani. Both Tillemont and Quesnel seem to have formed their conjecture without any sound reason except that a certain Dynamius, who contributed largely towards rebuilding the church of Narbonne, was bishop of the province of Narbonne, where the bishop of Béziers ranked next to the archbishop. (Gall. Christ. vi. 296; Tillemont, tom. xv.; Hist. Eccles. p. 405.) [D. R. J.]

DYNAMIUS (3), known by the title of PATRICIUS, from his rank as patricius Galliarum, was born of a noble family at Arles, in the middle of the 6th century. When only thirty, he was appointed governor of Marseilles, where he became infamous for his tyranny and avarice. He drove into exile Theodorus, the bishop of that city, and confiscated the revenues of that see. Later in life he became the subject of a conversion which transformed him into a trusted friend of Gregory the Great, and a munificent benefactor to the church. Among Gregory's letters are two to him. In the first (Epist. lib. ii.; Ind. xi. Ep. 33) he thanks him for his faithful administration of the estates of the church of Rome in Gaul, and presents him with a cross containing some filings from St. Peter's chains and St. Lawrence's gridiron. The second (lib. v. Ep. 33) simply urges perseverance in prayer. He died A.D. 601, as we learn from a letter of Gregory's (lib. ix. Epist. 70) consoling his brother Aurelius on this event. His political compositions in early life are mentioned with commendation by Venantius Fortunatus (Poem. lib. vi. 11). We have from his pen two letters, given by Migne, and the biographies of St. Marius, abbat of Bevon, given in an abridged form by Mabillon (Saec. Bened. tom. i. p. 105; Bolland. Act. Sc. Jan. 27), and of St. Maximus, abbat of Lerins, and afterwards bishop of Riéz (Surius, Nov. 27). Both are given by Migne (Patrolog. tom. lxxx. pp. 24-40). The epitaph of Dynamius and his wife Eucheria are given by Duchesne (Hist. France, i. 519). (Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 546.) [E. V.]

(4) Grandson of Dynamius Patricius, composed an epitaph for his grandfather by order of his father. (Duchesne, Hist. France, i. 518; Ceillier, xi. 401.) [W. M. S.]

(5) Thirteenth bishop of Avignon, is said to have been a priest at Marseilles before he was created bishop of Avignon, which diocese he ruled twenty-two years. He died A.D. 627. (Gall. Christ. i. 799.) [D. R. J.]

(6) Thirty-fifth bishop of Avignon, lived in the early part of the 7th century, when Sabinianus was pope, and Clotarius II. king. He was brought up at the court of king Sigibertus, by whom he was created patrician and prefect of a province. After the death of his wife, he vowed himself to God, entered the priesthood and served at Marseilles. On the recommendation of king Theodericus he was made bishop of Avignon, in which diocese he founded many churches and monasteries. He died in the twenty-third year of his episcopate, and was buried in the basilica of SS. Peter and Paul. His epitaph, which is contained in an ancient codex, and quoted in Gallia Christiana, corresponds with these facts.

He must be a different person from DYNAMIUS PATRICIUS, author of the lives of St. Marius and St. Maximus, for that personage is said to have died in 601, whereas Dynamius, bishop of Avignon, was consecrated in 605. The two poems of Venantius Fortunatus (Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. 229) are addressed to Dynamius Massiliensis, and must mean the bishop of Avignon. Dynamius Patricius is called by Gregory of Tours Dynamius Arelatensis. (Patrol. Lat. lxxi.; Gall. Christ. i. 867.) [D. J. R.]

DYSCOLIUS, 6th bishop of Rheims, about the year 346. Nothing is known of his life except that he is supposed by some to have been present in the year 346 at the council of Cologne, and in 347 at the council of Sardica, and to have died in the east during that visit, while others deny that there ever was such a person. The ancient catalogues of Rheims, however, testify that he existed as bishop of that diocese, and they are supported by Demochares, Marlotus, the Sammarthani, and others. (Gall. Christ. ix. p. 4.) [D. R. J.]

DYSIBOD (DISEN), July 8. He is said to have been a bishop in Ireland about A.D. 620, and by some styled bishop of Dublin; on account of the prevalent corruptions in faith and morals, he left Ireland and went forth as a missionary. After preaching some years through Germany, he settled in the diocese of Mentz, and built a monastery, which was the foundation of the present town of Disenberg, the ancient Mons Disibodi. There he was an episcopus regionarius, an abbot-bishop, without jurisdiction beyond his own monastery, and had under him a staff of twelve canons "ad numerum xii. apostolorum" (Todd, St. Patrick, 109-10; Reeves, Adamnan, 300); in the monastery, Lanigan says, the rule of St. Benedict was observed. He is said to have died in the eighty-first year of his age, on an eighth of July, and his life was written by the abbess Hildegardis, who died Sept. 17, A.D. 1180. The date of St. Disibod's death as usually given from Mar. Scotus, is A.D. 674. (Lanigan, Eocl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 18, § 9; Mabillon, Annal. Ben. at A.D. 674; Ware, Irish Writers, 11; O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Scriptor. iv. 191; Leslaeus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. lib. iv. 154; Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 375.) The Vita Sti. Disibodi is published by Surius (Acta SS. tom. iii. at Jul. 8) and by the Bollandists (Acta SS. tom. ii. 581-99, the Life itself however occupying only pp. 588-97). Dempster (Hist. Eocl. Scot. i. 205) says he has seen a book written by him upon the Proficiency of Monks in their solitary Estate, but, like much else in Dempster, the authorship is doubtful. In Men. Scot. at June 8, he adds this, however, which may be perfectly true, that, while in Ireland, bishop Dysibod wrought hard at the overthrow of rites of unspeakable wickedness. [J. G.]
